Economic Concerns May Have Dragged Down GOP. The New York Times (11/12, BU5, Altman, 1.16M) writes, "Politics affects economics, and vice versa -- at least that's the widely held theory. But what was the reality in last week's election? To paraphrase a Clinton-era mantra, it really might have been the economy, stupid. More than 80 percent of voters in an exit poll…said the economy was a very important or extremely important issue. That percentage was the highest for any issue, including Iraq and terrorism."

DOJ_NMG_0093200

DeLay Legacy "Cast A Long Shadow" Over Elections. The Houston Chronicle (11/12, Roth, Hedges, 530K) runs a feature called "How The Hammer Fell On His Own Party" about how "the legacy of the once powerful Republican Tom DeLay...cast a long shadow over last week's elections, in which voters shrank the ranks of a party accused of being too partisan, too cozy with special interests and too fond of big spending." DeLay "helped build a Republican political empire that he tried to make immune from erosion by pushing the 2003 Texas redistricting plan that threw several veteran House Democrats out of office. For years the former pest exterminator ruled with an iron hand that brought his party legislative victories but also intensified the poisonous partisan mood in Washington."

GOP Losses In Indiana Highlight Anti-"Insider" Trend. The New York Times (11/12, A28, Nossiter, 1.16M) examines Republican losses in usually solidly GOP Indiana, concluding that in three House races, GOP candidates "appeared to have unwittingly entered" into traps. In "all three cases, to demonstrate being a Washington insider was to court doom, no matter how much the incumbents railed against the ways of the capital."

Rove Remains Upbeat Despite GOP Setbacks. The Washington Post (11/12, Baker, 690K) runs a front-page profile of Karl Rove headlined "Rove Remains Steadfast In The Face Of Criticism," that begins by saying that "for a man still climbing out of the rubble," Rove "seemed in his usual unflappable mood" after the elections. The "rest of Washington might think Tuesday's elections were a repudiation of Rove's brand of politics, but Rove does not. For years, he has been the center of hyperbolic attention -- called the genius, the electoral mastermind, the most powerful presidential adviser in a century, Bush's brain, the master of the dark arts of wedge politics, the Republican Moses leading conservatives out of the desert. The mythology grew to such an outsized degree that when Rove insisted again and again during the campaign that Republicans would win despite the odds, fearful Democrats convinced themselves that he must have known something they did not and waited for an October surprise to spring. … It turns out that Rove is mortal after all, and not always so good at math." But "allies argued that without Rove, the losses would have been worse."

Chafee Says White House Partisanship Did In Centrist Republicans. In a New York Times (11/12, WK13, 1.16M), op-ed, Sen. Lincoln Chafee writes, "I was one of the many moderate Republican casualties of the anti-Bush virulence that swept the country. Despite my having voted against the Iraq war resolution, my reputation for independence, the editorial endorsement of virtually every newspaper in my state, and a job approval rating of 63 percent, I did not win. Why? Back in December 2000…Vice President-elect Dick Cheney was the guest at a weekly lunch meeting of a small group of centrist Republicans. … I was startled to hear the vice president dismiss suggestions of compromise and instead emphasize an aggressively partisan agenda. … I was incredulous. Instead of a new atmosphere of cooperation and civility which, after all, had been the promise of the Bush-Cheney campaign, we seemed ready to return to the poisonous partisanship that marked the Republican-Congress/Clinton White House years. … In my view, one of the most popular refrains expressed by Governor Bush during the presidential campaign was, 'I am a uniter, not a divider.' I believe moderate Republicans can help the new administration develop a unifying agenda in the next session of Congress."

Webb Says He May Be A Maverick In Senate. Under the headline "Webb May Be Senate Maverick," the Washington Post (11/12, C1, Craig, Shear, 690K) says "few know what to expect" when Sen.-elect James Webb "enters the nation's most exclusive club." Webb said he "might be a bit of a maverick in the Senate, which could frustrate Democratic leaders who poured more than $6 million into his campaign. … Webb said he will model himself after former New York senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D), whom he described as someone 'who had government experience that was shaped by the intellectual world.'"

Sidarth Says "Politics Of Division Just Don't Work Anymore." In a Washington Post (11/12, B2, 690K), op-ed, S.R. Sidarth writes, "This past summer, between my third and fourth year of college, I decided to volunteer" for the Webb campaign." In August, "I was singled out at a GOP picnic, identified as 'macaca or whatever his name is' -- despite the fact that Allen knew my name…and then 'welcome[d] to America and the real world of Virginia.' Allen's actions that day stood out because they were not representative of how I was treated while traveling around the state. Everywhere I went, though I was identifiably working on behalf of Allen's opponent, people treated me with dignity, respect and kindness. … The larger question that this experience brings up is: How far has society progressed on the issues of race and openness? By 2050, according to most projections, the United States will be a minority-majority nation. But the fact that Allen believed I was an immigrant, when in fact I am a native Virginian, underlines the problems our society still faces. … The politics of division just don't work anymore. Nothing made me happier on election night than finding out the results from Dickenson County, where Allen and I had our encounter. Webb won there, in what I can only hope was a vote to deal the race card out of American politics once and for all."

DOJ_NMG_0093201

Shays Will Be Only New England GOP Representative In Next Congress. The New York Times (11/12, A35, Applebome, 1.16M) profiles Rep. Christopher Shays, barely reelected last week, who, "like the only survivor of a hotel fire," was a "little hesitant to draw too many conclusions but glad he was alive." Shays was "one of the few Republicans among perhaps two dozen seen as vulnerable back in September who managed to survive. He was the only one of the three Republican incumbents from Connecticut who won re-election. When he went to Congress, he was one of nine Republican representatives from the six New England states. In the next Congress, he will be the only one."

Four Bush Appeals Court Nominees Seen As "Doomed." The New York Times (11/12, A26, Lewis, 1.16M) says the Democratic wins "will produce a vast change in an area that has produced some of the sharpest partisan battles in recent years: President Bush's effort to shape the federal bench with conservative judicial nominees. There is a strong consensus that the four most conservative of Mr. Bush's nominations to the federal appeals courts" -- Terrence W. Boyle, William J. Haynes II, William G. Myers III, and Michael B. Wallace – "are doomed."

Detroit Automakers To Seek Bush's Attention On Issues. The Detroit Free Press (11/12, Hyde, 373K) reports, "When the heads of Detroit's automakers finally take their seats at the White House on Tuesday across from President George W. Bush, their concerns will boil down to the old Aretha Franklin song: R-E-S-P-E-C-T. From the rising cost of retiree health care to the advantages a weak yen gives the Japanese, the Detroit automakers will press for more recognition for their issues, something industry executives say has been lacking from the president. They'll also attempt to draw distinctions between themselves and the foreign automakers whose U.S. branches generate record profits. But they will make clear that their concerns do not add up to another seven-letter word: B-A-I-L-O-U-T." GM Vice Chairman Bob Lutz said recently that the "meeting should 'enhance the president's understanding of the importance of the domestic auto industry to the economic health of the United States'…emphasizing the word 'domestic.' Foreign automakers that build cars in the United States help the economy, 'but it's not the same as a fully integrated American auto company that retains the intellectual property in the United States, has primarily American shareholders,' he said, so 'the wealth gets reinvested in the U.S.'"

Democrats Could Seek To Add Bargaining Ability To Medicare. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (11/12, Japsen, 230K) reports, "The Democratic landslide in last week's midterm elections raises the specter of federal regulation of drug prices via changes to Medicare's new prescription drug benefit -- a move that could lower costs for seniors and squeeze pharmaceutical and health insurance industry profits. With Democrats in control of both houses of Congress, they are almost certain to seek passage of price control measures in that legislative body. And there are enough Republicans who supported price-control measures in the past that bills will gain momentum next year, analysts say, meaning members of Congress who vote against them will feel the wrath of seniors in the 2008 election."

White House Scrutinizes Nevada Land Sale Profits. The Washington Times (11/12, Hudson, 88K) reports the Bush Administration "is trying to get its hands on millions of dollars generated from sales of federally owned land in Nevada in order to help pay down the deficit." The Times points out that Nevada public land sold as part of the Southern Nevada Public Land Management Act has brought "in nearly $3 billion." The Bush Administration "now wants some of the money transferred to the Treasury Department to help pay down the federal deficit." The Times adds that Nevada Sens. Harry Reid and John Ensign "oppose diverting the money out of Nevada."

DOJ_NMG_0093202

OTHER NEWS:

Liberals, Activists Expect "Their Due" From Democrats. The Los Angeles Times (11/12, A1, Wallsten, Hook, 850K) reports the Democrats' "incoming congressional leaders have immediately found themselves in another difficult struggle -- with their own supporters. Some of the very activists who helped propel the Democrats to a majority in the House and Senate last week are claiming credit for the victories and demanding what they consider their due: a set of ambitious -- and politically provocative -- actions on gun control, abortion, national security and other issues that party leaders fear could alienate moderate voters and leave Democrats vulnerable to GOP attacks as big spenders or soft on terrorism." Both Senate leader Harry Reid and House leader Nancy Pelosi "has pledged in recent days to 'govern from the center,' after a campaign in which anger over the Iraq war and GOP scandals helped their party attract some unusually conservative candidates and a large share of independent voters. Turning off those new voters could undermine Democrats' hopes of solidifying their new majorities and taking the White House in 2008. But to the leaders of interest groups who are core supporters of the Democratic Party, and who had been barred under Republican rule from the inner sanctums of power, the new Congress means a time for action, not compromise."

Democratic Party Has Careful Balancing Act With "Netroots." The New York Times (11/12, WK5, Confessore, 1.16M) reports on the "long battle between leading netroots activists and their critics, real and perceived, among Washington's Democratic elite. … Though the netroots have forever changed how campaigns raise money and find votes, the results demonstrated that they cannot yet win elections on their own. But the Democratic Party cannot win major national elections without the netroots."

Some In GOP Urge Return To Party's Core Principles. The Washington Times (11/12, Lambro, 88K) reports Republican officials across the country said last week that voters "did not reject core Republican principles of lower taxes, smaller government and family values when they put the Democrats in charge of Congress. … If anything, these officials told The Washington Times, Republicans blundered by abandoning or de-emphasizing signature issues that had fueled the party's meteoric rise since the 1990s. The party must champion these issues again if it hopes to win back the voters' trust in the 2008 presidential election, the officials said."

Ponnuru Sees Hope For Social Conservatism. In a New York Times (11/12, WK13, 1.16M), op-ed, Ramesh Ponnuru of National Review writes, "Before we declare this election proof that social conservatism is doomed, consider that Republicans as a whole had a worse night. Pro-lifers lost four seats in the Senate and, depending on some unresolved races, appear to have lost 20 in the House. But the Republican Party lost six in the Senate and 29 in the House. The discrepancy stems from the fact that some pro-choice Democrats are replacing pro-choice Republicans, and even a few pro-life Democrats are replacing pro-life Republicans. Meanwhile, ballot initiatives as a whole went better for the social right than for other conservative factions. … That's something to remember the next time you hear that after their defeat, the Republicans need to 'move to the center.' Maybe they should: but which center? When editorialists talk about the 'sensible center,' they usually have in mind free-trading, budget-balancing social liberals. … But there is another center -- one that's liberal on economic measures but conservative on social mores."

Rich Says "Callous Conservatism" Brought GOP Losses. In his New York Times (11/12, WK12, 1.16M), column, Frank Rich writes, "Of course, the 'thumpin" was all about Iraq. But let us not forget Katrina. It was the collision of the twin White House calamities in August 2005 that foretold the collapse of the presidency of George W. Bush. Back then, the full measure of the man finally snapped into focus for most Americans, sending his poll numbers into the 30s for the first time. The country saw that the president who had spurned a grieving wartime mother camping out in the sweltering heat of Crawford was the same guy who had been unable to recognize the depth of the suffering in New Orleans's fetid Superdome. This brand of leadership was not the 'compassionate conservatism' that had been sold in all those photo ops with African-American schoolchildren. This was callous conservatism, if not just plain mean. It's the kind of conservatism that remains silent when Rush Limbaugh does a mocking impersonation of Michael J. Fox's Parkinson's symptoms to score partisan points. It's the kind of conservatism that talks of humane immigration reform but looks the other way when candidates demonize foreigners as predatory animals. It's the kind of conservatism that pays lip service to 'tolerance' but stalls for days before taking down a campaign ad caricaturing an African-American candidate as a sexual magnet for white women. This kind of politics is now officially out of fashion."

DOJ_NMG_0093203

Libertarian May Have Tipped Montana, And Senate, To Democrats. The Washington Post (11/12, D1, Harden, 690K) profiles Libertarian Stan Jones, a "perennial loser in Montana politics, a kind of Harold Stassen of the interior West, a fringe candidate who sometimes has to sue to get invited to television debates." But this year, the "quirkily conservative" candidate took 10,324 votes in a race won by Democrat Jon Tester by 2,565 votes, "which tipped the Senate to the Democrats, which tipped the scales of U.S. political history. 'I'm tickled about that,' said Jones. After some reflection, he added, 'There is excitement for you to be talking to the guy who changed the country.'"

Defeated Representatives May Turn To Lobbying. The New York Times (11/12, WK2, Pilhofer, 1.16M) writes, "So it's the day after the election, and you've lost your seat in Congress. What to do? You might consider becoming a lobbyist. It is a well-traveled career path." A 2005 study by Public Citizen found that 43% of members of the House and Senate who left office between 1998 and 2004 became lobbyists.

Spitzer Hits Puerto Rico For Post-Election Break. The New York Times (11/12, A37, Eaton, 1.16M) writes about New York Gov.-elect Eliot Spitzer's post-campaign vacation in Puerto Rico. At a brief news conference after a meeting with the island's governor, Spitzer "referred to the war in Iraq as 'an unfortunate quagmire,' but said he had supported eliminating Saddam Hussein's threat to the international community. He pledged to appoint Latinos to important posts in his administration but sidestepped a question about Puerto Rico's status."

Ehrlich Does Not Plan To Seek Office Again. The AP (11/11, Witte) reports Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich Jr. said he does not plan to run for office again. He said the "results of the election Tuesday indicated Maryland has moved 'pretty hard left.'" Asked if he thought the anti-GOP trend nationwide hurt him, Ehrlich said that "when an incumbent is on the ballot 'it's generally a referendum on the incumbent.'"

Feingold Will Not Run For President In 2008. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (11/12, Gilbert, 255K) reports Sen. Russ Feingold said in a Saturday telephone interview that he will not run for president in 2008. Feingold said, "I never got to that point where I'd rather be running around the country, running for president, than being a senator from Wisconsin." He "conceded that he faced long odds of winning the nomination. 'It would have required the craziest combination of things in the history of American politics to make it work,' he said." The AP (11/12) also reports on Feingold's opting-out of the contest.

With Midterms Over, Presidential Race Shifts Into High Gear. CNN's Lou Dobbs This Week (11/11, Crowley) reported, "Across the country assorted politicians are dissecting the entrails of '06, with the Oval Office in mind. Not that anyone running for president will actually cop to it. … Roughly 10% of the US Senate is thinking about running for president, along with a couple of current and former House members, and several governors." Sen. John McCain's ambitions "are complicated by the '06 results, with much of the country wanting a plan to get out of Iraq. He thinks the way out is to put more troops in. McCain's lead position in the tough guy category has been challenged by Rudy Giuliani, His Honor, the in-your-face 9/11 New York mayor. He's been frequently areas west of the Mississippi and south of the Mason-Dixon, where so far they have politely ignored that he is pro-gay rights, pro-choice, and pro-gun licensing." Sen. Hillary Clinton "is the political world's most reluctant bride. She hasn't set foot on the presidential trail, running from Iowa to New Hampshire, making her all the more appealing. … Clinton's pull is so strong, she's in a class all her own. The other class in her party is the 'not Hillarys' -- generally less controversial, more centrist options like former vice presidential candidate John Edwards or Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh. From rising stars to familiar faces, from the right and the left and everywhere in between, you're going to need a scorecard to keep up. But the game is on."

The New York Times (11/12, WK1, Nagourney, 1.16M) writes that Sen. George Allen "had yet to hand back the Senate to the Democrats when Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa announced bright and early Thursday morning that he was running for president. Back in Washington, Senator John McCain of Arizona moved to set up his own presidential exploratory committee and prepared what aides promised would be two major speeches this Thursday about 2008, based on last Tuesday's vote. And Hillary Rodham Clinton scored the election-week cover of New York magazine; the subject was not her easy return to the Senate. In some ways, the midterm election of 2006 was the first big event of the 2008 race -- much like an early debate or an Iowa straw poll. It helped shake out and shake up the field. Some lessons were instantly apparent: you probably won't hear more talk of Republican candidates wrestling for the mantle of President Bush, and Democrats are looking hungrily at Ohio and Colorado, states that went Republican in 2004 and 2000."

DOJ_NMG_0093204

The Washington Post (11/12, B5, 690K) runs two op-eds examining the parties' prospects for the next campaign. Barbour Griffith & Rogers Chairman Ed Rogers looks at Republicans Sen. George Allen, Sen. Bill Frist, Newt Gingrich, Rudy Giuliani, Sen. John McCain, Gov. Mitt Romney, and "the rest…Dick Armey, Sam Brownback, Chuck Hagel, Mike Huckabee, Duncan Hunter and George Pataki." Joe Trippi, who ran Howard Dean's 2004 presidential campaign considers Democrats Sen. Evan Bayh, Sen. Joseph Biden, Wesley Clark, Sen. Hillary Clinton, John Edwards, Sen. Russ Feingold, Al Gore, Sen. John Kerry, Sen. Barack Obama, Gov. Bill Richardson, and Gov. Tom Vilsack.

In a Washington Post (11/12, B1, 690K), op-ed, Rolling Stone's Benjamin Wallace-Wells writes that the possible candidacies of Clinton and Obama "suggest that the next elections may play in ways that are more cultural and symbolic than tactical and political. Are Americans ready to put a black man or a woman in charge of the country? And does the hefty symbolism that Obama and Clinton would bring help one of them more than the other -- in other words, is the country more racist or more sexist?"

HIV Patients' Life Expectancy Increases. The AP (11/11) reports that an American with the HIV hires that can lead to AIDS "can expect to live for about 24 years on average, and the cost of health care over that time is more than $600,000, new research indicates. Both life expectancy and the cost of care have risen from earlier estimates; mainly because of expensive and effective drug therapies."

Ground To Be Broken For King Memorial On National Mall. The Washington Post (11/12, C1, Dvorak, 690K) reports that "ground will be broken in many ways tomorrow morning with a ceremony heralding construction of the Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial on the Mall. The memorial, scheduled to be completed in 2008, will mark a change in the very character of some of America's most hallowed real estate…The Mall."

WPost Says US Voting System Worked Well Overall. The Washington Post (11/12, B6, 690K) editorializes, "An estimated 83 million Americans voted in last week's elections. Some people encountered difficulties, but not of the scale or scope that had been predicted by Election Day doomsayers. Overall the voting system worked. … No one denies there are shortcomings. The generational decline in voter turnout is more reason than ever to figure out better ways to encourage voting. Is early voting a good idea? Should Election Day be a national holiday? How about adopting Oregon's system of voting by mail? All are ideas worthy of consideration, but let's not fool with parts of the process that aren't broken."

LATimes Says Naturalized Citizens Should Be Permitted To Seek Presidency. The Los Angeles Times (11/12, 850K) editorializes, "On Tuesday, citizens in an electoral-vote-rich state reelected a governor who had once seemed in danger of defeat. That sort of political resurrection ordinarily would be good for a mention or two in the endless speculation about 2008 presidential candidates. Unfortunately, this reelected governor can forget about aspiring to the highest office in the land. … A core principle about the equality of opportunity in our society to strive for the highest office. … Americans should be free to decide whether they want to be led by President Jennifer Granholm. Gotcha! Who'd you think we were talking about? … Were you perhaps thinking of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger? In this nation of immigrants, there will always be individuals affected by this arcane discrimination, and the urgency to address the matter should not be dampened by partisan concerns that it may help one candidate or another. Indeed, it would be nice to see California Democrats spearhead the movement, even if it could theoretically benefit our Austrian-born governor."

NYTimes Incredulous About Corporate Calls For More Lax Regulation. The New York Times (11/12, WK11, 1.16M) editorializes, "Corporate profits are at record levels. The Dow, too, has climbed past its high-water mark from the dot-com era. Executives reap bigger and bigger paydays, even as wages have stagnated. Meanwhile, the widening investigation into stock-option backdating reminds us that the corporate malfeasance era was much more than just a couple of bad apples like Enron and WorldCom. It seems almost unbelievable, then, that corporate America would pick this moment to beg for relaxed regulation and enforcement, as well as more protection from investors' lawsuits. … The rationale is that the high cost of complying with the corporate governance law, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, along with runaway lawsuits have scared foreign companies away from American stock exchanges." But the SEC "has already signaled that it will smooth the implementation of Sarbanes-Oxley, especially for smaller companies. And abuses of the private litigation system like pay-to-play should be stopped. There is room for reform. But over all, the system is working."

DOJ_NMG_0093205

US Vetoes UN Security Council Gaza Resolution. NBC Nightly News (11/11, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported Israeli PM Ehud Olmert "is on his way to Washington for talks with President Bush. On the eve of those discussions, the US vetoed a Security Council resolution condemning an attack in Gaza earlier this week."

The New York Times (11/12, Hoge, 1.16M) reports the US vetoed a UN Security Council resolution "that condemned Israel for its military actions in Gaza and called for an immediate withdrawal of Israeli forces from the area." Ambassador John Bolton "told the Council that the resolution 'does not display an even-handed characterization of the recent events in Gaza, nor does it advance the cause of Israeli-Palestinian peace.'" Despite revisions to the draft, Bolton "said it remained 'in many places biased against Israel and politically motivated.'" The Times says Washington "traditionally opposes what it considers one-sided Security Council resolutions on Israel, and Saturday's vote was the fourth time in three years that Washington had taken such action."

The AP (11/12, Bergman) quotes Bolton saying, "This resolution does not display an evenhanded characterization of the recent events in Gaza, nor does it advance the cause of Israeli-Palestinian peace to which we aspire and for which we are working assiduously." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that "the draft resolution would have aggravated the situation in Gaza because it contained 'inflammatory and unnecessary language. We do not believe the resolution was designed to contribute to the cause of peace.'"

Hamas Says Unity Government Imminent. The AP (11/12, Aji) carries comments by Hamas official Moussa Abu Marzouk "that a deal on forming a Palestinian national unity government was near, adding that an agreement on a new prime minister has been reached." The AP adds, "Abu Marzouk said Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Hamas officials have agreed on a candidate for the Palestinian prime minister, but declined to disclose the candidate's name, saying: 'It will be disclosed at the suitable time.'" Also, Abbas said yesterday "that he hoped to form a coalition government with the Islamic Hamas party by the end of the month."

Shiite Cabinet Resignations Could Cripple Beirut. The New York Times (11/12, Slackman, 1.16M) reports Lebanon "was thrown into a political crisis Saturday when talks broke down over giving [Hezbollah] and its political allies greater control of the government. Almost immediately, cabinet ministers from the group and the other main Shiite party resigned." This week's talks were focused on "trying to defuse tensions among the various government factions after Hezbollah demanded a greater role in the cabinet and called for its alliance to have veto power over all government decisions." While it had "appeared the talks were headed toward a compromise, the negotiations collapsed when Hezbollah refused to relinquish its demand for a veto, people in the talks said." The Shiite resignations make the government illegitimate under the 1989 Taif Agreement, forcing officials to move into a caretaker mode. The Times adds, "Lebanon's political stability, and the success or failure of the sitting government, is not just consequential for this country of four million. It is part of a broader contest between" Washington, Tehran and Damascus.

The Washington Post/AP (11/12, A14) notes the resignations "could cost the Western-backed government crucial support from Lebanon's Shiite Muslims." Prime Minister Fouad Siniora "said he would not accept the resignations. He has the authority to order the five cabinet ministers to stay on, but it was unclear if his weak government could enforce the demand." The AP says the "resignations are not enough to bring down Siniora's government -- eight cabinet ministers must resign for the government to collapse -- but they could cost him support among Shiites, the majority sect in Lebanon, and make it difficult for him to govern."

Russia Eyes Mediating Role In Iran Nuclear Dispute. The AP (11/12) notes Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov "said Saturday that he believed international talks with Iran over its atomic program were still possible, maintaining that Russia could help bridge differences with other negotiating partners, including the United States." Lavrov "said his country would continue efforts to bring Iran back to negotiations with Germany and the five permanent members of the" UNSC. President Vladimir Putin "met Saturday with Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, ending two days of talks that signaled a renewed push by Moscow to persuade Tehran to freeze its uranium enrichment effort. Iran, however, has so far snubbed Moscow's proposal to host its enrichment program." Larijani "remained defiant after the first round of meetings Friday, saying Tehran would push ahead with its nuclear program, and suggesting it could break off ties with the U.N. nuclear watchdog if the world inflicted punishments proposed by European nations."

DOJ_NMG_0093206

North Korea Talks Could Resume. NBC Nightly News (11/11, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Talks may soon be underway between officials with US and North Korea. Discussions could begin next week aimed at six-country talks on the north's nuclear program. It may include the financial sanctions imposed on North Korea.

The AP (11/11) carries Japanese newspaper reporting that Washington and Pyongyang "may hold talks in New York as early as this week aimed at working toward the resumption of six-nation discussions on Pyongyang's nuclear program." The Japanese daily "reported that officials from the two countries will discuss, among other issues, financial sanctions imposed on North Korea."

In Return To Power, Ortega Said To Emphasize "Reconciliation And Stability." In an analysis piece, the AP (11/12, Carl) reports Daniel Ortega "returns to Nicaragua's presidency a shadow of the fiery revolutionary who in Cold War times vowed an endless fight against a U.S. government determined to overthrow him." Ortega "now preaches reconciliation and stability, and promises to maintain close ties with the U.S. and the veterans of the Contra army it trained and armed against him. He has traded his wartime military fatigues for a white shirt and jeans. His guide, he says, is God, not Karl Marx." Ortega's post-election "speeches have focused on reassuring skeptics that he plans no radical changes and will embrace free trade, job creation and close U.S. ties." The AP adds, "More than ever, Ortega will need the support of his former enemies, and they have pledged to keep him in check. U.S. State Department spokesman Gonzalo Gallegos says cooperation with Ortega and his government will be 'based on their action in support of Nicaragua's democratic future.'"

A lengthy Washington Post (11/12, A12, Aizenman, 690K) piece entitled, "Former Contras Bemoan Ortega's Return To Power In Nicaragua," adds, "A week after [Ortega's election], Nicaraguans of all political stripes are still reeling. But perhaps none feel more personally affronted than the surviving foot soldiers of the U.S.-funded anti-Sandinista force, known as contras," some of whom "view Ortega's return in almost apocalyptic terms." Others said "their concern was that his victory would embolden his more radical supporters to harass former contra fighters in the many urban neighborhoods and rural villages across Nicaragua where old foes now live side by side."

Two UN Peacekeepers Killed In Haitian Capital. The AP (11/11) reports, "Two U.N. peacekeepers from Jordan were shot to death in Haiti's capital after coming under attack by gunmen, U.N. officials said Saturday." UN police spokesman Fred Blaze "said the soldiers came under attack in the Sonapi section of the capital near Cite Soleil, a slum where well-armed street gangs blamed for kidnappings are based."

German Immigrant Integration Efforts Contrasted With French "Estrangement." In an opinion piece in the New York Times (11/12, WK11, 1.16M), David Unger details the growing realization among "Germany's most conservative politicians" that "there is no reason someone cannot be German and Muslim at the same time. In America, that idea would be unremarkable. In Germany, with its tragic history of exclusive nationalism and race-based citizenship, it is an intellectual revolution." Describing public programs designed to reach out to immigrant women, Unger says, "It took a long time for Germany's leaders to wake up to the fact that millions of foreign-born or foreign-descended residents … intend to live their lives in Germany with no plans of returning to their ancestral homelands. More than three million of these new Germans are Muslims -- nearly two million from Turkey, with most of the rest from Bosnia, Albania, the Arab world, Pakistan and Iran." While "Germany has a long way to go," Unger adds, its "new approach contrasts favorably with that of neighboring France -- the home of Western Europe's largest and perhaps least integrated Muslim population."

DOJ_NMG_0093207

Public's View Of Official Corruption Worsening. The New York Times (11/12, BU2, Stein, 1.16M) briefly notes the release of Transparency International's "annual corruption perceptions index, which gauges how people view the honesty of public officials in 163 countries." The survey shows a growing perception of corruption in Iraq, Brazil, Cuba, Israel, Jordan, Laos, Algeria and the United States, which "fell three spots, to tie for 20th with Chile and Belgium. The pecuniary relationships that Jack Abramoff and other lobbyists had with certain members of Congress apparently took a toll on the country's reputation. And a substantial number of voters cited corruption as a factor in their decision in the midterm election last week."

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Centrist Path In Congress May Rile Democrats' Base."
"California Voters In A Happy State."
"Vietnam Activists See An Opening."
"'Laguna' Cast As The Villain In Laguna."

New York Times:
"Incoming Democrats Put Populism Before Ideology."
"Entrepreneurs See A Web Guided By Common Sense."
"Democrats Aim To Save Inquiry On Work In Iraq."
"Sectarian Rifts Foretell Pitfalls Of Iraqi Troops' Taking Control."
"Frustration Grows At Carousel As More Baggage Goes Astray."
"Sports Artist Sued For Mixing Crimson And Tide."

Washington Post:
"After Battle, Generation Kept On Fighting."
"Despite Billions Spent, Rebuilding Incomplete."
"Rove Remains Steadfast."
"Democrats Find Lessons In GOP Reign."
"Special Panel Could Reshape Iraq Policy."

Washington Times:
"For Vets And President, A Day Of Remembrance."
"Christianity Seen At Risk Of Extinction In Birthplace."
"Core Values Still Valid, GOP Says."
"Americans Believe In God, With Conditions."

Detroit Free Press:
"Michigan's Band Of Brothers: Loved Ones Soldier On."
"Carmakers' Agenda For Bush: Hear Our Pain."
"Going To The Airport? Pack Some Extra Cash."
"Three Motorists Die In Police Chase In Detroit."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Why Are ASA Planes So Late?"
"Kids Test Positive For Cocaine."
"Georgia Bucks Democratic Trend."
"Perdue: Few Promises To Keep."

Houston Chronicle:
"Texas, Louisiana Pipeline Maps Inaccurate."
"Probes Dig Deeper In Halliburton Bribery Case."
"Texas Democrats Hoping Gains Weren't A Fluke."
"Defeat At K-State Means Double Whammy For Ut."
"Houston Artists Scattering From Traditional Spaces."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Evening news was preempted by sports.
CBS: Evening news was preempted by sports.
NBC: Iraq War; US Soldiers Become Citizens; President Seeks Father's Advice; Election 2008; Public's View Of Veterans; Accidental Israeli Attack On Gaza; Future Talks With North Korea; New York Navy Rescue; CD's Replaced By Digital; Storm On Saturn; Teenager's Tribute To Veterans.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.

White House: PRESIDENT BUSH: No public schedule.
VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY: No public schedule.

US Senate: No scheduled events.

US House: No scheduled events.

Other: ISRAELI PRIME MINISTER OLMERT. Highlights: 5:30 a.m. Arrives at Andrews AFB. 6 p.m. Dinner with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Closed press.

Nov. 12 - 14. EDUCATION _ The Public Education Network holds its 16th annual conference on the transformation of public education by local education funds. Location: Fairmont Hotel, 2401 M St. NW. Contacts: Howie Schaffer, 202-628-7464 ext 209

DOJ_NMG_0093208

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
New Federal Probes Target Posada 2
CIA Says Detainee Treatment Is National Security Issue 2

Homeland Response:
More Air Travelers' Bags Missing In Wake Of Liquid Ban..... 3

War News:
Iraq Study Group May Have Few Good Options..... 3
Baghdad Suicide Bomber Kills At Least 33 4
Gates Selection Could Help Close Pentagon-State Rift..... 4
"No Tears" For Rumsfeld At Camp Victory 5
Casey Says US Has Resolve To Carry Out Iraq Mission..... 6
US Offers Reward For Information On Missing Soldier..... 6
Officer Who Refused Deployment Faces Court-Martial 6
Democrats Move To Save Iraq Reconstruction IG 6
Iraqi Corruption Fighter Is Accused Of Fraud 7
Iraq Seen As Longing For New "Strongman."..... 7
Romania To Stay In Iraq 7
Karzai Struggles To Steer Afghanistan..... 7

Corporate Scandals:
Former Tyco Head Is Selling Assets 7

Criminal Law:
More Subpoenas Issued In Menendez Probe 8
FBI Likely To Continue Congressional Corruption Probes 8
US To Seek Death Penalty In Hawaii Case..... 8

Civil Rights:
Osceola County, FL, Could Settle Discrimination Suit On Monday 9
Massachusetts Poll Workers Meet Goal..... 9
New Jersey Settles Suit Over Boy's Death For $7.5 Million..... 9

Antitrust:
Gannett Could Bid On Tribune Properties..... 9
Class-Action Suit Against Microsoft To Open Monday In Iowa ... 10
Sports Artist Sued Over Use Of Alabama's School Colors 10
Actor Sues Wisconsin Man Over Use Of Name..... 10

Environment:
Corpus Christi Left With Cleanup Bill In Asarco Mess..... 10

Immigration:
Weiner Seeks Deportation Of Former Nazi Guard..... 11
State Immigrant Protection Rules Prove To Be Unpopular 11

Congress-Administration:
As Bush Honors Soldiers, War Woes Continue To Drag On Him11
Democratic Freshmen Hope To Bring Pragmatism To Capitol Hill 12
Democrats Already Strategizing To Hold New Majorities..... 13
Rove Remains Upbeat Despite GOP Setbacks 14
Chafee Says White House Partisanship Did In Centrist Republicans 14
Webb Says He May Be A Maverick In Senate 14
Shays Will Be Only New England GOP Representative In Next Congress..... 15
Four Bush Appeals Court Nominees Seen As "Doomed." 15
Detroit Automakers To Seek Bush's Attention On Issues 15
Democrats Could Seek To Add Bargaining Ability To Medicare . 15
White House Scrutinizes Nevada Land Sale Profits..... 15

Other News:
Liberals, Activists Expect "Their Due" From Democrats..... 15
Some In GOP Urge Return To Party's Core Principles..... 16
Libertarian May Have Tipped Montana, And Senate, To Democrats..... 16
Defeated Representatives May Turn To Lobbying..... 16
Spitzer Hits Puerto Rico For Post-Election Break..... 16
Ehrlich Does Not Plan To Seek Office Again..... 17
Feingold Will Not Run For President In 2008 17
With Midterms Over, Presidential Race Shifts Into High Gear 17
HIV Patients' Life Expectancy Increases 17
Ground To Be Broken For King Memorial On National Mall 17
WPost Says US Voting System Worked Well Overall..... 18
LATimes Says Naturalized Citizens Should Be Permitted To Seek Presidency..... 18
NYTimes Incredulous About Corporate Calls For More Lax Regulation..... 18
US Vetoes UN Security Council Gaza Resolution..... 18
Shiite Cabinet Resignations Could Cripple Beirut 19
Russia Eyes Mediating Role In Iran Nuclear Dispute..... 19
North Korea Talks Could Resume 19
In Return To Power, Ortega Said To Emphasize "Reconciliation And Stability."..... 19
Two UN Peacekeepers Killed In Haitian Capital..... 19

German Immigrant Integration Efforts Contrasted With French "Estrangement." 20
Public's View Of Official Corruption Worsening 20

The Big Picture
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 20

Washington's Schedule
Today's Events In Washington 20

TERRORISM NEWS:

New Federal Probes Target Posada. The Miami Herald (11/12, Chardy, Weaver) reports, "One of the first things the businessman noticed about Luis Posada Carriles was that he spoke funny. Posada, who mumbled because of an old bullet wound in his jaw, frequently visited the businessman's Guatemala utility company in 1997 to meet with two co-workers." The Herald continues, "The businessman grew suspicious after one of the workers told him about Cuban exile plans to assassinate Fidel Castro and after a Venezuelan politician confided that Posada, a CIA-trained explosives expert, was a 'very dangerous individual.' … Concerned that Posada was using his utility business to plot illicit activities, the businessman hid a transmitter in an office and overheard the two co-workers talk with Posada about placing a 'putty-like explosive' in the shoes of Central Americans paid to pose as tourists on trips to Cuba. … Soon afterward, the businessman became a 'confidential source' for the FBI's investigation into bombs that exploded at Cuban tourist sites in 1997, killing an Italian and wounding seven others." The Herald notes, "The businessman, a Cuban-American engineer who set up the utility company in Guatemala City in 1996, could turn out to be the central figure in the Justice Department's rekindled criminal investigation of Posada. The probe is back on track -- despite the fact that the FBI field office in Miami destroyed evidence in 2003 about the initial Cuba bombing case. … Federal grand juries in New Jersey and Texas are investigating the secret activities of Posada, 78, who is detained at an immigration facility in El Paso, Texas. The Texas probe focuses on whether he lied about how he sneaked into the country. The New Jersey investigation, aided by the FBI in Miami, is zeroing in on his role as the alleged mastermind of the dozen tourist-site bombings in Cuba that investigators think were financed by Cuban exiles in Union City, N.J. … Either of the probes could lead to the first indictment of Posada in the United States."

Under the headline "FBI Destroyed Evidence As 'Routine' Matter," the Miami Herald (11/12, Weaver, Chardy) reported that the FBI's destruction of the Cuba bomb plot evidence "posed a serious challenge" to the renewed investigation, however, "officials portrayed the destruction as a routine administrative procedure after the U.S. attorney's office closed the case in August 2003 because of lack of progress in the investigation. 'We routinely destroy evidence in cases that have been closed,' said FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela, noting the agency needed to make room for other records in its evidence room at the time. She added that the FBI has been able to rebuild the body of evidence in the Cuba bombing probe, which targets Posada." Meanwhile, former FBI Miami SAC Hector Pesquera "said that any suggestion he sought to protect Posada from prosecution was 'preposterous.'"

Author Criticizes DOJ Investigations As Lackluster. In a Washington Post (11/12) op-ed titled "Why the FBI Is Coming After Me," author Ann Louise Bardach criticizes the US for what she sees as an unenthusiastic investigation of Posada Carriles and for the DOJ subpoena of her records from her interviews with him. Bardach adds, "Before the government starts tampering with the Constitution's protections of the press, it needs to do some housecleaning. A good start would be a special prosecutor to look into who ordered the removal of the Posada evidence, and why. If it then decides that it wants to go further, it might peruse the 45 years' worth of CIA and FBI files on Posada that detail his paramilitary career. And there are a dozen or so comrades of Posada's in Miami and New Jersey who know a great deal more than I do. But that's assuming that the government wants to prosecute Posada. It has declined to do so for decades. And nothing so far suggests that it is inclined to start now."

CIA Says Detainee Treatment Is National Security Issue. The Detroit Free Press/McClatchy Newspapers (11/12, Rosenberg) reports, "The CIA is still trying to impose secrecy around 14 top Al Qaeda suspects now held at the Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, detention center, including an alleged 9/11 mastermind, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed." McClatchy continues, "The arena for the effort is the U.S. District Court of Judge Reggie Walton in Washington, D.C., where the government is seeking a still-undefined restriction on the attorney-client relationship in the case of Majid Khan, one of the 14. … The CIA argues that details of the man's three years of detention and interrogation at so-called black sites -- out of reach of the International Red Cross -- are national security secrets." McClatchy adds, "Khan's attorney, Gita Gutierrez, argues that the Bush administration's intent is not to safeguard national security but to cover up three years of extrajudicial detention of her client -

DOJ_NMG_0093211

- to 'conceal illegal or embarrassing executive conduct.' … Khan, 26, was captured in his native Pakistan in 2003. The White House says he's linked to unsuccessful plots to blow up gas stations in the United States, poison U.S. water supplies and assassinate Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. … It's not known where he was held or how he was interrogated to establish these links. He hasn't been charged with a crime." McClatchy notes, "At least some of the 14 men whom President George W. Bush ordered handed over to the military this summer were reportedly submitted to harsh, classified interrogation techniques, including simulated drownings -- known as water-boarding -- to break their will. .. .Court documents filed by the government suggest that the 14 newest arrivals at Guantanamo, among them alleged Osama bin Laden deputies, would never be integrated into the general population of more than 430 captives, for fear they would talk about their secret confinement to other captives, who could, in turn, pass on the details to their lawyers. … In seeking to redefine attorney-client contacts, Justice Department lawyers offered a seven-page affidavit from CIA officer Marilyn Dorn, who describes herself as 'the information review officer for the National Clandestine Service.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

More Air Travelers' Bags Missing In Wake Of Liquid Ban. The New York Times (11/12, Bailey, 1.16M) reports on its front page that since August 10, "when a ban on most carry-on liquids sent the amount of checked luggage soaring, airlines have been misplacing many more bags, and the fumbling could well escalate during the busy holiday travel season." The Transportation Department also reported that "more fliers had their bags go missing in August than they did a year earlier" and "it got worse in September." The Times notes that currently "efforts are under way to fix two of the worst baggage operations" in the US, although "financial problems have slowed industry investment in technology that could improve bag handling."

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Study Group May Have Few Good Options. The Washington Post (11/12, A1, Abramowitz, Ricks, 690K) reports in a front page article, "Those familiar with the panel's work predict that the ultimate recommendations will not appear novel and that there are few, if any, good options left facing the country. Many of the ideas reportedly being considered -- more aggressive regional diplomacy with Syria and Iran, greater emphasis on training Iraqi troops, or focusing on a new political deal between warring Shiites and Sunni -- have either been tried or have limited chances of success, in the view of many experts on Iraq. [James] Baker is also exploring whether a broader U.S. initiative in tackling the Arab-Israeli conflict is needed to help stabilize the region." The Post states that the panel might have to contend with political pressures: "While Baker has been testing the waters for some time to determine how much change in Iraq policy will be tolerated by the White House, [Lee] Hamilton perhaps faces the now even-more-difficult challenge of cajoling Democrats such as former Clinton administration chief of staff Leon E. Panetta and power broker Vernon E. Jordan Jr. to sign on to a plan that falls short of a phased troop withdrawal, the position of many congressional Democrats. ... Within the panel, staffers and expert consultants have waged warfare by memo as idealists argue with pragmatists over particulars."

Baker, Gates Bring "Bush 41" Mindset To Administration. NBC Nightly News (11/11, story 3, 2:16, Mitchell, 9.87M) examined the changing of the guard in the Bush Administration's inner circle and how, "after six years of rejecting advice from members of his father's advisory team, the President is calling them off the bench, James Baker to craft an exit strategy in Iraq. His father's CIA Director Bob Gates to replace Donald Rumsfeld at the Pentagon. … The President bristled when Brian Williams asked if he was seeking his father's advice." Bush: "He understands I have often times have information he doesn't have." Mitchell: "There have been tensions. Gates, who had dinner with the President's father in Texas last night, has been sharply critical of the way the Pentagon has run the war." Former Rumsfeld adviser Kenneth Adelman: "I think it is the end of the kind of missionary spirit of George W. Bush and the resurgence of the calm stability arguments of George Herbert Walker Bush."

Blair Will Address Iraq Study Group. The Washington Post (11/12, A17, Sullivan, 690K) reports British PM Tony Blair "will speak via video link with officials from the Iraq Study Group on Tuesday to discuss 'U.K. ideas on Iraq and the Middle East,' a Blair spokeswoman said Saturday. ... The Guardian newspaper on Saturday reported that Blair would urge the panel to push the Bush administration to begin talks with Syria and Iran to persuade those two countries to become more involved in finding a solution to the situation in Iraq. The newspaper also reported that Blair would press Baker and Hamilton to recommend that any solution in Iraq depends on the United States making a 'reenergized push for peace in the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.'" The report was called "speculation" by the Blair spokeswoman.

WPost Says Baker-Hamilton Could Find Common Ground. The Washington Post (11/12, 690K) editorializes, "A close look at what the White House and Democrats have been saying, along with what is emerging from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, offers grounds for some optimism. There is, in fact, a center to the war debate that offers the outlines of a way forward." The group will "almost certainly endorse an idea long favored by Mr. Biden and many other Democrats: an attempt by the United States to find common ground on Iraq with its neighbors -- including Syria and Iran. ... Both the Bush administration and Democrats must face the possibility that no amount of U.S. pushing will produce political results or diminish the violence in Baghdad, at least in the short term. For some time, Mr. Maliki and other Iraqis have been warning any American who will listen that the dynamics driving the war won't necessarily respond to timetables drawn up in Washington. ... The United States needs a strategy for defending its own vital interests in that case. As it happens, Mr. Maliki has one to offer: In the last couple of weeks he has made clear that his government's priority is to gain full command over the Iraqi army the United States has been building and take the lead in fighting the Sunni-al-Qaeda insurgency. That means that U.S. troops could begin moving to a supporting role, backing up the Iraqi units with air power and rapid reaction forces."

DOJ_NMG_0093212

Brooks Says Baker-Hamilton May "Produce More Peace" At Home Than In Iraq. In his New York Times (11/12, WK12, 1.16M) column, David Brooks writes, "Both parties are desperate to be substantially out of Iraq by 2008. Vietnam-haunted Democrats don't want to be saddled with the remains of the war if they retake the White House. Most Republicans don't want to wage another campaign under the Mesopotamian shadow. The president, however, is thinking about the decades-long struggle, not the next election, so the G.O.P. could be heading toward a blood feud between 'Let's end this' Republicans and 'Let's win this' Republicans, with the potential bitterness lasting for years." The Baker-Hamilton commission "may produce more peace in America than in Iraq," and "events in Iraq are moving more quickly than adjustments in Washington. ... Visitors to Baghdad have been surprised by the lack of urgency many Iraqi leaders seem to feel in the face of national disintegration."

Hoagland Says Bush Lost His Gamble But Middle East Still Needs To Change. In his column for the Washington Post (11/12, B7, 690K), Jim Hoagland writes, "President Bush lost more than a midterm election and a cantankerous defense secretary last week. He also abandoned any lingering chance of remaking U.S. foreign policy into a radical force for democratic change in the Middle East and elsewhere." However, Hoagland claims that now-ascendant "realism" itself had failures: "Only the incompetence and discord of the past three years could cause reasonable people to welcome back with applause policymakers who failed to anticipate and then opposed the breakup of the Soviet Union; who were not realistic enough to see, much less prevent, the Balkans from plunging into flames; and who 'coddled dictators from Beijing to Baghdad' ... So hold the champagne and cheers for the return of 'realism.'"

Baghdad Suicide Bomber Kills At Least 33. The AP (11/12, al-Bashir) reports, "A suicide bomber blew himself up outside a police recruiting center in Baghdad early Sunday, killing at least 33 people and wounding 56, police said. Crowds of recruits were gathering outside the center in western Baghdad's Nissur Square when the bomber detonated explosives strapped to his body, police Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razaq said. He said the death toll was expected to rise because many of the injuries were extremely serious." The attack "was one of several on Sunday in the capital, where sectarian violence kills scores each week."

Iraqi Gunmen Kill 10 Shiites, Abduct 50 Others. The AP (11/11) reports, "Sunni gunmen ambushed a convoy of minibuses Saturday night at a fake checkpoint on a highway south of Baghdad, killing 10 Shiite passengers and kidnapping about 50. ... Police said the mass kidnapping and killing was near Latifiyah, about 20 miles south of Baghdad in the so-called Triangle of Death."

Sectarian Rifts In Diyala Portend Problems After Iraqis Take Over. The New York Times (11/12, A1, Oppel, 1.16M) reports in a pessimistic front page article, "Diyala is now teeming with Shiite militiamen who have rushed in from Baghdad in recent months to protect the Shiite population from attacks. Once considered by American officials to be relatively pacified, it has become a cauldron of violence carried out by insurgents and militias, intensified by sectarian-influenced security forces. As pressures for a phased United States withdrawal build, the experiences of American commanders over the past year in Diyala provide a window on the possible consequences of ceding authority to the Iraqi Army."

Gates Selection Could Help Close Pentagon-State Rift. Under the headline, "In Gates Selection, White House Hopes To Close Rift Between State And Defense," a piece in the New York Times (11/12, Sanger, Shane, 1.16M) says President Bush "selected Robert M. Gates as his new defense secretary in part to close a long-running rift between the Defense Department and the State Department that has hobbled progress on Iraq, keeping the two agencies at odds on issues ranging from reconstruction to detaining terrorism suspects, according to White House officials and members of Mr. Gates' inner circle." Since September, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and National Security Adviser Steven Hadley "quietly steered the White House" toward replacing Donald Rumsfeld with Gates, "who had worked closely with Ms. Rice under the first President Bush." Rice and Rumsfeld "never managed to resolve their differences," and as NSA "during Mr. Bush's first term, Ms. Rice was unable to halt a war between the State Department and the Pentagon that put senior officials in the departments in a state of constant conflict."

DOJ_NMG_0093213

Gates Could Signify Shift Toward "Realists." BBC.com (11/11, Beale) reports, "The departure of Donald Rumsfeld is seen as one indication that the White House has listened to its critics. ... The departure of Mr Rumsfeld and the arrival of Robert Gates at the Pentagon is being interpreted as the end of the road for the ideologues and the re-entry into orbit of the foreign-policy 'realists'. So-called 'realists' are supposed to have a more nuanced view of the world. They do not - like the so-called neo-conservatives - see everything in black and white terms. ... No doubt the new arrivals will bring a fresh perspective to the White House. But don't expect US forces to exit Iraq overnight or for Iran and Syria to be greeted with open arms." Furthermore, victorious Democrats "cannot afford to appear weak in the face of the threats that America faces if they are to have any chance of eventually taking the White House," and President Bush "has already made it clear that he is not going to abandon his goal of defeating terrorism in Iraq or ease the pressure on North Korea and Iran."

Gates's "Slogging Through" Iran-Contra Recalled. The AP (11/11, Yost) reports in a negative, historically oriented article, "Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada says he has questions about Gates' involvement in Iran-Contra. Republicans plan to push the nomination through before they lose control in January. Thomas Blanton, director of the National Security Archive, a private group that has collected hundreds of thousands of pages of documents on the scandal and published several books on it, calls Gates 'the ultimate hear-no-evil see-no-evil high official during Iran-Contra.' In a final report, Iran-Contra prosecutor Lawrence Walsh said that, 'like those of many other Iran-Contra figures, the statements of Gates often seemed scripted and less than candid.' The AP adds, "Questions about Gates focus not on what he did in Iran-Contra, but on what he knew."

Gates Speech Quoted As Clue To Thinking. The Outlook section of the Washington Post (11/12, B4, 690K) reprints a September 8 speech by Secretary-designate Gates at Texas A&M University (sardonically titling it "How Not To Run The Pentagon") in which he "cautioned against new leaders arbitrarily imposing their ambitious agendas, only to witness the reversal of their efforts immediately after they leave." Gates said, "Some leaders arrive with ambitious agendas and seek to impose them by fiat -- unilaterally and from above. They usually provoke either paralyzing opposition and internal warfare, or see the reversal of every action immediately after their departure. ... What, then, is the formula for successful leadership in public institutions, above all a great university? I believe it begins with a leader's recognition that his or her time in office is finite and that the institution and those who carry out its mission endure. They were there long before the leader arrived, and will be there long after he or she departs."

"No Tears" For Rumsfeld At Camp Victory. NBC Nightly News (11/11, story 2, 1:58, Askill, 9.87M) reported, "On this Veterans' Day American troops in Iraq mustered for a special ceremony. Seventy-five soldiers from 33 countries were sworn in as American citizens at Baghdad's Camp Victory. … There were no tears for Donald Rumsfeld's resignation as Secretary of Defense." Sgt. Miguel Bravo: "I am glad he is out of that position. Hopefully the new guy will do better things." Askill: "Military analysts say the 'new guy,' Robert Gates, faces an almost impossible situation."

Cafferty Criticizes Pentagon On Armor. On CNN's In The Money (11/11), anchor Jack Cafferty said, "How about a trade: one used defense secretary for enough armor to protect our soldiers, for starters."

Feith Defends Rumsfeld In WPost. In the Washington Post (11/12, 690K), former Under Secretary of Defense for Policy Douglas Feith writes, "Much of what you know about Donald Rumsfeld is wrong. ... I know that Don Rumsfeld is not an ideologue. ... Because of his complexity, Rumsfeld is often misread. His politics are deeply conservative, but he was radical in his drive to force change in every area he oversaw." Rumsfeld "has been attacked for insisting that troop levels for the Iraq operation be kept low, supposedly out of ideology and contrary to the advice of the military. What I saw, however, was that Rumsfeld questioned standard military recommendations for 'overwhelming force.' He asked if such force was necessary for the mission. And he asked what the consequences might be of having a large footprint in Iraq and playing into propaganda about the United States wanting to take over the country."

Rumsfeld's "Errors" Were Allegedly Shared By Generals. In a commentary for the Los Angeles Times (11/12, 850K), AEI scholar Frederick Kagan writes, "The strategy that has led to disaster in Iraq belonged to the commanders at least as much as to Rumsfeld. Scapegoating him in isolation will prevent us from learning the essential lessons of our recent failures." Kagan argues, "Belief in the value of technology and the need for light, swift ground forces pervaded the senior military leadership in the 1990s," being held by Gens. Eric Shinseki, Tommy Franks, and John Abizaid. Rumsfeld's failing was not his "managerial style, but his flawed understanding of war": he became "captive" to the "transformation program" that would "rely on information technology to permit American forces to locate, identify, track and destroy any target on the face of the Earth from thousands of miles away. Ideally, ground forces would not be necessary in future wars."

Rumsfeld Seen As "Central Villain" Of Woodward's "State Of Denial." In the New York Times Book Review (11/12, 1.16M), reviewer and New Republic editor Franklin Foer writes, "Where Bush appeared resolute in the first two installments of Woodward's trilogy, he now comes across as a 'Saturday Night Live' version of himself. ... But the president is too passive a player to be Woodward's central villain. Besides, Donald Rumsfeld fills that role far too perfectly. He comes across as utterly contemptuous of other human beings. ... What's worse, he is an obsessive micromanager, but one who disavows projects once they look doomed. As soon as the hunt for weapons of mass destruction seemed fruitless, he handed over the mission to the C.I.A. Rumsfeld takes so much pummeling that he eventually becomes a strangely sympathetic character." Foer finds "maddening reports of administration ham-handedness and arrogance" in Iraq and adds approvingly that Woodward has been forced by criticism "to change his style. There's less of his signature omniscience here."

DOJ_NMG_0093214

LATimes Publisher Recalls Playing Squash With Rumsfeld. In an op-ed piece for the Los Angeles Times (11/12, 850K), Times publisher David Hiller writes, "There was a period in the late 1990s when Don Rumsfeld and I played squash almost every month in Chicago, and before I say anything else, I should acknowledge this: He beat me almost all the time ... I think what struck me most was that Don never gave up on a point. His view was that every shot could be made, every game could be won, and he never surrendered until the last volley was played out."

Casey Says US Has Resolve To Carry Out Iraq Mission. The Los Angeles Times (11/12, Daragahi, Zavis, 850K) reports Gen. George Casey Jr. "voiced confidence Saturday that the United States would not abandon its mission in this violence-racked country amid a postelection reevaluation of Iraq strategy." His remarks "were among his first public statements since the resignation last week" of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Political insiders "have speculated that both Casey and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who was also at the ceremony, could leave their posts because of the Republican Party's defeat at the polls Tuesday."

US Offers Reward For Information On Missing Soldier. CNN (11/11, Lin) reported, "A reward is being offered in the search for a US soldier abducted in Iraq. The Army Reserve specialist was kidnapped nearly three weeks ago in Baghdad while visiting his Iraqi wife and family. The US military is offering up to a $50,000 reward for information leading to his recovery."

The New York Times (11/12, A12, Luo, 1.16M) reports the case "took a turn late last week when Entifad Qanbar, an associate of Ahmad Chalabi, the influential Iraqi politician, identified himself as the soldier's uncle and said that the kidnappers had issued a $250,000 ransom demand. American officials had been meeting with an intermediary trusted by those who had captured his nephew, he said." Qanbar said he had "asked for proof from the captors that his nephew was still alive, setting a deadline of noon last Saturday. But he has not had any contact with the kidnappers or their representatives since then, Mr. Qanbar said Saturday."

Officer Who Refused Deployment Faces Court-Martial. The Los Angeles Times (11/12, Watanabe, 850K) reports, "The nation's first commissioned officer to refuse deployment to Iraq said he was disappointed by the Army's decision last week to proceed with a court-martial against him but reiterated that he believed he did the right thing in opposing the war." Army 1st Lt. Ehren Watada "said that recent events had reinforced his belief that many Americans, including a growing number inside the military, shared his sentiments against the Bush administration's conduct of the war." Those events "include the midterm election results giving Democrats control of Congress, the resignation" of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, and a "landmark editorial in four affiliated military-focused publications calling for the Pentagon chief's ouster."

Democrats Move To Save Iraq Reconstruction IG. The New York Times (11/12, Glanz, Johnston, Shanker, 1.16M) reports on its front page, "Congressional Democrats say they will press new legislation next week to restore the power of a federal agency in charge of ferreting out waste and corruption in Iraq and greatly increase its investigative reach. ... The move would nullify a Republican-backed provision, slipped into a huge military authorization bill, that set a termination date for the agency, the Office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction. The agency's findings have consistently undermined Bush administration claims of widespread success in the reconstruction of Iraq." There is "unlikely to be much downside for the Democrats in going after waste and fraud in government contracting, particularly in the Iraq war, which is not only unpopular with the American public but also where corporate giants like Halliburton, Parsons and Bechtel have committed highly publicized missteps in the rebuilding program." In addition, "Outside the reconstruction program, some agencies are likely to be singled out for special scrutiny, not only the Pentagon, but also the Central Intelligence Agency and Federal Bureau of Investigation."

Iraq Reconstruction Said To Lag Despite US Funding. On its front page, the Washington Post (11/12, A1, Witte, 690K) headlines a piece on Iraqi reconstruction, "Despite Billions Spent, Rebuilding Incomplete." While an injection of $38 billion has produced many results, "as the U.S.-led, U.S.-funded portion of Iraq's reconstruction nears its end, American officials and contractors alike are grappling with a cold reality: Thousands of successes in Iraq may add up to a single failure." Many "inside the reconstruction effort say security concerns were hardly the only problem. Poor planning and coordination by U.S. officials meant that even successful individual projects failed to do the job; for example, health-care centers were built at great cost but had no water and sewer service. Poor work-site management by contractors meant that some projects went awry. And now that the United States is handing over reconstruction efforts to Iraq, many involved with the process worry that the Iraqis don't have the training or the money to keep U.S.-built facilities running." Noting that "this was not how the rebuilding of Iraq was supposed to go," the Post says many "Iraqis expressed frustration not just with the United States but with Iraqi leaders, too, for pocketing aid money that was supposed to be for everyone."

DOJ_NMG_0093215

NYTimes Says Democrats Must Investigate Iraq Planning. The New York Times (11/12, 1.16M) editorializes, "Criticizing President Bush's gross mismanagement of the war was a winning electoral strategy. But criticism will not extricate the United States from this mess, nor will it persuade voters that the Democrats are ready to take back the White House." The public "deserves a full accounting (backed by subpoenas, if necessary) of how prewar intelligence was cooked, why American troops were sent to war without adequate armor, and where billions of dollars in reconstruction aid disappeared to. ... The Democrats will also need to look forward -- and quickly. So far they have shared slogans, but no real policy." The Times warns that the Democratic call for "phased redeployment" might "only hasten Iraq's descent into civil war — while placing American soldiers who remain behind in even greater danger."

Iraqi Corruption Fighter Is Accused Of Fraud. The Los Angeles Times (11/12, Daragahi, 850K) reports, "Iraq's top anticorruption watchdog, a high-profile judge whose efforts have been hailed by Americans as one of the few bright spots in the country, is himself the target of a corruption probe, officials said Saturday. Judge Radhi Radhi, head of Iraq's Commission on Public Integrity, is under investigation by court authorities, accused of turning his 1,700-employee agency into a personal fiefdom and padding his salary with an extra $50,000 a year." Radhi, who "has worked closely with Stuart W. Bowen Jr. of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction," contends that "the pressure on his office might be a reaction to his attempts to ferret out corruption in key Shiite-controlled ministries." He is himself "Shiite but secular."

Iraq Seen As Longing For New "Strongman." In the New York Times (11/12, WK1, 1.16M), correspondent John Burns writes, "Mr. Hussein's outbursts served to remind many Iraqis, even those who hated him most, of something they crave in the rudderless nightmare Iraq has become under his successors: a strong leader ... It is something ordinary Iraqis say with growing intensity, even as they agree on little else. Let there be a strongman, they say, not a relentless killer like Saddam Hussein but somebody who will take the hammer to the insurgents and the death squads and the kidnappers and the criminal gangs who have banished all pretense of civility from their lives." Burns adds, "Of the many hard lessons America may take from its enterprise here, the impracticality of grafting American political values onto a society as different as Iraq's, by measure of culture, religion and historical experience, will surely be one. History may judge that attempting it in the midst of a savage war was the greatest of follies." However, "even if President Bush were convinced that Mr. Maliki should go, it is far from clear that the Americans would have the means to get rid of him."

Romania To Stay In Iraq. From an interview of Romanian President Traian Basescu, the AP (11/12, Kole) reports Bucharest "has no intentions of withdrawing its troops from the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq," according to Basescu, who vowed "to stay 'because it's a dishonor to leave your allies.'" He "said he empathized with mounting calls to withdraw the country's 608 non-combat personnel in Iraq, including impassioned pleas from the families of those serving. But 'Romania's honor is greater than its feelings,' he said."

Karzai Struggles To Steer Afghanistan. In an article exceeding 3,300 words, the Los Angeles Times (11/12, Watson, 850K) reports, "Five years after the fall of Kabul, aides say [Hamid Karzai] is turning to tradition as he struggles to build a stable democracy on a foundation of war, corruption, foreign interference and religious extremism. Critics counter that he is retreating behind the walls of his 19th century palace and losing touch with a country sinking deeper into trouble. But Karzai's foreign backers have left him with little real power, and his weak, corruption-riddled government lacks direct control over billions of dollars in development aid, money meant to help Karzai win Afghan support for his administration." Despite "enormous progress," many Afghans "see the nation slipping back into the grip of violence, corruption and extremism from which the West promised to liberate them." Karzai loses credibility "each time foreign troops accidentally kill Afghan civilians"; in addition, "For those Afghans suspicious of U.S. intentions, Karzai's close ties to the U.S. military were an issue from the start."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Tyco Head Is Selling Assets. The New York Times (11/12, Olson) reports, "When the government presented L. Dennis Kozlowski, the former head of Tyco International, with a bill for $167 million in fines and restitution, it was likely that everything would have to go." The Times continues, "After his 2005 conviction for looting Tyco, Mr. Kozlowski sold some big-ticket belongings, including his 130-foot yacht Endeavor and Impressionist paintings, whittling his debt to $59 million. … Now he's parting with his 8,600-square-foot chalet in Beaver Creek, Colo., complete with eight bedrooms and nine and a half baths — including one decked out as an outhouse. The sale price was $10 million, reduced from $11.5 million." The Times adds, "Brokers declined to identify the new owner, an oil-and-gas man based in Dallas, but said he also paid $750,000 for Mr. Kozlowski's furnishings, which include a stuffed mountain lion to greet visitors but no shower curtain like the infamous $6,000 model in his Manhattan flat."

DOJ_NMG_0093216

CRIMINAL LAW:

More Subpoenas Issued In Menendez Probe. The Newark Star-Ledger (11/11, Martin, Whelan) reported federal investigators "have resumed their inquiry into a rental deal" between Sen. Robert Menendez and the nonprofit Community Action Corp., "issuing new subpoenas in the days after he was elected to a full six-year term, according to a government source. The subpoenas sought documents related to the more than $300,000 in rent Menendez collected from the North Hudson Community Action Corp. between 1994 and 2003, the source said. It was unclear what records were sought or who was subpoenaed." The source also said, "More are coming."

FBI Likely To Continue Congressional Corruption Probes. McClatchy Newspapers (11/12, Gordon) reports, "The new chief of the FBI's Criminal Division, which is swamped with public corruption cases, says the bureau is ramping up its ability to catch crooked politicians and might run an undercover sting on Congress." McClatchy continues, 'Assistant FBI Director James Burrus called the bureau's public corruption program 'a sleeping giant that we've awoken' and predicted the nation will see continued emphasis in that area 'for many, many, many years to come.'" McClatchy adds, "So much evidence of wrongdoing is surfacing in the nation's capital that Burrus recently committed to adding a fourth 15- to 20-member public corruption squad to the FBI's Washington field office. … In the past year, former Republican Reps. Duke Cunningham and Bob Ney have pleaded guilty to corruption charges. FBI agents are investigating about a dozen other members of Congress, including as many as three senators. The Justice Department also is expected to begin seeking indictments soon after a massive FBI investigation of the Alaska Legislature. … If conditions warrant, Burrus said, he wouldn't balk at urging an undercover sting like the famed Abscam operation in the late 1970s in which a U.S. senator and six House members agreed on camera to take bribes from FBI agents posing as Arab sheikhs. … 'We look for those opportunities a lot,' Burrus said, using words rarely heard at the bureau during the past quarter century. 'I would do it on Capitol Hill. I would do it in any state legislature. ... If we could do an undercover operation, and it would get me better evidence, I'd do it in a second.' … Philip Heymann, who oversaw the Abscam investigation as chief of the Justice Department's Criminal Division during the Carter administration, expressed surprise to learn of the FBI's willingness to attempt another congressional sting after the outcry from Capitol Hill over Abscam. … 'It shows courage at the FBI,' said Heymann, now a criminal law professor at Harvard University. He said he concluded, after watching a recent public television documentary and listening to experts, that 'there is more corruption (on Capitol Hill) than I ever thought imaginable' and that a single FBI sting 'might result in very large numbers of prosecutions.' … But even without an undercover operation, Heymann and other observers say they have been pleased with the GOP-controlled Justice Department's willingness to pursue old-fashioned investigations, even if they hurt congressional Republicans."

US To Seek Death Penalty In Hawaii Case. The Honolulu Advertiser (11/12, Kobayashi) reports, "Justice Department officials have overruled federal prosecutors here and authorized seeking the death penalty for an Army soldier in a move critics say is part of a nationwide attempt by the Bush administration to spread capital punishment to non-death-penalty states." The Advertiser continues, "Naeem Williams, charged with murdering his 5-year-old daughter last year, is believed to be the first in the country to face the death penalty under a provision passed by Congress three years ago for first-degree murder cases involving 'a pattern or practice of assault or torture against a child or children.' … The U.S. Attorney's Office in Hawai'i recommended against seeking capital punishment for Williams and his wife, Delilah, who is also charged with the murder, according to sources familiar with the case who do not want to be identified because the recommendation is considered confidential. … The Justice Department went along with the recommendation for the 21-year-old wife, but U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who must approve federal death penalty prosecutions, authorized seeking capital punishment for the husband." The Advertiser notes, "That move is part of a trend under the Bush administration to seek the death penalty in Hawai'i and 11 other states that don't have capital punishment, some critics of the death penalty believe. … Gonzales and former Attorney General John Ashcroft authorized 180 death penalty prosecutions, including 51 cases in which the local U.S. attorney's office did not recommend capital punishment, according to the Federal Death Penalty Resource Counsel Project, a national information clearinghouse for court-appointed defense lawyers in federal death-penalty cases."

DOJ_NMG_0093217

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Osceola County, FL, Could Settle Discrimination Suit On Monday. The Orlando Sentinel (11/12, Pino) reports, "When Ana Erazo walked into the elections office on a summer day in 1990, her supporters followed and applauded after she filed the paperwork to run for County Commission. … 'It all started with me,' said Erazo, the first Hispanic to seek a commission seat. 'In those days, there was lot of prejudice against us.'" The Sentinel continues, "Erazo's tale is the first chapter in the struggle of Osceola's Hispanics for political power that came to a head last year when the U.S. Department of Justice sued the county, claiming countywide elections violate the Voting Rights Act by diluting Hispanics' political power. … The county spent nearly $2 million fighting, but now it looks as if Hispanic voters in Osceola may have a better chance to elect one of their own. .. Commissioners are expected to vote Monday night on a single-member district plan to settle the suit after a federal judge noted 'racial hostility' in Osceola and found that elections are 'racially polarized.' … 'There is also evidence of a history of discrimination against Hispanic voters and candidates,' U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell wrote in his ruling last month. 'It is clear from the record that voting in Osceola County tends to be racially polarized.'"

Massachusetts Poll Workers Meet Goal. The Springfield Republican (MA) (11/11, Arbulú) reports, "With more than 100 bilingual poll workers manning all but four voting precincts on Tuesday, the city has met a goal set in its voter reform agreement with the U.S. Department of Justice." The Republican continues, "The federal government had filed suit against the city for violating the rights of Spanish-speaking residents by failing to provide enough help at the polls. … The reform agreement, reached in August, called for the city to have at least 95 bilingual poll workers who speak Spanish and English working at Tuesday's election." The Republican adds, "Of the city's 410 poll workers, 127 are bilingual in Spanish and English and five speak Vietnamese, said Gladys Oyola, the city's Spanish Language Election Program coordinator. … The Justice Department required bilingual poll workers at all but four of the city's 64 precincts based on the number of voters with Spanish surnames in each precinct, said Election Commissioner Kathy Hoar Fleury."

New Jersey Settles Suit Over Boy's Death For $7.5 Million. The AP (11/12) reports, "New Jersey has spent $7.5 million to settle a lawsuit over a child welfare case in which a 7-year-old boy's mummified remains were found in a basement here." The AP continues, "The payout, arranged last year but only recently announced, is the second-largest made by the State Division of Youth and Family Services over child welfare mistakes, according to state officials." The AP adds, "The size of the settlement is surpassed only by the $12.5 million the state agreed to give to four brothers from Collingswood who were deprived of food and medical care by their adoptive parents. The state announced that settlement last year. … With the Newark case, the settlement money is going to the estate of Faheem Williams, along with two of his siblings who are in foster care. .. .The discovery in January 2003 of Faheem's body prompted an overhaul of the child welfare agency. The state had investigated abuse complaints involving Faheem, but had closed the file 11 months before his body was found in the basement of an apartment rented by his older cousin, Sherry L. Murphy. … The boy's brothers — Raheem Williams, now 11, and Tyrone Hill Jr., 8 — were found emaciated in a room adjacent to where the body was found."

ANTITRUST:

Gannett Could Bid On Tribune Properties. The Chicago Tribune (11/12, Oneal, Rosenthal) reports, "Turning up the heat on the already simmering auction for the assets of Chicago-based Tribune Co., Gannett Co., the nation's largest newspaper publisher, has emerged as a possible bidder for Tribune's newspaper properties, the Chicago Tribune learned Saturday." The Tribune continues, "Executives from the McLean, Va.-based media giant, which publishes 90 U.S. newspapers, including top-read USA Today, were in Chicago last week to hear presentations on Tribune's financial condition, two sources close to the situation said. .. Tribune has been hosting a number of bidders as part of a process it put in place in September to enhance shareholder value by possibly selling all of the company's television and newspaper assets. .. .But the emergence of a potential buyer with the resources and clout of Gannett could significantly change the complexion of the bidding process." The Tribune adds, "The sources noted that the Tribune sell-off is still in its early stages and that Gannett has participated in newspaper auctions before without pulling the trigger. Most recently, Gannett expressed formal interest in Knight Ridder Inc. before eventually backing away. .. .But assuming it is serious, Gannett would be the first so-called 'strategic buyer'—Wall Street parlance for a suitor in the same industry—to jump into the fray. … Until now, bidding for

DOJ_NMG_0093218

Tribune assets had been thought to be limited to financial buyers: several large private equity firms and a handful of wealthy entrepreneurs. But, unhappy with bids that valued the whole company close to the current stock price of about $32 a share, Tribune began asking for bids on its parts—newspapers such as the Los Angeles Times and the Chicago Tribune and television stations such as WGN-Channel 9, among other properties."

Class-Action Suit Against Microsoft To Open Monday In Iowa. The Des Moines Register (11/12) reports, "About 450 registered voters, in two shifts, will converge on the Polk County (IA) Courthouse (Monday) to begin what could be the weeks-long process of picking a jury for a class-action, antitrust lawsuit against Microsoft Corp. The trial is expected to last several months and could be worth up to $450 million for lawyers and four named plaintiffs, who contend that the giant computer software company used anti-competitive practices to drive up the cost of its Windows operating system, as well as its Microsoft Office, Word and Excel programs." The Register continues, "Potential members of the class include any person, business or other large organization that bought those programs between May 18, 2004, and June 30, 2006. … Microsoft has denied overcharging its customers and insists that consumers received fair and reasonable prices. .. . The trial is expected to be one of the longest in Iowa history."

Sports Artist Sued Over Use Of Alabama's School Colors. The New York Times (11/12, Liptak) reports, "In the solemn cathedral of college football devotion and instruction that is the Paul W. Bryant Museum here, a large painting dominates the main chamber. It is called 'The Sack,' and it shows an encounter between a Notre Dame quarterback and a human locomotive in crimson and white. … 'I've never been hit like that before,' the quarterback, Steve Beuerlein, said after his near-lethal sack by Cornelius Bennett in 1986, in the University of Alabama's first victory ever over his team." The Times continues, "Daniel A. Moore, who painted 'The Sack' and scores of other renditions of signal moments in Alabama football history, said he felt something similar last year, when his fax machine began to spit out a lawsuit from the university. … Mr. Moore's paintings, reproduced in prints and on merchandise, violated the university's trademark rights, the suit said. It asked a federal judge to forbid him to, among other things, use the university's 'famous crimson and white color scheme.'" The Times adds, "Athletes, sports leagues and universities around the nation have become increasingly aggressive in protecting what they say is their intellectual property, and their claims have met with a mixed response from judges and fans. But almost no one here thinks the suit against Mr. Moore is a good idea. … Mr. Moore has asked Judge R. David Proctor of the Federal District Court in Birmingham to dismiss the case on First Amendment grounds. His brief cited a decision of the federal appeals court in California ruling that a trademark owner 'does not have the right to control public discourse' if 'the public imbues his mark with a meaning.'"

Actor Sues Wisconsin Man Over Use Of Name. The AP (11/12, Press) reports from Milwaukee, WI, "Andy Griffith, the actor who portrayed the sheriff of the fictional town of Mayberry on television, has sued a Wisconsin man who unsuccessfully ran for sheriff of Grant County after legally changing his name to Andrew Jackson Griffith." The AP continues, "The lawsuit, filed Nov. 3 in Federal District Court in Madison, contends that the candidate, William H. Fenrick, 42, violated trademark and copyright laws, as well as the privacy of the actor when he used his new name to promote his candidacy for sheriff in southwestern Wisconsin. … Mr. Griffith, the actor, who is 80, starred in the 1960s program 'The Andy Griffith Show,' one of the most popular series in television history. He also played an unorthodox lawyer on 'Matlock' in the 1980s and 1990s." The AP notes, "The lawsuit says the former Mr. Fenrick changed his name for the 'sole purpose of taking advantage of Griffith's notoriety in an attempt to gain votes.' It asks the court to order him to go back to his original name. … The lawsuit also asks the new Mr. Griffith to publish disclaimers and an apology in Grant County newspapers that say he has no association with the actor. It seeks unspecified damages and court fees."

ENVIRONMENT:

Corpus Christi Left With Cleanup Bill In Asarco Mess. The Corpus Christi (TX) Caller-Times (11/12, Kelley) reports, "Ruth Einkauf and her Dona Park neighbors were promised a 30-acre nature preserve behind her home in 1999 as part of an Environmental Protection Agency settlement with a nearby recycling plant." The Caller-Times continues, "Before the settlement, announced as part of an enforcement action by the state and federal governments, she and neighbors tended the area. Now, weeds and tall grass on the lot provide cover for varmints that invade Einkauf's home." The Caller-Times adds, "It is unclear if the project ever will be completed. Dona Park residents are neighbors to one of the largest bankruptcies in the country, a vast and tangled affair that encompasses century-old mining giant Asarco and its subsidiary Encycle Texas. … Tom Aldrich, vice president for environmental affairs at Asarco, said the company established a conservation trust at the 30-acre parcel and performed some environmental studies as a prelude to building the park. It has not built the walkways nor planted the promised vegetation that was required. With the company in bankruptcy, the future of that conservation trust is murky. … Neighbors of other Asarco plants across Texas have yet to see more than $1.75 million in supplemental environmental projects - plans approved by the government as part of settlement agreements."

DOJ_NMG_0093219

IMMIGRATION:

Weiner Seeks Deportation Of Former Nazi Guard. The New York Daily News (11/12, Rose) reports, "A U.S. congressman rallied alongside hundreds of Jewish teenagers outside the home of a former Nazi camp guard - but some of the man's Jackson Heights neighbors say they should just leave the old man alone." The News continues, "Jakiw Palij, 84, was stripped of his U.S. citizenship three years ago by a judge who ruled that Palij lied when he applied for an immigrant visa in 1949. … But he has not been deported because the government can't find a country to accept him - which the activists said was unacceptable. … 'No one is going to hide in our midst,' declared U.S. Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-Queens). 'Thousands and thousands of people were murdered by this monster. He's not paying for his crimes by living here in a peaceful block in Jackson Heights.'" The News notes, "But several of Palij's neighbors, who describe him as quiet and frail, disagreed with the protesters. … 'It's wrong; why don't they just leave the people alone?' said Abraham Pabon, 48, a truck driver. 'Everybody has a life to live. It's like they say, God forgives. It's very, very wrong what they're doing here.' … Justice Department officials have acknowledged there's no evidence Palij engaged in atrocities - but say that the mere act of guarding prisoners sealed their fate. More than 6,000 Jews at Trawniki were shot to death on Nov. 3, 1943, in one of the single largest massacres of the Holocaust."

State Immigrant Protection Rules Prove To Be Unpopular. The New York Times (11/12, A22, McKinley, 1.16M) reports that state and local laws like San Francisco's "so-called sanctuary policy, which forbids police and city officials from asking people they encounter in the course of an investigation about their immigration status" have drawn criticism by some. Critics argue sanctuary policies "discourage the police from enforcing laws" and "conservative legal groups and politicians have begun to challenge such policies," while some states "have passed laws discouraging sanctuary policies."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

As Bush Honors Soldiers, War Woes Continue To Drag On Him. NBC Nightly News (11/11, lead story, 3:12, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) was the only network newscast Saturday night, and it began by segueing from President Bush's honoring of soldiers and veterans into an account of the President's difficulties at home. NBC opened by saying, "On this Veterans' Day, Americans led by President Bush paid tribute to the men and women of our armed forces, those who have served in the past and those serving now around the world. The day has special meaning during this time of war when more than 140,000 Americans remain on duty in Iraq alone. As the President considers the next step in the war in Iraq, a new poll shows his approval ratings have dropped to the lowest point so far in his Administration." NBC (Ohm): "On a day when the nation's attention is on the men and women in uniform, the White House is looking for a new direction in Iraq. At Arlington National Cemetery, President Bush paused to remember the country's fallen and those currently on the frontlines. … Unlike previous Veterans Day the President barely mentioned Iraq. Last year he gave a strong defense of the war. … Now the President must deal with a Democratic-controlled Congress. A new Newsweek poll shows his approval rating at 31%, an all-time low."

Newsweek (11/11, Mabry, 3.12M) says Bush's "response was swift and decisive -- if a little late. After voters gave Republicans 'a thumpin" at the polls," Bush "banished his contentious defense secretary; invited the presumptive leaders of the new House and Senate to lunch (would-be House Speaker Nancy Pelosi had pasta; the president ate crow, a Bush aide joked); and suffered through two pained photo-ops with Pelosi and Harry Reid. … And what did the president get for listening to the voice of the American people? The worst approval rating of his presidency." Bush's 31% job approval is the same as that of Vice President Cheney. "Bill Clinton's lowest rating during his presidency was 36 percent; Bush's father's was 29 percent, and Ronald Reagan's was 35 percent. Jimmy Carter's and Richard Nixon's lows were 28 and 23 percent, respectively." And "worst of all, most Americans are writing off the rest of Bush's presidency; two-thirds (66 percent) believe he will be unable to get much done, up from 56 percent in a mid-October poll; only 32 percent believe he can be effective." The AP (11/11) says that for the "relentlessly optimistic" Bush, "this is a season of disappointment, surprise and setbacks. At home and around the world, things are not going his way. With Bush's legacy-building time running out, Americans sent a clear message in Tuesday's election that they were angry at him and wanted change. Though Bush's name was not on the ballot, voters took revenge on the Republican Congress and put the Democrats in charge" on Capitol Hill.

Bush Lays Wreath At Arlington. National coverage of Veterans Day commemorations focused on President Bush's visit to Arlington National Cemetery, where he laid a wreath on the Tomb of the Unknowns. Coverage is largely limited to wire services or brief reports. The AP (11/11) reports Bush "marked Veterans Day by praising U.S. troops for fighting tyranny and oppression, yet touched only briefly on the war in Iraq, where U.S. commanders are rethinking strategy. Three days after announcing the ouster of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Bush hailed members of the armed services, past and present, for their dedication and bravery"; however, his Arlington address "contrasted sharply with the strong rhetoric he used to defend the war on Veterans Day a year ago." The Washington Post (11/12, C1, Schwartzman, 690K) and the Washington Times (11/12, A1, Lively, 88K) primarily quote veterans in their reporting.

DOJ_NMG_0093220

Bush Says Elections Do Not Signal Loss Of Resolve In Terror War. The Los Angeles Times (11/12, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports President Bush said in his weekly radio address that GOP election losses "didn't signal a weakening of American resolve to win the war on terrorism." Bush said, "America faces brutal enemies who have attacked us before and want to attack us again. I have a message for these enemies: Do not confuse the workings of American democracy with a lack of American will. Our nation is committed to bringing you to justice, and we will prevail." DNC Chairman Howard Dean "said in a response to Bush that voters made it clear they wanted 'a new direction' in Iraq and his party intended to use its control of Congress to try to deliver that."

Chait Critical Of Bush's Linking Of Terror Issue And Election Results. In his Los Angeles Times (11/12, 850K) column, Jonathan Chait writes, "At his news conference after Tuesday's elections, President Bush struck a note of reassurance. 'I have a message for those on the front lines,' he said. 'To our enemies, do not be joyful. Do not confuse the workings of our democracy with a lack of will…. To our brave men and women in uniform: Don't be doubtful. America will always support you.' Why would terrorists or U.S. soldiers think electing Democrats would suggest a lack of will or support for the troops? Oh, right. Because Bush had been saying so. 'However they put it, the Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win, and America loses,' he told a GOP crowd in October. 'That's what's at stake in this election.' I guess if I were a terrorist, I would have been joyful to learn that the people who were going to help me win had prevailed in the elections."

Democratic Freshmen Hope To Bring Pragmatism To Capitol Hill. The New York Times (11/12, Toner, Zernike, 1.16M) reports on its front page that while many members of the Democratic congressional class of 2006 "show little appetite" for a 1994-style "ideological crusade," in interviews "with nearly half of them this week, the freshmen -- 41 in the House and 9 in the Senate, including one independent -- conveyed a keen sense of their own moment in history, and a distinct world view: they say they were given a rare opportunity by voters, many of them independents and Republicans, who were tired of the partisanship and gridlock in Washington." They have "set themselves an extraordinary (political veterans might say impossible) task: to avoid the ideological wars that have so dominated Congress in recent years, to be pragmatists, and to change the tone in Washington after a sharply partisan campaign."

The Washington Post (11/12, Weisman, 690K) says on its front page that Democrats "are looking to the Republican takeover in 1995 as an object lesson of what to emulate and what to avoid. They hope to match the legislative energy of the Newt Gingrich era while avoiding at all costs the partisan pitfalls that eventually soured voters on the GOP. … Led by a feisty Nevada senator and the first woman in history to claim the House speaker's post, the long-banished Democrats hope to prove their bona fides as lawmakers and challenge a president from the other party to accept their agenda, a game plan taken straight from the Gingrich era's 'Contract With America.' They also intend to challenge President Bush to change course in Iraq and consider their demands for a timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops. But Democrats say they will avoid the overreaching, arrogance and rancorous partisanship that left them virtually powerless on Capitol Hill and spawned an era of political corruption and influence-peddling."

"Two Pugnacious Democrats" Will Lead On Capitol Hill. In a piece about Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, Ronald Brownstein of the Los Angeles Times (11/12, 850K) writes that in Reid and House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, "Bush will face two pugnacious Democrats determined to challenge his agenda and to force him to react to their own goals. Bush could count on congressional Republicans to repeatedly schedule votes on his priorities, such as legislation to abolish the estate tax. Reid dismisses that idea with barely a shrug." Instead, Democrats "want to force the national debate onto a very different agenda. Reid says he expects the Senate 'pretty quickly' to pass legislation raising the minimum wage. He's also optimistic about quick action allowing Medicare to negotiate directly with drug companies for lower prescription prices -- an idea the White House and the pharmaceutical industry blocked in 2003 when Congress passed the drug benefit for seniors." He also "anticipates more aggressive congressional oversight, starting with Iraq."

The Los Angeles Times (11/12, Fiore, Barabak, 850K) writes that on the day after the elections, Pelosi "awoke to a celebrity of a whole other order. Her near-certain ascension as the nation's first female speaker of the House had networks lining up for interviews and newspapers placing her picture on the front page. Blogs were abuzz. Overnight, a woman who was scarcely known to the nation moved into a world of constant public attention." The AP (11/11) says Pelosi "will be the first Californian" to become speaker, "and congressional watchdogs say they'll be observing her new spending clout with great interest." The AP adds that "aides to Mrs. Pelosi don't dispute that the state will benefit from a changing of the guard at the Capitol."

DOJ_NMG_0093221

Bush Could Have Hard Time Reviving Texas-Style Bipartisanship. The Houston Chronicle (11/12, Mason, 530K) writes that the President's "rude awakening Wednesday morning to a newly elected Democratic-led Congress stirred up all kinds of nostalgia -- and questionable impressions -- about his days as Texas governor. Bush told reporters he could easily manage the challenge of working with a majority in the other party; that after all, he did it in the 1990s with the state's Legislature." But Bush "did not spend six years bashing Democratic state lawmakers as bad for the state before taking over as governor. When he became president and was complemented by a Republican-controlled Congress, he often was on the attack against the opposing party for the next six years."

Panetta Says Democrats Must Govern, Not Obstruct. In a New York Times (11/12, WK13, 1.16M) op-ed, Clinton White House Chief of Staff Leon Panetta warns, "Last Tuesday, the American people sent a clear message that they are sick and tired of government by crisis. They elected Democrats to the House and Senate not to prolong gridlock, but to govern. There are those who believe that the best political strategy for 2008 is for the Democrats to continue to confront President Bush and seal his fate as a failed president. The danger, however, is that if the Democrats become nothing more than a party of obstruction, it will be only a matter of time before they too will lose the trust of the American people."

Scholar Says Democrats Have Duty To Investigate Administration. In a New York Times (11/12, WK13, 1.16M) op-ed, Stanley Brand of the Penn State Dickinson School of Law writes, "The Democrats' victory has stoked the fire beneath an already brewing debate within the party regarding the need for investigations of the executive branch during the Bush administration's two remaining years. Some Democratic members of Congress are reluctant to pursue investigations into war profiteering, detainee interrogation or other controversial issues, fearing that such scrutiny of the administration will make Democrats appear petty and partisan and cost them electoral support in 2008. A vigorous examination of the administration's conduct, however, is not only the appropriate action as a matter of constitutional prerogative, it is the politically necessary response to voters' overwhelming rejection of the current Congress's failure to assert itself in this area."

Democrats Already Strategizing To Hold New Majorities. The AP (11/11, Kuhnhenn) says one question for Democrats is basic: "Are their new majorities in the House and Senate sustainable? What if the war in Iraq is over by 2008? Or what if it is still being waged despite Democratic pledges to change the course? What if voter antipathy toward President Bush is irrelevant in two years?" DSCC Chairman Sen. Charles Schumer "acknowledged that the Democrats' 51-49 majority in the Senate was the result of the narrowest of victories in six race. 'Had 10,000 votes flipped we would have four seats not six,' he said." But Democrats "do see opportunities ahead. In 2008, there are 21 Republican Senate seats up for election and only 12 Democratic seats. E ight of the Republicans in those seats won their last election with 55% or less of the vote."

On CNN's In The Money (11/11), anchor Jack Cafferty said, "I think the degree to which we saw [Democrats win] was absolutely surprising. There were no Democratic incumbents voted out anywhere in the country. They won all the seats that they needed to take the Senate, and even Vegas said that was a real long shot. The interesting thing to me was, if you look at Montana and Virginia, two of the firewall states for the Republicans, the total number of votes that tipped the balance of power in this country, fewer than 10,000."

"Brutally Effective Taskmaster" Emanuel Captained Democrats To Win. The Chicago Tribune (11/12, Bendavid, 617K) runs a 6,000-word profile of DCCC Chairman Rep. Rahm Emanuel, "a portrait in power of a brutally effective taskmaster." He guided his party to victory in large measure "by remaking the Democratic Party in his own image. Democrats had never raised enough money. Emanuel, a savvy fundraiser who shaped those skills under Richard M. Daley and Bill Clinton, yelled at colleagues and threatened his candidates into generating an unprecedented amount of campaign cash. Democrats had a history of appeasing party constituencies. Emanuel tore up the old litmus tests on abortion and other issues. With techniques that would make a Big Ten football coach blush, he recruited candidates who could mount tough challenges in some of the reddest patches of America. Democrats had blanched at hardball. Emanuel, jokingly called 'Rahmbo' even by his mother, muscled weaker Democrats out of races in favor of stronger ones, and ridiculed the chairman of his own party."

On CNN's In The Money (11/11), Time national political correspondent Karen Tumulty said, "One of the smartest things that the two generals in this campaign," Schumer and Emanuel, did, is they "went out and looked for candidates who looked like the districts in which they were running, who really represented the values of those districts much more so than they did the national Democratic profile. That's why you did have people like Heath Shuler in North Carolina, former Redskins quarterback running. Brad Ellsworth in Indiana, a county sheriff running. And these people were a lot more appealing back in the districts. But it could make their lives a little more difficult when they get to Washington because they are such an unusual fit with the national party."

DOJ_NMG_0093222

Economic Concerns May Have Dragged Down GOP. The New York Times (11/12, BU5, Altman, 1.16M) writes, "Politics affects economics, and vice versa -- at least that's the widely held theory. But what was the reality in last week's election? To paraphrase a Clinton-era mantra, it really might have been the economy, stupid. More than 80 percent of voters in an exit poll…said the economy was a very important or extremely important issue. That percentage was the highest for any issue, including Iraq and terrorism."

DeLay Legacy "Cast A Long Shadow" Over Elections. The Houston Chronicle (11/12, Roth, Hedges, 530K) runs a feature called "How The Hammer Fell On His Own Party" about how "the legacy of the once powerful Republican Tom DeLay…cast a long shadow over last week's elections, in which voters shrank the ranks of a party accused of being too partisan, too cozy with special interests and too fond of big spending." DeLay "helped build a Republican political empire that he tried to make immune from erosion by pushing the 2003 Texas redistricting plan that threw several veteran House Democrats out of office. For years the former pest exterminator ruled with an iron hand that brought his party legislative victories but also intensified the poisonous partisan mood in Washington."

GOP Losses In Indiana Highlight Anti-"Insider" Trend. The New York Times (11/12, A28, Nossiter, 1.16M) examines Republican losses in usually solidly GOP Indiana, concluding that in three House races, GOP candidates "appeared to have unwittingly entered" into traps. In "all three cases, to demonstrate being a Washington insider was to court doom, no matter how much the incumbents railed against the ways of the capital."

Rove Remains Upbeat Despite GOP Setbacks. The Washington Post (11/12, Baker, 690K) runs a front-page profile of Karl Rove headlined "Rove Remains Steadfast In The Face Of Criticism," that begins by saying that "for a man still climbing out of the rubble," Rove "seemed in his usual unflappable mood" after the elections. The "rest of Washington might think Tuesday's elections were a repudiation of Rove's brand of politics, but Rove does not. For years, he has been the center of hyperbolic attention -- called the genius, the electoral mastermind, the most powerful presidential adviser in a century, Bush's brain, the master of the dark arts of wedge politics, the Republican Moses leading conservatives out of the desert. The mythology grew to such an outsized degree that when Rove insisted again and again during the campaign that Republicans would win despite the odds, fearful Democrats convinced themselves that he must have known something they did not and waited for an October surprise to spring. … It turns out that Rove is mortal after all, and not always so good at math." But "allies argued that without Rove, the losses would have been worse."

Chafee Says White House Partisanship Did In Centrist Republicans. In a New York Times (11/12, WK13, 1.16M), op-ed, Sen. Lincoln Chafee writes, "I was one of the many moderate Republican casualties of the anti-Bush virulence that swept the country. Despite my having voted against the Iraq war resolution, my reputation for independence, the editorial endorsement of virtually every newspaper in my state, and a job approval rating of 63 percent, I did not win. Why? Back in December 2000…Vice President-elect Dick Cheney was the guest at a weekly lunch meeting of a small group of centrist Republicans. … I was startled to hear the vice president dismiss suggestions of compromise and instead emphasize an aggressively partisan agenda. … I was incredulous. Instead of a new atmosphere of cooperation and civility which, after all, had been the promise of the Bush-Cheney campaign, we seemed ready to return to the poisonous partisanship that marked the Republican-Congress/Clinton White House years. … In my view, one of the most popular refrains expressed by Governor Bush during the presidential campaign was, 'I am a uniter, not a divider.' I believe moderate Republicans can help the new administration develop a unifying agenda in the next session of Congress."

Webb Says He May Be A Maverick In Senate. Under the headline "Webb May Be Senate Maverick," the Washington Post (11/12, C1, Craig, Shear, 690K) says "few know what to expect" when Sen.-elect James Webb "enters the nation's most exclusive club." Webb said he "might be a bit of a maverick in the Senate, which could frustrate Democratic leaders who poured more than $6 million into his campaign. … Webb said he will model himself after former New York senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D), whom he described as someone 'who had government experience that was shaped by the intellectual world.'"

Sidarth Says "Politics Of Division Just Don't Work Anymore." In a Washington Post (11/12, B2, 690K), op-ed, S.R. Sidarth writes, "This past summer, between my third and fourth year of college, I decided to volunteer" for the Webb campaign." In August, "I was singled out at a GOP picnic, identified as 'macaca or whatever his name is' -- despite the fact that Allen knew my name…and then 'welcome[d] to America and the real world of Virginia.' Allen's actions that day stood out because they were not representative of how I was treated while traveling around the state. Everywhere I went, though I was identifiably working on behalf of Allen's opponent, people treated me with dignity, respect and kindness. … The larger question that this experience brings up is: How far has society progressed on the issues of race and openness? By 2050, according to most projections, the United States will be a minority-majority nation. But the fact that Allen believed I was an immigrant, when in fact I am a native Virginian, underlines the problems our society still faces. … The politics of division just don't work anymore. Nothing made me happier on election night than finding out the results from Dickenson County, where Allen and I had our encounter. Webb won there, in what I can only hope was a vote to deal the race card out of American politics once and for all."

DOJ_NMG_0093223

Shays Will Be Only New England GOP Representative In Next Congress. The New York Times (11/12, A35, Applebome, 1.16M) profiles Rep. Christopher Shays, barely reelected last week, who, "like the only survivor of a hotel fire," was a "little hesitant to draw too many conclusions but glad he was alive." Shays was "one of the few Republicans among perhaps two dozen seen as vulnerable back in September who managed to survive. He was the only one of the three Republican incumbents from Connecticut who won re-election. When he went to Congress, he was one of nine Republican representatives from the six New England states. In the next Congress, he will be the only one."

Four Bush Appeals Court Nominees Seen As "Doomed." The New York Times (11/12, A26, Lewis, 1.16M) says the Democratic wins "will produce a vast change in an area that has produced some of the sharpest partisan battles in recent years: President Bush's effort to shape the federal bench with conservative judicial nominees. There is a strong consensus that the four most conservative of Mr. Bush's nominations to the federal appeals courts" -- Terrence W. Boyle, William J. Haynes II, William G. Myers III, and Michael B. Wallace – "are doomed."

Detroit Automakers To Seek Bush's Attention On Issues. The Detroit Free Press (11/12, Hyde, 373K) reports, "When the heads of Detroit's automakers finally take their seats at the White House on Tuesday across from President George W. Bush, their concerns will boil down to the old Aretha Franklin song: R-E-S-P-E-C-T. From the rising cost of retiree health care to the advantages a weak yen gives the Japanese, the Detroit automakers will press for more recognition for their issues, something industry executives say has been lacking from the president. They'll also attempt to draw distinctions between themselves and the foreign automakers whose U.S. branches generate record profits. But they will make clear that their concerns do not add up to another seven-letter word: B-A-I-L-O-U-T." GM Vice Chairman Bob Lutz said recently that the "meeting should 'enhance the president's understanding of the importance of the domestic auto industry to the economic health of the United States'…emphasizing the word 'domestic.' Foreign automakers that build cars in the United States help the economy, 'but it's not the same as a fully integrated American auto company that retains the intellectual property in the United States, has primarily American shareholders,' he said, so 'the wealth gets reinvested in the U.S.'"

Democrats Could Seek To Add Bargaining Ability To Medicare. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (11/12, Japsen, 230K) reports, "The Democratic landslide in last week's midterm elections raises the specter of federal regulation of drug prices via changes to Medicare's new prescription drug benefit -- a move that could lower costs for seniors and squeeze pharmaceutical and health insurance industry profits. With Democrats in control of both houses of Congress, they are almost certain to seek passage of price control measures in that legislative body. And there are enough Republicans who supported price-control measures in the past that bills will gain momentum next year, analysts say, meaning members of Congress who vote against them will feel the wrath of seniors in the 2008 election."

White House Scrutinizes Nevada Land Sale Profits. The Washington Times (11/12, Hudson, 88K) reports the Bush Administration "is trying to get its hands on millions of dollars generated from sales of federally owned land in Nevada in order to help pay down the deficit." The Times points out that Nevada public land sold as part of the Southern Nevada Public Land Management Act has brought "in nearly $3 billion." The Bush Administration "now wants some of the money transferred to the Treasury Department to help pay down the federal deficit." The Times adds that Nevada Sens. Harry Reid and John Ensign "oppose diverting the money out of Nevada."

OTHER NEWS:

Liberals, Activists Expect "Their Due" From Democrats. The Los Angeles Times (11/12, A1, Wallsten, Hook, 850K) reports the Democrats' "incoming congressional leaders have immediately found themselves in another difficult struggle -- with their own supporters. Some of the very activists who helped propel the Democrats to a majority in the House and Senate last week are claiming credit for the victories and demanding what they consider their due: a set of ambitious -- and politically provocative -- actions on gun control, abortion, national security and other issues that party leaders fear could alienate moderate voters and leave Democrats vulnerable to GOP attacks as big spenders or soft on terrorism." Both Senate leader Harry Reid and House leader Nancy Pelosi "has pledged in recent days to 'govern from the center,' after a campaign in which anger over the Iraq war and GOP scandals helped their party attract some unusually conservative candidates and a large share of independent voters. Turning off those new voters could undermine Democrats' hopes of solidifying their new majorities and taking the White House in 2008. But to the leaders of interest groups who are core supporters of the Democratic Party, and who had been barred under Republican rule from the inner sanctums of power, the new Congress means a time for action, not compromise."

DOJ_NMG_0093224

Democratic Party Has Careful Balancing Act With "Netroots." The New York Times (11/12, WK5, Confessore, 1.16M) reports on the "long battle between leading netroots activists and their critics, real and perceived, among Washington's Democratic elite. … Though the netroots have forever changed how campaigns raise money and find votes, the results demonstrated that they cannot yet win elections on their own. But the Democratic Party cannot win major national elections without the netroots."

Some In GOP Urge Return To Party's Core Principles. The Washington Times (11/12, Lambro, 88K) reports Republican officials across the country said last week that voters "did not reject core Republican principles of lower taxes, smaller government and family values when they put the Democrats in charge of Congress. … If anything, these officials told The Washington Times, Republicans blundered by abandoning or de-emphasizing signature issues that had fueled the party's meteoric rise since the 1990s. The party must champion these issues again if it hopes to win back the voters' trust in the 2008 presidential election, the officials said."

Ponnuru Sees Hope For Social Conservatism. In a New York Times (11/12, WK13, 1.16M), op-ed, Ramesh Ponnuru of National Review writes, "Before we declare this election proof that social conservatism is doomed, consider that Republicans as a whole had a worse night. Pro-lifers lost four seats in the Senate and, depending on some unresolved races, appear to have lost 20 in the House. But the Republican Party lost six in the Senate and 29 in the House. The discrepancy stems from the fact that some pro-choice Democrats are replacing pro-choice Republicans, and even a few pro-life Democrats are replacing pro-life Republicans. Meanwhile, ballot initiatives as a whole went better for the social right than for other conservative factions. … That's something to remember the next time you hear that after their defeat, the Republicans need to 'move to the center.' Maybe they should: but which center? When editorialists talk about the 'sensible center,' they usually have in mind free-trading, budget-balancing social liberals. … But there is another center -- one that's liberal on economic measures but conservative on social mores."

Rich Says "Callous Conservatism" Brought GOP Losses. In his New York Times (11/12, WK12, 1.16M), column, Frank Rich writes, "Of course, the 'thumpin" was all about Iraq. But let us not forget Katrina. It was the collision of the twin White House calamities in August 2005 that foretold the collapse of the presidency of George W. Bush. Back then, the full measure of the man finally snapped into focus for most Americans, sending his poll numbers into the 30s for the first time. The country saw that the president who had spurned a grieving wartime mother camping out in the sweltering heat of Crawford was the same guy who had been unable to recognize the depth of the suffering in New Orleans's fetid Superdome. This brand of leadership was not the 'compassionate conservatism' that had been sold in all those photo ops with African-American schoolchildren. This was callous conservatism, if not just plain mean. It's the kind of conservatism that remains silent when Rush Limbaugh does a mocking impersonation of Michael J. Fox's Parkinson's symptoms to score partisan points. It's the kind of conservatism that talks of humane immigration reform but looks the other way when candidates demonize foreigners as predatory animals. It's the kind of conservatism that pays lip service to 'tolerance' but stalls for days before taking down a campaign ad caricaturing an African-American candidate as a sexual magnet for white women. This kind of politics is now officially out of fashion."

Libertarian May Have Tipped Montana, And Senate, To Democrats. The Washington Post (11/12, D1, Harden, 690K) profiles Libertarian Stan Jones, a "perennial loser in Montana politics, a kind of Harold Stassen of the interior West, a fringe candidate who sometimes has to sue to get invited to television debates." But this year, the "quirkily conservative" candidate took 10,324 votes in a race won by Democrat Jon Tester by 2,565 votes, "which tipped the Senate to the Democrats, which tipped the scales of U.S. political history. 'I'm tickled about that,' said Jones. After some reflection, he added, 'There is excitement for you to be talking to the guy who changed the country.'"

Defeated Representatives May Turn To Lobbying. The New York Times (11/12, WK2, Pilhofer, 1.16M) writes, "So it's the day after the election, and you've lost your seat in Congress. What to do? You might consider becoming a lobbyist. It is a well-traveled career path." A 2005 study by Public Citizen found that 43% of members of the House and Senate who left office between 1998 and 2004 became lobbyists.

Spitzer Hits Puerto Rico For Post-Election Break. The New York Times (11/12, A37, Eaton, 1.16M) writes about New York Gov.-elect Eliot Spitzer's post-campaign vacation in Puerto Rico. At a brief news conference after a meeting with the island's governor, Spitzer

DOJ_NMG_0093225

"referred to the war in Iraq as 'an unfortunate quagmire,' but said he had supported eliminating Saddam Hussein's threat to the international community. He pledged to appoint Latinos to important posts in his administration but sidestepped a question about Puerto Rico's status."

Ehrlich Does Not Plan To Seek Office Again. The AP (11/11, Witte) reports Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich Jr. said he does not plan to run for office again. He said the "results of the election Tuesday indicated Maryland has moved 'pretty hard left.'" Asked if he thought the anti-GOP trend nationwide hurt him, Ehrlich said that "when an incumbent is on the ballot 'it's generally a referendum on the incumbent.'"

Feingold Will Not Run For President In 2008. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (11/12, Gilbert, 255K) reports Sen. Russ Feingold said in a Saturday telephone interview that he will not run for president in 2008. Feingold said, "I never got to that point where I'd rather be running around the country, running for president, than being a senator from Wisconsin." He "conceded that he faced long odds of winning the nomination. 'It would have required the craziest combination of things in the history of American politics to make it work,' he said." The AP (11/12) also reports on Feingold's opting-out of the contest.

With Midterms Over, Presidential Race Shifts Into High Gear. CNN's Lou Dobbs This Week (11/11, Crowley) reported, "Across the country assorted politicians are dissecting the entrails of '06, with the Oval Office in mind. Not that anyone running for president will actually cop to it. … Roughly 10% of the US Senate is thinking about running for president, along with a couple of current and former House members, and several governors." Sen. John McCain's ambitions "are complicated by the '06 results, with much of the country wanting a plan to get out of Iraq. He thinks the way out is to put more troops in. McCain's lead position in the tough guy category has been challenged by Rudy Giuliani, His Honor, the in-your-face 9/11 New York mayor. He's been frequently areas west of the Mississippi and south of the Mason-Dixon, where so far they have politely ignored that he is pro-gay rights, pro-choice, and pro-gun licensing." Sen. Hillary Clinton "is the political world's most reluctant bride. She hasn't set foot on the presidential trail, running from Iowa to New Hampshire, making her all the more appealing. … Clinton's pull is so strong, she's in a class all her own. The other class in her party is the 'not Hillarys' -- generally less controversial, more centrist options like former vice presidential candidate John Edwards or Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh. From rising stars to familiar faces, from the right and the left and everywhere in between, you're going to need a scorecard to keep up. But the game is on."

The New York Times (11/12, WK1, Nagourney, 1.16M) writes that Sen. George Allen "had yet to hand back the Senate to the Democrats when Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa announced bright and early Thursday morning that he was running for president. Back in Washington, Senator John McCain of Arizona moved to set up his own presidential exploratory committee and prepared what aides promised would be two major speeches this Thursday about 2008, based on last Tuesday's vote. And Hillary Rodham Clinton scored the election-week cover of New York magazine; the subject was not her easy return to the Senate. In some ways, the midterm election of 2006 was the first big event of the 2008 race -- much like an early debate or an Iowa straw poll. It helped shake out and shake up the field. Some lessons were instantly apparent: you probably won't hear more talk of Republican candidates wrestling for the mantle of President Bush, and Democrats are looking hungrily at Ohio and Colorado, states that went Republican in 2004 and 2000."

The Washington Post (11/12, B5, 690K) runs two op-eds examining the parties' prospects for the next campaign. Barbour Griffith & Rogers Chairman Ed Rogers looks at Republicans Sen. George Allen, Sen. Bill Frist, Newt Gingrich, Rudy Giuliani, Sen. John McCain, Gov. Mitt Romney, and "the rest…Dick Armey, Sam Brownback, Chuck Hagel, Mike Huckabee, Duncan Hunter and George Pataki." Joe Trippi, who ran Howard Dean's 2004 presidential campaign considers Democrats Sen. Evan Bayh, Sen. Joseph Biden, Wesley Clark, Sen. Hillary Clinton, John Edwards, Sen. Russ Feingold, Al Gore, Sen. John Kerry, Sen. Barack Obama, Gov. Bill Richardson, and Gov. Tom Vilsack.

In a Washington Post (11/12, B1, 690K), op-ed, Rolling Stone's Benjamin Wallace-Wells writes that the possible candidacies of Clinton and Obama "suggest that the next elections may play in ways that are more cultural and symbolic than tactical and political. Are Americans ready to put a black man or a woman in charge of the country? And does the hefty symbolism that Obama and Clinton would bring help one of them more than the other -- in other words, is the country more racist or more sexist?"

HIV Patients' Life Expectancy Increases. The AP (11/11) reports that an American with the HIV hires that can lead to AIDS "can expect to live for about 24 years on average, and the cost of health care over that time is more than $600,000, new research indicates. Both life expectancy and the cost of care have risen from earlier estimates; mainly because of expensive and effective drug therapies."

Ground To Be Broken For King Memorial On National Mall. The Washington Post (11/12, C1, Dvorak, 690K) reports that "ground will be broken in many ways tomorrow morning with a ceremony heralding construction of the Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial on the Mall. The memorial, scheduled to be completed in 2008, will mark a change in the very character of some of America's most hallowed real estate…The Mall."

DOJ_NMG_0093226

WPost Says US Voting System Worked Well Overall. The Washington Post (11/12, B6, 690K) editorializes, "An estimated 83 million Americans voted in last week's elections. Some people encountered difficulties, but not of the scale or scope that had been predicted by Election Day doomsayers. Overall the voting system worked. … No one denies there are shortcomings. The generational decline in voter turnout is more reason than ever to figure out better ways to encourage voting. Is early voting a good idea? Should Election Day be a national holiday? How about adopting Oregon's system of voting by mail? All are ideas worthy of consideration, but let's not fool with parts of the process that aren't broken."

LATimes Says Naturalized Citizens Should Be Permitted To Seek Presidency. The Los Angeles Times (11/12, 850K) editorializes, "On Tuesday, citizens in an electoral-vote-rich state reelected a governor who had once seemed in danger of defeat. That sort of political resurrection ordinarily would be good for a mention or two in the endless speculation about 2008 presidential candidates. Unfortunately, this reelected governor can forget about aspiring to the highest office in the land. … A core principle about the equality of opportunity in our society to strive for the highest office. … Americans should be free to decide whether they want to be led by President Jennifer Granholm. Gotcha! Who'd you think we were talking about? … Were you perhaps thinking of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger? In this nation of immigrants, there will always be individuals affected by this arcane discrimination, and the urgency to address the matter should not be dampened by partisan concerns that it may help one candidate or another. Indeed, it would be nice to see California Democrats spearhead the movement, even if it could theoretically benefit our Austrian-born governor."

NYTimes Incredulous About Corporate Calls For More Lax Regulation. The New York Times (11/12, WK11, 1.16M) editorializes, "Corporate profits are at record levels. The Dow, too, has climbed past its high-water mark from the dot-com era. Executives reap bigger and bigger paydays, even as wages have stagnated. Meanwhile, the widening investigation into stock-option backdating reminds us that the corporate malfeasance era was much more than just a couple of bad apples like Enron and WorldCom. It seems almost unbelievable, then, that corporate America would pick this moment to beg for relaxed regulation and enforcement, as well as more protection from investors' lawsuits. … The rationale is that the high cost of complying with the corporate governance law, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, along with runaway lawsuits have scared foreign companies away from American stock exchanges." But the SEC "has already signaled that it will smooth the implementation of Sarbanes-Oxley, especially for smaller companies. And abuses of the private litigation system like pay-to-play should be stopped. There is room for reform. But over all, the system is working."

US Vetoes UN Security Council Gaza Resolution. NBC Nightly News (11/11, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported Israeli PM Ehud Olmert "is on his way to Washington for talks with President Bush. On the eve of those discussions, the US vetoed a Security Council resolution condemning an attack in Gaza earlier this week."

The New York Times (11/12, Hoge, 1.16M) reports the US vetoed a UN Security Council resolution "that condemned Israel for its military actions in Gaza and called for an immediate withdrawal of Israeli forces from the area." Ambassador John Bolton "told the Council that the resolution 'does not display an even-handed characterization of the recent events in Gaza, nor does it advance the cause of Israeli-Palestinian peace.'" Despite revisions to the draft, Bolton "said it remained 'in many places biased against Israel and politically motivated.'" The Times says Washington "traditionally opposes what it considers one-sided Security Council resolutions on Israel, and Saturday's vote was the fourth time in three years that Washington had taken such action."

The AP (11/12, Bergman) quotes Bolton saying, "This resolution does not display an evenhanded characterization of the recent events in Gaza, nor does it advance the cause of Israeli-Palestinian peace to which we aspire and for which we are working assiduously." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that "the draft resolution would have aggravated the situation in Gaza because it contained 'inflammatory and unnecessary language. We do not believe the resolution was designed to contribute to the cause of peace.'"

Hamas Says Unity Government Imminent. The AP (11/12, Aji) carries comments by Hamas official Moussa Abu Marzouk "that a deal on forming a Palestinian national unity government was near, adding that an agreement on a new prime minister has been reached." The AP adds, "Abu Marzouk said Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Hamas officials have agreed on a candidate for the Palestinian prime minister, but declined to disclose the candidate's name, saying: 'It will be disclosed at the suitable time.'" Also, Abbas said yesterday "that he hoped to form a coalition government with the Islamic Hamas party by the end of the month."

DOJ_NMG_0093227

Shiite Cabinet Resignations Could Cripple Beirut. The New York Times (11/12, Slackman, 1.16M) reports Lebanon "was thrown into a political crisis Saturday when talks broke down over giving [Hezbollah] and its political allies greater control of the government. Almost immediately, cabinet ministers from the group and the other main Shiite party resigned." This week's talks were focused on "trying to defuse tensions among the various government factions after Hezbollah demanded a greater role in the cabinet and called for its alliance to have veto power over all government decisions." While it had "appeared the talks were headed toward a compromise, the negotiations collapsed when Hezbollah refused to relinquish its demand for a veto, people in the talks said." The Shiite resignations make the government illegitimate under the 1989 Taif Agreement, forcing officials to move into a caretaker mode. The Times adds, "Lebanon's political stability, and the success or failure of the sitting government, is not just consequential for this country of four million. It is part of a broader contest between" Washington, Tehran and Damascus.

The Washington Post/AP (11/12, A14) notes the resignations "could cost the Western-backed government crucial support from Lebanon's Shiite Muslims." Prime Minister Fouad Siniora "said he would not accept the resignations. He has the authority to order the five cabinet ministers to stay on, but it was unclear if his weak government could enforce the demand." The AP says the "resignations are not enough to bring down Siniora's government -- eight cabinet ministers must resign for the government to collapse -- but they could cost him support among Shiites, the majority sect in Lebanon, and make it difficult for him to govern."

Russia Eyes Mediating Role In Iran Nuclear Dispute. The AP (11/12) notes Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov "said Saturday that he believed international talks with Iran over its atomic program were still possible, maintaining that Russia could help bridge differences with other negotiating partners, including the United States." Lavrov "said his country would continue efforts to bring Iran back to negotiations with Germany and the five permanent members of the" UNSC. President Vladimir Putin "met Saturday with Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, ending two days of talks that signaled a renewed push by Moscow to persuade Tehran to freeze its uranium enrichment effort. Iran, however, has so far snubbed Moscow's proposal to host its enrichment program." Larijani "remained defiant after the first round of meetings Friday, saying Tehran would push ahead with its nuclear program, and suggesting it could break off ties with the U.N. nuclear watchdog if the world inflicted punishments proposed by European nations."

North Korea Talks Could Resume. NBC Nightly News (11/11, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Talks may soon be underway between officials with US and North Korea. Discussions could begin next week aimed at six-country talks on the north's nuclear program. It may include the financial sanctions imposed on North Korea.

The AP (11/11) carries Japanese newspaper reporting that Washington and Pyongyang "may hold talks in New York as early as this week aimed at working toward the resumption of six-nation discussions on Pyongyang's nuclear program." The Japanese daily "reported that officials from the two countries will discuss, among other issues, financial sanctions imposed on North Korea."

In Return To Power, Ortega Said To Emphasize "Reconciliation And Stability." In an analysis piece, the AP (11/12, Carl) reports Daniel Ortega "returns to Nicaragua's presidency a shadow of the fiery revolutionary who in Cold War times vowed an endless fight against a U.S. government determined to overthrow him." Ortega "now preaches reconciliation and stability, and promises to maintain close ties with the U.S. and the veterans of the Contra army it trained and armed against him. He has traded his wartime military fatigues for a white shirt and jeans. His guide, he says, is God, not Karl Marx." Ortega's post-election "speeches have focused on reassuring skeptics that he plans no radical changes and will embrace free trade, job creation and close U.S. ties." The AP adds, "More than ever, Ortega will need the support of his former enemies, and they have pledged to keep him in check. U.S. State Department spokesman Gonzalo Gallegos says cooperation with Ortega and his government will be 'based on their action in support of Nicaragua's democratic future.'"

A lengthy Washington Post (11/12, A12, Aizenman, 690K) piece entitled, "Former Contras Bemoan Ortega's Return To Power In Nicaragua," adds, "A week after [Ortega's election], Nicaraguans of all political stripes are still reeling. But perhaps none feel more personally affronted than the surviving foot soldiers of the U.S.-funded anti-Sandinista force, known as contras," some of whom "view Ortega's return in almost apocalyptic terms." Others said "their concern was that his victory would embolden his more radical supporters to harass former contra fighters in the many urban neighborhoods and rural villages across Nicaragua where old foes now live side by side."

Two UN Peacekeepers Killed In Haitian Capital. The AP (11/11) reports, "Two U.N. peacekeepers from Jordan were shot to death in Haiti's capital after coming under attack by gunmen, U.N. officials said Saturday." UN police spokesman Fred Blaze "said the soldiers came under attack in the Sonapi section of the capital near Cite Soleil, a slum where well-armed street gangs blamed for kidnappings are based."

DOJ_NMG_0093228

German Immigrant Integration Efforts Contrasted With French "Estrangement." In an opinion piece in the New York Times (11/12, WK11, 1.16M), David Unger details the growing realization among "Germany's most conservative politicians" that "there is no reason someone cannot be German and Muslim at the same time. In America, that idea would be unremarkable. In Germany, with its tragic history of exclusive nationalism and race-based citizenship, it is an intellectual revolution." Describing public programs designed to reach out to immigrant women, Unger says, "It took a long time for Germany's leaders to wake up to the fact that millions of foreign-born or foreign-descended residents … intend to live their lives in Germany with no plans of returning to their ancestral homelands. More than three million of these new Germans are Muslims -- nearly two million from Turkey, with most of the rest from Bosnia, Albania, the Arab world, Pakistan and Iran." While "Germany has a long way to go," Unger adds, its "new approach contrasts favorably with that of neighboring France -- the home of Western Europe's largest and perhaps least integrated Muslim population."

Public's View Of Official Corruption Worsening. The New York Times (11/12, BU2, Stein, 1.16M) briefly notes the release of Transparency International's "annual corruption perceptions index, which gauges how people view the honesty of public officials in 163 countries." The survey shows a growing perception of corruption in Iraq, Brazil, Cuba, Israel, Jordan, Laos, Algeria and the United States, which "fell three spots, to tie for 20th with Chile and Belgium. The pecuniary relationships that Jack Abramoff and other lobbyists had with certain members of Congress apparently took a toll on the country's reputation. And a substantial number of voters cited corruption as a factor in their decision in the midterm election last week."

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Centrist Path In Congress May Rile Democrats' Base."
"California Voters In A Happy State."
"Vietnam Activists See An Opening."
"'Laguna' Cast As The Villain In Laguna."

New York Times:
"Incoming Democrats Put Populism Before Ideology."
"Entrepreneurs See A Web Guided By Common Sense."
"Democrats Aim To Save Inquiry On Work In Iraq."
"Sectarian Rifts Foretell Pitfalls Of Iraqi Troops' Taking Control."
"Frustration Grows At Carousel As More Baggage Goes Astray."
"Sports Artist Sued For Mixing Crimson And Tide."

Washington Post:
"After Battle, Generation Kept On Fighting."
"Despite Billions Spent, Rebuilding Incomplete."
"Rove Remains Steadfast."
"Democrats Find Lessons In GOP Reign."
"Special Panel Could Reshape Iraq Policy."

Washington Times:
"For Vets And President, A Day Of Remembrance."
"Christianity Seen At Risk Of Extinction In Birthplace."
"Core Values Still Valid, GOP Says."
"Americans Believe In God, With Conditions."

Detroit Free Press:
"Michigan's Band Of Brothers: Loved Ones Soldier On."
"Carmakers' Agenda For Bush: Hear Our Pain."
"Going To The Airport? Pack Some Extra Cash."
"Three Motorists Die In Police Chase In Detroit."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Why Are ASA Planes So Late?"
"Kids Test Positive For Cocaine."
"Georgia Bucks Democratic Trend."
"Perdue: Few Promises To Keep."

Houston Chronicle:
"Texas, Louisiana Pipeline Maps Inaccurate."
"Probes Dig Deeper In Halliburton Bribery Case."
"Texas Democrats Hoping Gains Weren't A Fluke."
"Defeat At K-State Means Double Whammy For Ut."
"Houston Artists Scattering From Traditional Spaces."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Evening news was preempted by sports.
CBS: Evening news was preempted by sports.
NBC: Iraq War; US Soldiers Become Citizens; President Seeks Father's Advice; Election 2008; Public's View Of Veterans; Accidental Israeli Attack On Gaza; Future Talks With North Korea; New York Navy Rescue; CD's Replaced By Digital; Storm On Saturn; Teenager's Tribute To Veterans.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.

White House: PRESIDENT BUSH: No public schedule.
VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY: No public schedule.

DOJ_NMG_0093229

US Senate: No scheduled events.

US House: No scheduled events.

Other: ISRAELI PRIME MINISTER OLMERT. Highlights: 5:30 a.m. Arrives at Andrews AFB. 6 p.m. Dinner with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Closed press.

Nov. 12 - 14. EDUCATION _ The Public Education Network holds its 16th annual conference on the transformation of public education by local education funds. Location: Fairmont Hotel, 2401 M St. NW. Contacts: Howie Schaffer, 202-628-7464 ext 209

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0093230

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, November 13, 2006 8:14 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Saturday, November 11, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061111.pdf; dojclips061111.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Warrantless Wiretaps Unlikely To Be OK'd (AP) 5
Social Security Data A Major Source In Terrorism Probes (WP) 6
Former USF Professor Must Testify In Va. Grand Jury Probe (BRAH) 7
In Letter, Radical Cleric Details CIA Abduction, Egyptian Torture (WP) 8
Britain's MI5 Warns Of Rising Terror Threat (WP) 9
Blair Says Homegrown Terrorism Is Generation-Long Struggle (NYT) 10
Judge Lets Guilty Plea Stand In Terrorism Case (WP) 11
Egyptian Says He Was Tortured After Being Kidnapped In Milan (NYT) 12
A Topic In The Air But One That Political Candidates Declined To Touch: Torture Of Prisoners (NYT) 12

Homeland Response:

Democrats Still Face Hurdles In Enacting 9/11 Panel's Ideas (WP) 14
Looking Into Laptops (LAT) 16
Slow Home Grants Stall Progress In New Orleans (NYT) 16

War News:

Pentagon To Reevaluate Strategy And Goals In Iraq (WP) 18
Military Team Undertakes A Broad Review Of The Iraq War And The Campaign Against Terror (NYT) 19
US Army "To Suggest Iraq Changes" (BBC) 20
A Budding, Bipartisan Consensus On Iraq (LAT) 21
A Salute To Duty And Sacrifice (WP) 23
Marines, Bush Dedicate Museum (WT) 25
Selfless Courage: Marine Is Awarded Medal Of Honor (WSJ) 26
Medal Of Honor Granted To Slain Marine (LAT) 27
Marine To Receive Medal Of Honor For Iraq Heroism (CNN) 27
At Dusty Outpost In Iraq, Cake Is Cut For Marines Young And Not So Young (NYT) 28
Blair To Give Iraq Evidence To Baker (FT) 30
U.S. Gov't Office In Iraq Attacked (WT/AP) 30
Hang Hussein Fast, Clerics Say (LAT) 31
Nat'l Guard Units Face 2nd Tours In Iraq (AP) 32
Guard Units Could Do 2nd Tour In Iraq (LAT/AP) 33
Tall Afar's Long Road Back (WP) 33
Decrepit Healthcare Adds To Toll In Iraq (LAT) 35
Rumsfeld May Face Abuse Charges (BBC) 37
Rummy's Got A New Woe - Torture Suit By 9/11 Thug (NYDN) 38
Rumsfeld Rides Off Into The Sunset (FT) 38
Afghanistan Waits For Peace Five Years After Fall Of Taliban (AFP) 39
In Pakistan, Recent Attacks Shred Hopes For Regional Peace Model (WP) 40
Then And Now, Female Soldiers Just Do Their Jobs (NYT) 42

Corporate Scandals:

Fastow Gets His Moment In The Sun (NYT) 43
Corporate Crime In H-P Case, New Sheriff Comes To Town (WSJ) 45
3 Qwest Executives Cash In Options (AP) 45
SEC, Accounting Board Officials To Weigh Sarbanes-Oxley Update (WP) 46
SEC Chairman Backs Creation Of One Regulator For Brokerages (WSJ) 47
Hedge Funds Could Face New Limits (BLOOM) 47
Spitzer's Successor May Not Follow In His Footsteps (WSJ) 48
Korean Prosecutors Hit Snags In Inquiry Of Lone Star Deal (WSJ) 49

Criminal Law:

Supreme Court Will Consider Jud (SLPD) 50
Agent's Article Puts Case At Risk (AP) 51
Mistrial Called In Online Ad Fraud Case (WP) 52
Anti-Foley Blogger Speaks Out (LAT) 52

4 Plead Guilty In Wave Of Eco-sabotage (OREG) 55
4 More Plead Guilty In Ecosabotage Cases; Trial May Be Avoided (SEATIMES) 56
Four More Guilty In String Of Arsons (ERG) 57
Government Claims Victory Over Ecoterrorism Outfit (AP) 58
Paul Pleads Guilty To Eco-arson (MEDMT) 59
Gun Collector Fails Polygraph Over Second Barrel Purchase (SEATIMES) 60
Man Once Held In Wales Killing Fails Polygraph (AP) 61
Former LAPD Spokesman Indicted On Sex Charges (LAT) .. 62
Suit Links Ovitz To Pellicano Case (LAT) 62
Microsoft Targets Piracy (FT) 64

Civil Law:

U.S. Settles Civil Case Against British Online Gambling Company BetOnSports (FINDLAW/AP) 64

Civil Rights:

Feds Probe Care At Ore. Mental Hospital (AP) 65
Human Trafficking Cases Increase In El Paso (EPT) 65
2 LAPD Officers Investigated In Beating Case (LAT) 67
Beating Of L.A. Suspect Sparks Outcry (WP) 68
Police Beating Video From L.A. Demonstrates The Power Of YouTube Again (USAT/AP) 69
Landscapers Cause Furor By Shunning Gay Clients (NYT) .. 70
Gain For Same-Sex Marriage In Massachusetts (NYT) 71
The Court And Abortion (NYT) 72
Choosing Choice (LAT) 73
Keeping The Voting Clean (NYT) 74

Antitrust:

DOJ Targets 36 Markets In NAR Antitrust Suit (INMAN) 75
Motorola To Buy Rival Of BlackBerry (AP) 76
Bulldog Edition Clash Of Cultures Exacerbates Woes For Tribune Co. (WSJ) 77

Environment:

EPA Wants Man Fined For Silence On Pollution Role (SPT) 81
Lawsuit Says Family Damaged Wetlands In Chesapeake (VP) 82
Energy Demand Is Expected To Rise In 4th Quarter (WSJ) ... 82
Bill Allowing More Drilling Along Coasts Appears Dead (NYT) 83

Immigration:

Democrats To "Revisit" Law Creating Border Fence (WT/UPI) 84

Congress-Administration:

Bush, Pelosi Pledge To Work Together (MCT) 85
On A Shifting Field, A Sense Of Rising Expectations (NYT) ... 86
Gridlock Need Not Be Inevitable For Bush (AP-Y) 87
Bush Meets With Pelosi; Both Vow Cooperation (WP) 88
Democratic Victory Raises Spirits Of Those Favoring Citizenship For Illegal Aliens (NYT) 90
Harry Reid, An Infighter With A Sharp Jab (NYT) 92
Bush, Democrats Pledge To Work Together (AP-Y) 93
Bush, Pelosi Look Ahead Over Lunch (WT) 94
Bush In Overture To Democrats (FT) 96
Bush Asks Congress To Approve Bolton (FT) 96
Bolton Unlikely To Win Senate Approval (AP-Y) 97
Bolton May Not Return As U.N. Envoy (WP) 98
U.N. Envoy Confirmation Unlikely (LAT) 99
Bush Renominates Bolton Ahead Of Change In Senate (WT) 100
With Power Set To Be Split, Wiretaps Re-emerge As Issue (NYT) 101
Bipartisanship On Hold (NYT) 102
Democrats Are Set To Subpoena (LAT) 103
Democrats Poised To Flex New Muscles (WSJ) 105
Democrats Weigh New Power As Leaders (NYT) 107
Sweep Gives Dems Power To Put Plans Into Action (USAT) 108
Now The Decider Must Listen (WP) 109
New Majority Plans Early Security Push (USAT) 110
Dingell Wants To Cut U.S. Oil Habit (USAT) 111
First, Ethics Reform (WP) 113
The Family-Friendly Congress? (NYT) 113
Alternative Minimum Tax Targeted (WP) 114
Ex-Treasury Head Rubin Urges Democrats To Mull Tax Increase (WSJ) 116
The Wages Of Politics (WSJ) 116
Time For The $5.15 Minimum Wage To Punch Out? (WSJ) 118
Slow Track (WSJ) 119
Economic Populism Pays For Democrats (FT) 120
Congress Likely To Clash With Bush On Trade (LAT) 122
Tipping Point For Trade (WP) 123
Labor Movement Dusts Off Agenda As Power Shifts In Congress (NYT) 124
Choice For Intelligence Panel Poses Early Test For Pelosi (NYT) 125
Reid, Pelosi Expected To Keep Tight Rein In Both Chambers (WP) 126
Pride Of Baltimore (WP) 128
The Determined Democrat (FT) 130
2 Democrats Vie For House No. 2 (WT) 132
Democrats Ready To Flex Congressional Muscle (CHIT) .. 133
Scandals Have Touched Some Key Democrats (WSJ) 134

DOJ_NMG_0093233

Connecticut's Dodd May Lead Banking Committee (USAT) 136
Some Defense Firms More At Ease As McCain Denied Oversight Chair (WSJ) 137
Treasury Chief Set To Seek Deals (NYT) 138
U.N. Post Will Test Bush On Pledge For Consensus (NYT) 140
Mississippians Rise Up Over Rangel's Comment (NYT) 142
Pelosi Affirms Support Of Full D.C. Voting Rights (WP) 143
Full Vote Eyed For House Delegate Before Session Ends (WT) 143

Other News:

Election Past, How High Can Stocks Go? (WSJ) 144
Shares Up, Led By Home Builders (NYT) 145
Virginia Sen. Allen Concedes Defeat (AP-Y) 146
Democrats Take Control Of Senate As Allen Concedes To Webb In Va. (WP) 147
Allen Concedes, Gives Senate To Democrats (WT) 149
After 2 Decades In Ascent, A Stunning Breakdown (WP) 151
Democrats Gain Senate And New Influence (NYT) 152
Allen Concedes Defeat, Sealing Transfer Of Senate (LAT) . 154
Webb Gives Thanks Early; Allen Aides Still Stunned (WP) ... 155
Another Layer Of Winners And Losers (NYT) 156
Burns Concedes Montana Race To Democrat (AP-Y) 158
Rural Montana Farmer Is Going To Washington (LAT) 159
Lawmakers Who Won't Be Missed (WP) 160
Just Call Him Joe Democrat (LAT) 161
Democrats Win Bigger Share Of Religious Vote (WP) 162
The Architect Speaks (TIME) 163
R.I. Senator May Leave Republican Party (AP-Y) 164
Republicans Are Ahead In Remaining House Races (WSJ) 165
RNC Asks Steele To Replace Mehlman (WT) 166
Mehlman To Step Down From RNC Post (AP-Y) 167
Republican Party Chairman Will Not Seek Another Term (NYT) 168
Mehlman Won't Seek Another Term As Republican Party Chief (WP) 168
Redistricting: Home To Roost (WSJ) 169
Evangelical Leader: GOP Abandoned Voters (AP-Y) 171
Schwarzenegger Welcomes 'New Blood' In D.C. (LAT) 172
Schwarzenegger Implores GOP To Follow Script Of His Sequel (WP) 173
Gingrich Sees Hope For Conservatives (WT) 174
Minority Report (WSJ) 176
Bridge To Somewhere (WSJ) 177
A Putsch At The DNC? (TNR) 178
Steele Still A Main Attraction (WT) 178
Corporate Donors Increased Their Support For Dems (USAT) 179
Republicans Lose Ground Among Hispanic Voters (USAT) 180
For Latino Voters, Best Years Are Ahead (USAT) 181
Immigration Losers (WSJ) 182
Recount Likely In Harris' House District (AP-Y) 183
In Florida, Echoes Of 2000 As Vote Questions Emerge (NYT) 183
Voters Say Yes To Borrowing Billions For New Projects (USAT) 185
Iowa Governor Declares For '08 (NYT/AP) 185
McCain Plans A Committee To Study '08 (NYT) 186
Election Doesn't Shutter Clinton Campaign Offices (NYT) .. 187
The '08 Race For The White House Begins (CQ) 188
Denver Wooing Democrats For '08 (USAT) 201
Referendum Revelations (WSJ) 202
Michigan Prefers Equality (WSJ) 203
Trade Deficit Narrowed In September (WSJ) 204
Dow Tumbles 73 Points As Attention Shifts To The Economy, New Congress (WSJ) 205
Wyoming's Sen. Craig Thomas Has Leukemia (AP-Y) 206
Foreign Sales By U.S. Arms Makers Doubled In A Year (NYT) 206
O'Malley Calls For Slots At Racetracks (WP) 208
Baltimore Celebrates Political Last Hurrah? (WT) 209
Democrats May Urge More Contact With U.S. Adversaries (WP) 210
Around The Globe, Relief Over U.S. Vote (WP) 211
Bush Discusses Immigration Reform With Mexico's President-elect (MCT) 212
Calderon Reassured On Immigration Bill (WT) 214
Iran Warns U.N. Against Sanctions (LAT) 214
U.S. Presses Russia To Bridge Gap Over UN Sanctions On Iran (BLOOM) 216
Rice Says US Unfazed By Growth Of China's Global Role (AFP-Y) 216
China: Scapegoat Or Sputnik (NYT) 217
U.S. Will Train Latin American Militaries (USAT) 218
Ortega Redux: A History Smolders On Cold War Embers (NYT) 219
White House Watches Ortega (WT) 220
Ortega, Again (NYT) 221
The Other Winner In Nicaragua (WSJ) 221
Security Council Sets Palestinian Vote (AP) 223
Palestinian PM Offers To Resign For Aid (AP) 223
Berlin Aims To Revive Mideast 'Quartet' (FT) 224
Palestinians Mourn Civilians Killed By Israel (NYT) 225

DOJ_NMG_0093234

Olmert: Israel Won't Stop Targeting Gaza (AP-Y) 226
Anaylsis: Hamas Has Big Stake In Truce (AP-Y).....228
The Perils Of Inaction (NYT) 229
Under Heavy Police Guard, Gay Rights Advocates Rally In Jerusalem (NYT).....229
Israeli Gay Rights Parade Called Off (LAT) 230
U.N. Delivers Plan For Court In Hariri Case To Lebanon (NYT) 232
A Royal Emirati Whose Career Fuels Young Women's Dreams (NYT).....232
Poland Sets Referendum On Euro, Further Clouding Stance On EU (WSJ).....234
Cyprus Says Rival's Transit Ban Will Hurt EU Credibility (WT)235
U.S. Criticizes U.N. Rights Council (AP) 235
Russia Reaches Trade Deal With U.S. (WP) 236
Russia Near Deal To Join The W.T.O. (NYT) 238
Russia's WTO Bid Comes Closer To Fruition (WSJ) 239
Russia And US Reach Deal On WTO (FT) 240
Russia Moves Closer To WTO Membership (AP) 241
Russia To Sign Agreement With U.S. On Terms For WTO (BLOOM) 242
U.S. Pact Paves Way For Russia In WTO (WT) 243
Envoy: U.S. Eager For India Nuke Deal (AP).....245
Trade Pacific Rim Initiative Gains A U.S. Push (WSJ).....245
US Looking For Compromise On UN Force For Darfur (AFP-Y).....246
Figure Skater Is New Envoy Of Good Will Overseas (NYT) ..247
Greenhouse Guessing (WP).....247
Kosovo: Final Report On Future Delayed (NYT).....248
Here Comes Kosovo (WP).....249
Northern Ireland Deal Advances (NYT) 249
Police Issue Stalls N. Ireland Deal (LAT) 250
U.S. Official Offers A Bleak Assessment Of Somalia (NYT) .251
Aid Group Quits Darfur, Citing Disruptions (WP/AP).....252
Next In Darfur (WP) 252
Nigeria's Savior, And Menace (LAT) 253
Don't Count Out Turkey (LAT) 253

DOJ_NMG_0093235

TERRORISM NEWS:

Warrantless Wiretaps Unlikely To Be OK'd (AP)

By Laurie Kellman, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Legislation aimed at President Bush's once-secret program for wiretapping U.S.-foreign phone calls and computer traffic of suspected terrorists without warrants shows all the signs of not moving ahead, notwithstanding President Bush's request this week that a lame-duck Congress give it to him.

Senate Democrats, emboldened by Election Day wins that put them in control of Congress as of January, say they would rather wait until next year to look at the issue. "I can't say that we won't do it, but there's no guarantee that we're going spend a lot of time on controversial measures," Democratic Whip Richard Durbin of Illinois said Thursday.

In Senate parlance, that means no.

Republicans for months have known that no bill accomplishing Bush's goal could get filibuster-proof support from 60 senators. Sealing off any hope was what Democratic leader Harry Reid put on his lame-duck to-do list. The warrantless domestic surveillance bill was conspicuous in its absence.

As for next year, Bush should not expect Democrats to allow such legislation to pass without language establishing considerable congressional oversight of any expansion of warrantless wiretaps.

"We have been asked to make sweeping and fundamental changes in law for reasons that we do not know and in order to legalize secret, unlawful actions that the administration has refused to fully divulge," said Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the next Judiciary Committee chairman. "If legislation is needed for judicial review, then we should write that legislation together, in a bipartisan and thoughtful way."

The Bush administration has a backup plan. In speeches over the next few weeks, the Justice Department will launch a new campaign for the legislation by casting the choice as one between supporting the program or dropping it altogether -- and appearing soft on al-Qaida.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will make the eavesdropping program the focus of a Nov. 18 speech at the U.S. Air Force Academy. Kenneth L. Wainstein, assistant attorney general for the national security, will make a similar pitch Wednesday to the American Bar Association.

Leahy said that monitoring communications of suspected terrorists is essential but that "it needs to be done lawfully and with adequate checks and balances to prevent abuses of Americans' rights and Americans' privacy."

After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Bush ordered the National Security Agency to monitor communications potentially related to al-Qaida between people in the U.S. and those overseas. He bypassed normal requirements for court approval of such eavesdropping, and the program came under harsh criticism after it was disclosed last December by The New York Times.

Democrats and Republicans on the intelligence and judiciary committees spent much of the year trying to find out details from the administration, to little avail. Much of the information is classified, and the White House has insisted that revealing it would mean compromising the war on terrorism.

The House passed a bill in September to allow warrantless wiretaps under certain restrictions. House and Senate intelligence committees and congressional leaders would have to be notified, the president would have to believe that a terrorist attack is imminent, and certification would have to be renewed every 90 days.

A Republican measure in the Senate favored by the administration would require the Justice Department to report twice a year to the House and Senate intelligence committees the number and kind of any such operations. It would permit the surveillance to continue for up to one year without a warrant.

*—

The House bill is H.R. 5825; the Senate bill is S. 3931.

DOJ_NMG_0093236

Social Security Data A Major Source In Terrorism Probes (WP)

By Carlos Roig And Christopher Kriva, Special to The Washington Post

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

Sohaib Bin Lateef left Pakistan for the United States more than 25 years ago and fulfilled his dreams with a suburban home, a family and a string of gas stations and convenience stores in St. Louis. But along the way, he says, he took some bad advice and obtained a Social Security number under a false name.

Now Bin Lateef, 47, faces deportation and stands to lose everything, even though he insists he has no ties to terrorists. The Justice Department lists his case as terrorism-related.

Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the Social Security Administration's vast databases of personal information have become a resource for federal investigators, who have asked the agency to check tens of thousands of records for number misuse and identity fraud -- potential precursors to terrorist activity. Bin Lateef is one of hundreds of people convicted as a result.

The Social Security Administration is "the Fort Knox of identity information in the United States," said James Huse, the agency's inspector general from 1998 to 2004. "That's a pretty impressive investigative tool that no other agency possesses."

From just after Sept. 11 through 2005, Social Security officials sent prosecutors 456 referrals that were classified as terrorism-related, according to statistics compiled by Syracuse University's Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse. The review shows that 91 percent of those referrals led to prosecutions.

Only the departments of Justice and Homeland Security have referred more terrorism-related cases for prosecution, according to the Syracuse records, which are based on data compiled by the Justice Department's Executive Office for United States Attorneys.

Still, few if any suspects in Social Security cases are ever linked publicly to alleged terrorist activity. Most cases referred to prosecutors in the months after Sept. 11 involved document fraud by Latino immigrants working at airports.

Previous studies by the Syracuse center found that thousands of cases have been referred by all agencies for prosecution under the labels of "international terrorism" or "antiterrorism." However, senior Justice officials instead usually cite the criminal division's much smaller list of terrorism-related cases, which as of June included 441 defendants and 261 convictions. Most on that smaller list were charged with crimes unrelated to terrorism, an earlier Washington Post analysis found.

Prosecutors generally will not discuss individual cases. Law enforcement officials have said that even if they have evidence of terrorist activity, it does not need to be made public if suspects can be arrested or deported on lesser charges, such as document fraud or immigration violations.

"Prosecution of terrorism-related targets on these types of charges is often an effective method -- and sometimes the only available method -- of deterring and disrupting potential terrorist planning and support activities without compromising national security information," Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty wrote in a Justice Department report in June.

The federal law prohibiting misuse of Social Security numbers is "a very easy statute from a prosecution standpoint," said Jonathan Lasher, deputy chief counsel to the Social Security Administration's inspector general. "We don't have to prove a lot in the way of motive or intent. If you represent a number to be yours that isn't yours, you've essentially met the burden."Tapping the Data

After the 2001 attacks, authorities tapped the two main Social Security databases for information on suspected terrorists. "We were given taskings and requests, and we were responding to them as best we could in the wake of this national tragedy," said Richard A. Rohde, the Social Security Administration's assistant inspector general for investigations.

One database lists basic application information from people seeking Social Security numbers. The other contains wage and earnings histories compiled by the agency that are used to determine Social Security benefits.

The Internal Revenue code normally prohibits Social Security from releasing information in the wage and earnings database, even to law enforcement agencies. But IRS and Social Security officials are permitted to waive that rule in "life-threatening situations." A 30-day waiver was granted immediately after the Sept. 11 attacks and was extended four times by the IRS through early 2002, Lasher said.

Huse said he asked Congress several times unsuccessfully for permanent authority to release information in the wage database to federal law enforcement officials investigating potential terrorist activity.

DOJ_NMG_0093237

One of the earliest uses of Social Security data in homeland security investigations came before the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City. Ronald Ingleby, resident agent in charge of the Social Security inspector general's office there, worked with the U.S. attorney's office to acquire about 10,000 employee records from the local airport authority and had his staff search Social Security records. As a result, 69 workers were indicted for alleged misuse of Social Security numbers on applications for airport security badges.

The program, which was expanded to many of the nation's airports as well as ports and other facilities, resulted in hundreds of guilty pleas, largely from Latino workers with no discernible links to terrorist groups. The workers had used fake or stolen Social Security numbers to gain employment or acquire access badges.

Federal agents also began turning to Social Security to check dubious records brought to their attention or to run down terrorism leads. In one case, a tip that al-Qaeda might try to poison military rations led to checks on workers at a meals-ready-to-eat factory in Texas. Several were convicted in 2004 of possessing or using false documents, though the case files show no evidence of a poisoning plot.

Other cases led to charges against members of document-counterfeiting rings in Maryland and New York.Attracting Notice

Bin Lateef believes he originally came to the attention of investigators because he was a Pakistani national with a check-cashing company among his holdings. He said authorities began looking into his business in 2003. He also said that for a number of years he sent as much as $24,000 to $36,000 annually to his family in Pakistan, sometimes using "hawala," the system of informal money transfers in which cash moves between friends and relatives.

His lawyer believes authorities also were concerned about a September 2003 trip Bin Lateef took with his family through Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and Germany.

Commenting on this type of case, Jimmy Gurule, a law professor at the University of Notre Dame who was undersecretary for enforcement at the Treasury Department from 2001 to 2003, said a number of issues would have interested investigators. "The combination of the international travel, the combination of the money being transferred abroad through a hawala-type system or certainly the use of false identification documents are all red flags of possible terrorist activity," he said.

An inquiry turned up Bin Lateef's Social Security fraud. He had entered the United States on a student visa in 1980 to attend Southern Illinois University. A 1985 application to extend his stay was denied, but he said he became a legal permanent resident alien in 1988 under the Reagan administration's immigration reform.

However, to get the green card, Bin Lateef said, he used a false name on the application based on bad advice from acquaintances. A year or two later, he obtained a Social Security number with that false name.

Bin Lateef said that he has never had links to terrorist groups -- only that he went into business, raised a family and bought a home in O'Fallon, Mo., near St. Louis. "This is the only country in the whole entire world that would give me the opportunity to do what I did," he said.

William Wynne, Bin Lateef's lawyer, said, "This guy has a tattoo on his forehead that says 'productive citizen.' "

Bin Lateef pleaded guilty to felony charges of lying to federal authorities and of misusing a Social Security number. Deportation proceedings are ongoing. Prosecutors declined to comment on his case.

Like many other Social Security referrals related to homeland security prosecutions, Bin Lateef's is classified by the Justice Department as anti-terrorism.

In his report, McNulty, the deputy attorney general, signaled that investigators would continue to rely on Social Security and other government statutes not directly related to terrorism.

"There has been some criticism of our use of nonterrorism offenses, such as false statement charges, immigration fraud, and use of fraudulent travel documents, in terrorism cases," McNulty wrote. "Yet the appropriate charging of such offenses is so important to our disruption of terrorist plans that the Department has urged prosecutors to undertake initiatives to increase their use of these statutes."

Roig and Kriva were Medill School of Journalism fellows in the News 21 program of the Carnegie-Knight Initiative on the Future of Journalism Education.

Former USF Professor Must Testify In Va. Grand Jury Probe (BRAH)

DOJ_NMG_0093238

The Bradenton Herald, November 11, 2006

TAMPA - Sami Al-Arian must testify before a federal grand jury despite claims that a plea agreement freed him from cooperating with the U.S. government, a federal judge ruled.

U.S. District Judge James S. Moody Jr. ruled Al-Arian must testify in the probe of International Institute of Islamic Thought in Herndon, Va., because Virginia prosecutors have granted him immunity.

In his trial, prosecutors said Al-Arian's World and Islamic Studies Enterprise got money from the Va. Institute. A jury acquitted Al-Arian, a former University of South Florida professor, of eight counts but deadlocked on nine others in December.

In Letter, Radical Cleric Details CIA Abduction, Egyptian Torture (WP)

By Craig Whitlock, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

Friday, November 10, 2006;

MILAN, Nov. 9 -- In an account smuggled out of prison, a radical Muslim cleric has detailed how he was kidnapped by the CIA from this northern Italian city and flown to Cairo, where he was tortured for months with electric shocks and shackled to an iron rack known as "the Bride."

Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, also known as Abu Omar, wrote an 11-page letter describing his 2003 abduction at the hands of the CIA and Italian secret service agents. He somehow transferred the document out of Egypt -- where he remains in custody -- and into the hands of Italian prosecutors who are investigating his disappearance.

The Milan public prosecutor's office on Thursday confirmed the authenticity of the letter, the existence of which was first reported by the Italian daily newspaper Corriere della Sera.

The document has been submitted as evidence to defense attorneys representing 25 CIA officers, a U.S. Air Force officer and nine Italian agents who have been charged with organizing the kidnapping of Nasr, an Egyptian national, in February 2003.

A copy of the document, handwritten in Arabic, was obtained by The Washington Post. Undated, it reads like a homemade legal affidavit, outlining how Nasr was seized as he was walking to a mosque in Milan, stuffed into a van and rushed to Egypt in a covert operation involving spies from three countries.

"I didn't understand anything about what was going on," Nasr wrote. "They began to punch me in the stomach and all over my body. They wrapped my entire head and face with wide tape, and cut holes over my nose and face so I could breathe."

Upon his arrival in Egypt hours later, he said, he was taken into a room by an Egyptian security official who told him that "two pashas" wanted to speak with him.

"Only one spoke, an Egyptian," he recalled. "And all he said was, 'Do you want to collaborate with us?' " Nasr said the other "pasha" appeared to be an American. His captors offered a deal: They would allow him to return to Italy if he agreed to become an informant. Nasr said he refused. As a result, he said, he was interrogated and physically abused for the next 14 months in two Cairo prisons.

Italian prosecutors charge that the CIA and the Italian military intelligence agency known as Sismi collaborated to kidnap Nasr, who was known for preaching radical sermons in Milan and railing against U.S. policies in Afghanistan and the Middle East. According to prosecutors, the abduction thwarted a separate Italian police investigation into Nasr's activities and jeopardized a surveillance operation concerning other radicals in Milan.

Court papers allege that the kidnapping was orchestrated by the CIA's station chief in Rome and involved at least two dozen CIA operatives, most of whom arrived in Italy months before to lay the groundwork. Italian judges have issued arrest warrants for the CIA officers and have pledged to try them in absentia if necessary.

Although the case has caused a furor in Italy, the U.S. government has neither confirmed nor denied playing a role in Nasr's disappearance. Egyptian officials have also remained silent. A CIA spokesman declined to comment for this story.

Nasr's wife and his lawyer in Cairo have said the cleric is still imprisoned in Egypt, although he has been released under house arrest for brief periods. It is unclear how Italian prosecutors received a copy of his letter. Investigators said handwriting experts have verified that Nasr was the author.

DOJ_NMG_0093239

Prosecutors in Milan are also investigating allegations that Italian spies offered to give Nasr $2.5 million if he would sign papers saying he had left Italy voluntarily and was not kidnapped, according to Italian news reports.

The imam of a Milan mosque where Nasr preached on occasion said he also recognized the handwriting as the Egyptian's. "This is his writing, I know it for sure," said the imam, Arman Ahmed al-Hissini, who is known locally as Abu Imad and runs the Viale Jenner mosque, a few blocks from where Nasr was kidnapped.

Abdel Hamid Shaari, president of the Islamic Cultural Center in Milan, said he was worried that the public disclosure of Nasr's letter could jeopardize his life, or at least dash any chances that he might be released. "What are they going to do with him now?" Shaari said. "He's a problem for the Italians, the Egyptians and the Americans."

In his letter, Nasr described how his health had badly deteriorated. He had lost hearing in one ear from repeated beatings, he said, and his formerly pitch-black hair had turned all white. He said he was kept in a cell with no toilet and no lights, where "roaches and rats walked across my body."

He also gave a graphic account of Egyptian interrogation practices, including how he would be strapped to an iron rack nicknamed "the Bride" and zapped with electric stun guns.

On other occasions, he wrote, he was tied to a wet mattress on the floor. While one interrogator sat on a wooden chair perched on the prisoner's shoulders, another interrogator would flip a switch, sending jolts of electricity into the mattress coils.

Post a Comment

Comments: (Limit 5,000 characters)

Comments that include profanity or personal attacks or other inappropriate comments or material will be removed from the site. Additionally, entries that are unsigned or contain "signatures" by someone other than the actual author will be removed. Finally, we will take steps to block users who violate any of our posting standards, terms of use or privacy policies or any other policies governing this site. Please review the full rules governing commentaries and discussions. You are fully responsible for the content that you post.

Britain's MI5 Warns Of Rising Terror Threat (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 10 -- British spies are watching 1,600 people in 200 cells believed to be plotting terrorist acts in Britain or overseas, according to the head of Britain's domestic spy agency.

"More and more people are moving from passive sympathy towards active terrorism," said Eliza Manningham-Buller, director general of the MI5 intelligence agency. The spy chief, who rarely speaks publicly, delivered her stark assessment Thursday in a speech at the University of London's Queen Mary College. A transcript of her remarks was posted on MI5's Web site Friday.

Manningham-Buller said a growing number of people are plotting to kill others and damage the British economy. The conspirators, she said, are motivated "by a sense of grievance and injustice driven by their interpretation of the history between the West and the Muslim world."

She also described the terrorists' "propaganda machine" as "sophisticated," noting that footage of attacks in Iraq is posted on the Internet within 30 minutes, facilitated by teams that edit the video, translate the audio into many languages and package the material for a global audience. "And, chillingly, we see the results here," she said. "Young teenagers being groomed to be suicide bombers."

Responding to her remarks, Prime Minister Tony Blair said, "It's a very long and deep struggle, but we have to stand up and be counted for what we believe in and take the fight to those people who want to entice young people into something wicked and violent but utterly futile." He said he agreed with Manningham-Buller's assessment that this terrorist threat would last a generation.

The spy chief said her agency was currently aware of about 30 plots, which "often have links back to al-Qaeda in Pakistan." It is through those links, she said, that al-Qaeda gives "guidance and training to its largely British foot soldiers here on an extensive and growing scale."

DOJ_NMG_0093240

Earlier this week, a British court sentenced to life in prison an al-Qaeda operative who had made a detailed proposal to financiers in Pakistan, according to prosecutors. The operative, Dhiren Barot, 34, had plotted synchronized bomb attacks on U.S. financial institutions, along with London hotels and other sites in Britain.

U.S. intelligence officials have not publicly estimated the number of terrorist cells they are watching. In September, however, President Bush delivered a speech in which he detailed eight plots that had been thwarted as a result of intelligence gleaned from detainees in the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Manningham-Buller's motivation for publicly airing her assessment was unclear. Some analysts suggested the move could be seen as a plea for more funding or for intelligence tips; others saw the speech as a way to recruit more agents.

Staffing at MI5 has increased 50 percent to 2,800 since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and it will continue to grow, Manningham-Buller said. More than 6 percent of MI5 personnel are ethnic minorities, she added. The agency has actively recruited Muslims and other minorities.

But Manningham-Buller also painted a picture of an overstretched agency that has to make daily decisions about "whom to follow, whose telephone lines need listening to," and what seized evidence needs to be analyzed first.

She emphasized that the first al-Qaeda-related plot against Britain was discovered and disrupted in November 2000, long before the Iraq war started. But she also said that videotaped statements of British suicide bombers made it clear that they are motivated by "perceived worldwide and long-standing injustices against Muslims," including their interpretation of British foreign policy as "anti-Muslim," particularly in Iraq and Afghanistan.

She also warned that many countries are facing a new terrorist threat and specifically mentioned Spain, France, Canada and Germany. While terrorists were currently using homemade improvised explosive devices, she said, "tomorrow's threat may include the use of chemicals, bacteriological agents, radioactive materials and even nuclear technology."

Blair Says Homegrown Terrorism Is Generation-Long Struggle (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 10 — Prime Minister Tony Blair said Friday that the threat from homegrown Islamic terrorism would last "a generation," reinforcing a highly unusual warning by the head of the MI5 domestic intelligence agency that it was keeping some 1,600 suspects in 200 terrorist cells under surveillance.

The warning by Dame Eliza Manningham-Buller, head of MI5, in a speech on Thursday was by far the most extensive and somber of recent times and included assertions that about 30 terrorist conspiracies were under investigation and that "tomorrow's threat may include the use of chemicals, bacteriological agents, radioactive materials and even nuclear technology."

She also asserted that operatives for Al Qaeda in Pakistan were helping to guide some of the plots, reflecting British assessments that Qaeda operatives survived campaigns against them to steer conspiracies in Britain from afar.

"We are aware of numerous plots to kill people and to damage our economy," she said. "What do I mean by numerous? Five? Ten? No, Nearer 30 — that we know of. These plots often have links back to Al Qaeda in Pakistan and through those links, Al Qaeda gives guidance and training to its largely British foot soldiers here on an extensive and growing scale."

The British counterterrorism authorities say they cannot move too quickly to break up plots because they need enough evidence to prosecute suspects successfully.

Since the London bombings of July 2005, Britain has sounded frequent terrorist alarms, most notably last August when it issued a major alert alleging that Islamic terrorists planned to blow up trans-Atlantic airliners. And just this week, a judge sentenced a 34-year-old Muslim, Dhiren Barot, to a minimum of 40 years in prison for plotting a series of attacks in the United States and Britain from 2000 to 2004.

The news and warnings have left many Britons with mixed feelings: a sense of foreboding, but also some skepticism about the government's motives in making such announcements since there have been no attacks for more than a year.

Among the more frightening aspects of Dame Eliza's warning was her statement that support for terrorism among British Muslims was broader than previously known, as more young people had become radicalized.

DOJ_NMG_0093241

"More and more people are moving from passive sympathy toward active terrorism through being radicalized or indoctrinated by friends, families, in organized training events here and overseas, by images on television, through chat rooms and Web sites on the Internet," she said.

Moreover, Dame Eliza said, since the July 2005 subway and bus attacks, five other "major conspiracies" had been thwarted in Britain, "saving many hundreds, possibly even thousands, of lives." MI5's caseload has increased 80 percent so far this year alone, she said.

Historically, the head of MI5 does not make such public pronouncements. "Emerging from the shadows is not something they like to do," said Neil Ellis, a domestic security expert at Royal United Services Institute, a research group. Indeed, Dame Eliza acknowledged in her speech to academics on Thursday night: "I rarely speak in public. I prefer to avoid the limelight and get on with my job."

But it was a sign of changed times — and, perhaps of MI5's campaign to secure more government money and expand its ranks of agents and recruits — that the text of her speech was posted Friday on the MI5 Web site, prompting some Islamic leaders to say the authorities were demonizing Britain's Muslim minority of 1.6 million.

Massoud Shadjareh, the chairman of the Islamic Human Rights Commission, said, "Although we recognize that there is a real threat, the suggestion that we could even face a nuclear threat will only contribute to paranoia rather than safety and security."

Dame Eliza echoed some longstanding arguments by Mr. Blair, who has resisted critics' accusations that his support of the United States in Iraq and Afghanistan had made Britain a target for terrorist attack. "Let there be no doubt about this," she said, "the international terrorist threat to this country is not new. It began before Iraq, before Afghanistan and before 9/11."

But she went on to say that terrorist recruiters had woven a "powerful narrative" of Muslim oppression. She said the video wills of British suicide bombers made it clear that they were motivated, in part, by their interpretation of British foreign policy, particularly in Iraq and Afghanistan, as anti-Muslim, but also by perceived worldwide and longstanding injustices against Muslims and an "extreme and minority interpretation of Islam promoted by some preachers and people of influence."

She said the terrorist threat was "serious, is growing and will, I believe, be with us for a generation."

"It is a sustained campaign, not a series of isolated incidents," she continued. "It aims to wear down our will to resist."

In a separate news conference on Friday, Mr. Blair said, "I think it's absolutely right that it will last a generation."

"It's a very long and deep struggle," he said, "but we have to stand up and be counted for what we believe in and take the fight to those people who want to entice young people into something wicked and violent but utterly futile."

Dame Eliza has presided over a major, public effort to expand MI5, which deals exclusively with domestic security and espionage. In her speech, she said the MI5 staff now numbers 2,800, "an increase of over 50 percent since 9/11."

In a telephone interview, Mr. Ellis, of the Royal United Services Institute, said there had been a series of public statements by British officials warning of an increasing threat and seeking public support. Just on Wednesday, for instance, the foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, urged British Muslims to "speak up against extremism."

From that point of view, Mr. Ellis said, Dame Eliza may have been trying to promote this "cultural shift in how the security services engage with the public."

"If society is to engage in this battle of ideas," Mr. Ellis said, "then perhaps we need to know the level, the size and the scale of this threat."

Judge Lets Guilty Plea Stand In Terrorism Case (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

A federal judge has refused to throw out the guilty plea of a convicted al-Qaeda supporter who argued that he was illegally spied on through President Bush's controversial warrantless eavesdropping program.

Iyman Faris, an Ohio truck driver, pleaded guilty in 2003 to plotting to bring down the Brooklyn Bridge and launch a simultaneous attack in Washington. He asked a judge to vacate the plea, arguing in part that the alleged surveillance violated his rights and that the government could not use it to build a case against him.

DOJ_NMG_0093242

U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema rejected Faris's motion this week for reasons that are unclear because her ruling remains sealed. It is cited in the docket in U.S. District Court in Alexandria. Another docket entry says Brinkema rejected efforts by Faris's attorneys to obtain documents "relating to or concerning any warrantless electronic surveillance or monitoring" of his conversations by the National Security Agency.

Faris, a Kashmiri-born naturalized U.S. citizen, pleaded guilty to providing material support to al-Qaeda. Federal officials said he was an al-Qaeda scout who had planned with top al-Qaeda operative Khalid Sheik Mohammed to sever the cables of the Brooklyn Bridge and to derail trains in or near Washington.

Faris's attorney, David B. Smith, declined to comment on Brinkema's ruling, as did prosecutors.

Faris is one of a number of terrorism defendants who have filed legal challenges to the NSA program, under which the agency has monitored phone calls and e-mails involving U.S. residents and foreign parties without obtaining warrants from a secret court that handles such matters.

A federal judge in Detroit ruled in August that the program, which is aimed at communications of potential terrorists, is unconstitutional and violates privacy and free speech rights. The government is appealing. Bush has argued that the program is legal and necessary to protect Americans from terrorists.

Faris is unique among defendants who have challenged the surveillance because Bush administration officials have said he was spied on -- and credited the program with helping to uncover his plot.

Egyptian Says He Was Tortured After Being Kidnapped In Milan (NYT)

By Elisabetta Povoledo

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

ROME, Nov. 10 — A militant Egyptian cleric who prosecutors say was kidnapped by the Central Intelligence Agency said in a newly published account that he was tortured with electric shocks while he lay on a wet mattress in a Cairo prison and was repeatedly beaten and forced to eat rotten bread in a pitch-black cell, while rats and cockroaches ran over his body.

The cleric's recounting was contained in an affidavit given to Italian prosecutors investigating his alleged abduction. Excerpts were published in a Milan daily newspaper, Corriere della Sera, on Thursday.

"I am writing my testimony from this, my tomb," writes Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, known as Abu Omar, at the start of an 11-page letter that was excerpted Thursday by the newspaper. His face has been transformed, he claims, "as a result of the torture."

Milanese prosecutors have appended the account to the case they are building against 39 people, including 25 C.I.A. operatives. Prosecutors accuse them of abducting Mr. Nasr and sending him to Egypt for questioning, in the American practice of rendition. Members of the Italian secret services, including Nicolo Pollari, the country's top spy, are also under investigation in the kidnapping, which took place in Milan in February 2003.

Earlier this year, an Italian military police officer confessed to having participated in the kidnapping, which he believed was jointly organized by the American and Italian intelligence services.

In the letter, Mr. Nasr says he was stopped by an American, asked for his documents and then forced into a white van where he was "beaten on my stomach and my entire body" before being bound and gagged and taken to Cairo by plane.

In the Cairo prison, he says, he was subjected to weeks of torture while he was being interrogated. "It lasted seven months," he wrote, but "it felt like seven years." His wife, Nabila, told Milanese prosecutors that Egyptian officials had tried to bribe her husband so he would deny that he had been kidnapped.

Writing from Egypt, she said that her husband had been offered $2 million "to say that he had not been kidnapped and to say that he had come of his own free will" to Egypt, the Milan newspaper reported Friday.

Milanese prosecutors have asked that the United States extradite the 25 operatives they believe organized and executed the kidnapping.

A Topic In The Air But One That Political Candidates Declined To Touch: Torture Of Prisoners (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0093243

By Peter Steinfels

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

The October issue of Theology Today, a scholarly journal published by the Princeton Theological Seminary, featured a series of articles on torture. "It is a matter of shame," writes one of the contributors, Jeremy Waldron, a professor of law at New York University, that "we have no choice but to conduct a national debate about torture."

That debate, Professor Waldron continues, is not about stopping torture by "corrupt and tyrannical regimes" but about whether the American people and the American nation want "to remain part of the international human rights consensus that torture is utterly beyond the pale."

There were few if any signs of such a debate in the midterm election campaigns. That cannot simply be because of the government's insistence that the United States abhors torture and does not practice it. The government insists on many things — about the war in Iraq and economic prosperity, for example — that its political opponents do not hesitate to challenge and challenge vociferously.

Torture is different. It is such a stain on personal and national character that nothing but appalling photographs could have forced the subject to the fore. When it comes to pressing the question of official complicity, no stack of equivocating documents can have similar force. In a season of shameless attack ads, torture is still too shameful to be debated.

As for religious reaction, Fleming Rutledge, the Episcopal priest and noted preacher, said in this issue of Theology Today, "In my lifetime, I do not remember any major public question being so studiously ignored as this one."

The journal articles stem from an effort to change that. They are based on presentations at the founding conference, in Princeton last January, of the National Religious Campaign Against Torture. Prominent religious leaders, Protestant (both mainline and evangelical), Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, Jewish and Muslim, issued a statement, "Torture Is a Moral Issue," that was a sweet seven sentences in length:

"Torture violates the basic dignity of the human person that all religions, in their highest ideals, hold dear. It degrades everyone involved — policy makers, perpetrators and victims. It contradicts our nation's most cherished values. Any policies that permit torture and inhumane treatment are shocking and morally intolerable.

"Nothing less is at stake in the torture abuse crisis than the soul of our nation. What does it signify if torture is condemned in word but allowed in deed?

"Let America abolish torture now — without exceptions."

It is hard to say how much the Theology Today articles add to that succinct statement. In one, William T. Cavanaugh, who teaches theology at the University of St. Thomas in St. Paul, draws on his previous study of torture by the Pinochet government in Chile. His most provocative observations may be that, however counterintuitive, "those who torture tend to think of their work in extremely high moral terms."

Citing examples from Chile, Professor Cavanaugh notes that "torturers sometimes imagine their acts as a kind of self-sacrifice on their part: 'What terrible things I must do in order to defend my beloved people!' "

What goes for the individual torturer can go for the nation as a whole. "The moral purpose is made more righteous," Professor Cavanaugh writes, "by the extremity of the act of torture itself." By definition, "the threat against the nation must be extremely severe if such an extreme procedure as torture is used."

The argument is strangely circular, but it ends in the conviction, he says, that "only the most morally righteous nation could be trusted with the capacity to use torture for a good purpose."

In another article, a leading evangelical ethicist, David P. Gushee, a professor of moral philosophy at Union University in Jackson, Tenn., worries that the United States is "succumbing to the temptation to waive moral rules that we have every reason to know are applicable to us."

"We know that torture is wrong," Dr. Gushee writes, "but just not now, not in our exceptional case, not in this global war on terror. Yet we are queasy enough, that we do not want to call torture, torture."

Instead, he continues, "we deny that we are torturing, or we deny that our prisoners are really prisoners, or when pushed to the wall, we remind one another of how evil the enemy is and how much worse other countries or ideologies are."

"We give every evidence," he concludes, "of the kind of self-deception so characteristic of the descent into sin."

DOJ_NMG_0093244

Dr. Gushee has not limited his concern to scholarly pages. Last February he wrote an article for the popular evangelical monthly Christianity Today titled "5 Reasons Torture Is Always Wrong."

All these writers must step carefully around the fact that the president and other American authorities have repeatedly denied that the government tolerates torture — even while they reserve its right to use what are delicately referred to in official parlance as "enhanced" or "alternative" interrogation techniques.

Obviously, these theologians have something less than complete confidence in such official protestations, and one can understand why.

In a White House compromise with a small group of adamant Republicans, last month's Military Commissions Act, for example, left standing the United States' commitment to Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions protecting prisoners from violence, cruelty, torture and humiliating and degrading treatment.

But while the legislation spelled out certain "grave breaches" of Common Article 3 that would constitute war crimes, it also underlined the president's power to interpret the nation's obligations, to define what is grave or not and to screen his definitions from court challenges, and maybe even from public knowledge.

Already, the Central Intelligence Agency has warned that detained Qaeda suspects must not be allowed to disclose their treatment to courts — or perhaps even to their own lawyers — lest other terrorists "adapt their training to counter the tactics that C.I.A. can employ in interrogations."

Is there any way around this lack of transparency? Here is one idea, admittedly inspired not by sober theological analysis but by political ads.

Let all interrogations be videotaped (interrogating off camera would itself be a "grave breach"). Three years after any interrogation, the video would be made public. One could assume that by that time terrorists would have learned whatever techniques had then been in use.

The important feature, of course, would be the kind of endorsement now required of campaign advertising — a closing shot of the president on screen. "This interrogation was paid for by the American people," the president would have to say, "and I approve of its methods."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Democrats Still Face Hurdles In Enacting 9/11 Panel's Ideas (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

Democratic leaders preparing to take control of Congress have vowed to push through a host of reforms recommended two years ago by the Sept. 11 commission, such as better port security and improved radio communications for first responders, but many of the most controversial changes are likely to face obstacles even with Capitol Hill in Democratic hands, according to experts and legislative aides.

Presumptive House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has made implementing the commission's recommendations one of the centerpieces of her "first 100 hours" legislative agenda, with particular focus on requiring radiation scans of all cargo that arrives by sea.

Other proposals include more money for rail security and hiring more Border Patrol agents and aviation screeners. Some Democrats also want to declassify intelligence agencies' budgets, improve management of terrorist watch lists, toughen regulation of chemical plants and improve privacy safeguards.

"As part of the first 100 hours, we will try to the best of our ability to address them in a more complete fashion than the piecemeal approach that Congress has taken thus far," said Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), incoming chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, referring to the commission's recommendations. "On some of the more controversial issues of cargo screening and other things, I think we can work out a compromise."

DOJ_NMG_0093245

Homeland security experts cautioned that Democratic control of Congress will not guarantee implementation of some of the commission's most controversial suggestions, which have languished because of entrenched political and bureaucratic obstacles.

A prime example is the commission's call to base the federal government's homeland security funding on the actual risk of terrorist attacks or other calamities -- an approach that would generally benefit large metropolitan areas at the expense of smaller cities and rural regions. Although such an approach would favor regions represented by Democrats, lawmakers have preferred to spread dollars to as many jurisdictions as possible.

"It's easy to say they'll implement the 9/11 recommendations. But some of the recommendations have not been implemented because they've been so hard to swallow," said Michael Greenberger, director of the Center for Health and Homeland Security at the University of Maryland. "It remains to be seen if the Democrats have an answer to that."

Democrats will face the usual divisions between the House and the Senate, as well as tensions between liberals and centrists within their own party. The Senate Homeland Security Committee is likely to be led by Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), who is more moderate than his House colleagues and who just completed, as an independent candidate, a bruising reelection campaign in which many Democrats opposed him after he lost in the primary.

The bipartisan Sept. 11 panel released its report in 2004. It subsequently issued admonishments to the Bush administration and the GOP-controlled Congress for failing to enact many of its major recommendations.

In a December 2005 "final report card," the commission gave the government mediocre to failing grades in numerous areas, including screening airline passengers and improving first responders' communication systems. Many commissioners have also pointed to mixed results in the effort to merge terrorism watch lists maintained by the FBI and other agencies.

Republican Thomas H. Kean, a former New Jersey governor who served as the commission's chairman, said yesterday that some recommendations that have languished -- including reserving portions of the broadcast spectrum for emergency responders and improvements in border security -- would be relatively easy to implement if Democrats are determined.

But he acknowledged that other changes are politically difficult, including the panel's call for restructuring the way Congress oversees and pays for homeland security programs. A Democratic leadership source, speaking on the condition of anonymity because the plans are not final, said Pelosi is likely to reorganize House committees to streamline jurisdiction over security matters.

"There's a whole realm of things that need to be done," Kean said. "The fact that the new speaker wants to make it a priority, I congratulate her."

Democrats have not spelled out how they intend to pay for their initiatives. In 2006, they unsuccessfully proposed $3 billion for rail security and $5 billion for first-responder communications equipment.

No one has figured out how to scan all cargo reliably in real-world settings.

"I should feel relieved, but I don't," said Carie Lemack, co-founder of Families of September 11 and head of a national security consulting firm.

Lemack said some of the commission's recommendations are relatively easy but have lacked the political backing to move forward. She cited naming a senior adviser to the president to oversee the lockdown of nuclear weapon materials worldwide and declassifying intelligence agencies' budgets.

James Jay Carafano, a senior research fellow at the Heritage Foundation, said lawmakers from both parties have signaled that they are unwilling to dispense homeland security funding based on risk, preferring the locality-based, pork-barrel funding that is popular at election time.

"What's left on the table is really, really hard and can't be legislated into existence, or really, really stupid and shouldn't be done anyway," Carafano said.

Some recommendations highlighted by Democrats are already in the works but face technical hurdles. These include efforts to put in place a border entry and exit screening system and to streamline the terrorism watch lists. A battle also looms over whether to pay for or delay Real ID, a multibillion-dollar effort to standardize state driver's licenses.

Other proposals by House Democrats, including hiring 2,000 new Border Patrol agents a year for five years and building a "virtual fence" using sensors and other technology, are already being adopted by the Bush administration.

DOJ_NMG_0093246

Looking Into Laptops (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

IT WAS BAD ENOUGH for international travelers earlier this year when security officials barred laptop computers from carry-on luggage. Now that the ban has been lifted, a new worry has replaced it: the prospect of U.S. customs agents snooping through your laptop — and even seizing it.

It doesn't happen often — only about 1% of executives surveyed recently by the Assn. of Corporate Travel Executives said their laptops had been confiscated — but it's enough to set off alarm bells. If your laptop holds critical banking data or operational information, the association warns, you're better off e-mailing a copy to yourself before heading to the airport. And if you have truly sensitive items, you'd better not put them on your laptop in the first place.

Officials at the Department of Homeland Security recite the familiar mantra — legitimate business travelers have nothing to fear. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents, they say, first conduct a routine check of whether a person should be admitted to the country. If that leads them to suspect the traveler is involved in a crime, they'll search any laptop. The only time a computer is seized, the department said in a statement, is "if the laptop contains information with possible ties to terrorism, narcotics smuggling, child pornography or other criminal activity."

But as the department's records point out, even "legitimate business travelers" may wind up having their laptops rifled if a person fits a suspicious profile (in one case, men between the ages of 30 to 60s traveling alone from Asia), or if an individual is unlucky enough to be chosen for a random inspection. Because the Supreme Court has ruled that agents at international points of entry can perform "routine" searches without a warrant or even reasonable suspicion, some courts have interpreted that to mean all travelers are subject to inspections of their privileged and personal information at any border crossing.

There is a glimmer of hope for travelers eager to keep the authorities' hands off their hard drives. U.S. District Judge Dean D. Pregerson in Los Angeles recently ruled against a laptop search because agents didn't have a reasonable basis to suspect a U.S. traveler of having committed a crime. In Pregerson's view, searching a laptop isn't "routine," and the 4th Amendment's protection against unreasonable searches and seizures applies on the border. The government appealed the ruling to the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals.

Stopping bad guys at the border is important, and it makes sense to inspect incoming items, including laptops, for explosives and other weapons. But the government has been using the terrorist attacks of 9/11 to redefine "reasonable." There's a clear line between checking a laptop for explosives and reading its contents, and agents should have an excellent reason to cross it.

Slow Home Grants Stall Progress In New Orleans (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — The $7.5 billion program to rebuild Louisiana by helping residents repair or replace their flooded homes has gotten off to a slow start, frustrating government officials and outraging many homeowners who say they are still in limbo 14 months after Hurricane Katrina hit.

Though nearly 79,000 families have applied to the program, called the Road Home, only 1,721 have been told how much grant money they will receive. And just 22 have received access to the cash, which was provided by federal taxpayers and is being distributed by the state.

“I don’t know of anyone who has actually received any money,” said Cassandra D. Wall, who is active in a group of homeowners from the eastern part of New Orleans. Ms. Wall said she planned to attend a protest Nov. 17 in Baton Rouge, the state capital, “to go public with the outrage and the outcry.”

Many hopes have been pinned on the Road Home program, which is widely considered the most important factor in rebuilding the ruined neighborhoods of New Orleans and is also meant to start an economic boom in southern Louisiana. Homeowners who rebuild or buy new houses in the state are eligible for grants of up to $150,000 to cover their uninsured losses, although the average award has been about $68,000.

DOJ_NMG_0093247

The city's mayor, C. Ray Nagin, is so dissatisfied with the pace of the program that on Nov. 1 he announced that the city was developing a plan to lend money to people waiting for their Road Home grants.

[Officials announced on Nov. 6 that Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco had ordered the contractor managing the program to calculate 10,000 awards by the end of the month.]

"It's time to kick into high gear," said Walter Leger, a lawyer and a member of the Louisiana Recovery Authority, which devised the federally financed Road Home program. "It's time to forget the reasons and excuses" for the slow pace so far.

In some ways, the program's low-speed beginning reflects an urgent need to avoid the kind of waste and fraud that plagued federal programs after the hurricane. The government, among other things, is demanding that applicants produce details of insurance policies and payouts, proof of title to a house, and, if possible, official assessments of a home's prestorm value. Many New Orleans residents lost such paperwork in the flood, or never had it in the first place.

But the larger explanation is that the program is, in effect, a giant experiment.

"There is no precedent," said Andy Kopplin, executive director of the recovery authority. "Louisiana's version is the single largest housing assistance program ever done anywhere."

The only similar program is in Mississippi, which got a full Congressional appropriation for its roughly $3 billion plan months before Louisiana got the full $7.5 billion it asked for. The Mississippi program is smaller and differs in many details; fewer people are eligible, for example, and the grants do not have to be used for housing.

But Mississippi's program has been plagued by some of the same problems, including a slow start that drew public criticism from, among others, Trent Lott, the state's junior Republican senator. New data from the program show that it has now paid $320.6 million in 5,201 grants — but officials had originally planned to have given out most of the grants by the end of August, the first anniversary of the storm.

Some Louisiana officials also point out that the Mississippi program got a public-relations black eye when it turned out that several state lawmakers had won a lucrative legal contract with the program. No accusations of fraud or conflicts of interest have surfaced in Louisiana's program.

That is not much comfort to people like Lisa A. Lincoln, a social worker flooded out of New Orleans who now lives about 130 miles away, near Lafayette. Ms. Lincoln applied for a Road Home grant in August. She was interviewed, her house was inspected and her thumbprint was taken as a fraud-prevention measure.

But she still has not heard if she will get a grant to repair her Creole cottage in the Gentilly neighborhood of New Orleans. The house still needs at least $60,000 worth of work, she said; it took all her insurance money, and help from community groups, to gut it and install some wallboard.

The delay appears to be that the program has to verify that she had insurance, and how much it paid her, she said. "And that could take however long to get," she said. "I'm in limbo."

Dealing with the insurance companies is just one challenge the program has faced, said Michael Byrne, a former New York City firefighter who is now chief program executive for ICF International, the private company the state hired to run the Road Home program.

Complicated federal regulations bar what is called "duplication of benefits," so anyone who received insurance money or housing assistance from a different government agency, like the Federal Emergency Management Agency, has to document it and have it subtracted from the Road Home grant. And there have been computer systems to coordinate, documents to verify, hundreds of people to hire and offices to open across the state and, soon, in Houston.

Even figuring out how much a house was worth before the storm — the cap on the amount of a grant — is difficult, slow and often controversial.

Michael M. Homan, a professor of theology at Xavier University, is among the few who has been told how much he can get to repair his badly damaged house in the Mid-City neighborhood. But Professor Homan thinks the amount he was offered, about $64,000, is too low.

That is because the program assigned a prestorm value to his house of $146,000, less than he paid for it in 2002 and about $40,000 less than the appraisal when he refinanced his mortgage the next year. So he has appealed, and is hoping that his grant will be increased. Because he writes about his experiences on the Internet (at michaelhoman.blogspot.com), his results are being anxiously watched by other applicants.

DOJ_NMG_0093248

Professor Homan said he was not dissatisfied with the program, compared with his other experiences after the storm. It has been, he said, "a year of incredible frustration," starting when the levees broke. He had flood insurance, but is suing his insurance company, which denied his claim for wind damage.

It is not just the financial strain. As anyone here will tell you, trying to live in New Orleans is hard. Professor Homan, his wife and two children are living in the second story of their tilted house and in a FEMA trailer parked out front. Around them, some houses look abandoned, and a few have waist-high weeds in their yards.

Because housing in New Orleans has traditionally been relatively inexpensive, limiting grants to the prestorm value of a house may keep many people from rebuilding, said Melanie Ehrlich, a professor at Tulane University who is a founder of Citizens Road Home Action Team, a group that is pushing for changes in the state program.

Dr. Ehrlich, a molecular biologist, cites statistics suggesting that before the storm, about 10 percent of the city's houses were valued at less than $50,000, and about two-thirds were valued at less than $125,000, far less than it would cost to build them from scratch. State officials say that low-income homeowners will be eligible for special loans that will be forgiven if they live in their houses for five years.

Salvatore S. Barone may be a test case, of sorts. Mr. Barone and his sister inherited a house in the eastern part of New Orleans after their mother died in 2000. Mr. Barone said that the house was valued at about $72,000, and that a contractor told him it would cost $52,000 to fix the flood damage.

But his situation, like many here, is complicated. His sister, who lived in the house before the storm, failed to pay the insurance or tax bills, probably because she was suffering from dementia, Mr. Barone said, adding that she was now in a nursing home.

A former driver for United Cabs in New Orleans, Mr. Barone said he was disabled by a stroke a decade ago and lives on $699 a month in federal benefits. He is staying in a trailer in rural Mississippi.

Though he has applied for a Road Home grant, Mr. Barone must first get his name on the title to the house, a common problem in New Orleans, lawyers there say.

Paul Tuttle, the pro bono counsel for Southeast Louisiana Legal Services, said that since the storm, his office had heard from hundreds of people living in family homes that they suddenly have to prove they own.

And the issue is critical. In Mr. Barone's case, he said, "I'll be living in a cardboard box under the Interstate if I don't get this grant."

WAR NEWS:

Pentagon To Reevaluate Strategy And Goals In Iraq (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

The Pentagon is conducting a major review of the military's Iraq strategy to determine "what's going wrong and should be changed" to attain U.S. objectives in the war-torn country, the nation's top general said yesterday.

The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, initiated the review this fall after starkly deteriorating security in Baghdad led commanders there to rule out any significant cut this year in the level of U.S. troops in Iraq -- now at about 145,000 -- according to senior defense officials and sources.

Pace said he, Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, and Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, who as head of Central Command oversees the U.S. military in the Middle East, are all working on recommendations for how to improve Iraq strategy.

The military's growing view that Iraq is at a crossroads, a belief spurred largely by intensified sectarian fighting and mounting U.S. casualties on the ground, coincides with political pressure in Washington to find alternatives to the current Iraq policy, heightened by this week's election and the Democratic takeover of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0093249

Pace is scheduled to meet early next week with members of the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan commission mandated by Congress to review the Bush administration's Iraq policy and propose changes, a senior defense official said. Pace's review and other military recommendations are expected to be merged with the work of the Iraq Study Group as part of a broad effort by the administration to redefine Iraq policy. "It will become part of something bigger," the source said.

"We need to give ourselves a good, honest scrub about what is working, what is not working, what are the impediments to progress, and what should we change about the way we're doing it," Pace said in an interview yesterday with CBS News.

"We'll make the changes that are needed to get ourselves more focused on the correct objectives," Pace said, adding in a later interview that the U.S. objectives are themselves in question.

In a string of television appearances to mark Veterans Day, Pace declined to provide details of any specific recommendations for major military shifts in Iraq, saying that would be "premature" and could compromise the effort. "We should not be signaling to our enemies what we're going to do next," he told MSNBC.

Pace said he and other military officials "continuously review what's going right, what's going wrong, what needs to change" and give the defense secretary and the president their "best military advice."

Still, sources said that Pace's review marks a more fundamental and open-ended look for possible solutions in Iraq than the military has undertaken to date, growing out of a realization that Iraq could descend into chaos and that the current strategy is inadequate.

"The collapse of the strategy in Baghdad . . . caused a very deep introspection by the military," said a source connected to the Pentagon, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the topic.

Asked by one interviewer whether the United States is winning the war in Iraq, Pace replied: "You have to define 'winning.' I don't mean to be glib about that.

"Winning, to me, is simply having each of the nations that we're trying to help have a secure environment inside of which their government and people can function," he said, in remarks that seemed to depart from the administration's more ambitious stated goal of building a democracy in Iraq.

"You are not going to do away with terrorism," Pace continued. "But you can provide governments in Iraq and Afghanistan and elsewhere with enough security capacity to keep the acts below a level at which their governments can function," he said.

Pace's comments also could foreshadow a reassertion of influence by senior officers in the wake of this week's resignation by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, according to military officers and analysts. Moreover, some military officers have voiced concern in recent days that if they do not assert a greater role in formulating a future course in Iraq, that course will be defined for them by the resurgence of congressional Democrats, many of whom favor a withdrawal of U.S. troops.

"Senior military officers in Rumsfeld's watch felt their counsel was only welcomed when it was congenial to Rumsfeld's view, and they now want the whole story, good and bad, to be reflected in whatever strategy the administration pursues," said Loren B. Thompson, a national security expert at the Lexington Institute, a public policy think tank.

Pace said yesterday that he was surprised and saddened by Rumsfeld's resignation, calling him "a strong advocate for all of us in the military." But he also praised President Bush's nominee to replace Rumsfeld, former CIA chief Robert M. Gates, as a "very talented, dedicated patriot." Gates "has a reputation as a man who gets things done, a man who is collaborative and solicits subordinates' opinions," Pace said.

"Unless they get a very hard push-back from Mr. Gates during the early days of his tenure, the officers will try to reassert military control over the strategy in Iraq and the investment agenda," Thompson said.

Pace said the military will forge ahead with its work in Iraq, regardless of the change in civilian leadership at the Pentagon. "The change in leadership itself will not have a direct impact on what we do or don't do in Iraq," he said. "We in the military are used to changes of command."

Military Team Undertakes A Broad Review Of The Iraq War And The Campaign Against Terror (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093250

WASHINGTON, Nov. 10 — Senior military leaders have begun a broad review of strategy in Iraq and other crisis areas in the Bush administration's campaign against terrorism, according to Pentagon officials.

In a closely held effort, Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, has assembled a team of some of the military's brightest and most innovative officers and told them to take a fresh look at Iraq and Afghanistan, among other flashpoints.

Pentagon officials said that the team's objective was to outline a range of options that General Pace might draw on in advising President Bush and Robert M. Gates, selected by Mr. Bush to become defense secretary, as the White House adjusts its strategy in Iraq. Ideas that have been discussed include increasing the size of the Iraqi security forces, along with the American effort to train and equip them, and adjusting the size of the American force in Iraq.

But Pentagon officials stressed that the review extended well beyond Iraq, and that some unorthodox ideas on how to fight terrorism were being weighed. The review reflects the recognition that military efforts need to be part of an overall approach that includes all aspects of American power, including diplomatic and economic.

Pentagon officials said the military review, which formally began Sept. 25, is being coordinated with the rest of the government, but that the military team had not met with members of the Iraq Study Group, the commission that is also looking into options for Iraq. The creation of that commission, headed by a former secretary of state, James A. Baker III, and Lee H. Hamilton, a former chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, had raised the possibility that fundamental decisions on how to proceed in Iraq might be determined largely outside of the Pentagon. The commission is being advised by former military officers, but none of its members have served as senior military commanders.

The team involved in the military review includes Col. H. R. McMaster, the Army officer whose 2005 operation in Tal Afar has been cited as a textbook case in how to wage counterinsurgency in Iraq.

Other military officers include Col. Peter R. Mansoor, the director of the United States Army and Marine Corps Counterinsurgency Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., who previously commanded an Army brigade that fought the Mahdi Army militia in 2004 at Karbala.

Col. Thomas C. Greenwood, the director of the Marine Command and Staff College, who oversaw efforts to train Iraqi security forces in Anbar, the restive province in western Iraq, is also on the team. All told, more than a dozen military officers are on the team, which is overseen by Capt. Michael Rogers of the Navy, who serves as a special assistant to General Pace.

Though the review has been under way for six weeks, it has acquired special urgency as a result of the Democratic gains in the election, President Bush's decision to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld as defense secretary and the clamor for some kind of course adjustment in Iraq.

The goal is to finish the review in December, but some of its interim thinking has been made available to the military chiefs, Pentagon officials said.

Initially, the Pentagon tried to keep the existence of the review secret. But in recent days the Bush administration has advertised its willingness to consider fresh approaches in an effort to counter criticism that it was rigidly adhering to a faltering strategy. General Pace referred to the review in general terms in TV appearances today.

"We have to give ourselves a good honest scrub about what is working and what is not working, what are the impediments to progress and what should we change about the way we are doing it to make sure that we get to the objective that we set for ourselves," General Pace said in an interview with CBS. "I am looking at it with the Joint Chiefs. We're making our recommendations. We're having our dialogue."

General Pace said that Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top commander in Iraq, and General John P. Abizaid, the head of the United States Central Command, were part of the effort.

Mr. Bush is to meet Monday with the commission headed by Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton. Others who will meet with the group are Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; Mr. Rumsfeld; the national intelligence director, John D. Negroponte; Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency; and Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador to Iraq. The study group is expected to issue its recommendations around Dec. 7.

US Army "To Suggest Iraq Changes" (BBC)

DOJ_NMG_0093251

BBC.com, November 11, 2006

US military leaders are preparing to recommend changes in strategy on Iraq, America's top military officer says.

Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen Peter Pace said commanders were having their own dialogue and would make the changes that were needed.

President George W Bush is to meet members of a panel drawing up proposals for ending the conflict on Monday.

Iraq was a key factor in the Republican defeat in mid-term polls and US defence chief Donald Rumsfeld's resignation.

Mr Rumsfeld will be replaced by former CIA director Robert Gates, a member of the Iraq Study Group set to report to Mr Bush next week.

The White House says it is open to new thinking on the conflict, and correspondents say it would not be surprising if a real change of policy emerged soon.

Gen Pace told CBS that military leaders were taking a hard look at what they were doing in Iraq.

"We have to give ourselves a good honest scrub about what is working and what is not working... and what should we change about the way we are doing it."

But Gen Pace said Mr Rumsfeld's departure would not have a direct impact.

"We continuously review what's going right, what's going wrong, what needs to change," he added.

His comments came as the White House announced Monday's meeting with the bipartisan task force asked by Congress to examine the effectiveness of policy in Iraq.

The panel, which is led by former US Secretary of State James Baker, reportedly think that "staying the course" is an untenable long-term strategy.

It is said to have been looking at two options, both of which would amount to a reversal of the Bush administration's stance.

One is the phased withdrawal of US troops, and the other is to increase contact with Syria and Iran to help stop the fighting.

Democratic Party leaders visiting the White House in the wake of their poll victory have raised the idea of an Iraq summit.

Nancy Pelosi, the Democrat set to be the next speaker of the House of Representatives, has called for a change of strategy, describing the current policy as a "catastrophic path".

In Iraq, the health minister has said between 100,000 and 150,000 civilians have been killed in the war, far more than other previously accepted figures.

Officials say the total is based on estimates of the number of bodies brought to mortuaries and hospitals.

Casualty figures are a controversial topic, with estimates or counts ranging from 50,000 to 650,000 deaths.

Separately, the US military says three of its personnel have been killed in two separate incidents in Iraq.

At least 23 US troops have been killed in November.

In October, at least 105 soldiers were killed, the fourth highest monthly toll since US forces overthrew Saddam Hussein, and the worst for US casualties in nearly two years.

A Budding, Bipartisan Consensus On Iraq (LAT)

By Paul Richter, Doyle Mcmanus

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — With the Democratic capture of Congress boosting pressure for a bipartisan approach to the Iraq war, a rough consensus is emerging that could lead to a new direction and a gradual U.S. disengagement from the costly conflict.

There are those on both sides of the aisle who favor giving the Iraqis firm deadlines for meeting a list of political goals, with the possibility of redeploying U.S. troops if the goals aren't met — a scenario that could lead to withdrawal.

Democratic and Republican leaders also have begun to agree on ideas such as accelerating a shift of U.S. troops from a combat to an advisory role, decentralizing Iraqi government power and launching diplomatic efforts to win support from Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria.

But formidable obstacles remain. Most notably, there is no clear agreement on the key issue of troop withdrawals. Some Democrats have demanded a fixed timetable for a military exit, but incoming Democratic leaders haven't endorsed the idea.

DOJ_NMG_0093252

Similarly, some Republicans — including Sen. John McCain of Arizona — have proposed an increase in U.S. troop strength, if only a temporary one, to give the Iraqi government one more chance to gain control of security in Baghdad. That idea may have lost crucial support with Tuesday's Democratic electoral success.

All of the options have distinct disadvantages. Even so, administration officials, lawmakers, military commanders and others interviewed for this article said that this growing agreement, combined with the passing of a fractious midterm election season, offered a chance for headway.

Two people familiar with the discussions of the Iraq Study Group — a bipartisan commission, backed by the White House and Congress, that will suggest changes in policy — said that one fundamental point the panel was likely to make is that the U.S. commitment to Iraq cannot be open-ended.

"The administration has been saying: 'We cannot afford to lose,' " said one of them, speaking on condition of anonymity when discussing panel views. "But at some point, the question becomes, 'Can we afford to stay?' "

Bush has said he is willing to adjust U.S. tactics but has emphasized that his goal of an Iraq that can defend, govern and sustain itself is unchanged. But like the president, key administration officials have adopted more conciliatory views after the dramatic Democratic takeover of the House and Senate.

"We have to give ourselves a good, honest scrub about what is working and what is not working, what are the impediments to progress, and what should we change," Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said in a CBS News interview Friday.

Considering new angles

Pace said Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top commander in Iraq, and Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, who oversees U.S. forces in the Middle East, were working on a new review.

Stephen J. Hadley, the White House national security advisor, said this week that Bush thinks "we have an opportunity to define a way ahead" that will draw support from Republicans and Democrats as well as from Iraqis.

The agreements on new approaches among Democrats and Republicans carry more weight because they come at a time when centrists are gaining an important role in shaping U.S. foreign policy. Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld was expected to be replaced soon by former CIA Director Robert M. Gates. Gates is considered a foreign policy "realist" who has been openly critical of aspects of the Iraq policy.

The Iraq Study Group will have the first opportunity for charting a new path. The congressionally organized panel is stocked with foreign policy centrists from both parties. Led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), the panel will meet with Bush next week and hopes to release its recommendations by mid-December.

Although officials of the panel have not begun working to reach a formal consensus, it is widely expected that the group will call for engagement with Iran and Syria, proposals that are fiercely resisted by some Democrats and Republicans alike.

Baker and Hamilton have indicated they favor talking to Iran and Syria, as has Gates, who was a member of the panel before his nomination to the Pentagon post. He was replaced Friday by former secretary of State Lawrence S. Eagleburger, another Republican centrist who privately has been fiercely critical of some Bush policies.

Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R- Ind.), who is chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), another committee member, have indicated they are open to talks with Iran and Syria. Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), who becomes the chairman of the committee when Democrats take over the Senate, also supports the idea of talks.

The proposal for shifting more power out of Baghdad and toward Iraq's Kurdish and Shiite and Sunni Arab regions has been most visibly championed by Biden. But it also has won at least general support from lawmakers of both parties, including Lugar, Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) and Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Texas).

But the idea of breaking the country into three fully independent parts, which Biden has not proposed, has little support because of fears it would lead to "ethnic cleansing" and could draw the neighbors into a protracted regional war.

Spreading power in Iraq

Lawmakers of both parties pressed during the election campaign for an increase in pressure on the Iraqis to reach a power-sharing deal. Yet there is no agreement on how to apply pressure on the factions to make concessions.

DOJ_NMG_0093253

Many Democratic lawmakers support a plan by Sens. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), the incoming Senate Armed Services Committee chairman, and Jack Reed (D-R.I.), a committee member, to begin a "phased redeployment" of U.S. troops in order to force Iraqis to reach an agreement. But the Bush administration and its supporters strongly oppose redeployment.

Since winning control of Congress, Democratic leaders have not pushed for immediate troop reductions and have indicated that they would resist efforts by any of their members to end the mission through a funding cutoff.

Some Iraq Study Group members have appeared interested in at least temporarily increasing U.S. troop strength to see if it would suppress sectarian violence, said people close to the panel. Some insiders referred to the option as "one last chance" when it was raised earlier this fall.

Reed, who has been one of the Democrats' point men on the issue, has signaled that he would not dismiss the idea of a temporary troop increase — as long as the Iraqis were moving toward a political deal.

Still, U.S. military officers are increasingly skeptical that adding more troops to Baghdad would help significantly, because the addition of 4,000 American troops has shown few results. Officers said they believed it would be more useful to add Iraqi military units.

Some U.S. military officers say they sense a growing consensus in Washington for imposing firmer deadlines and reducing U.S. troop presence. Some said they believed that would be the right move.

"The John Kerry position of timetables as a forcing mechanism for the Iraqis to get their act together is not that far off from what other people [involved in the U.S. effort in Iraq] are saying," said one officer, referring to a proposal by the Democratic Massachusetts senator.

'Old bulls' as guides

A Senate Republican aide agreed there were wide agreements emerging on possible policy shifts. Speaking on condition of anonymity when discussing senators' views, the aide said the "old bulls" who dominated the Foreign Relations and Armed Services committees would guide Senate consideration of the alternatives.

Bush has invited suggestions but has not signaled a shift in his Iraq policy. The president "keeps talking about victory," said David Gergen, an aide to Democratic and Republican presidents. "It may be that he plans to define 'victory' down. Or it may be that he hasn't decided to change the policy very much."

One U.S. official said that the administration had entered a more pragmatic phase and would "look again at what's workable." Officials "were going to go this way, no matter who won, once the glare of the political campaign was over," said the official, who declined to be identified because he was not authorized to speak on the policy.

He said the emphasis would be on looking for "some kind of Iraqi entity that holds together, that meets at least the minimum requirements for a state."

But he cautioned that the options under discussion by outsiders had been weighed — and several already tried out — by the administration. For example, officials have sought ways to compromise with insurgents, he said.

Other options that seem appealing "may have too high a price," he added, referring to the idea of negotiating with Syria and Iran. Iran, for example, could demand that the U.S. drop its effort to halt the Iranian nuclear program, he said.

With the Iraq war entering its fifth year in 2007, some of the observers said solutions would be difficult to find and implement, even for the high-powered Iraq Study Group.

"It's not going to be a magic bullet," said an official at the U.S. Institute of Peace, the government-funded think tank that has provided the commission with offices and staff.

A Salute To Duty And Sacrifice (WP)

By Leef Smith

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

Norman Halfpenny heard the first strains of "The Marines' Hymn" and snapped to attention, his 73-year-old body not quite as straight as when he served as a young man in Korea and Vietnam.

DOJ_NMG_0093254

He was joined yesterday by thousands like him, hundreds in wheelchairs, their hair grayed by time. Many traveled thousands of miles for this moment, on the 231st anniversary of the Marine Corps, to gather on a grassy promenade near the Quantico Marine Corps Base, to remember and cry and celebrate the opening of the National Museum of the Marine Corps.

"I made sure he got here," said Halfpenny's wife, Paulette, 63, gripping her husband's uniformed knee. The couple donated $4,000 toward the construction of the $90 million facility and traveled from their home in Arizona for the ceremony. They wanted to be among the first to visit the striking museum, designed on a sharp angle reaching skyward to invoke one of history's most famous images -- the flag being raised over Iwo Jima during World War II.

Halfpenny wanted to talk about his years of service, about the combat he saw in Korea at the famed Chosin Reservoir, where Marines valiantly fought the Chinese, but he was halted by his own tears.

"It's the Corps," he said, weeping. "Once a Marine, always a Marine."

Visitors, many in uniform, showed up hours early for the dedication ceremony, waiting eagerly for an address by President Bush, who arrived to thunderous applause. He hailed the museum as the military's most modern, giving visitors an appreciation for what it's like to serve.

"For too long, the only people to have direct experience of the Marine Corps have been the Marines themselves and the enemy who has made the mistake of taking them on," Bush said. "The Marines believe you can't know what you stand for if you don't know where you come from. The history of the Corps is now preserved behind these walls. These walls remind all who visit here that honor, courage and commitment are not just words. They are Corps values for a way of life that puts service before self."

The museum, which opens to the public Monday, is the creation of the Marine Corps and the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation, which raised $60 million for its construction. The Marine Corps provided another $30 million to fill out the museum's interior, which will include more than 1,000 artifacts, 1,800 photographs and personal letters from the battlefront.

The museum is split into separate galleries that focus on many of the major wars, including one gallery called "Global War on Terrorism," which displays photographs, combat art and maps fresh from battlefields in Iraq and Afghanistan. Other galleries to be installed later include ones on the Colonial period, the Civil War era and World War I.

The museum is filled with iconic artifacts -- a Grumman F9F-2B Panther, its first widely used jet; a Bell UH-1E Huey, the ubiquitous Vietnam War helicopter; the pair of American flags raised at Mount Suribachi on Iwo Jima.

Museum exhibits also include personal artifacts, such as the Medals of Honor awarded Sgt. Maj. Daniel J. Daly, often referred to as "the outstanding Marine of all time," for his heroics during the Boxer Rebellion in 1900 and the first Haitian campaign in 1915. Also on display is the M40A1 sniper rifle used by Lance Cpl. Charles Benjamin "Chuck" Mawhinney in Vietnam, where he killed a confirmed 103 enemy soldiers. And there is the overseas cap worn by legendary Maj. Gen. John A. Lejeune, who fought in World War I.

The museum, in the southeastern end of Prince William County, is expected to boost tourism and economic development in an area that has struggled. It is off Route 1 and will be open daily from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Admission is free. Fees will be charged for two interactive experiences -- a flight simulator and target practice.

Lou Burg, 85, flew in from Los Angeles with his daughter Myra, 47, to witness the moment. He served three years in the Corps and was a 2nd lieutenant at Iwo Jima, the bloodiest battle for the Corps during World War II. It was there that 6,800 U.S. troops, mostly Marines, were killed and nearly 20,000 were wounded during a 36-day assault that began Feb. 19, 1945.

Yesterday, Burg dressed in his red satin survivors jacket, shaking the hands of fellow Marines and soaking in the significance of his contribution. "It's important for me to be here for my children, and it's important for me to be here because of this organization," Burg said. "Mostly it's important for me to be here for my wife."

She died last year, and, to honor her, Burg had purchased a brick that was used to build the pathway outside the museum.

James Lewis, 75, saw action in Korea, fighting at Chosin Reservoir in 1950. Many did not survive the Marines' fighting withdrawal.

Yesterday, Lewis proudly wore a T-shirt that bore the words "The Chosin Few."

"This means everything to me," said Lewis, who watched the ceremony from a wheelchair.

"He's planned this for a year," said his wife, Jean, 63. The couple traveled from Houston to attend.

DOJ_NMG_0093255

Before closing the ceremony, Bush told the story of Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham of New York, who would have turned 25 yesterday had he not been killed in combat two years ago. The young soldier threw himself on a grenade to save two fellow Marines.

Yesterday, Bush announced that Dunham would receive the Medal of Honor, the military's highest honor.

"As long as we have Marines like Corporal Dunham, America will never fear for her liberty," said Bush, who wiped a tear shortly after Dunham's parents were honored with a standing ovation. "As long as we have this museum, America will never forget their sacrifice."

Marines, Bush Dedicate Museum (WT)

By Tarron Lively

The Washington Times, November 11, 2006

President Bush yesterday attended the dedication ceremony for the National Museum of the Marine Corps in Quantico, Va., an event nearly 20 years in the making.

Mr. Bush and thousands of current and retired Marines converged on the Marine Corps base to celebrate the opening of museum. The dedication coincided with the 231st anniversary of the Marine Corps.

After a 21-gun salute and a flyover of four F-18 jets, Mr. Bush told the crowd that the museum will honor past and present Marines and preserve the Corps' history for future generations.

"For too long, the only people to have direct experience of the Marine Corps have been the Marines themselves -- and the enemy who's made the mistake of taking them on," Mr. Bush said, drawing cheers and applause.

"In this museum, you'll experience life from a Marine's perspective. You'll feel what it's like to go through boot camp, make an amphibious landing under fire or deploy from a helicopter in Vietnam."

The museum opens to the public Monday and is expected to attract 250,000 to 600,000 visitors annually. Admission is free.

"The museum will not make you into a Marine -- only a drill instructor can do that," Mr. Bush said. "But by putting you in the boots of a Marine, this museum will leave you with a rich appreciation for the history of the Corps."

The 118,000-square-foot museum is adjacent to the base. The building's skyline is designed to suggest the five Marines and one Navy corpsman raising the flag at Iwo Jima in 1945.

"Marines put a great deal of stock in history," said Gen. Michael W. Hagee, the commandant of the Marine Corps. "We use it for two reasons. One, to inspire us and, two, to educate us. This museum, I believe, will do that not only for the Marines, but for the American public."

The museum is the centerpiece of the Marine Corps Heritage Center on 135 acres, donated by Prince William County, between Interstate 95 and Route 1 opposite the main gate of the Quantico base.

When completed, the complex will include a parade deck, memorial walking trails, a chapel, an Imax theater, a conference center and a hotel.

In the late 1980s, Congress authorized each military service branch to develop its own national historic center.

Construction of the Marine museum began in 2004.

"It is here that the proud history of the United States Marine Corps will be appreciated, reflected upon and enjoyed like never before," said Ron Christmas, a retired lieutenant general and president of the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation, which spearheaded the building of the museum.

During the two-hour ceremony, Mr. Bush announced that Cpl. Jason L. Dunham, of Scio, N.Y., would posthumously receive the Medal of Honor, the United States' highest military decoration.

Cpl. Dunham, who was killed near Karabilah, Iraq, in 2004 while shielding fellow Marines from a hand grenade, would have been 25 years old yesterday.

"You might say he was born to be a Marine," Mr. Bush said to Cpl. Dunham's parents, Dan and Deb Dunham, who were in attendance.

Jim Lehrer of PBS' "The NewsHour," who served three years as an infantry officer in the Corps, said such actions of courage are common for Marines.

DOJ_NMG_0093256

"The death rate among Marines in Iraq has been more than double that of the other service," Mr. Lehrer said. "That's a first-to-fight, first-wave pattern that has pretty much held since the Revolutionary War ... whatever needs to be done, particularly if the need is for it to be done well, and be done immediately."

Today the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation will hold a memorial to honor deceased Marines.

Selfless Courage: Marine Is Awarded Medal Of Honor (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

QUANTICO, Va. -- Cpl. Jason Dunham, a charismatic kid from small-town America, received the Medal of Honor for sacrificing himself to protect his fellow Marines from an Iraqi hand grenade.

President George W. Bush announced the award -- the country's highest honor for military valor -- at the opening of the Marine Corps museum here yesterday. It would have been Cpl. Dunham's 25th birthday.

"As far back as boot camp, his superiors spotted the quality that would mark this young American as an outstanding Marine: His willingness to put the needs of others before his own," Mr. Bush said. "As long as we have Marines like Cpl. Dunham, America will never fear for its liberty."

Maj. Trent Gibson, then commander2 of Kilo Co., Third Battalion, Seventh Marines, visits the scene of the grenade attack with reporter Michael Phillips.

On patrol on April 14, 2004, Cpl. Dunham found himself engaged in hand-to-hand combat with an insurgent near the Syrian border. When his attacker dropped a live hand grenade, the Marine made the split-second decision to cover the weapon with his own helmet, shielding two of his men from its full explosive force.

The other Marines staggered away from the blast, injured but alive. Cpl. Dunham suffered deep shrapnel wounds to the brain. He survived eight days in a coma, only to die with his parents at his bedside. He was 22 years old.

"There's not a day that goes by that I don't think about it," said Cpl. William Hampton, one of the Marines fighting beside Cpl. Dunham when the grenade exploded. The explosion left Cpl. Hampton, a 24-year-old from Woodinville, Wash., peppered with shrapnel. "I see my arms, I see my leg. I'm always reminded of it."

Cpl. Dunham grew up in Scio, a one-stoplight town in western New York. His father, Dan Dunham, works in a nearby factory; his mother, Deb Dunham, teaches home economics. Jason was the oldest of four children and a star athlete, with a winning grin and a natural kindness.

He was an eager volunteer when the Marine recruiter spotted him at the local Kmart before his senior year in high school. Soon his lead-from-the-front approach won him the admiration of those above and below him, and he was given command of a 10-man infantry squad when his unit -- Kilo Co., Third Battalion, Seventh Marine Regiment -- deployed in early 2004 to the hostile desert towns of Husaybah, al Qa'im and Karabilah.

Due to complete his enlistment that July, Cpl. Dunham extended his service by several months to remain in Iraq through the battalion's entire combat tour because, as he told a friend at the time, "I want to make sure everyone makes it home alive."

In the days after he was injured, Cpl. Dunham passed through a series of military hospitals and underwent brain surgery. He never, however, awoke from his coma. His parents met him at the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md., expecting to spend months nursing their son back to health. Instead, doctors told them that the damage was too severe and that the corporal would never again understand the world around him. Following the instructions Cpl. Dunham left in his living will, the Dunham s authorized the doctors to remove him from life support.

"In the end, Cpl. Dunham, you proved that one man can make a difference," his former company commander, Maj. Trent Gibson, said in June at a ceremony renaming Scio's post office after the fallen Marine. "You proved to be utterly selfless, uniquely compassionate, and absolutely committed to your men...You were that which we all strived to be. And you were somehow more pure."

A photo of the shredded remains of the corporal's helmet was among the pieces of evidence the battalion included when it nominated the corporal for the Medal of Honor shortly after he died.

Cpl. Dunham's life and death were chronicled in a page-one story in The Wall Street Journal on May 25, 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0093257

The award is often called the Congressional Medal of Honor because Congress authorized it during the Civil War. Including Cpl. Dunham's, 3,462 medals have been awarded, according to the Congressional Medal of Honor Society. Cpl. Dunham's is the second awarded for gallantry in the Iraq war. The first went to Army Sgt. 1st Class Paul R. Smith, who was killed while manning a machine gun against scores of Iraqi soldiers at Baghdad's airport in April 2003.

The president is expected to present the medal itself to Cpl. Dunham's parents at a White House ceremony at a later date.

Medal Of Honor Granted To Slain Marine (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — On what would have been the 25th birthday of Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham, President Bush said Friday that the Marine would be posthumously awarded the Medal of Honor, the nation's highest decoration for valor.

Dunham, from Scio, N.Y., was 22 when he died from his wounds in April 2004, eight days after using his body and helmet to save two fellow Marines from an insurgent's grenade.

Bush recounted Dunham's exploit during a ceremony marking the opening of the National Museum of the Marine Corps at Quantico, Va.

A machine-gunner, Dunham was leading a squad manning a checkpoint in an Iraqi town near the border with Syria. As Dunham searched a vehicle, "an insurgent jumped out and grabbed the corporal by the throat," Bush said. Dunham engaged him in hand-to-hand combat, and shouted to his fellow Marines, "watch his hand."

A grenade rolled out, Bush said, adding, "Cpl. Dunham did not hesitate; he jumped on the grenade to protect his fellow Marines."

Dunham, who was with Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 7th Marine Regiment, based in Twentynine Palms, will be the first Marine to receive the nation's highest medal for bravery for combat since the war in Vietnam.

The award ceremony will be at the White House at a date to be selected by Bush and the Dunham family.

The president presented Dunham's actions as a reflection of the history of the Marine Corps.

"Years from now, when America looks out on a democratic Middle East growing in freedom and prosperity, Americans will speak of the battles like Fallouja with the same awe and reverence we now give to Guadalcanal and Iwo Jima," the president said to an audience of about 10,000, among them Dunham's parents.

The museum, dedicated on the 231st anniversary of the founding of the Marine Corps, is designed to evoke the photograph of the raising of the flag at Mt. Suribachi on Iwo Jima, during World War II, and to portray the Marine experience.

"In this museum, you'll feel what it's like to go through boot camp. No thanks," said Bush, who was a member of the Texas Air National Guard during Vietnam.

Marine To Receive Medal Of Honor For Iraq Heroism (CNN)

CNN.com, November 10, 2006

(CNN) -- President Bush announced on Friday that the Medal of Honor, the nation's highest military decoration, will be awarded posthumously to Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham.

In April 2004, Dunham was leading a patrol in an Iraqi town near the Syrian border when the patrol stopped a convoy of cars leaving the scene of an attack on a Marine convoy, according to military and media accounts of the action.

An occupant of one of the cars attacked Dunham and the two fought hand to hand. As they fought, Dunham yelled to fellow Marines, "No, no watch his hand." The attacker then dropped a grenade and Dunham hurled himself on top of it, using his helmet to try to blunt the force of the blast.

Still, Dunham was critically wounded in the explosion and died eight days later at Bethesda Naval Hospital in Maryland.

"As long as we have Marines like Corporal Dunham, America will never fear for her liberty," Bush said Friday as he announced that Dunham would receive the award. Bush spoke at the dedication of the National Museum of the Marine Corps in Virginia. (Watch announcement of award at museum -- 1:27)

"His was a selfless act of courage to save his fellow Marines," Sgt. Maj. Daniel A. Huff of the 3rd Battalion, 7th Marine Regiment, was quoted as saying in Marine Corps News that April.

DOJ_NMG_0093258

"He knew what he was doing," Lance Cpl. Jason A. Sanders, 21, of McAllester, Oklahoma, who was in Dunham's company, was quoted as saying by Marine Corps News. "He wanted to save Marines' lives from that grenade."

In various media accounts, fellow Marines told how Dunham had extended his enlistment shortly before he died so he could help his comrades.

"We told him he was crazy for coming out here," Lance Cpl. Mark E. Dean, 22, from Owasso, Oklahoma, said in Marine Corps News. "He decided to come out here and fight with us. All he wanted was to make sure his boys made it back home."

"He loved his country, believed in his mission, and wanted to stay with his fellow Marines and see the job through," Vice President Dick Cheney said when speaking of Dunham's heroism at a Disabled American Veterans conference in July 2004.

The Scio, New York, native would have been 25 years old on Friday.

In a letter urging Bush to honor Dunham with the Medal of Honor, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-New York, called the Marine's actions "an act of unbelievable bravery and selflessness."

Dunham's story was told in the book "The Gift of Valor," written by Wall Street Journal reporter Michael Phillips.

Dunham will be the second American to receive the Medal of Honor from service in Iraq.

Army Sgt. 1st Class Paul Ray Smith was the other, honored for action near Baghdad International Airport in April 2003, in which he killed as many as 50 enemy combatants while helping wounded comrades to safety. Smith was the only U.S. soldier killed in the battle.

At Dusty Outpost In Iraq, Cake Is Cut For Marines Young And Not So Young (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

OUTPOST VIKING, Iraq, Nov. 10 — Capt. James W. Mingus faced another platoon of his marines. They stood in their fire-retardant uniforms, wearied and hungry, weapons slung across their chests and backs.

A birthday cake was on the table in front of them. One piece had been cut out with a bayonet.

The captain, 37 and the oldest marine in the rifle company he commands, had just given that piece to the platoon's youngest marine, Lance Cpl. T. J. McDowell, who is 20.

"Two hundred and thirty-one years," the captain said.

"Tradition. This is what makes us different. This is what sets us apart."

The Marine Corps celebrated its 231st birthday on Friday, an event that passes with little notice outside the corps's insular ranks, but is an essential ritual within, especially now, as the policies guiding the war seem certain to change and the reasons that brought the marines here are less clear.

No matter the changes in Washington, here in this forward base in Anbar Province, Company F, Second Battalion, Eighth Marines marked the day with the same insistence on ceremony that surrounds marines from their first seconds before an enraged drill instructor to the folded flag at the grave.

As each platoon came in from their duties on patrol or manning posts at Outpost Viking's walls, a ceremony repeated itself: a reading of a traditional birthday message from 1921, a reading of a message from the current commandant and then the cake, passed symbolically from one generation to the next.

"When were you born, Graham?" a marine called out, just before one platoon's cake-cutting ceremonies began.

Cpl. Jeremy L. Graham, who had hit four bombs in three months while riding in vehicles, and who was blasted once more on a foot patrol, answered without a pause: "1775," he said, using the year that the Marine Corps first took up arms, in a Pennsylvania tavern.

Every year, and everywhere, it is the same, even now.

The graying marines remind marines who are new to shaving: You are part of an outfit, storied and bloodied, that is older than the nation it serves. You are one of us. Pass it on.

In peacetime it can be poignant, as the ceremony, held in veteran halls and bases, invariably attracts veterans from several generations and wars.

DOJ_NMG_0093259

In Outpost Viking, which is little more than a sandbagged fortress ringed by an insurgency that hounds the marines at each turn, Captain Mingus and his noncommissioned officers needed few words. The youngest marines here already know much of what veterans tell; there are 22-year-olds on their third combat tours.

Second Battalion, Eighth Marines has been in Iraq on this rotation for a little more than three months.

Nearly 15 percent of the battalion's marines have been wounded. Five marines and one of their interpreters have been killed and 31 marines have been wounded seriously enough to require evacuation back to the states.

Each week, the number of wounded climbs. On Thursday, an improvised explosive struck a vehicle in the battalion's Weapons Company, sending shrapnel into the right leg of Lance Cpl. William J. Thorpe and shattering Lance Cpl. Daniel B. Nicholson's face.

(The week before, Lance Corporal Nicholson had said a prayer for the recovery of another marine, Lance Cpl. Colin Smith, who had been shot through the head. Now, Lance Corporal Nicholson was in a military hospital in Germany, with the others praying for him.)

Captain Mingus told the marines to observe this day every year, no matter where they were. "If you have two marines in a fighting hole somewhere, find a Twinkie, cut it in half and say, 'Happy birthday, marine,' " he said.

The hearty greetings belied an underlying unease that these men confront each day, and it was noticeable in what was left unsaid. There was little talk on Friday of saving Iraq. And there was a message implicit in the older marine's words.

Gradually, as months and tours have passed here, blending into years inside a country that has slipped out of everyone's control, the list of reasons for fighting has changed. First it shifted from finding weapons of mass destruction to removing a dictator to building a stable, democratic Iraq.

Eventually, when talk of stability in Iraq gave way to questions of whether the spasms of sectarian violence could be properly called a civil war, the marines' reasons for fighting shrank further, down to more basic things.

The captain and the others who spoke steered wide of politics, but that wide steer was noticeable. They spoke instead of fundamental sentiments, those that have always been first and last on a marine's list of reasons to fight.

Five years after the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States, and almost four years after the troops prepared to invade Iraq, many of the marines in the battalion, in their quiet times in the weeks before this day, have said they fight for two things: the corps's tradition and reputation, and for the man on their left and right.

Their Iraq is a land of dangers and deceptions, an endless test and a daily set of deadly traps. Each marine's own future can feel like an abstraction when a patrol is heading out. It is difficult to see the hidden bombs. It is harder still to see the future of Iraq, or how any of this might end.

Friday was the birthday. Each of the marines stepped into the line, just as they always do.

Five times, the cakes were cut with bayonets and pieces handed out. Then the marines filed through a field kitchen and were served lobster, steak, crab legs and shrimp. Even the exhausted smiled, leaning against blast walls designed to keep out the frequent mortar fire.

Many were bedecked with charms, a collection that provided a measure of how deeply into the combat culture these young marines had already passed. The charms were small keepsakes, often not obvious, taken from churches, homes or firefights and designated as talismans of luck.

Lance Cpl. Elijah D. Henry, from North Carolina, came for his cake. He wore a big knife. Its handle was carved from the antlers of the first deer he killed, a six-point whitetail he shot at his uncle's deer camp in southern Georgia.

He is half Irish and half Cherokee. In his pocket was a small leather bag with more charms, 100-year-old tobacco — grown by the oldest living Cherokee, he said — along with a pinch of sage, a ruby, dirt from every country he has ever visited and a shell from the 21-gun salute for his late grandfather, who was a P.O.W. in World War II.

"I guess you heard about my squirrel tails?" he said.

"I get them blessed and hand them out to my friends."

So far, he said, he had handed out five.

Cpl. Daniel M. Greenwald, from Rockland County, N.Y. passed through the line. He had threaded a dog-tag chain through the mangled remains of a Kalashnikov bullet, which on Sept. 2 hit him on the helmet and knocked him flat.

DOJ_NMG_0093260

His head was soaked in blood from the impact of the helmet on his forehead, but the Kevlar kept the bullet out. Now he carries the broken bullet wherever he goes, hoping that bullets, like proverbial lightning, will not strike twice.

The battalion commander arrived and said that the battalion's snipers had just shot three Iraqi men who were burying a bomb beside a bridge near Saqlawiya, a town not far away.

One of the insurgents was killed instantly, he said.

The other two had been wounded, and had stumbled off into the marsh and reeds. Marines were out following their blood trails, a birthday spent on the job.

Blair To Give Iraq Evidence To Baker (FT)

By James Blitz

Financial Times, November 11, 2006

Tony Blair will next week give evidence to the Iraq Study Group led by James Baker, the former US secretary of state, in the first indication Britain is being consulted by Washington over potential change of policy on the war.

As he continues the task of presenting a range of new policy alternatives on Iraq for President George W. Bush, Mr Baker is expected to interview the UK prime minister by means of a video link on Tuesday.

The decision by the Iraq Study Group to interview Mr Blair is an important boost for Downing Street, amid fears that Britain might be excluded from the US reassessment of Iraq policy following the Democrats' victory in the congressional elections.

Downing Street last night gave no details of what Mr Blair would tell Mr Baker and his co-chairman, retired US congressman Lee Hamilton. However, the prime minister is expected to set out his latest thoughts on Iraq on Monday in his annual Mansion House foreign policy speech.

Mr Blair is certain to tell Mr Baker that the US and UK must not "cut and run", remaining in Iraq until Baghdad can manage the security situation on its own. Mr Blair has told allies he is confident that the Baker-Hamilton committee will make no such recommendation.

Margaret Beckett, UK foreign secretary, spelt out the UK's position this week saying there would be no "precipitate" moves to withdraw UK troops. However, the prime minister is likely to be probed on the extent to which he believes Syria and Iran can be involved in attempts to put Iraq on a stable footing.

Mr Blair has recently launched a diplomatic initiative towards Syria, sending his most senior foreign policy adviser to Damascus to meet President Bashar al-Assad.

Mr Blair is looking to see whether Syria can be coaxed into playing a constructive role in attempts to revive the peace process between Israel and the Palestinians.

In recent weeks, Mr Blair has expressed no enthusiasm for engaging Syria and Iran in plans to put the Iraqi government on a firmer footing. He believes that the Iranian regime must be firmly faced down in its bid to acquire nuclear weapons.

However, recent leaks of the Baker-Hamilton committee's findings suggest that the ISG is looking at whether the Syrian and Iranian regimes can be involved in attempts to stabilise the situation in Iraq.

U.S. Gov't Office In Iraq Attacked (WT/AP)

By SAMEER N. YACOUB

The Washington Times/AP, November 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- The U.S. government's office in central Iraq came under mortar fire early Saturday, an attack that touched off a blaze in part of the complex, Iraqi police said. There was no immediate word on damage or casualties.

In the western city of Tal Afar, two suspected insurgents were killed during an overnight search for those behind a suicide bombing Friday that killed six Iraqi soldiers in the western city of Tal Afar.

Hand grenades and 20 AK-47 assault rifles were seized in the raid just east of the city, along with fake ID cars and passports, cell phones, and a pair of pickup trucks, police Brig. Najim Abdullah al-Jubouri said.

Al-Jubouri identified those killed as Zainal Abdul-Ghani Younis al-Haider and Bakir Khuweiret, and said 10 terrorist suspects were arrested.

DOJ_NMG_0093261

The mortar attack was at least the second reported in recent weeks against the U.S. office in Hillah, which oversees government and diplomatic interests in the central Euphrates region, about 60 miles south of Baghdad.

Nine of the 10 mortar bombs fired landed inside the complex, police Capt. Muthanna Khalid Ali said.

He said U.S. and Iraqi forces sealed off the area and there was no word on damage or injuries.

U.S. diplomats usually refuse to comment on such reports to avoid releasing sensitive information to insurgents. Calls and e-mail seeking confirmation were not immediately returned by U.S. Embassy spokesmen in Baghdad.

Inaccurate but highly mobile, the mortar is growing increasingly popular among Iraqi fighters because it can be fired from a secure location several miles from a target and then quickly hauled away or hidden. Some insurgent groups mount the weapons on pickup trucks, remaining in constant motion except when firing.

Tal Afar has suffered scattered insurgent attacks, even after Bush in March declared the city an example of progress made in bringing security to Iraq. Tal Afar lies 90 miles east of the Syrian border, 260 miles northwest of Baghdad.

Also Saturday, a bomber drove a car rigged with explosives into the police station in the northern town of Zaganya, killing the police chief, burning four vehicles, and badly damaging the building, the provincial police information office said.

In nearby Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, a staffer with the local agriculture directorate, Zuhair Hussein Alwan, was shot and killed by unknown assailants

Two bodies that had been bound and shot in the head and chest were pulled from the Tigris River Saturday morning in Suwayrah, 25 miles south of Baghdad. Scores of such bodies are recovered around Iraq each week, most believed to be the victims of sectarian death squads, morgue administrator Maamoun al-Ajili said.

Hang Hussein Fast, Clerics Say (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

BAGHDAD — Addressing worshipers for the first time since the conviction of Saddam Hussein, many of Iraq's Shiite Muslim preachers called Friday for the speedy hanging of the former president.

Hussein, a Sunni Muslim who long repressed Iraq's Shiite majority, should be executed in public between two of the holiest Shiite sites in Iraq, a cleric demanded during his sermon in Karbala. "It's the least that could be done to this tyrant for the atrocious crimes he has committed, in this city in particular," said Sayyed Ahmed Safi, a preacher close to Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, the country's preeminent Shiite cleric.

Hussein was sentenced Sunday to death at the gallows in connection with his role in the killing of 148 Shiites from the village of Dujayl after a 1982 attempt to assassinate him. Dujayl was a stronghold of the devout Shiite activists who now dominate Iraq's political and religious institutions.

U.S. officials had hoped the trial of Hussein, toppled in the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, would help unite Iraq. But many now believe the verdict is heightening ethnic and sectarian tensions. Shiites in eastern Baghdad and other areas where they are concentrated cheered the decision in mass rallies as angry Sunni Arabs marched in large demonstrations north of the capital.

Speaking to worshipers in the Shiite holy city of Najaf, preacher Sadruddin Qubanchi called for Hussein to go to the gallows as soon as possible. Qubanchi likened his execution to "decapitating a snake," saying it would signify "the end of terror."

"The verdict of death is less than what he deserves," said Qubanchi, telling a crowd that Hussein's hanging would signal a new beginning for Iraq by putting an end to hopes of Hussein's supporters that he could ever return to power.

Worshipers chanted, "Execution is the least for Saddam!"

In the capital's eastern Sadr City slum, a Shiite stronghold, Sheik Abdul Zahra Swaidi told a large crowd that Hussein was getting what he deserved.

"Saddam's family and followers stole Iraq's wealth and are paying for killings, displacement, assassinations," Swaidi said. "We ask the government and the court to carry out Saddam's execution — Iraqis demand it."

A legal expert in the Dujayl case said Hussein could be executed inside the notorious Abu Ghraib prison within the next four or five months. Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, a Shiite, has said Hussein could be hanged by the end of the year.

DOJ_NMG_0093262

International observers have questioned the fairness of the trial. Some say the U.S.-backed court was illegitimate and the proceedings deeply flawed, and they note that the verdict came two days before America's midterm election.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak warned this week that the execution of Hussein would deepen sectarian and ethnic strife and "explode violence like waterfalls in Iraq."

Leaders of other key American allies, such as Saudi Arabia and Jordan, have not criticized the verdict.

At a mosque in the southern Iraqi city of Kufa, Shiite cleric Juma Khafaji called for the government to speed up Hussein's execution. Khafaji, who is close to the anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr, warned other countries not to interfere to protect Hussein and lashed out at those who stood by "when Hussein was killing the Iraqis."

In Iraq, Sunni Arab politicians have protested the verdict, saying it was the foregone result of a biased court.

Qubanchi in his sermon on Friday said Sunni Arab lawmakers had "made politics more chaotic" and warned Sunni blocs to "forget about Saddam."

In Baghdad, meanwhile, Sunni preacher Hashim Yahya preached reconciliation to a crowd in a mosque but also issued not-so-veiled warnings to Shiite power brokers.

"Iraq has, regrettably, become a field for settling scores," he said. "Those who are powerful now must always remember God's might and power. The oppressed Iraqis will eventually question the officials about their deeds."

Nat'l Guard Units Face 2nd Tours In Iraq (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor,

AP, November 11, 2006

The nation's citizen soldiers, already strained by long tours in Iraq and Afghanistan, could be tapped again under new plans being developed by the Pentagon.

National Guard combat brigades that have already served in Iraq may be called for a second tour, likely breaking the 24-month deployment limit initially set by the Pentagon, the Guard's top general said.

While active-duty soldiers and smaller Guard units and members have returned to Iraq for multiple tours, the new plans would, for the first time, send entire Guard combat brigades back to the battlefront. Brigades generally have about 3,500 troops.

The move — which could include brigades from Arkansas, Florida, Indiana and North Carolina — would force the Pentagon to make the first large-scale departure from its previous decision not to deploy reserves for more than a cumulative 24 months in Iraq.

For some units, a second tour would mean they would likely exceed that two-year maximum. The planning was described by Lt. Gen. H. Steven Blum, who commands the Guard, in an Associated Press interview this week.

In a related move, the Pentagon is preparing to release a list of active units — and perhaps reserves as well — scheduled to go to Iraq that would largely maintain the current level of forces there over the next two years, another senior defense official said Thursday. There are about 152,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

That official requested anonymity because the plan has not been made public.

The Pentagon routinely notifies units to prepare for deployment, knowing it is easier to cancel a move overseas than to suddenly make such a large troop movement.

It was not clear whether this week's resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would affect deployment plans. President Bush has selected former CIA chief Robert Gates, who has criticized U.S. policy in Iraq, to replace Rumsfeld, but he has not yet been confirmed by the Senate.

"We are doing contingency planning for one or two (units), and we have contingency plans for more than two if necessary," Blum said Wednesday. The North Carolina brigade, he said, is being considered since it was one of the first to go to Iraq after the war began in 2003.

Blum also said defense officials have been discussing whether they need to adjust their policy that limits the deployment of reserves in the war to 24 months.

"When that policy was originally formulated, I seriously doubt anyone thought we would be where we are today, at the level of commitment that is necessary today," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0093263

Just last month, defense officials said the Marines are drawing up similar plans that would for the first time send some reserve combat battalions back to Iraq for a second tour.

Under the authority by which Bush ordered a call-up of the Guard and Reserve after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, troops could be mobilized an unlimited number of times as long as each mobilization is no longer than 24 consecutive months.

Until now, Pentagon officials have interpreted that as 24 cumulative months.

While the ultimate goal for the National Guard is to deploy one year overseas and spend six years at home, Blum said current demands could force soldiers to deploy as often as one year every three or four years.

Blum said he believes that Guard combat brigades are prepared and willing to make a second trip to Iraq if needed.

He said the first units to deploy in the war — such as the 30th Infantry Brigade from North Carolina, the 76th Infantry Brigade from Indiana, the 53rd Infantry Brigade from Florida and the 39th Infantry Brigade from Arkansas — would probably be among those first called for a second tour.

"Logic would lead you to go back to the ones that went first, and start going around again," said Blum. "But that's probably not exactly how we'll do it" because the decision will depend partly on what types of units are needed.

Blum also said the Pentagon will no longer break up the brigades and send them to war in smaller units. He said Guard brigades are more effective working as teams.

___

On the Net:

Defense Department: http://www.defenselink.mil

Guard Units Could Do 2nd Tour In Iraq (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon is developing plans that for the first time would send entire National Guard combat brigades back to Iraq for a second tour, the Guard's top general said in the latest sign of how thinly stretched the military has become.

Smaller Guard units and individual troops have already returned to Iraq for longer periods, and some active duty units have served multiple tours. Brigades generally have about 3,500 troops.

The move — which could include brigades from North Carolina, Florida, Arkansas and Indiana — would be the Pentagon's first large-scale departure from its previous decision not to deploy reserves for more than a total of 24 months in Iraq.

A second tour would probably put some units over that two-year maximum. The planning was described by Lt. Gen. H. Steven Blum, who commands the Guard, in an Associated Press interview this week.

In a related move, the Pentagon is preparing to release a list of active units — and perhaps reserves as well — scheduled to go to Iraq that would largely maintain the current level of forces there over the next two years, another senior defense official said Thursday. There are about 152,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

That official requested anonymity because the plan has not been made public.

The Pentagon routinely notifies units to prepare for deployment, knowing it is easier to cancel a move overseas than to suddenly make such a large troop movement.

It was not clear whether this week's resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would affect deployment plans. President Bush has selected former CIA chief Robert M. Gates, who has criticized U.S. policy in Iraq, to replace Rumsfeld, but he has not yet been confirmed by the Senate.

Tall Afar's Long Road Back (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

TALL AFAR, Iraq -- A year ago, U.S. officials championed the military's success in pushing insurgents out of this city in Iraq's northwestern desert, reclaiming it for the roughly 250,000 residents and eliminating an insurgent safe haven. President Bush publicly praised the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment's effort.

DOJ_NMG_0093264

In the months since, soldiers say, Tall Afar has proved a model for the rest of Iraq, an insurgent stronghold turned relatively peaceful. Attacks dwindled to almost none in August before a spate of violence in September and October tied to the Muslim holy month of Ramadan. The local government is strong. Iraqi security forces are poised to take control from the roughly 1,000 U.S. troops in the region, which is a reduction of 75 percent from the U.S. presence here last spring.

"I think Tall Afar is on its way," said Lt. Col. Malcolm Frost, who commands the 3rd Squadron, 4th Cavalry Regiment, based just southwest of the city and now in charge of the region. "I think it's a beacon of light, not just for security but also in local government infrastructure. I think we're close to the tipping point."

But the road to stability in Tall Afar has been long and bumpy, and it continues to pose daily challenges. The city's transformation underscores how difficult it will be for parts of Iraq -- especially Baghdad -- to mirror its success.

The unemployment rate here is nearly 70 percent. Officials estimate that fewer than half of Tall Afar's residents remained here or returned after the last big U.S.-Iraqi military operation in September 2005. Many of the city's buildings are vacant or were destroyed in the fighting last year. Hundreds of millions of dollars was promised to help rebuild and restore Tall Afar, but the money has just started to trickle in through the Iraqi central government's staggeringly slow bureaucracy. And Iraqi forces have only recently taken the lead in providing security, helped in large part by the population drop and lack of attacks.

Though sectarian violence has been stemmed by cooperation among Sunni and Shiite Muslim sheiks here, insurgents attack Shiite civilians in the southern part of Tall Afar and Iraqi forces in the north. Officials call it a delicate balance.

"Tall Afar was another Fallujah or Ramadi," said Mayor Najim al-Jibouri, referring to cities in western Iraq that have experienced heavy fighting between U.S. forces and insurgents. "But with the help of the people, everyone gained the momentum and claimed Tall Afar from the terrorists and vowed not to go back to the old, bad days. Still, there are a lot of shortcomings that really disappoint us. Things like that prolong the life of the insurgency."

The mayor points mainly to the lack of help from the Iraqi government, which has left parts of the city a shambles. The city's northwest quadrant is like a ghost town, with scores of vacant houses, some reduced to rubble by fighting more than a year ago, almost entirely cordoned off with Iraqi police checkpoints designed to choke the insurgents' ability to move.

Soldiers call the northwest neighborhood the city's "gated community" because Iraqi forces have put such a stranglehold on it. In addition to reducing attacks, the restrictions have kept some people from moving back in, officials said.

Capt. Luke Hale, the U.S. squadron's intelligence officer, said the security situation in Tall Afar is tied closely to the economy. For example, he said, attacks sometimes increase because insurgents are willing to pay a local resident to place a roadside bomb. The focus of violence is in the city's northwest, where troops have found significant weapons caches and safe houses and last week recovered 85 pounds of homemade explosives, sticks of TNT and other materials probably destined for more attacks, Hale said.

During the past nine months, U.S. soldiers have logged an average of about one attack against them per day in Tall Afar, but nearly 45 percent have involved relatively harmless small-arms fire. Roadside bombs were planted at an average of six per month from February to August, with just two in July and none in August -- vastly fewer than what insurgents unleashed in previous years.

"It was very, very bad before," said Falah Hassan, 23, an Iraqi police sergeant who works with U.S. soldiers. He pointed excitedly to a wall-size map of the city he has lived in since birth. "Everyone was afraid to move around because of the insurgents. Now it's much, much better. Tall Afar is coming back."

However, insurgents have begun sabotaging homes with massive explosives to try to lure, trap and kill Iraqi forces who enter. The soldiers here call them "house-borne improvised explosive devices," and three such homes have been leveled in recent weeks, causing some Iraqi soldiers to hesitate when chasing insurgents into vacant buildings.

Still, the Iraqi forces are out front, while U.S. forces hang back more and more. At an old granary on the edge of town, American soldiers are working directly with their Iraqi counterparts to clean up the city and restore services.

"The Iraqi security forces are definitely on the offense, and the insurgents are definitely on the defense and reeling," said Capt. Mike Lingenfelter, 32, of Panhandle, Tex., whose Comanche Troop lives at the granary and patrols the city. "It's working. They're almost there."

DOJ_NMG_0093265

On a recent patrol through several parts of the city, Lt. Joshua Murphy, 24, of Owensboro, Ky., highlighted the strong Iraqi police presence and noted that there had been several days of calm after Ramadan, when nine suicide bombers set off explosives.

"The less of a presence we have here, the better we're doing," Murphy said, glancing out his Humvee's window at an Iraqi checkpoint made of plywood and sandbags. "They're taking over."

At a security meeting last week, two dozen Iraqi police and army leaders met with the mayor and U.S. officials at a castle atop one of Tall Afar's highest points. The chief concern among the Iraqis was the lack of strength demonstrated by the country's criminal justice system. Officials said they had seen insurgents arrested here return to the streets after being released in Baghdad.

"At the end, after we catch the people, we see them on the road again, and it's very disappointing," said Col. Muhammad, who runs the Qadisiyah neighborhood police station. "These groups build again even when they are in the cells."

The Iraqi government's overall lack of ability to respond to the local success in Tall Afar is a significant concern, several officials said.

"We had high hopes the Iraqi government would be able to produce more visible, tangible results quicker," said Brig. Gen. Mick Bednarek, deputy commander for operations with Multinational Division -- North, based in Tikrit. "How long will a civilized people that are very much in need of basic fundamental services wait before they are frustrated and look somewhere else?"

Jibouri, the mayor, said: "You can't separate what happens in Tall Afar and what happens in the rest of Iraq. If Iraq recovers, Tall Afar will recover. If Iraq doesn't succeed, Tall Afar will again fall."

Decrepit Healthcare Adds To Toll In Iraq (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

Thousands of Iraqis are believed to have died from shortages of medicine, vital equipment and qualified doctors, despite an infusion of nearly half a billion dollars from U.S. coffers into the country's healthcare system, Iraqi officials and American observers say.

Raging sectarian violence as well as theft, corruption and mismanagement have drained health resources and made deliveries of supplies difficult. Exacerbating the crisis, hundreds of doctors have been killed, and thousands have fled Iraq. The child mortality rate, a key indicator of a nation's health, has worsened since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, according to Iraqi government figures.

In the most sinister reported development, provincial Sunni Muslim doctors charge that Shiite Muslims who control the Health Ministry deliberately withhold medicines and other vital supplies. Privately, some U.S. officials say that hard-line Shiites use the ministry for political and sectarian ends.

This fall, U.S. troops raided the ministry, arresting employees suspected of kidnapping and killing patients at the Medical City Hospital in Baghdad. Afterward, ministry officials severed ties with the Americans and refused to open an $800,000 clinic built by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers in a deprived Sunni neighborhood in the capital.

The clinic has since been opened, but relations are still strained between U.S. military officials and the ministry, which is staffed by Shiites loyal to anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr.

Across Iraq, a country whose healthcare was once the envy of the region, many hospitals have neither computers nor meaningful patient files. Functioning X-ray machines and MRI scanners are few and far between.

At one of the busiest hospitals in Baghdad, five people die on average every day because the staff does not have the equipment to treat heart attacks and other commonplace illnesses and injuries, said Husam Abud, a doctor at Yarmouk Hospital. That translates to more than 1,800 preventable deaths in a year in that hospital alone.

"Frankly speaking, if we get cases of cancer, we can't treat them," he said. "They'll probably end their days here. We don't have the adequate medication or the adequate equipment, and specialized doctors are not available."

A pharmacist in the town of Taji, north of Baghdad, described a looming "humanitarian catastrophe" as medicine, blood bags, oxygen, anesthetics, vaccines and IV fluid run out. Taji has a hospital, but the surgical room contains little medicine and fewer instruments. In September, doctors there were forced to turn away a pregnant woman who was experiencing labor complications. She died on her way to another hospital.

DOJ_NMG_0093266

Already overburdened by large numbers of civilian victims of the civil war, hospitals also are stretched by Iraqi military and police casualties. Because the security forces have no emergency facilities, soldiers take wounded comrades to hospitals for care, often forcing doctors at gunpoint to treat them first, U.S. military officials say.

Healthcare in Iraq once was first rate. Medicine and hospital care were free, doctors well-educated and respected. But neglect by former President Saddam Hussein and years of United Nations sanctions laid waste to the system.

Since 2003, U.S. agencies have spent at least $493 million of Iraqi reconstruction funds on healthcare, but no new hospitals and only a few clinics have been built. With reconstruction funds running out, officials can point to few success stories beyond a child vaccination campaign. Hospitals looted in the first days after the invasion remain decrepit, without vital equipment and supplies. The hospital rehabilitation program has been plagued by cost overruns and complaints of shoddy but expensive work.

A flagship $50-million children's hospital in the southern city of Basra, a pet project of First Lady Laura Bush, has run far behind schedule and over budget. If it is ever finished, the hospital probably will end up costing at least $40 million more than planned, not including medical equipment, according to a congressional report by the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction.

The largest U.S.-funded construction program in the healthcare sector has fallen far short. A project to build 150 primary healthcare centers in Iraq was initially scaled back to 142 because of cost overruns. But only six clinics are open to the public, five of them in Shiite neighborhoods of Baghdad, according to a information provided by the U.S. Agency for International Development.

In Sunni-dominated Al Anbar province, the poorest, most dangerous part of the country, it has become increasingly difficult to get medical care. Several clinics have shut down in Ramadi, Hit, Haditha and Fallouja as doctors have fled and supplies have dwindled, local officials say.

The nation's health has deteriorated to a level not seen since the 1950s, said Joseph Chamie, former director of the U.N. Population Division and an Iraq specialist.

"They were at the forefront," he said, referring to healthcare just before the 1991 Persian Gulf War. "Now they're looking more and more like a country in sub-Saharan Africa."

At the outset of the 2003 war, the U.S. administration pledged to cut the child mortality rate in half by 2005. But instead it has worsened, from 125 deaths per 1,000 births in 2002 to 130 per 1,000 this year, according to Health Ministry figures. By comparison, the child mortality rate in the United States was 8 per 1,000 births in 2005.

Meanwhile, the Health Ministry's budget has grown substantially — $1.1 billion this year, compared with $22 million in 2002. More than 55% of its funds are spent on medication and medical supplies, and 33% on salaries. Remaining funds are spent on upkeep and auxiliary work, according to ministry figures.

But much of the medicine and medical supplies never benefit the most needy patients.

There is no reliable system for government agencies to track deliveries of medicines and equipment. Large quantities cannot be accounted for, according to a Western official who declined to be identified.

"The system still hemorrhages a massive amount of the goods for health at a time when the people can least afford to be without medicines," Richard Garfield, a Columbia University healthcare expert, told a Senate committee hearing in July. "The value of medicines lost this way far outweighs the amount lost to corruption, either before or after the invasion."

In Hussein's hometown, Tikrit, 57 truckloads of medicine have disappeared within the last two weeks, according to Sgt. 1st Class Jeff Newkirk, a civil affairs officer who operates in the area. Health workers have run out of such everyday items as painkillers, plastic gloves, test tubes and blood bags, said Jasim Mukhlis, a 28-year-old Turkmen who works in the outpatient pharmacy.

The once well-funded hospital in the city now needs repairs to its roof and water pipes. The only available MRI scanner has been broken for eight months, but the Health Ministry has refused to send engineers, local officials say. As a result, patients sometimes have to travel about 200 miles to the northern city of Mosul for scans, say doctors, who perform only the most urgent operations in the hospital.

DOJ_NMG_0093267

Three newly built clinics remain unopened, lacking doctors and supplies. Omar Hadithi, a local doctor, said Shiite officials take care of Shiite regions.

"The officials in the ministry think that our province received special treatment during Saddam's reign, so they are treating it with less care," he said.

Doctors and officials in Baqubah also charge that the Shiite-run ministry discriminates against them.

"We have no medications or blood serum supplies," said Tariq Hiali, a Baqubah health official. "The Ministry of Health is not providing us with medications and medical equipment; they consider [us to be] terrorists."

Qasim Yahya, a Health Ministry spokesman, denied that the ministry discriminates against Sunnis. Supplies are available to all, but must be picked up in Baghdad, he said, adding that the ministry is not responsible for delivery.

Sending Shiite ministry workers to Sunni-dominated areas might indeed be a dicey proposition.

And Sunni health workers say it is too dangerous for them to travel to the capital, especially to the ministry. Health Minister Ali Shammari is a member of Sadr's political movement, and the militiamen nominally loyal to the radical Shiite cleric, the Al Mahdi army, control the Health Ministry complex and the surrounding area.

Ali Mahdawi, a Sunni health official from Baqubah, disappeared inside the ministry complex four months ago as he was on his way to a meeting with the health minister. Mahdawi and his guards have not been heard from since, according to his colleagues and American officials.

"The ambulances we send to Baghdad are being intercepted by the Mahdi army," said Jamal Qadoori, an employee at Baqubah's blood bank. The Shiite militiamen then sell the stolen supplies on the black market, getting as much as $100 for blood bags, he said.

But both Shiite and Sunni health workers are targeted. At least 455 doctors, medical staffers and hospital guards on both sides of the sectarian divide have been killed since 2003, according to Health Ministry figures. In the same period, about 7,000 doctors left the country, according to the Doctors Assn. of Iraq.

In a few provinces, healthcare has not deteriorated since the U.S.-led invasion. The quiet, semiautonomous Kurdish region in the north has benefited from the influx of Arab doctors fleeing the violence in the capital. And in the south, Japanese forces have built or rehabilitated three hospitals and 32 health clinics in the peaceful Shiite-dominated Muthanna province. As a result, child mortality rates have improved there, according to provincial health director Falah Hassan.

But in most of the country, the situation has grown worse. Like violence, theft and corruption have become endemic. People caring for sick or injured family members say health workers are on the take and refuse to treat patients unless they're paid extra.

"They will not take care of the patient unless you pay them money all the time," said Akram Hussein, whose 75-year-old grandmother was taken to the Chawader Hospital in Baghdad's sprawling Shiite neighborhood of Sadr City recently. "We paid money to the cleaners and the nurses."

When his grandmother was in need of an important injection, the doctor also demanded extra: 5,000 dinar, or about $4.

Hussein's family didn't complain to the manager, he said, "fearing they might leave her completely."

After 10 days, she died.

"God decides people's ages," Hussein said. "But I think that the lack of care in this hospital caused the death of my grandmother."

Rumsfeld May Face Abuse Charges (BBC)

BBC.com, November 11, 2006

Donald Rumsfeld, who quit as US defence secretary this week, may face criminal charges in Germany for alleged abuses in Guantanamo Bay and Iraq.

A complaint has been launched by the US-based Centre for Constitutional Rights, representing a Saudi detained in Cuba and 11 Iraqis held in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0093268

German law allows the pursuit of cases originating anywhere in the world.

The centre made a similar request in 2004 but German prosecutors dropped that case.

The Centre for Constitutional Rights argues that Mr Rumsfeld was instrumental in abuses committed at Guantanamo Bay and at Abu Ghraib jail in Baghdad.

The lawyer group alleges that Mr Rumsfeld personally approved torture to be used to extract information from the prisoners.

It is also seeking to prosecute US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and former CIA director George Tenet, among others.

The group's complaint will be filed to German federal prosecutors on Tuesday, a spokesperson for the group said.

The prosecutors will have to again decide whether the complaint should be heard.

Mr Rumsfeld resigned on Wednesday following Republican losses to the Democrats in the US mid-term elections.

The Pentagon has not yet commented on the issue.

The US denies any torture has taken place at Guantanamo Bay and has defended its interrogation techniques.

Abuse of prisoners at Abu Ghraib was brought to world attention after photographs of the incidents were released and published.

Rummy's Got A New Woe - Torture Suit By 9/11 Thug (NYDN)

By James Gordon Meek, Daily News Washington Bureau

New York Daily News, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON - A New York human rights group plans to sue Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld for mistreating a 9/11 plotter and a former American general intends to back up the case, Time magazine reported yesterday.

The Center for Constitutional Rights will file the claim in Germany next week on behalf of Mohammad Al-Qahtani and 11 Iraqis who claim they were tortured in Baghdad's infamous Abu Ghraib prison. German courts claim a "universal jurisdiction" for war crimes.

Qahtani, who was stopped by an alert U.S. Customs officer in Orlando, Fla., before meeting with 9/11 cell leader Mohamed Atta days before the attacks, claims in legal papers he was tortured at the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The CCR alleges that abuse of terrorist suspects at Gitmo and Abu Ghraib were condoned or authorized by Rumsfeld, who was axed by President Bush after this week's election results.

Retired Army Col. Janis Karpinski is the star witness backing the detainees, who also name ex-CIA Director George Tenet, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, ex-Iraq commander Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez and retired Gitmo commander Maj. Gen. Geoffrey Miller.

Before Bush demoted her from brigadier general because of the abuse, Karpinski commanded the Long Island-based 800th Military Police Brigade that ran all of Iraq's prisons, including Abu Ghraib.

"It was clear the knowledge and responsibility [for Abu Ghraib detainee abuses] goes all the way to the top of the chain of command to the Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld," Karpinski said in the legal brief.

Karpinski did not return calls by the Daily News yesterday.

Rumsfeld Rides Off Into The Sunset (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, November 11, 2006

"Stuff happens."

Donald Rumsfeld, the US defence secretary, this week was put out to pasture following a turbulent six years at the Pentagon.

Mr Rumsfeld will go down in history as one of the most controversial figures of the Bush presidency. Comparisons will inevitably be made with Robert McNamara, the Vietnam-era defence secretary, who was fired after he disagreed with President Lyndon Johnson about US policy in Vietnam.

DOJ_NMG_0093269

Mr Rumsfeld did not have a McNamaraesque epiphany about the direction of the war. He was a true believer to his bitter end. But President George W. Bush was forced to jettison him after the US expressed its total dissatisfaction with the war in this week's mid-term -elections.

Always combative, often charming, sometimes a bully, Mr Rumsfeld introduced a style of Pentagon press conference that both entertained and infuriated.

Trying to pin down the former university wrestling champion was about as easy as finding Osama bin Laden, which, as the defence secretary himself explained, is not easy.

"If you're chasing the chicken around the chicken yard and you don't have him yet, and the question is how close are you? The answer is, it's tough to characterise because there's lots of zigs and zags."

In his own form of Socratic soliloquy, he might have summed up his fate something like this: "Goodness gracious me...Did I see this coming? No. Should I have? Perhaps. Was I wrong? Of course not. You should know that. What does it all mean? It is what it is."

How surprised Mr Rumsfeld really was at being replaced is one of those known unknowns that first made his name as a poet whose rhetorical musings have been compiled in Pieces of Intelligence: The Existential Poetry of Donald H. Rumsfeld.

"As we know, there are known knowns. There are things we know we know. We also know there are known unknowns. That is to say we know there are some things we do not know. But there are also unknown unknowns, the ones we don't know we don't know."

He once, uncharacteristically, explained his problem: "I'm brusque. I'm impatient. It's genetic. I can't help it."

The former naval pilot had many careers. A Congressman and top official in the administrations of presidents Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford, he later left government to run several companies, before returning in 2001 as the Bush administration's poet-in-residence.

As far back as the 1960s, he was considered a supreme Washington infighter. One of the compliments Mr Nixon paid to him was that he was a "ruthless little bastard".

But Mr Rumsfeld appeared to relish the bruising battles he had with other administration officials, and especially with Colin Powell, the former secretary of state. At a White House meeting in 2004, the defence chief stunned the other attendees by reached over and drank Mr Powell's Diet Coke because he could not find one himself.

After eyebrows were raised, Condoleezza Rice, then national security adviser, interjected: "Now that Don has had his Diet Coke, perhaps we can start." Mr Powell's office had no recollection of the event.

But, privately, even some of his foes recognised his sense of humour, which appeared intact the day after he had been fired. Giving the Landon lecture at Kansas State University, Rummy the Gladiator joked: "I hope all of you appreciate how I have managed so skilfully public affairs for this event."

What Mr Rumsfeld does next is another "known unknown". Perhaps he will visit old friends, including one who has been waiting patiently in a Mongolian field.

During a visit to Ulan Bator last year, Mr Rumsfeld was given a horse he named Montana. But since he could not bring Montana back to the US, the Mongolian defence minister told him tradition dictated that he would be put out to pasture until his master returned.

For Rumsfeld, his rocky ride has come to an end. But as he himself once quipped: "How does it end? It ends, that's all"

Afghanistan Waits For Peace Five Years After Fall Of Taliban (AFP)

By Sylvie Briand

AFP, November 11, 2006

Five years after US-led forces drove the Taliban from Kabul, peace remains a distant dream in Afghanistan with militant attacks at an all-time high, a despondent population and widespread corruption.

The violence, in its bloodiest phase since November 2001 with some 1,000 civilians killed this year, results from "the failure of international intervention to stop the cycle of decades of conflict," says the International Crisis Group, a leading think-tank.

DOJ_NMG_0093270

"The primary error of the Americans and their allies has been to not grant enough troops and resources, which has allowed the return of the Taliban, and resulted in the disillusionment of the people and the unpopularity of the government," added Ahmed Rashid, a Pakistani expert on Afghanistan.

The NATO-led International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) had only 4,500 members in 2002, all deployed around Kabul. The alliance now commands some 31,000 troops, boosted by 10,000 troops from the US-led coalition that ousted the Taliban five years ago.

By comparison Kosovo, which is around 60 times smaller than Afghanistan, played host to 40,000 NATO soldiers after the 1999 bombing campaign against Serbian forces.

ISAF's chief, British General David Richards, has himself said that current troops numbers are insufficient to counter the violence that has effectively doubled since 2004 and is now marked by a previously alien phenomenon here -- suicide bombings.

The international community's other mistake, according to Rashid, is its failure to press Pakistani authorities to stop allowing their territory to serve as a "refuge for the Taliban".

"The Americans were more worried about Al-Qaeda in Afghanistan than they were about the Taliban. But the lack of pressure by Pakistan means that the Taliban have reorganised with the help of Al-Qaeda," Rashid said.

The United States launched Operation Enduring Freedom in Afghanistan to track down Osama bin Laden after the September 11, 2001 attacks on New York and Washington.

Faced with US air raids and the oncoming Northern Alliance forces, the Taliban abandoned Kabul on the night of November 12, around a month after the operation started.

But the Al-Qaeda chief remains at large, as does the Taliban's supreme leader, Mullah Mohammad Omar.

Much-needed reconstruction has stopped in several areas because of combat or the withdrawal of Afghan and foreign aid workers, "calling into question some of the modest gains achieved since 2001 such as the return of children to school, especially girls," says US-based Human Rights Watch.

To meet the needs of this destitute country, the NATO forces have embarked on building bridges, schools and clinics but "without a state capable of keeping them up, it is pointless," says Joanna Nathan, a Kabul-based analyst with the International Crisis Group (ICG).

The group has called for reforms in the Afghan government and for a campaign against endemic corruption to stop disillusioned Afghans from swelling the ranks of an insurgency that the ICG says "is going to last for years".

In the eyes of many Afghans the situation is worse than it was five years ago: the cost of living has increased, infrastructure remains deficient and security is still not assured, according to the non-governmental organisation Action Against Hunger.

The insurgents are not the only source of violence, according to experts who also point to local warlords who are often implicated in drug trafficking. Afghanistan is the world's leading producer of opium.

The situation is particularly bad in the south of the country where the Taliban insurgency and the drug trade are both concentrated.

"You would not be able to grow massive poppy fields in regions that were under the control of the central government and foreign forces," Nathan said.

In Pakistan, Recent Attacks Shred Hopes For Regional Peace Model (WP)

By Pamela Constable, Kamran Khan

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

PESHAWAR, Pakistan -- Two months ago, Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, triumphantly announced a peace pact with Islamic extremists in the North Waziristan tribal district near the Afghan border, saying he hoped it would become a model for curbing domestic Islamic militancy and cross-border insurgent attacks in Afghanistan.

Today that model lies in shreds. Northwestern Pakistan's fragile political peace has been shattered by two devastating attacks: a government missile strike that killed 82 people at an Islamic school in the Bajaur tribal district on Oct. 30, and a retaliatory suicide bombing Wednesday that killed 42 army recruits at a training camp in the Malakand tribal district.

DOJ_NMG_0093271

The missile strike was based on U.S. intelligence reports that the school was being used as a training site for Islamic insurgents, who have found sanctuary across the semi-autonomous tribal areas where Osama bin Laden and other al-Qaeda figures may also be hiding. Now, officials are predicting a new wave of violence, as anti-government anger spreads and religious extremists call for holy war against the Pakistani military and Western forces fighting in Afghanistan.

"This is a disaster. We all recognize the gravity of the situation," said a senior military official in this northwestern provincial capital, speaking on condition of anonymity. "It's a nightmare to have an army being attacked on its own soil and by its own people." After the two incidents, he added, "the doors to peaceful negotiated settlements are closed. I am afraid we are on a war course in the tribal areas."

Public condemnation of the missile attack has been almost universal in Pakistan. Many people say they believe it was actually carried out by a U.S. Predator drone, which witnesses described as circling overhead before Pakistani helicopter gunships arrived. U.S. and Pakistani officials have denied that.

Local leaders have also vehemently asserted that the school, run by a cleric from a banned extremist group, was used only for religious studies and that many young students were killed in the strike. No physical evidence of a training camp has been publicly produced, journalists have been barred from the site, and most of the victims' bodies were too disfigured to identify.

"This was a crime against humanity. Everyone hates America now, and they hate Musharraf for giving in to American pressure," said Bashir Ahmed, 25, a produce trader in a Peshawar market crowded with crates of bananas and pomegranates. "America is the enemy of all Muslims, but they will never defeat us, because we are all becoming al-Qaeda now, even me."

Pakistani military and intelligence officials said they had little choice but to bomb the site after they received overwhelming proof from U.S. intelligence sources that it was being used as a training center for insurgents. A refusal to act, the Pakistanis said, would have badly damaged their relations with the United States, which counts Pakistan as a key ally in the war against al-Qaeda and fundamentalist Islamic terrorism.

"They loaded us with evidence. The strike was absolutely inevitable," said a senior intelligence official, also speaking on condition of anonymity. Another official called the attack a "major test" of military and intelligence cooperation between the United States and Pakistan. "We thought about other options, but the Americans weren't ready to take any chances," he said. "We were caught between the devil and the deep sea."

Public outrage has also flared over Wednesday's suicide bombing, in which a man wrapped in a cloak strolled among army recruits exercising on a field and detonated powerful explosives, killing more Pakistani troops than any previous terrorist attack. But many Pakistanis view that bombing as a predictable response to an ill-conceived military action taken under U.S. pressure.

Ansar Abbasi, Islamabad bureau chief for the News International newspaper, called the Bajaur attack "outrageous" and argued in a column that while it might have raised Musharraf's tough-guy image in the West, it served no national interest and could only exacerbate conflict between the army and the civilian populace. "Have we not fallen into a U.S. trap?" he asked.

One political leader in Peshawar said the Bajaur site was definitely a terrorist base but that it was not "politically correct to say so" in the region. Bajaur elders had reached a peace accord similar to the Waziristan pact, he said, but the missile strike came just hours before they were to sign it. "People find this mind-boggling and impossible to understand," he said.

The Musharraf government has long been caught between conflicting domestic and international pressures. Western powers have demanded that it crack down on religious extremists and hunt down al-Qaeda fugitives, widely reported to be hiding in the semi-autonomous tribal belt. But Islamic groups are politically dominant in Pakistan's northwest, and many tribal fighters have fiercely resisted military efforts to dislodge Islamic militants from their midst.

Musharraf's recent attempt at compromise, a series of negotiated settlements with armed Islamic groups and tribal leaders, has been controversial. Critics charge that pacts in North and South Waziristan left both areas under the control of extremists who continue to export violence to Afghanistan. They say the deals were aimed only at extricating army troops from the tribal areas, where they had suffered heavy casualties and public hostility during months of fighting.

At the same time, however, the growing violence has led to urgent calls for mass tribal conflict-resolution meetings, known as jirgas. Afghan President Hamid Karzai recently proposed a series of jirgas in both countries, and the Awami National Party, which represents the ethnic Pashtuns who predominate in Pakistan's northwest, has called for a separate tribal jirga. Party leaders say the only antidote to Islamic radicalization is the ancient tribal code known as Pashtunwali, which prescribes consensual pacts to halt feuds.

DOJ_NMG_0093272

"Even though Talibanization is spreading, Pashtunwali is still in people's blood," said Afrasiab Khattak, an Awami party official and human rights activist in Peshawar. "We don't want to settle scores or embarrass the government. Our only agenda is to stop this conflict from getting worse."

The dominant political group in the northwest, a religious party called Jamaat-e-Islami, responded to the Bajaur attack by staging nationwide protests. While Jamaat officially opposes terrorism and has played a responsible leadership role in provincial government for the past several years, it issued calls for jihad after the missile strike, and several key leaders resigned from their government posts or seats in parliament.

In interviews here, several Jamaat leaders echoed the current ambivalence, saying they were horrified by suicide bombings but furious at Western military interference in the region and opposed to the moderate version of Islam promoted by Musharraf.

Abdul Akbar Chitrali, a cleric and Jamaat politician who directs an Islamic academy for boys in Peshawar called the Garden of Knowledge, said he believes in spreading Islam by peaceful means. "But when someone invades you, you have no choice but to resist," he said. "The Americans and NATO have no right to occupy Afghanistan. They are the hooligans causing our problems, not the Taliban or al-Qaeda."

It may never be known whether the tiny Islamic school in Bajaur's Chingai village was a garden of knowledge or a staging ground for terrorists. A group of lawyers from Peshawar who visited the site last week said they saw no evidence of training or weapons.

What they did see was disturbing enough: a tense, angry crowd that surrounded their vehicles, shouting for holy war against the Pakistani and U.S. governments, less than a week after local leaders had been ready to sign a peace pact with the government.

"If it was a military camp, I found no sign of it. But the people were very inflamed," said Barrister Baachaa, one of the lawyers. "Bajauris are known to be quiet and not carrying guns, but the mood is becoming very militant. If Bajaur can fall into Talibanization, so can the other tribal areas, and then I fear it can spread to the settled areas, too," he said. "This has to be contained, but the way they did it in Bajaur has only made it worse."

Khan reported from Karachi.

Then And Now, Female Soldiers Just Do Their Jobs (NYT)

By Maura J. Casey

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

One of my most prized possessions is a set of World War II dog tags. They are inscribed with my mother's name and serial number: Jane I. Murray, A-218847.

She enlisted in the Women's Army Corps at 21, determined to get as near to the front as possible. She got no closer to combat than Fort Riley, Kan. Her Army years became her one great adventure before returning to marry and have six children in seven years, a daunting task for which her warrior's ethos probably came in handy.

My mother's service gave her a lifelong belief in women's abilities. She horrified my friends during the Vietnam War when she argued that women should have been included in the draft, since they had an equal obligation to serve. The courage and competence of women currently serving in Iraq and Afghanistan would have come as no surprise to her.

Yet, despite what women in uniform have accomplished, there are critics who want to curtail their military roles. Despite Pentagon policy that keeps women from entering combat units like infantry, armor or field artillery, some conservatives profess horror that women are members of any combat support units in harm's way.

Because of this, Representative Duncan Hunter, the California Republican who is the outgoing chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, tried to amend the 2006 defense authorization bill to restrict the role of women in the Army. It would have barred women from nearly 22,000 jobs. The measure was withdrawn once it became clear it wouldn't pass.

But reality has overrun critics' arguments. Between Iraq and Afghanistan, 68 women have been killed in action, and 436 have been wounded, according to the Pentagon's Web site. In the midst of what is truly a 360-degree front, some still insist that women should not be in the line of fire before the country has an "open debate" on the impact of women on morale, readiness and military cohesion in time of war.

DOJ_NMG_0093273

In truth, that debate has never ended, no matter how well women have served, and has largely been a ludicrous waste of time and millions of dollars. In the last 30 years, two federal commissions examined the impact of women in the military for months on end.

The Army alone has conducted at least a dozen major studies on how women should be utilized. The studies found that, properly armed and trained, women enhance unit readiness and cohesion, said Brig. Gen. Pat Foote, who is retired. "Women have been pulled through more knotholes with people questioning their abilities," she said. "Women can do anything they are trained for."

The questions prove equally exasperating to women like Col. Patricia Jernigan, retired, who is a board member for the United States Army Women's Foundation. "An airplane doesn't care who is flying it," she said. "A rifle doesn't care who is firing it. Judge women on performance."

Given the ease of modern communication, from cellphones to e-mail, if women were not measuring up in Iraq, that would have become very clear by now. Last year, the Pentagon quietly approved creation of the Combat Action Badge, awarded to Army combat support soldiers who come under fire and engage the enemy. Sgt. April Pashley, of Egg Harbor Township, N.J., was among the first five recipients.

My mother never fought. But every day for the 30-plus years she lived after the war, she was proud she had enlisted. And despite the passage of time, there remains a fundamental bond between the experience of Army women today and that of my mother, so very long ago: all she wanted was to be a good soldier.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Fastow Gets His Moment In The Sun (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

HOUSTON, Nov. 3 — No one sold tickets, but the Andrew S. Fastow show cost a small fortune.

And while it was light on laughs, it even featured window washers who moved in the background like shadowy ninjas before a nervous audience of big-name Wall Street lawyers representing some of the largest banks in the world.

For eight and a half days, Mr. Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, held some 70 lawyers rapt in a downtown Houston conference room as he delivered the most expansive deposition yet in a spate of lawsuits stemming from Enron's 2001 collapse. His much-anticipated appearance, which ended on Nov. 2, was the first time an Enron insider had sought to help shareholders recover money in the civil litigation.

Lawyers representing Enron investors have already won settlements for $7.3 billion of the $40 billion shareholders claim they lost in Enron's 2001 collapse. On Nov. 1, the latest settlement — an agreement by Arthur Andersen, Enron's former accounting firm, to pay $72.5 million — was disclosed.

But it is far from clear whether the testimony of Mr. Fastow, a convicted felon who masterminded some of the fraudulent transactions that hid the company's poor financial health, will be enough to push the seven banks that have not settled to the negotiating table.

A number of the banks named in the consolidated Enron shareholders' suit argued that they were now in the catbird seat, and they played down the significance of Mr. Fastow's deposition.

The Royal Bank of Scotland, one of the seven banks yet to settle, said "there was nothing in Fastow's deposition that changes R.B.S.'s view of the case."

Merrill Lynch said the deposition "did not break any material new factual ground." Mark Herr, a Merrill spokesman, said the bank viewed a decision by a federal appeals court on Nov. 1 as more important than what Mr. Fastow had to say.

DOJ_NMG_0093274

The appeals court said it would review the basis on which Judge Melinda Harmon of United States District Court allowed the case to proceed as a class action. If the court rules that Judge Harmon erred in certifying the class, the civil suit could be thrown out for the remaining banks.

Judge Harmon dropped Barclays and Deutsche Bank from the shareholder suit this summer, saying their actions amounted to aiding and abetting Enron but not to direct involvement in the fraud.

Plaintiffs' lawyers, though, hailed Mr. Fastow's appearance as a milestone in the sprawling and stunningly expensive Enron civil litigation.

Mr. Fastow calmly outlined the role of the banks in helping Enron meet its earnings targets while hiding its poor cash flow and mounting debt. He named specific bankers without prompting, recounted private conversations with them and corroborated sheaves of the banks' internal documents, according to those who witnessed the deposition.

He testified that he viewed the banks as Enron's "problem solvers." They would "lend their balance sheets," he said, and provide loans disguised as something else to pump up Enron's poor cash flow and reduce the debt on its balance sheet.

"We were changing how Enron appeared to the outside world," Mr. Fastow said in his deposition.

According to J. B. Heaton, a lawyer who represents several investment funds holding Enron debt and seeking relief in a private-action suit, "there were no smoking guns" in Mr. Fastow's testimony.

Mr. Heaton added, though, that "it was the power of corroboration and the consistency under nine days of questioning that was so impressive. That's why it was believable."

The deposition drew lawyers representing 10 major banks and top Enron executives who have not been charged with crimes. It was also streamed live over the Internet so law firms in New York, London and elsewhere could listen in.

With the typical lawyer in the case billing about $450 an hour, the legal fees just to follow the testimony could cost at least $2.1 million, and the overall price tag of the litigation is expected to reach hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. Fastow's switch from defendant to plaintiffs' witness was engineered by Lerach Coughlin, the San Diego-based law firm pursuing shareholders' claims. It released Mr. Fastow from the shareholder case after he agreed to give a sworn declaration and sit for the deposition. The firm is paying legal fees for Mr. Fastow's lawyer, Craig Smyser.

Mr. Fastow acknowledged in his deposition that he hoped his criminal sentence might be lowered if he agreed to help the shareholders recover money in the civil case. Yet Mr. Smyser said Mr. Fastow was motivated more by a need to set the record straight.

"This was part of a personal journey to redeem himself as much as he can," Mr. Smyser said.

Judge Harmon granted Mr. Fastow daily release from a Houston federal detention center after he gave the court a 25-page statement detailing what he viewed as the banks' roles in Enron's fraud. Mr. Fastow offered the statement on the day he was sentenced for fraud; a judge reduced his sentence to 6 years, from the 10 he had expected to receive.

[Mr. Fastow was moved on Nov. 7 to Oakdale, La., where he will serve his time in a minimum-security camp in the same complex as a low-security prison where Bernard J. Ebbers, the former chief executive of WorldCom, is serving his 25-year sentence for fraud.]

Each day United States marshals escorted a shackled Mr. Fastow from the detention center, where he awaited his prison assignment in solitary confinement, to the 21st floor of a downtown Houston office building, where a "deposition center" was set up specifically for the Enron civil cases.

Dressed in olive green garb, he sat in front of a blue screen with his back to the windows and answered questions, with only occasional breaks, from 9 a.m. to nearly 6 p.m. on most days.

Tensions were high that first morning, according to several people who witnessed the deposition. About 30 lawyers packed into the main conference room, sitting on either side of Mr. Fastow. Almost 40 more watched on video feeds in two overflow rooms.

Suddenly, four shadowy figures with ropes appeared, hanging outside the windows of the main room, which had the blinds drawn. A marshal scrambled to the windows. One lawyer for a major bank said the figures resembled ninjas. It turned out they were window washers.

DOJ_NMG_0093275

"A lot of uncomfortable smiles broke out," Mr. Heaton said. During the deposition, Mr. Fastow discussed how he prioritized the banks Enron dealt with. "Tier 1" banks were those willing to lend Enron up to $1 billion. In October 2001, as Enron's financial situation was unraveling, he sought to elevate two banks — Chase and Citibank — into an even higher category if they would agree to help bail out Enron by lending up to $2 billion between them, he said.

Mr. Fastow said he tried to make clear to Citibank, a unit of Citicorp, and Chase, a unit of J. P. Morgan Chase, that "this was extraordinarily important to Enron and that this would, going forward, set them apart from any other bank."

Both banks declined to comment. They have previously settled shareholder claims but still face billions of dollars of liability in private-action suits.

While Mr. Fastow gave testimony useful to the plaintiffs' cases, he also gave some ammunition to defense lawyers by admitting that he consistently lied to the banks about Enron's true financial condition. He never "opened his kimono," he said, for fear that they would effectively shut Enron down if they knew how precarious its position was.

And Mr. Fastow revealed more about Enron's corporate culture. In early 1999, a tour with analysts of Enron's new energy services trading floor was staged to make it look busier than it was, he said. Mr. Fastow wanted to play music from the movie "The Sting" during a dry run, as a joke.

He changed his mind after learning that Kenneth L. Lay, the company's chief executive, would be there. "I didn't think he had the same sense of humor," Mr. Fastow said.

Corporate Crime In H-P Case, New Sheriff Comes To Town (WSJ)

By George Anders

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

The criminal prosecution of former Hewlett-Packard Co. chairman Patricia Dunn -- who is due to be arraigned on Friday -- could get a fresh look from one of California's best-known politicians.

On Nov. 7, California voters picked Democrat Jerry Brown -- the former governor and presidential candidate -- to be the state's next attorney general. Mr. Brown, who is currently mayor of Oakland, will begin his new job Jan. 9.

As attorney general, Mr. Brown will have ultimate authority in deciding how to proceed with People vs. Dunn, a case filed in state court in San Jose last month by William Lockyer, the current AG. The state's case focused on allegedly improper techniques used by H-P and its agents to gather phone records and other personal data for an investigation of boardroom leaks.

Mr. Lockyer took a negative view of H-P's conduct. "One of our state's most venerable corporate institutions lost its way," he said in an Oct. 4 briefing about the state's case. "In this misguided effort, people inside and outside H-P violated privacy rights and broke state law."

Tom Dresslar, a spokesman for the attorney general's office, said he expects the Dunn case will be "a candidate for review" by Mr. Brown, "if only to get him up to speed on the evidence we gathered and why we brought the case."

During his campaign for the AG post, the 68-year-old Mr. Brown focused his attention on other issues, vowing to take steps to protect public safety, abortion rights and California's recently enacted curbs on greenhouse-gas emissions. A spokesman for Mr. Brown declined to comment on how the attorney general-elect might view the Dunn case.

Mr. Dresslar reaffirmed his office's confidence in the merits of the H-P privacy-invasion case. "We had prosecutors with a combined 74 years of experience working on the case," he said. Still, he acknowledged that with Mr. Lockyer's tenure coming to an end, cases in progress could be reassessed. Mr. Lockyer was elected state treasurer on Tuesday; he will switch to his new job in early January.

Ms. Dunn and four other people were criminally charged in the state's case last month. The other defendants, including former H-P ethics director Kevin Hunsaker, have already entered pleas of not guilty. Ms. Dunn is expected to do the same at her arraignment.

3 Qwest Executives Cash In Options (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, November 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093276

DENVER, Nov. 10 (AP) — Three executives at Qwest Communications International made more than $43 million by cashing in stock options, according to regulatory filings.

The chief executive, Richard C. Notebaert, made a profit of $18.4 million and the chief financial officer, Oren G. Shaffer, made $18.5 million, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission filing.

The chief legal officer, Richard N. Baer, made a $6.4 million profit, according to documents filed earlier this week.

A Qwest spokesman, Nicholas Sweers, said that Mr. Notebaert planned to donate his after-tax proceeds to charities. Mr. Sweers did not identify the charities.

Mr. Shaffer and Mr. Baer have not revealed any plans for their proceeds.

The sales were disclosed about a month after Qwest's founder and largest shareholder, Philip F. Anschutz, contracted to sell 80 million shares through 2010.

Mr. Sweers said the executives retained substantial stock options. With Qwest share prices up by more than 80 percent year-over-year, "all shareholders have been rewarded by the company's financial and operational performance," Mr. Sweers said.

Qwest has announced plans to buy back up to $2 billion worth of its stock over two years.

Its shares fell 22 cents, to $8.23.

The company, based in Denver, is the primary phone service provider in 14 Midwestern and Western states.

SEC, Accounting Board Officials To Weigh Sarbanes-Oxley Update (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

Leaders of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the panel that oversees the accounting industry will meet Sunday in an effort to resolve differences over how to overhaul a controversial corporate accountability measure that business groups have targeted as overly expensive.

Tension over a part of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law, which requires companies to review their financial controls and to have auditors pass judgment on them, spilled into public view this week after the release of portions of a letter by SEC Chairman Christopher Cox proposing changes.

The Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, which reviews the work of auditors, met privately for 90 minutes yesterday to consider how to respond to Cox's letter, which urged the board to be flexible and cost-conscious in response to complaints from businesses. Cox and former Federal Reserve Board official Mark W. Olson, who now leads the accounting panel, are to meet this weekend to discuss the issues.

The exact language in Cox's letter has not been made public. Both agencies declined to release it yesterday. But speculation raged after reports suggested that Cox had proposed that small and mid-size companies could avoid reviews of their internal controls altogether or that regulators could render the reviews virtually useless by significantly heightening the standard for what kinds of transactions were important enough for auditors to assess.

Cox, in a telephone interview yesterday, rejected the notion that regulators would gut the internal control standard, which was put in place to help detect fraud and financial errors. Instead, he said, the goal was to retool the provision using "the lessons learned from the past four years," including making sure that "things that don't have to do with financial statements don't have excessive attention" and ensuring that small companies do not bear "disproportionate" cost burdens. Cox declined to be more specific, adding that some of the language mentioned earlier in the week was flatly inaccurate or had already been "overtaken by events."

Several of Cox's ideas spring from a report last year by a committee of small business leaders, which entreated the agency to exempt their companies from internal control reviews. Cox publicly rejected that option. But concern has persisted over the wording of the changes, and what they mean in practice, which can be difficult to grasp for anyone who is not an accountant.

Any formal proposals from the session between Cox and Olson would be unveiled at open meetings next month and subject to public comment, after which they could be modified, regulators from both agencies noted.

DOJ_NMG_0093277

After years-long and increasingly intense lobbying, congressional leaders including the presumptive chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, Barney Frank (D-Mass.), and Senate Banking Committee member Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) have called on regulators to ease the burden for industry.

Regulators are racing against the clock. The SEC and the accounting oversight board need a plan in place by March or April at the latest to influence the next round of corporate audits.

The nation's biggest accounting firms have reaped record profits from more-intense audits since Congress passed the law after scandals at Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. four years ago. PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP, Deloitte & Touche LLP, KPMG and Ernst & Young renewed a plea this week to insulate themselves from liability for failed audits. Because the firms insure themselves, they say they are at risk of financial disaster if they are deceived by a team of executives engaged in fraud. It is unclear whether the industry, which was tarnished after failing to detect widespread accounting fraud in recent years, has recovered sufficient clout to move ahead with liability reform.

The ongoing and increasingly heated debate over the internal controls provision also renewed tensions between the accounting oversight board, whose members and budget are approved by the SEC, and securities regulators. The board, which was created under the Sarbanes-Oxley law, has struggled to maintain its independence after early skirmishes over leadership. In February, the Free Enterprise Fund sued the board, arguing among other things that it lacked authority under the U.S. Constitution. A federal judge in Washington is considering the case and has requested argument from both sides next month.

SEC Chairman Backs Creation Of One Regulator For Brokerages (WSJ)

By Judith Burns, Randall Smith

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

BOCA RATON, Fla. -- The chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission threw his weight behind regulatory relief for Wall Street, endorsing creation of a single regulator to oversee brokerage firms.

Talks to merge the oversight of securities firms by the National Association of Securities Dealers and NYSE Group Inc.'s New York Stock Exchange have heated up, and could result in an accord in the next few months, according to people familiar with the talks.

The new entity, which hasn't been named yet, would combine the two regulators' routine rule-making, inspection and enforcement functions, while leaving in place the ability of the Big Board and other exchanges to police their own trading.

In a speech before a few hundred securities-industry professionals attending a meeting of the Securities and Financial Markets Association here Friday, Christopher Cox repeatedly criticized the current regulatory setup as "antiquated," "redundant," "needless and often harmful."

A new single regulator could be "more nimble and cost effective," he added. And in response to questions he predicted it could be up and running within a year.

Wall Street's main lobbying group, recently renamed SIFMA (after a merger of the stock-market and bond-market trade groups), has been pressing for such relief for several years.

But the effort has gained steam this year amid a broad deregulatory push-back against some rules adopted after the severe stock-market decline of 2000-02 and the collapse of Enron Corp.

Both Wall Street and corporate executives have argued that such rules need to be relaxed so global public companies don't avoid U.S. exchanges. In his speech Mr. Cox said failure to act on the regulatory consolidation could "impair" the strength of U.S. capital markets.

Hedge Funds Could Face New Limits (BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, November 11, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission will propose rules next month raising asset requirements for investing in hedge funds after one fund, Amaranth Advisers, lost $6.5 billion on bad natural gas trades.

The changes will be proposed to the S.E.C.'s five commissioners at a December meeting in Washington, the agency chairman, Christopher Cox, said yesterday. He did not specify how the agency might limit the pool of hedge-fund investors.

DOJ_NMG_0093278

"We're going to make it very clear that hedge funds are risky investments that are not for mom and pop by fencing it off with higher standards to accrediting investors," Mr. Cox said in an interview.

Hedge funds are open to individuals with at least $1 million in assets or at least $200,000 in income for the last two years, and also institutions like insurance companies, mutual funds and pension funds. Since Amaranth collapsed in September, lawmakers have become increasingly concerned that a hedge fund meltdown could put pension fund investments at risk.

Mr. Cox said at the meeting on Dec. 13, the S.E.C. would also propose a hedge fund anti-fraud rule as well as new guidelines to help companies and auditors interpret the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate governance law in a way that saves time and money.

The chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, has asked Mr. Cox and the Treasury secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. to figure out ways to increase transparency in the $1.3 trillion hedge-fund industry, which is largely unregulated. A federal appeals court in June rejected rules requiring hedge funds to register with the S.E.C. The agency wanted funds to report their size, number of employees and types of clients, and submit to random inspections.

Mr. Cox said that the shift in control of Congress to the Democrats should not impede efforts to revise corporate governance laws.

"This is a hugely bipartisan issue," Mr. Cox said. "The concerns that we've heard expressed on behalf of investors and small companies, and on behalf of the marketplace in general, have come roundly from Democrats and Republicans."

Spitzer's Successor May Not Follow In His Footsteps (WSJ)

By Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

Cuomo Targets Medicaid Fraud, Guns, Government Corruption; Grasso Case Will Be Early Test

Soon, there will be a new sheriff in town.

New York state's departing attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, used the once-provincial job to propel himself onto the national stage: Applying little-known state laws, he crusaded against bad behavior in mutual funds, banking and the insurance businesses, forcing billions of dollars in penalties. He also took on business titans such as Dick Grasso, the former head of the New York Stock Exchange, charging that he was overpaid.

His successor, 48-year-old Andrew Cuomo, inherits an office that has been transformed. Now everyone is waiting to see how Mr. Cuomo, who was elected on Tuesday in a landslide, plans to wield his power.

In an interview, Mr. Cuomo, the son of former New York Gov. Mario Cuomo, signaled that he intends to be different from Mr. Spitzer. Unlike the hard-nosed Mr. Spitzer -- who in his office keeps a picture of Teddy Roosevelt, another New York maverick, who famously crusaded a century ago to break up monopoly businesses like Standard Oil -- Mr. Cuomo said he works best "collaboratively." Mr. Cuomo said his top priorities are to clamp down on Medicaid fraud, the sale and use of illegal guns, and government corruption.

"Just the way Eliot exposed corruption on Wall Street, the attorney general has a responsibility to expose corruption in government," Mr. Cuomo said. He plans to go after big business whenever necessary, but said times have changed since the widespread scandals that erupted after the stock-market bubble burst earlier in the decade. Mr. Spitzer, he said, filled a void left by federal regulators who were slow to respond to questionable business practices.

Mr. Spitzer, who was elected New York's governor on Tuesday, will start his new job in January, as does Mr. Cuomo.

Mr. Cuomo's first test will likely be the case Mr. Spitzer brought against Mr. Grasso. In 2004, Mr. Spitzer sued the former Big Board chief over his $187.5 million compensation package, alleging it was excessive under the state's not-for-profit laws. (The NYSE is now part of a public, for-profit entity, NYSE Group Inc.) Mr. Grasso denies the charges and the lawsuit has turned into a major battle in state court.

Several appeals are still pending, but the judge in the case ruled that Mr. Grasso should give back as much as $100 million in compensation.

The case is expected to go to trial during the first half of 2007, and thus will be prosecuted by Mr. Cuomo's office. Mr. Cuomo brings fresh perspective to the case, which has been bitterly fought on both sides. Depending on how the appeals play out, some speculate that Mr. Cuomo could broker a settlement that avoids a trial. However, any perception that he is giving in could be politically problematic, given that the public now has high expectations for what once was considered a second-tier office.

DOJ_NMG_0093279

Mr. Cuomo said he is reviewing the Grasso case and declined to comment on his position.

Despite Mr. Cuomo's shift in priorities for the office, he is expected to maintain a high profile. Politically ambitious, he, too, will likely try to use the position as a launching pad to higher office. "I would be very surprised if the basic playbook were thrown out the window, especially since it was so effective," said Thomas Curran, a former Manhattan assistant district attorney who is now a partner at Ganfer & Shore LLP.

Politics are in Mr. Cuomo's DNA. His father, Mario, was New York's governor from 1983 to 1995. Mr. Cuomo was married to Robert Kennedy's daughter, Kerry, before getting divorced in 2003.

A graduate of Albany Law School, Mr. Cuomo worked in his father's administration before a brief stint as a Manhattan assistant district attorney. He later started a nonprofit that built housing for the homeless. After serving as housing secretary in the Clinton administration, he ran unsuccessfully for New York governor in 2002.

Some observers expect Mr. Cuomo could eventually run for the U.S. Senate if Hillary Clinton (who was re-elected Tuesday) decides to run for president. Wendy Katz, a spokeswoman for Mr. Cuomo, said: "Andrew has said he is 100% focused on serving New Yorkers as their next attorney general, and those are his plans."

In addition to fighting Medicaid fraud and government corruption, Mr. Cuomo says he plans to pursue civil-rights cases and push the federal government to do more to strengthen environmental regulations.

He plans to focus on more-traditional consumer issues, the mainstay of the office, which traces its roots back to Dutch colonial days in the 1600s. Several early New York attorneys general parlayed the job to national office, including Aaron Burr, who held the office in the late 1700s before eventually becoming Thomas Jefferson's vice president (and, of course, killing Alexander Hamilton in a duel).

Mr. Spitzer did his share of consumer cases. But he made his name prosecuting big, national corporations in part by using obscure state laws such as the 1921 Martin Act, which let him subpoena documents and force executives to testify -- powers that most state attorneys general don't have.

"Eliot is a very tough act to follow," said John Moscow, a former Manhattan assistant district attorney, who is now a partner at the law firm Rosner, Moscow & Napierala.

Investigating conflicts of interest on Wall Street was Mr. Spitzer's first big splash. In 2002, he exposed how analysts at major Wall Street firms hyped stocks backed by their firms' investment-banking division. Eventually, 10 top Wall Street firms, without admitting or denying guilt, paid a combined $1.4 billion to settle investigations into conflicts of interest between their investment-banking and analyst-research divisions.

Mr. Spitzer took on the mutual-fund industry, investigating a practice known as "market timing" or "late trading" in which fund companies cut special deals with major investors, allowing them to buy fund shares after the market closed, a practice that raised expenses and lowered returns for other shareholders. Since 2003, 18 firms have reached settlements totaling more than $4 billion in fines, penalties and fee cuts for investors.

Mr. Spitzer then went after major insurance brokers, suing Marsh & McLennan Cos. for alleged bid rigging of contracts. The firm paid $850 million in restitution to its policy holders and Chief Executive Jeffrey Greenberg was forced out of his job. American International Group Inc. agreed to pay $1.6 billion in February to settle improper accounting and bid-rigging charges, which forced the resignation of Mr. Greenberg's father, CEO Maurice "Hank" Greenberg.

Mr. Cuomo shrugged off comparisons between himself and Mr. Spitzer. "You do the best you can to meet the needs of the job at the time," he said.

Write to Paul Davies at paul.davies@wsj.com1

Korean Prosecutors Hit Snags In Inquiry Of Lone Star Deal (WSJ)

By Laura Santini

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093280

South Korean prosecutors are hitting some stumbling blocks in their investigation of Dallas private-equity firm Lone Star Funds and its 2003 acquisition of Korea Exchange Bank, even as a recent assessment by Korean tax authorities almost wiped out the bank's earnings for the latest quarter.

Tuesday, the Seoul Central District Court rejected prosecutors' second request for arrest warrants for Lone Star Vice Chairman Ellis Short, General Counsel Michael Thomson and country head Paul Yoo, citing lack of evidence regarding warrant petitions for the first two men. Regarding Mr. Yoo, who resides in Korea, the court said he didn't pose a flight risk and wasn't likely to destroy evidence gathered by prosecutors.

Then, Thursday, in an apparent sign of frustration, prosecutors emailed a seven-page document to about 3,000 prominent Koreans, including lawyers, academics and journalists, criticizing the court's rebuff as hampering the investigation.

"We are concerned about the court's decision," a spokesman for the prosecutor's office said. Prosecutors say they are preparing a third petition.

Also Thursday, the prosecutors issued a summons to Messrs. Short and Thomson demanding they appear in Seoul Monday. A lawyer for Lone Star described the summons and the mass email as attempts to justify the third application to the court.

It is unlikely that Messrs. Short and Thomson will travel to Korea on short notice, the lawyer said, adding that Mr. Thomson has met with prosecutors in Seoul several times and as recently as last month.

The Supreme Prosecutor's Office is investigating a number of alleged improprieties concerning the firm's acquisition of Korea Exchange Bank. Lone Star has said the firm and its executives are innocent of the charges. The probe began early this year.

Friday, KEB reported that its third-quarter net profit had dropped 90% from a year earlier, to 51.8 billion won ($55.3 million), because of a provision of 247 billion won made to cover back taxes the government says KEB owes. Revenue declined 7.3% to 1.63 trillion won.

Last month Korea's National Tax Service completed a seven-month audit of KEB for fiscal years 2001 through 2004, assessing back taxes of 311 billion won. At issue are loan-loss provisions that KEB carried forward when it merged the credit-card unit in 2004, lowering its tax bill.

The bank defended its accounting method, saying that it will appeal the tax agency's assessment. "We strongly disagree with the most significant elements of the preliminary assessment and have formally filed for a review and appeal," it said. The National Tax Service declined to comment.

--Lina Yoon and Jeongjin Lim contributed to this article.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Supreme Court Will Consider Jud (SLPD)

By Adam Sichko, POST-DISPATCH WASHINGTON BUREAU

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — Mario Claiborne faced a likely prison sentence of 37 to 46 months as he stood before a U.S. District Court judge in March 2005.

That was the recommended range for a prison term under federal sentencing guidelines. But Judge Carol E. Jackson chose to knock nearly two years off the prison term for the 21-year-old St. Louisan, who had pleaded guilty to two cocaine-related offenses.

Claiborne's case now sits before the Supreme Court, which will answer a central question: How does a judge adequately justify a sentence that's well outside the prison term recommended by federal guidelines?

The court agreed last week to hear Claiborne's case, along with a similar case from North Carolina. That case raises the question of how much weight should be given to the advisory guidelines and whether a sentence within the suggested range can automatically be presumed "reasonable."

DOJ_NMG_0093281

Lower courts have divided over those issues since the court decided last year to make the guidelines advisory, not mandatory. While district courts were no longer bound by those guidelines, they were still required to take them into account.

In the 2005 opinion, issued before Claiborne was sentenced, the 5-4 Supreme Court majority said it hoped the changes would help "avoid excessive sentencing disparities" while maintaining a level of flexibility. But two justices in that majority, swing vote Sandra Day O'Connor and then-Chief Justice William Rehnquist, are no longer on the court.

Now, the court will re-examine that decision for the first time and seek to clarify whether a presumption of "reasonableness" given to sentencing guidelines actually implies that they're more "mandatory" than "advisory."

Claiborne had no criminal record before he was arrested twice in 2003, both times for cocaine-related activity. In May, he sold 0.23 grams of cocaine base to an undercover police officer in St. Louis, according to court documents. Almost six months later, he dropped a bag of 5.03 grams of cocaine base as he tried to run from St. Louis police.

The judge concluded that even the minimum recommended sentence of 37 months was "excessive." She cited Claiborne's lack of a prior criminal record, the "small quantity" of cocaine he had possessed and the court's finding that he'd be unlikely to commit similar crimes in the future.

"I don't want to minimize what you did — you committed two serious felony offenses," the judge told Claiborne, according to court transcripts. Just after that, the judge said: "I come to the conclusion that a 37-month sentence would be tantamount to throwing you away."

The Justice Department appealed. Government attorneys disputed the lower court's conclusion that Claiborne was unlikely to repeat a similar offense again, calling it nothing more than "a speculative hope." They noted that Claiborne had been arrested for another felony less than half a year after his first arrest for a similar offense.

"It strains credulity to suggest that there are many drug dealers who deal in such quantities first-time offenders or not who receive sentences as low as 15 months' imprisonment," government attorneys wrote.

In February 2006, the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in St. Louis agreed that the proposed 15-month prison term was far too short and reflected "substantial leniency."

"The sixty percent reduction granted to Claiborne was an extraordinary variance that is not supported by comparably extraordinary circumstances," the appeals court wrote.

The Supreme Court will likely hear the case in spring 2007.

Agent's Article Puts Case At Risk (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

BURLINGTON, Vt. (AP) -- The man accused of killing a University of Vermont student from Arlington, Va., is asking a judge to dismiss the charges because an FBI agent wrote a newspaper opinion piece about the case that referred to the suspect as "evil," a "sexual predator" and a "two-legged hyena."

In the opinion piece, which appeared Wednesday in the weekly newspaper Seven Days, the agent wrote anonymously and described his personal reaction during the search for the man accused of killing 21-year-old Michelle Gardner-Quinn.

David Sleigh, the attorney for suspect Brian Rooney, filed a motion Wednesday after the article appeared. He said the article made it impossible for Mr. Rooney to get a fair trial.

"Agents of the state have deliberately disseminated highly inflammatory and prejudicial comments to the press," Mr. Sleigh said in a three-page motion.

Mr. Rooney has pleaded not guilty to a charge of aggravated murder for the Oct. 7 abduction, assault and killing of Miss Gardner-Quinn after the two met by chance in downtown Burlington.

If convicted, Mr. Rooney, 36, of Richmond, Vt., could be sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole.

"I view this release as an unauthorized release," said Burlington Police Chief Thomas Tremblay.

The story was bylined "An Anonymous Cop," but FBI spokesman Paul Holstein said the author was an FBI agent.

"We're not happy with it, and we'll take steps to ensure it doesn't happen again," Mr. Holstein said. "We take it very seriously when we have an unauthorized media contact, and it also is an issue because we have a policy that we do not discuss ongoing investigations or prosecutions."

DOJ_NMG_0093282

The article describes the agent's response to the search for Miss Gardner-Quinn and then the efforts to find her killer. Mr. Rooney is not named in the article, but it's clear he is the subject.

Mr. Sleigh contends the article, as well as an appearance of a Burlington police officer on a national cable news program, made it impossible for Mr. Rooney to receive a fair trial.

Seven Days co-publisher and editor Pamela Polston said the paper granted the author's request for anonymity after verifying his identity. She defended the paper's decision to publish the piece.

"We stand behind the freedom of expression of every citizen, including that of law-enforcement officers, and, like all newspapers, offer a forum to our readers for that expression," she said.

Mistrial Called In Online Ad Fraud Case (WP)

By Carrie Johnson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

A federal judge declared a mistrial in the fraud case against former PurchasePro Inc. chief executive Charles E. Johnson Jr. after his attorney successfully petitioned to withdraw nearly three weeks into the case, according to court records.

The prosecution of Johnson, an entrepreneur who came under government scrutiny for engaging in questionable last-minute advertising deals with America Online Inc. during the Internet boom, will be separated from the case against three other defendants in the Alexandria trial. Johnson will be tried separately, U.S. District Judge Walter D. Kelley Jr. ruled Thursday.

The exact reasons for the mistrial remained under court seal, although two sources who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the judge's order said they pertained to allegations of misconduct by Johnson, 45, a tough-talking former college basketball player. Johnson, who is known by his nickname "Junior," did not return calls to his cellphone yesterday.

In opening statements to the jury last month, Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles F. Connolly accused Johnson of directing subordinates to destroy e-mail messages, computers and other evidence and suggested that Johnson, whose father was a policeman and former security company operator, had threatened employees who failed to bend to his will.

Johnson denied the charges against him and argued that he put his wealth and his health on the line in an ill-fated attempt to save PurchasePro, his Las Vegas software company.

Johnson's former lawyer, onetime Washington federal prosecutor Preston Burton, yesterday declined to comment, citing ethical strictures. Burton, of the law firm Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe LLP, appeared in court Thursday morning for sealed proceedings related to the mistrial, according to the court docket.

Mark W. Foster, a legal ethics expert at Zuckerman Spaeder LLP in the District, said allowing a defense lawyer to quit midstream is rare, particularly in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, known as the "rocket docket" for its speed and judicial efficiency.

Under Virginia ethics rules, however, defense lawyers are required to come forward if they become aware that their clients intend to break the law or if they possess information that clients have "perpetrated a fraud" on the court by tampering with evidence or other maneuvers.

It remains to be seen what impact the absence of Johnson, who took an active role in his defense, will have on the case. Johnson's actions in the first few months of 2001, as his company struggled to meet analyst targets and as he faced a personal financial crunch, were a centerpiece of the prosecution.

The unusual move left three defendants, former AOL employees Kent D. Wakeford and John P. Tuli and former PurchasePro executive Christopher J. Benyo. The fraud and conspiracy case against them will resume Thursday, when the judge is expected to inform jurors about the mistrial.

Prosecutors contend that PurchasePro and AOL employees worked in tandem to mislead auditors about the nature of a series of ad deals in early 2001. The agreements helped both companies meet revenue expectations at a time when the technology sector had begun to crater.

Anti-Foley Blogger Speaks Out (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093283

The man who first posted the now-resigned congressman's e-mails says he was angry about a culture of corruption.

WASHINGTON — Lane Hudson had no idea he would bring down a congressman when he sat in his living room and turned on his laptop one Sunday morning nearly seven weeks ago.

The former congressional aide, who is gay, had been railing for weeks on his anonymous blog against congressmen who sexually preyed on young people. That day in late September, he decided to post a series of suggestive e-mail exchanges between Rep. Mark Foley and a male former congressional page.

"I thought, 'Here we go. Let's see what happens,' " Hudson, 29, said in a recent interview.

Within days, he had his answer.

Foley, a six-term Florida Republican, resigned in disgrace. And Hudson had launched the biggest Washington sex scandal since Monica S. Lewinsky.

Hudson remained anonymous throughout the fall as the scandal raged and GOP leaders complained of a Democratic conspiracy. Then two weeks ago, he was unmasked by bloggers, who identified him as an organizer for a national gay rights group; Hudson was fired.

'No one did anything'

On the terrace of a hotel in Miami Beach, where he went to escape the political storm, Hudson for the first time talked publicly about his role in the Internet-fueled scandal.

Occasionally defensive and slightly ill at ease, the ambitious South Carolina Democrat fiercely denied a preelection plot. Rather, he said, he was driven by genuine anger at a corrupt environment that protected the powerful on Capitol Hill.

"It's the Washington culture that allowed this to happen," he said. "Now we know the FBI, a host of media organizations, Republican leadership — all were in possession of this same information. And no one did anything about it."

Hudson, who will not say where he got the e-mails, shared them with the Los Angeles Times in July. He posted them anonymously in September, he said, frustrated that the paper was still conducting research and had not published an article.

Hudson's rise to political muckraker and minor Web celebrity did not happen overnight. He has been working phones and knocking on doors for Democratic candidates since his mother took him to volunteer for a relative of his second-grade teacher who was running for the South Carolina Legislature.

"My mother said, Republicans take care of the rich and Democrats take care of everyone else. And we were everyone else," said Hudson, who grew up in the state's cotton country.

Hudson volunteered for candidates through high school and college, including the head of his alma mater. "He was a whirling dervish," recalled Alex Sanders, former president of the College of Charleston, who ran unsuccessfully for the U.S. Senate four years ago.

Hudson moved north in 2001 to join the D.C. staff of Sen. Ernest F. Hollings, South Carolina's last Democratic senator, but he couldn't get to the center of the action in Washington and didn't stay long.

Hudson tried jobs raising money for an Episcopal school in Washington and worked at a bank in Charleston, S.C. In 2004, he went to Wisconsin to work for the unsuccessful presidential campaign of Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.).

"He wants to be involved…. And he really believes in the campaigns he works in," said Liz Patterson, a former South Carolina congresswoman for whom Hudson volunteered in high school. "But the campaigns he has worked on, we haven't won…. I think he's still trying to find his place."

This summer, Hudson moved back to Washington.

Then he acquired the e-mails.

Hudson will say only that the e-mails "weren't hard to come by." Since the scandal broke, it has become clear that numerous media outlets, Republican House leaders, a government reform group and the FBI had them.

Those e-mails — all to a former page from Louisiana — were not sexually explicit. But in one, the congressman asked the boy for a photo and, in another, commented that a different former page was "in really great shape."

Memories triggered

Hudson said he knew immediately that something wasn't right.

DOJ_NMG_0093284

Eleven years earlier, as an 18-year-old congressional intern, Hudson had been approached by Foley at a Capitol Hill bar, Hudson said. The congressman asked Hudson for his e-mail address and started sending him invitations to drinks and meals.

"Honestly, I had forgotten about the whole incident," Hudson said. But this summer, a former page mentioned in a casual conversation that Foley "hit on him all the time."

"It kind of clicked in my head," Hudson said. "I asked another friend who had been a page. I heard the same kind of story, and realized that this guy is just a real creep."

Hudson contacted The Times and, without disclosing his plan to the paper, started an anonymous blog he titled Stop Sex Predators.

"This blog is dedicated to exposing sex predators before they can get to our kids," Hudson announced in his first posting, July 28.

Breathless posts would follow, recapping congressional sex scandals dating to the 1970s and decrying sexual liaisons between interns and older Washington officials.

"The blog was my backup," Hudson said recently. "The blogosphere isn't subject to the same rules as the Washington culture, as the mainstream media."

Just after 11 a.m. Sunday, Sept. 24, Hudson put up the Foley e-mails.

"This is absolutely amazing … ," he wrote that morning. "There must be even more out there. E-mail me … and let me know what we should do!!!!"

By that Wednesday, Wonkette, a popular Washington gossip site, had linked to Hudson's blog. On Thursday, ABC News posted an article on its website.

And Friday, after the network confronted Foley with a series of sexually explicit instant messages between the lawmaker and a different former page, Foley resigned.

"Wow!" Hudson titled a posting that night. In it, he said: "This is a good start…. Maybe we can keep stopping them!!!!!"

Scary response

But the sense of triumph faded as Hudson was deluged with e-mails from journalists and others trying to find out who he was and what he knew.

"Thank you for your interest," he said in a posting a few days after Foley's resignation, "but if you were doing your job to begin with, Mark Foley would have been exposed a long time ago…. I'm nobody that anybody should care about. So, please, go about your day as if I don't exist."

Hudson said he got warnings that he should watch his back. "I kind of got scared," he said.

He scaled back his Internet postings.

And then someone found him out.

Tracking Hudson's Internet profile, a blogger traced him to Human Rights Campaign, a leading national gay political organization.

On Oct. 25, the group fired him. Vice President of Programs David M. Smith praised Hudson's work but said he had violated policy by using a Human Rights Campaign computer to work on his blog.

Hudson flew to New York and then to Miami.

"You know, I had no interest in being public about this," he said last weekend in Miami Beach.

"This was about exposing someone who was a sexual predator. And that's it.

"It's like it's accepted to come to D.C. and have high ideals and believe in something and then have it go away," he continued. "This whole Washington culture allows that to happen. It's not only accepted, it's expected that people become callous and lose their ideals and their focus. And that makes me mad."

Hudson said he was apprehensive about what would happen next.

But he has few regrets. "I did the right thing," he said.

And by election night, he was back in Washington to celebrate the Democratic victories.

noam.levey@latimes.com

DOJ_NMG_0093285

4 Plead Guilty In Wave Of Eco-sabotage (OREG)

By Bryan Denson, The Oregonian

The Oregonian, November 11, 2006

Federal court - An Ashland man admits to conspiracy and arson as part of a radical environmental movement

EUGENE -- For 20 years he denied involvement in eco-sabotage while supporting those who took part. He extolled the virtues of firebombs while serving as a volunteer firefighter. But on Thursday, Jonathan Paul stood before a federal judge and declared himself guilty of arson and conspiracy.

The Ashland resident, 40, a leading voice in the nation's radical movement to protect whales, wild horses and wilderness areas, was one of four people to plead guilty to conspiracy for their roles in a five-year campaign of sabotage in Oregon, Washington, California, Wyoming and Colorado.

The four were snagged by the largest investigation of eco-sabotage in U.S. history, an 18-crime inquiry into arsons and vandalism the government dubbed "Operation Backfire." Federal prosecutors have charged 13 men and women in Oregon with crimes, most committed on behalf of the Animal Liberation Front and Earth Liberation Front. The two organizations are characterized by the FBI as the nation's leading domestic terrorist threats.

Thursday's pleas by Paul, Daniel G. McGowan of New York and Nathan F. Block and Joyanna L. Zacher, both of Olympia, brought the number of convictions in Oregon to 10, with two others convicted outside Oregon for related crimes. Four others remain fugitives.

At a press conference in Portland, U.S. Attorney Karin Immergut and Robert Jordan, the FBI's special agent in charge for Oregon, declared victory.

"These people claimed they did what they did to protect the environment," Jordan said. "Along the way, they destroyed more than $30 million worth of resources. They spent year after year using violence to try to intimidate you and your government into their twisted way of thinking."

The four defendants in Thursday's hearing pleaded guilty in an agreement with prosecutors, who recommended shorter prison sentences than they were facing. McGowan, Block and Zacher faced 20 years to life and Paul faced as long as 30 years, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Peifer.

McGowan, 32, sobbing before U.S. District Judge Ann Aiken as he pleaded guilty to arson, said his actions were not the work of a terrorist, but an idealistic young man who cared deeply about saving forests. Block and Zacher pleaded guilty to multiple counts of arson.

The government recommended a sentence of eight years for McGowan, Block and Zacher, and five years for Paul. They are likely to be sentenced early next spring, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Kirk A. Engdall in Eugene.

Defense lawyers had filed court papers seeking to determine whether the government had used warrantless wiretaps to collect evidence against their clients. But they dropped their request and said that helped them strike their plea deals, a claim dismissed by the government.

"There's absolutely no basis for the claim that the NSA (National Security Agency) was involved in this case in any way," said Peifer.

The Jonathan Christopher Mark Paul who sat in court Thursday looked like a milder, middle-aged version of the brash young man who spoke up for the ALF and ELF in an interview with The Oregonian in late spring of 1999.

He was a seasoned activist then, comfortable answering questions on his lawn near Williams in Southern Oregon. Authorities had charged him with a 1986 Animal Liberation Front raid on a University of Oregon lab, a charge dismissed.

Paul lived in a redwood rental home in Northern California, where he broke bread with some of the stars of the radical environmental movement. He was an animal-rights activist who helped unify the so-called bunny huggers and tree huggers. They became fundamentalists in a belief that humans had no business plundering living things for profit.

Paul morphed into a public voice against logging and whaling, denying in his 1999 interviews with The Oregonian that he had taken part in underground eco-sabotage.

Six years passed before the feds closed in. They indicted Paul and a dozen others for their roles in the Operation Backfire crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0093286

The indictment accused Paul and others of performing surveillance on Redmond's Cavel West slaughterhouse in 1997, preparing incendiaries, checking their two-way radios and then planting their firebombs for the conflagration that followed.

The Animal Liberation Front later claimed responsibility for burning down the "Cavel West Horse Murdering Plant," claiming success because the company did not reopen.

In his interview nearly two years later with The Oregonian, Paul mentioned the Cavel West arson as a good example of economic sabotage. "Complete success," he said.

On Thursday, after his court appearance, Paul stood atop the steps of Eugene's new federal courthouse with co-defendant McGowan and a gang of friends and supporters. The men let others speak for them.

One of those was Paul's actress sister, former "Baywatch" TV star Alexandra Paul. She described her brother as a man who infiltrated and exposed the mink industry, liberated suffering lab animals, and who got between whales and the men who hunted them.

Aimee Green of The Oregonian staff contributed to this report. Bryan Denson: 503-294-7614; bryandenson@news.oregonian.com.

4 More Plead Guilty In Ecosabotage Cases; Trial May Be Avoided (SEATIMES)

By Hal Bernton, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, November 11, 2006

PORTLAND — Four more people Thursday pleaded guilty to arson crimes on behalf of the Earth Liberation Front and Animal Liberation Front, raising the possibility that the Justice Department's largest-ever prosecution of ecosabotage will wrap up without a trial.

Since the first arrests in December, the federal government in Washington and Oregon has obtained 12 guilty pleas from men and women who participated in more than 20 arsons and other acts of sabotage in six states. Four other alleged participants have fled the country, including former Microsoft computer-programmer Joseph Dibee, whom federal officials believe has taken refuge in Syria.

Only one defendant still is preparing for a trial. She is Briana Waters, a California violin teacher accused of acting as a lookout in the 2001 arson that destroyed the University of Washington Urban Horticulture Center.

The most recent pleas unfolded Thursday in U.S. District Court in Eugene. They prompted Robert Jordan, FBI special agent in charge for Oregon, to declare victory in a decadelong effort to track down and prosecute the stealthy arsonists of the ELF and ALF.

Calling themselves "the family," cell members fabricated bombs in clean rooms without leaving behind telltale evidence and used hand signals and code words to maintain secrecy. Between 1996 and 2001, various members of the group launched attacks against federal, university and private property that caused some $30 million worth of damage.

"Instead of using reason and logic, they used fire bombs and destruction. Instead of using peaceful, lawful methods they used fears and threats," Jordan said in Portland.

The guilty pleas reflect the strength of the government's evidence, which was bolstered by extensive informants' testimony. The pleas also reflect the harsh consequences should defendants risk a trial and end up being convicted.

Under mandatory minimum sentences approved by Congress, judges would have been required to send most of the defendants to prison for at least 30 years, and some risked life imprisonment for use of firebombs.

Two of the defendants who pleaded guilty in Eugene court are Washington residents. Joyanna L. Zarcher, 28, and Nathan F. Block, 25, who lived together in Olympia before their arrests earlier this year. The government recommended that each serve eight years in prison.

Jonathan Paul, a high-profile Northwest environmental activist who joined in the 1999 protests against the Makah whaling hunt, also entered a guilty plea Thursday.

Paul joined in the July 21, 1997, arson at the Cavel West Horse Meatpacking Plant in Redmond, Ore. The government recommended that he serve five years in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0093287

In a statement Thursday, Paul said that his crime was in response to the slaughter of wild horses — "the personification of the American spirit." As Paul viewed the flames, he realized that "fire was an unacceptable means to an end, no matter how compelling," according to the statement.

Paul now lives in southern Oregon, where he has been a volunteer firefighter.

Daniel McGowan, another defendant, spoke of his crimes as he entered his plea.

"I hope you will see that my actions were not those of a terrorist, but of a concerned young person who was deeply troubled by the destruction of Oregon's beautiful old-growth forests and the dangers of genetically modified trees," McGowan, 32, of New York City, said in a tearful statement in court. "... I realized that burning things down did not fit with my visions or belief about how to create a better world. So I stopped committing these crimes."

McGowan's recommended sentence is eight years.

A sentencing date for the defendants has not been set.

The four plea agreements entered Thursday differed in one substantial way from earlier plea agreements: These defendants acknowledged their crimes. But unlike defendants involved in earlier plea agreements, they did not pledge to provide information to assist in prosecuting other individuals, according to Amanda Lee, a Seattle attorney representing McGowan.

These agreements were reached about two months after defendants, in court motions, demanded to know whether warrantless wiretaps by the National Security Agency were used against them.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Kirk Engdall said surveillance was not a factor. Defense attorney Amanda Lee of Seattle said the timing of the plea agreement led her to believe it was.

Engdall and other state, federal and Eugene city officials say that persistence and interagency cooperation were key to cracking the case. They also enlisted the aid of an early informant, Jake Ferguson, who secretly tape-recorded conversations with others.

Though Ferguson has acknowledged participation in arsons, he has not been charged. On Thursday, U.S. Attorney Karin Immergut said, "We are still considering what charges to bring, and what to do with him."

Material from The Associated Press is included in this report.

Four More Guilty In String Of Arsons (ERG)

By Bill Bishop And David Steves, The Register-Guard

Eugene Register-Guard, November 10, 2006

The final four defendants awaiting trial for conspiring in arsons and sabotage by radical environmental groups took plea deals Thursday in federal court in Eugene, bringing a declaration of victory among law enforcement agencies that worked a decade to dismantle the secretive cell.

In public statements, two of the defendants expressed their regret for crimes they now consider misguided deeds done out of deep devotion to environmental causes.

The four are among 13 defendants in "Operation Backfire," the name investigators gave to their effort to solve a score of arsons over five years in six states that did an estimated $30 million in damage. Most of the arsons were claimed by the shadowy Environmental Liberation Front and Animal Liberation Front.

With Thursday's court action, all defendants have pleaded guilty except three who remain fugitives and are believed to be out of the country.

Under the plea deals, three of the defendants - Daniel Gerard McGowan, 32; Nathan Fraser Block, 25; and Joyanna Zacher, 28 - may get eight-year prison terms. The fourth, Jonathan Christopher Mark Paul, 40, may get a five-year term. All are free to argue for shorter terms at their sentencing hearings, which have not yet been scheduled.

advertisement

Six co-defendants earlier took plea deals that will bring sentences ranging from just over three years to just under 16 years. They also agreed to cooperate in the investigation.

McGowan admitted taking part in 2001 fires at the Superior Lumber Co. in Glendale and at Jefferson Poplar Farm in Clatskanie. Block and Zacher admitted their roles in 2001 in burning 35 vehicles at the former Joe Romania Chevrolet Truck Center in Eugene and in the fire at Jefferson Poplar Farm.

Paul admitted helping to destroy the Cavel West Horse Meatpacking plant in Redmond in 1997.

Thursday's plea deals, unlike the six earlier ones, do not require the defendants to testify against each other or against other co-conspirators - a condition the four defendants demanded in a joint settlement offer made to the government.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Kirk Engdall said the government accepted the no-testimony proposal in order to settle the case. But the defendants' demand carried a price. The government is recommending the four get proportionately longer sentences than the six co-defendants who agreed to cooperate fully, he said.

While the case is all but over, more arrests are possible, Engdall said.

"We believe we have basically disassembled the Northwest cell of ELF/ALF arsonists," Engdall said. "There may be other arrests."

Within moments of the guilty pleas in Eugene, U.S. Attorney Karin Immergut led seven other local, state and federal law-enforcement officials into a press conference in Portland's federal courthouse.

Immergut praised the hard work and cooperation of the FBI; Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; Eugene Police; Lane County sheriff's office; Bureau of Land Management; U.S. Forest Service; Oregon State Police and the state Department of Justice.

"They were relentless, persistent, thorough and dogged," she said. "They got the job done."

Immergut called the four guilty pleas the conclusion of "the largest case of domestic terrorism in United States history," later amending that to say it was the largest case of eco-terrorism.

Environmental activists have criticized the use of the "terrorism" label against perpetrators of property crimes, saying the label unfairly taints the legal efforts of legitimate activist groups and government dissidents. U.S. District Judge Ann Aiken will decide whether to apply harsher sentences under the federal terrorism statute when the defendants are sentenced.

Robert Jordan, the FBI's special agent in charge in Oregon, said the conspirators deserve the punishment awaiting them.

Government Claims Victory Over Ecoterrorism Outfit (AP)

By Jeff Barnard

AP, November 11, 2006

EUGENE, Ore. -- Five years ago a special ecoterrorism task force was stymied by a string of firebombings that caused some $30 million in damage to western ranger stations, genetic engineering facilities, a truck dealership, a ski resort, wild horse corrals and lumber mills.

On Thursday, federal authorities declared they had destroyed the shadowy Earth Liberation Front and Animal Liberation Front, which claimed responsibility for the largest case of ecoterrorism in U.S. history.

Four more people pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to conspiracy and arson charges stemming from firebombings in Oregon.

That brought to 12 -- 10 in Oregon and two in Washington -- the number of people headed for prison as part of the local, state and federal investigation known as Operation Backfire that was aided by an informant with a wire.

Three suspects remain fugitives. Prescott, Ariz., bookstore owner William C. Rodgers, described as the leader of the Eugene-based cell known as The Family, committed suicide in jail.

"The pleas of these individuals today together with (earlier guilty pleas) have effectively dismantled the Northwest cells of the organizations operating loosely under the mantles of ALF and ELF," U.S. Attorney Karin Immergut said in Portland.

"Today we can declare victory in that fight," added Robert Jordan, FBI special agent in charge for Oregon.

The firebombings attributed to The Family stopped after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and two of the four pleading guilty Thursday said they quit the attacks because they realized that was the wrong way to protect animals and the environment.

"I hope you will see that my actions were not those of a terrorist, but of a concerned young person who was deeply troubled by the destruction of Oregon's beautiful old-growth forests and the dangers of genetically modified trees," Daniel G. McGowan,

DOJ_NMG_0093289

32, of New York City said in a tearful statement read in court. "After taking part in these two actions, I realized that burning things down did not fit with my visions or belief about how to create a better world. So I stopped committing these crimes."

After years of finding little more than melted five-gallon buckets and the residue of diesel fuel, investigators got a break in 2002 when one of the people involved in firebombing a logging company and a gravel pit in 2001 told his girlfriend, and she told her father, a state fire marshal.

Three people were convicted, and the alleged leader of that group, Michael "Tre Arrow" Scarpitti, is being held in Victoria, British Columbia, on a shoplifting charge, fighting extradition.

In 2005, the task force known as Operation Backfire adopted a cold case approach and landed an informant, unindicted co-conspirator Jacob Fergusen of Eugene, who wore a hidden recording device as he traveled the country talking with his old friends, who had disbanded.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven Peifer said in Portland that the cell was tough to crack, because the members assembled their bombs in clean rooms, leaving behind no fingerprints or even DNA evidence, seldom talked to each other, and used code words and even hand signals.

The four in court Thursday were Joyanna L. Zarcher, 28, and Nathan F. Block, 25, both of Olympia, Wash.; Jonathan Christopher Mark Paul, 40, of Ashland, and McGowan.

They were headed for trial on charges carrying life sentences when the plea agreement was announced, two months after they demanded to know whether warrantless wiretaps by the National Security Agency were used against them. Their guilty pleas came with recommended sentences of five to eight years in prison.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Kirk Engdall denied NSA surveillance was a factor in the investigation or the plea agreement, but defense attorney Amanda Lee of Seattle said the timing of the plea agreement led her to believe it was.

She said the defendants were happy they would not have to testify against others.

Sentencing is not expected until spring, but prosecutors recommended eight years in prison for Block, Zacher and McGowan, the son of a New York transit policeman who was working for a nonprofit law firm helping abused women when he was arrested in New York.

Because he had taken part in only one firebombing, Paul's recommended sentence was five years.

McGowan pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit arson and topple a high-voltage electric tower in Central Oregon in December 1999, serving as lookout for the 2001 firebombing of the Superior Lumber Co. office in Glendale, and attempted arson and arson at the Jefferson Poplar Farm in Clatskanie in 2001.

Block and Zacher both pleaded guilty to the conspiracy charge, setting fire to SUVs at the Romania Chevrolet Truck Center in Eugene in 2001 and attempted arson and arson at the tree farm. Prosecutors recommended a sentence of eight years for each.

Paul, an independently wealthy animal rights activist and volunteer firefighter, pleaded guilty to conspiracy and the 1997 firebombing of the Cavel West horse slaughterhouse in Redmond.

His sister, actress Alexandra Paul, read a statement outside the courthouse saying Paul had fought against mink farms, laboratory testing of animals, and Indian whale hunting, and he had always taken responsibility for his actions.

"When Mr. Paul saw the flames engulf the Cavel West slaughterhouse in Redmond, Ore., he realized that fire was an unacceptable means to an end, no matter how compelling," she said.

Paul Pleads Guilty To Eco-arson (MEDMT)

Medford Mail Tribune, November 11, 2006

Greensprings man calls it 'unacceptable means to an end'; 3 others admit guilt

EUGENE — Greensprings resident Jonathan Paul pleaded guilty Thursday to arson and conspiracy to commit arson in a 1997 firebombing of a horse slaughterhouse in Redmond.

Paul, 40, also repudiated violence as a way to protect the environment or animals during a plea hearing with three other defendants in the new U.S. District Court here. All four had been arrested in the federal government's "Operation Backfire" investigation of Animal Liberation Front and Earth Liberation Front activities beginning in fall 1996 and continuing through fall 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0093290

A five-year sentence has been recommended for Paul, whom prosecutors say was a member of the ALF at the time the slaughterhouse was destroyed by fire on July 21, 1997. The plant, which suffered more than $1 million in damage, was not rebuilt.

The arson charge carries a potential maximum sentence of up to 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

After the hearing, Paul's sister, actress Alexandra Paul, read a statement for the family.

"When Mr. Paul saw the flames engulf the Cavel West slaughterhouse in Redmond, he realized that fire was an unacceptable means to an end, no matter how compelling," she said. "He immediately abandoned arson as a valid way of making the mistreatment of animals unprofitable."

She also noted that her brother, a volunteer firefighter, had a legacy of personal responsibility that included working to stop cruelty to animals as well as taking action to protect the environment. She would not take questions.

During a break in the hearing, Jonathan Paul declined to talk to the Mail Tribune. "Talk to my lawyer," he said.

Attorney Marc Blackman of Portland was equally closemouthed after the hearing. "I have no idea how it will turn out," he said of Paul's sentencing, which is expected in the spring.

In addition to Paul, the other three defendants in court Thursday included Daniel McGowan, 32, of New York City, and Nathan Block, 25, and Joyanna Zarcher, 28, both of Olympia, Wash.

An eight-year sentence has been recommended for McGowan, who was working for a nonprofit law firm helping abused women when he was arrested in New York. He pleaded guilty to serving as a lookout for the 2001 firebombing of the Superior Lumber Co. office in Glendale; conspiracy to commit arson and topple a high-voltage electrical tower in Central Oregon in late 1999; and attempted arson and arson at the Jefferson Poplar Farm in Clatskanie in 2001.

McGowan, who made a statement before Judge Ann Aiken, said he regretted the actions that brought him to court but said he remained committed to protecting the environment.

Block and Zarcher both pleaded guilty to a conspiracy charge related to setting fire to SUVs at the Romania Chevrolet Truck Center in Eugene in 2001 and attempted arson and arson at the tree farm that year. Like McGowan, they are facing the recommended sentence of eight years.

"The pleas of these individuals today, together with (earlier guilty pleas) have effectively dismantled the Northwest cells of the organizations operating loosely under the mantles of ALF and ELF," declared U.S. Attorney Karin Immergut during a press conference in Portland, according to The Associated Press.

"Today we can declare victory in that fight," said Robert Jordan, FBI special agent in charge for Oregon.

With Thursday's hearing, a dozen alleged ALF or ELF defendants have now pleaded guilty to conspiracy and arson charges in the investigation, which involved cases in Oregon, Washington, California, Wyoming and Colorado.

In Eugene, the small courtroom was packed with supporters of the four defendants.

"We're here to show moral support for Jonathan," said one, who would not give his name. "He did the wrong thing but his heart is in the right place."

Before the plea bargain agreement was announced this week, all four defendants had been scheduled for trials on charges that could have carried life sentences. Two months ago, their defense attorneys had asked the federal government whether warrantless wiretaps by the National Security Agency had been used against the defendants.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Kirk Engdall denied the NSA surveillance was a factor in the investigation or the plea agreement, according to the AP. However, Amanda Lee, an attorney representing McGowan, said Thursday she believed it was a factor, given the timing of the plea agreements. She noted the four defendants did not testify against each other as part of the plea.

Gun Collector Fails Polygraph Over Second Barrel Purchase (SEATIMES)

The Seattle Times, November 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093291

A Bellevue gun collector questioned in the 2001 slaying of Seattle federal prosecutor Thomas Wales has failed an FBI polygraph test about whether he owned two gun barrels that were the same type as the one used in the shooting, his lawyer said Thursday.

Albert Kwan agreed to the polygraph test last month after he was indicted and jailed in a different case for illegal possession of a machine gun.

His lawyer, Joseph Conte, of Washington, D.C., revealed the test result at a Thursday court hearing.

At the hearing, U.S. District Judge Thomas Zilly released Kwan from custody on the condition that Kwan post a $250,000 bond. Zilly also ordered Kwan to wear a location monitor, not possess firearms, and surrender his Hong Kong, British and U.S. passports.

Previously, Kwan refused four times to testify before the grand jury investigating the Wales killing, invoking his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

FBI agents do not believe Kwan shot Wales, but want to know if he provided the gun barrel to someone who did.

Slugs and shell casings from the Wales crime scene show that the weapon was an Eastern European handgun called a Makarov that was fitted with a replacement barrel, the FBI said. Wales was shot to death in his Queen Anne home on Oct. 11, 2001.

FBI agents have pressed Kwan about his apparent purchase of two Makarov replacement barrels.

Kwan's lawyers have said he only recalls buying one barrel, which he turned over to the FBI and which has been ruled out in the crime.

But the FBI has receipts showing Kwan bought two in 1996 from the Minnesota company that makes them, according to a recent affidavit by Special Agent Ron Bone, lead investigator in the Wales case.

The lead suspect in the homicide is a commercial airline pilot formerly of Bellevue who now lives in Snohomish. Wales had prosecuted the pilot for fraud, but charges eventually were dropped.

Before the pilot moved from Bellevue, he lived only several miles from Kwan.

After Thursday's hearing, Conte said federal investigators told him that Kwan had failed the polygraph. Conte said he wants an independent polygraph examiner to review the government's test.

"It's our opinion that if you can't help the government, then they say you're not telling the truth," the lawyer said.

Polygraph evidence is generally not admissible in criminal cases because results are not considered reliable enough. Steven Clymer, the special prosecutor assigned to the Wales investigation, declined to comment.

Agents have tried to trace the roughly 3,500 barrels sold in the U.S. by the Minnesota company before Wales was killed. The FBI said 69 such barrels had been shipped to customers within 50 miles of the Queen Anne homicide scene.

Agents have not been able to locate and test about 30 of those barrels, including the one they are pressing Kwan about.

When Kwan was first contacted by the FBI in August 2003, he evaded agents, ignored a subpoena and provided misleading information about his travel and whereabouts, according to agent Bone's affidavit.

Kwan was arrested as a material witness in January 2005 at Seattle-Tacoma International Airport as he prepared to travel to China, Bone wrote.

The gun collector was held for 23 days during which agents searched his Bellevue home. There they found hundreds of legal firearms, including several machine guns. Federal agents seized an M-14 assault rifle they allege was an unlicensed machine gun.

Kwan was indicted in September on the gun charge. A federal magistrate ordered that Kwan be kept in custody as a flight risk and a potential danger to the community.

Kwan's attorneys asserted that authorities brought the charge to try to pressure Kwan into cooperating with the Wales probe.

Man Once Held In Wales Killing Fails Polygraph (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

SEATTLE (AP) -- A Bellevue gun collector failed an FBI polygraph test about whether he owned two gun barrels like those used to kill federal prosecutor Thomas Wales, his lawyer says.

Albert K. Kwan has been a person of interest in the unsolved 2001 slaying because sales records indicate he purchased the two gun barrels from a Minnesota company back in the mid-1990s. While prosecutors apparently do not believe Kwan shot Wales, they are interested in knowing if he provided a gun barrel to the person who did.

Kwan has only provided one Makarov pistol replacement barrel to investigators, maintaining he doesn't remember ever purchasing a second one. He agreed to take a polygraph test last month after he was indicted on an unrelated charge of illegal machine gun possession.

After a U.S. District Court hearing Thursday, Kwan's lawyer, Joseph Conte, told The Seattle time that according to federal investigators, Kwan failed the polygraph. Conte said he wants an independent polygraph examiner to review the government's test.

"It's our opinion that if you can't help the government, then they say you're not telling the truth," the lawyer said.

At the hearing, Judge Thomas Zilly said he would release Kwan from custody on the machine gun charge as long as he posts a $250,000 bond, wears a location monitor, does not possess firearms, and surrenders his Hong Kong, British and U.S. passports.

Previously, Kwan refused four times to testify before the grand jury investigating the killing of Wales, invoking his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

The only publicly identified suspect in the Wales killing is a commercial airline pilot, formerly of Bellevue and now of Snohomish, whom Wales had prosecuted in a fraud case. When Wales was killed, the pilot lived just a few miles from Kwan. Kwan's lawyers have said they do not believe Kwan and the pilot ever met; the pilot's lawyer insists he's innocent.

Former LAPD Spokesman Indicted On Sex Charges (LAT)

From A Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

Former Los Angeles police spokesman Roderick "Rod" Bernsen was indicted Thursday on two felony counts of "abusive sexual contact" stemming from an alleged incident with two 12-year-old boys in a cruise ship sauna.

Bernsen, 58, also a former Fox 11 news reporter, was arrested Oct. 7 after the boys told the FBI that he had tried to talk with them about sex and then touched one boy's penis with his toe and spanked another's bare buttocks, according to an affidavit.

If convicted, he faces up to two years in prison, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney said.

Bernsen's attorney, Alan Rubin, said his client was innocent. "He is a good guy, a decent guy, and he will defend against these charges," he said.

Suit Links Ovitz To Pellicano Case (LAT)

By Andrew Blankstein And Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 10, 2006

The former Hollywood agent's attorney denies ex-reporter's allegation that he took part in a plan to threaten her.

A former Los Angeles Times reporter has alleged in a civil lawsuit that onetime Hollywood power broker Michael Ovitz participated with indicted private investigator Anthony Pellicano and others to intimidate and threaten her.

The former reporter, Anita M. Busch, originally filed a civil suit in 2004 that identified Pellicano, several of his associates and numerous unnamed defendants as responsible for an alleged campaign of "threats, intimidation, harassment and invasion of privacy for the purpose of deterring … and retaliating against [Busch] for investigating and writing articles about the entertainment business."

An amendment to the civil complaint, which was filed Monday in Los Angeles County Superior Court, states that one of those unnamed defendants — identified earlier as "Doe 4" — is Ovitz, a co-founder of one of Hollywood's best known talent agencies, Creative Artists Agency.

Other than naming Ovitz, Busch's filing details no alleged actions by Ovitz.

The suit says only that he was one of dozens of defendants who were involved in "directing, organizing, commanding, employing and/or hiring individuals to engage in the unlawful and tortious conduct."

Busch and her attorney, Ian Herzog, could not be reached for comment.

In a brief statement, Ovitz's attorney, James Ellis, said: "My client had nothing to do with this. It's unfortunate that Ms. Busch has chosen to involve him in this matter."

Ovitz previously has acknowledged that his outside law firm hired Pellicano to assist in the defense of three lawsuits filed in 2002 against Artist Management Group, a second talent agency established by Ovitz. Pellicano was paid $75,000 for that work.

After helping found Creative Artists Agency, Ovitz became president of Walt Disney Co. under then-Chief Executive Michael Eisner. But the two had a falling out, and the former talent agent was fired after 15 months.

In the late 1990s, Ovitz formed Artists Management Group, which aimed to revolutionize Hollywood by representing talent and producing a broad slate of TV and movie projects while distributing content in innovative ways. Ovitz no longer works as a talent agent.

Federal authorities would not comment on the latest development in the civil lawsuit.

One former assistant U.S. attorney who is not involved in the case said the decision by Busch and her attorney to name Ovitz could indicate that they had recently obtained new information as part of their lawsuit, either from federal prosecutors or other potential witnesses.

"Practically speaking, it means they are prepared to take him on and put the financial resources behind a lawsuit against a person with substantial means to defend himself," said the former federal prosecutor, who declined to be identified because of the continuing probe.

Ellis disagreed. "That's pretty rampant speculation, and I fundamentally disagree with its premise," he said. "I'm certainly unaware that my client's status in this case has changed at all over the past few years."

Ovitz's name first surfaced in connection with the Busch case in February, when attorneys for Busch subpoenaed him to provide a sworn deposition in the civil case.

Busch's suit, which was filed nearly two years before the indictment of Pellicano in February, accused the former private eye and others of tracking down and threatening the reporter over unspecified stories about the entertainment business.

It also accused former Los Angeles police Sgt. Mark Arneson of illegally accessing confidential police databases to give Pellicano confidential background information about her. Arneson also has been indicted and, like Pellicano and five others, is awaiting trial next year.

The indictment states that Arneson, at Pellicano's behest, unlawfully ran Busch's name through confidential law enforcement databases in the spring of 2002, when Busch and former New York Times reporter Bernard Weinraub were reporting and writing stories for the New York Times about Ovitz.

The timing also coincided with a hard-hitting Vanity Fair piece about the Hollywood power broker that mentioned Busch, Weinraub and two Creative Artists Agency executives: Bryan Lourd and Kevin Huvane. They were former Ovitz proteges but had a high-profile split with him that was detailed in the magazine.

The federal indictment against Pellicano names the two reporters and the two CAA executives as victims of illegal background checks by the private eye and other defendants.

According to the indictment, Busch had her records illegally accessed on May 16, 2002, less than a month before she found a fish with a rose in its mouth and a note reading "Stop" on the windshield of her car.

Federal prosecutors have accused Pellicano, Arneson and Rayford Earl Turner, a former employee of SBC and Pacific Bell, of repeatedly violating the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act by establishing a criminal "enterprise" that enhanced Pellicano's business.

The indictment describes Pellicano as the conspiracy's organizer and leader, and charges that the trio used wiretaps, protected computers, bribery, identity theft and obstruction to enhance the Hollywood private eye's reputation and ongoing relationship with "lucrative clients, including entertainment celebrities and executives, attorneys and law firms."

The intent of obtaining the potentially scandalous information, authorities say, was so that Pellicano's clients could scare off a lawsuit or gain the upper hand in litigation.

Nearly a dozen people — among them actors Sylvester Stallone and Keith Carradine — allegedly were the targets of wiretaps conducted by Pellicano and the others between August 2000 and November 2002, the federal indictment alleges.

andrew.blankstein@

latimes.com
greg.krikorian@latimes.com

Microsoft Targets Piracy (FT)

By Joe Leahy In Mumbai

Financial Times, November 11, 2006

Microsoft needs to do more to crack the consumer market in developing countries, with piracy and affordability holding back sales in regions ranging from Asia and eastern Europe to Latin America, its chief executive told the FT.

Steve Ballmer said the group had launched initiatives such as XP StarterEdition, a Windows software package with reduced features, and Flexgo, a pay-as-you-go PC, but these had not yet signficantly penetrated the middle-income markets in countries such as India and China.

"On a per-cent basis, it [emerging markets] is the most rapidly growing part of our business but it's still a relatively small percentage. We have two issues: number one is where are the PCs and number two is piracy rates are also high in so-called emerging markets," Mr Ballmer said in an interview in Mumbai.

Microsoft declined to provide a breakdown of its revenue by region or product. But Mr Ballmer, in Mumbai on a three-day visit to India, said emerging markets globally accounted for roughly 20 per cent of its total business, excluding software sales to hardware vendors, Xbox and other revenue streams such as advertising.

Total revenue in the year ended June was $44.282bn. While this was growing rapidly, the company could do better to reach middle-income consumers in developing countries. The company has sold only about 1m copies of Windows XP Starter since it was first piloted in 2004, most of these through government-sponsored programmes.

"XP Starter takes us a small way down the road, [but] we've got more to do," Mr Ballmer said. "Not just ourselves - when you think of what it takes to deliver the experience, it takes hardware, it takes software, it takes internet connectivity."

He cast doubt on whether a US$100 laptop being developed by the Massachussetts Institute of Technology for low-income children, which uses a wind-up crank arm to generate power rather than a battery, would be any more successful in penetrating low-end markets. There were already computers on the market in India for US$200 with built-in powerpacks. Connecting to the internet was the most expensive part of owning a PC.

"Even in India, you will pay more than US$100 a year to connect yourself to the internet," Mr Ballmer said.

Microsoft was working on new initiatives to "re-engineer" the computing experience, Mr Ballmer said. He declined to elaborate on most of them but said one proposal was a plan to connect mobile phones that had their own micro-processors to keyboards and screens, using them as a computing platform.

Dion Wiggins, analyst with Gartner in Hong Kong, said Microsoft has tended to concentrate its innovation at the top end of the market, leaving behind the mass, lower end consumers.

But Starter Edition, while it still needed some improvements - for instance, it currently does not allow users to upgrade to full Windows - had made great strides. He said he expected Microsoft to begin pushing it much harder a few months after it launched Vista, its new operating system, early next year.

"Windows Starter Edition is now a relatively mature product and ready for bigger things," Mr Wiggins said.

CIVIL LAW:

U.S. Settles Civil Case Against British Online Gambling Company BetOnSports (FINDLAW/AP)

By Christopher Leonard, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 11, 2006

(AP) - ST. LOUIS-U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway reached a settlement with online gambling company BetOnSports PLC that permanently bars the London-based company from accepting any bets from the United States.

The lawsuit has been closely watched by the online gambling industry, which generates about $6 billion (â,¬4.7 billion) annually in the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0093295

The settlement announced Thursday ends a massive civil case Hanaway filed this summer. It does not affect a criminal case still pending against several BetOnSports employees, including Chief Executive David Carruthers, who remains under house arrest in a St. Louis suburb.

Carruthers faces 22 counts of fraud and racketeering charges. His case is scheduled to go to trial early next year. BetOnSports fired him soon after he was arrested in July.

Hanaway spokeswoman Jan Diltz said the U.S. Attorney's Office would not comment on the civil settlement because the criminal case is ongoing.

BetOnSports said in a statement that it did not admit wrongdoing by entering the settlement.

Spokesman Kevin Smith said about 20 percent of the company's revenue came from other countries, most of them in Asia.

"That will be the total focus of the company now," he said.

The settlement requires BetOnSports to open a toll-free telephone service to inform bettors how they can reclaim wagers pending before the suit was filed.

Smith said the hot line should be running within a week. He said he did not know how BetOnSports planned to refund customers.

BetOnSports must also take out an advertisement in a major newspaper telling customers that Internet gambling is illegal in the United States and the company will no longer take their bets. It must post similar messages on its Web sites.

The settlement is not likely to have a huge effect on the Internet gambling industry, said Nelson Rose, a professor at Whittier College of Law and an expert on Internet gambling.

Rose said companies paid more attention to the recent passage of the Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act, which President George W. Bush signed into law Oct. 13. The act cracks down on banks that transfer bets placed on the Internet.

Rose said passage of the act forced Internet gambling companies to decide whether they want to risk doing business in the United States.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Feds Probe Care At Ore. Mental Hospital (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

PORTLAND, Ore. -- Federal investigators are looking into patient care at the hospital made famous in the movie "One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest," where there have been reports of abuse, short staffing and overcrowding.

The Oregon State Hospital is one of the oldest and most dilapidated state mental institutions in the nation. The movie was filmed there in 1975.

Justice Department officials are expected to visit the hospital next week. The department alerted Gov. Ted Kulongoski in June that it would investigate whether patients' constitutional rights were violated.

The facility is at the center of discussions about reforming mental health care in Oregon. Reports of abuse and other problems led lawmakers to reassess the hospital's future.

Lawmakers have proposed replacing it with two separate hospitals and two residential facilities at an estimated cost of at least $324 million.

It's unclear how long the investigation could take. Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said she could not discuss the timeline or details of the investigation.

Human Trafficking Cases Increase In El Paso (EPT)

By Louie Gilot

El Paso (TX) Times, November 11, 2006

A billboard encourages reporting suspected human trafficking. (Yasmin A. Aboytes / El Paso Times)Photographs of men, women and children filled the screen. But they didn't tell the whole story.

A shy Chinese boy is pictured. He was forced to work in restaurants in El Paso and North Carolina.

DOJ_NMG_0093296

A young woman poses on a stationary bike. She was lured into the sex trade from her native Uzbekistan.

Two middle-aged couples smile at the camera. The pair on the left were deaf and mute victims of human traffickers. On the right were the traffickers.

"You have to look beneath the surface. You'll not know it when you see it," Brandy Gardes, an assistant U.S. attorney in El Paso, told hundreds of law enforcement officers and social workers at a conference last month in El Paso.

Officials have called human trafficking one of the toughest crimes to tackle.

It is hard to identify and hard to prove. Victims are often too scared to speak out. And the public and juries have a hard time believing slavery still goes on in the United States.

The U.S. Department of State estimated that 18,000 to 20,000 people are trafficked into the

Advertisement

United States each year and held by force or coercion for sexual slavery and forced labor. Between 2001 and 2005, the Justice Department prosecuted fewer than 150 alleged traffickers.

There are no figures for El Paso, but it was chosen by the Justice Department as the site of one of 18 new human-trafficking task forces in the nation as part of a far-reaching effort to bring the problem out of the shadows.

A community's response

Task-force coordinator Paul Piñon is training police officers to recognize the signs.

He said El Pasoans can also play a crucial role in spotting traffickers' safe houses and trafficking victims. "We feel that the majority of situations will come to light through the involvement of the community."

Neighbors may notice that a large number of people live in a house but never congregate outside except to be picked up for work.

Often, El Paso is a pit stop for traffickers on their way to California and elsewhere.

But some cases with elements of human trafficking began here.

Gardes prosecuted two such cases -- the 1998 exploitation of Mexican deaf and mute men and women by two El Paso sisters, and the 2001 sexual exploitation of women from Uzbekistan by a UTEP research assistant. The culprits were convicted, but not for human smuggling, and were sentenced to prison time.

Trafficking victims are not necessarily foreigners, but the great majority are.

One case going to trial Monday can also be classified as human trafficking, Gardes said. It is the prosecution of the owners of a far East El Paso quarry, where Mexican undocumented immigrants worked and lived in substandard conditions. The owners were charged with harboring undocumented immigrants.

Gardes said prosecutors usually apply human-trafficking charges in cases where the use of force can be proved because those cases are stronger in court. However, most human traffickers use coercion or fraud to keep their victims enslaved.

Not 'vanilla smuggling'

Often, what starts as "plain old, vanilla human smuggling," as Gardes put it, turns into trafficking when the migrant can't pay.

Gardes showed the photograph of a field worker standing on top of a large farm truck -- a scene common across the Southwest. His name is Ricardo, she said. He was smuggled across the border in Arizona and abandoned in the desert for eight days with only three days' worth of food and water. He was found by another smuggler who offered to guide him, for a fee. When Ricardo couldn't pay, the smuggler sold him to a Florida labor contractor for $1,100.

This became Ricardo's debt. He worked in a field for $80 a week to repay it. At the same time, his trafficker overcharged him for rent and other necessities. Gardes said he was never meant to be able to repay the debt.

One day, another trafficking victim escaped, was recaptured and was beaten in front of Ricardo and the others. "At this point, Ricardo realized this was really slavery," Gardes said.

Ricardo eventually escaped and testified against his traffickers. He still receives death threats.

In a recent case in El Paso, police rescued a 15-year-old Salvadoran girl at the Downtown Greyhound bus station after her smuggler asked her family in California for ransom.

In Juárez, officials at Casa del Migrante shelter, which helps migrants after they have been deported back to Mexico or after they fail to cross, said they have housed a few women who said their smugglers tried to sell them.

DOJ_NMG_0093297

Brainwashed

Collaboration between police and private aid organizations is crucial to tackle human trafficking, officials said.

A new El Paso case in which a 14-year-old Guatemalan boy allegedly held in Fabens was presented as a model of cooperation to the White House's faith-based initiative task force, social workers involved said. The boy allegedly worked at a Fabens store, slept in a camper shell in a backyard and washed his clothes with a garden hose. Law enforcement officials would not say more because the investigation continues.

When the boy was placed in custody at the migrant children detention center in Canutillo, he was suicidal and refused to speak to FBI agents for two days.

Elvia Garcia, a supervisor at the Diocesan Migrant and Refugee Services, was called to help.

After several hours of small talk, the boy finally opened up.

"It takes a whole community to take care of a victim of trafficking," Garcia said.

Many victims come from Third World countries where police corruption is rampant, and they learn not to trust law enforcement officers. They are also brainwashed by traffickers who tell them the police would not believe their outcry and would put them in jail or deport them.

In reality, victims of trafficking have legal recourse.

In 2000, the Congress passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, which broadened the federal status and gave victims the T Visa to allow a three-year stay in the United States. During that time, victims can apply for a green card.

Charles Song, the director of legal services for the Coalition to Abolish Slavery and Trafficking in Los Angeles, said that less than 1 percent of trafficking victims he has helped chose to go back to their countries. That's because traffickers often have associates abroad who threaten the victims and their families.

Florencia Molina, 34, of Mexico, was a trafficking victim in Los Angeles in 2002, sewing dresses for 17 hours a day, every day for months. At night, she was locked inside the clandestine workshop. Her trafficker held her papers, and Molina did not speak English. She summoned the courage to flee and ended up testifying for the FBI.

Molina spoke at the El Paso conference. She said that her trafficker, an important woman in her native Mexican village, was sentenced to six months of house arrest. Then she went to Mexico, looking for Molina.

Molina obtained a T Visa and is living in hiding in the Los Angeles area. She now works as a security guard and dreams of becoming a sheriff's deputy, she said.

"I feel protected in the United States," she said.

Louie Gilot may be reached at lgilot@elpasotimes.com; 546-6131.

2 LAPD Officers Investigated In Beating Case (LAT)

By Richard Winton, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 10, 2006

Two Los Angeles police officers were under investigation today for allegedly beating a man during a videotaped arrest in Hollywood that LAPD Chief William J. Bratton called "disturbing."

The video of the Aug. 11 incident, posted on the YouTube website, shows one of the officers holding down William Cardenas, 24, as the other officer places his knee on the man's throat and punches him in the face six times.

Cardenas, who is lying on his back, is heard yelling, "I can't breathe!"

He was arrested on suspicion of using violence or threats to prevent an officer from performing his duty and was charged with two counts of resisting arrest, said LAPD Lt. Paul Vernon.

Cardenas remains in custody.

The tape was photographed by an unnamed neighbor who gave it to B. Kwaku Duren, a lawyer who represents Cardenas.

Bratton cautioned that the videotape only reflected a part of the struggle with Officers Alexander Schlegel and Patrick Farrell, who is seen punching Cardenas.

"There is no denying that the video is disturbing," Bratton said. "But as to whether the actions of the officers were appropriate in light of what they were experiencing, and the totality of the circumstances, is what the investigation will determine."

DOJ_NMG_0093298

Bratton said that Cardenas was not seriously hurt. "The guy got punched but that is not life-threatening."

The chief also pointed out that the incident showed that a federal oversight program of the department -- imposed under a consent decree -- was working. Even before the video became public, an investigation of the incident was underway based on the officers' report and interviews with witnesses, he said.

"All the steps of consent decree have been complied with," Bratton said. "That is the good side. There is no taking away the beating itself."

The incident began when the officers spotted Cardenas, a Gordon Street gang member wanted on a felony warrant for stolen goods, and he fled, police said. During the subsequent arrest, a struggle ensued and the officers reported that they used force to subdue the suspect.

After the arrest, witnesses told investigators that they saw the officers punch Cardenas in the upper torso, Bratton said.

During a preliminary hearing on Aug. 29, Cardenas' attorneys produced the beating video that was subsequently turned over to prosecutors and police, the chief said. The officers have since been assigned to desk duties while the investigation continues.

The district attorney's office is also reviewing Cardenas' case, said Jane Robison, a spokeswoman for the office.

"Policing is often not pretty," Bratton said. "Looking at a slice of [the video] makes it look less pretty, but my obligations is to wait until all the facts are in."

richard.winton@latimes.com

Beating Of L.A. Suspect Sparks Outcry (WP)

By Sonya Geis And Hamil R. Harris, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

Police and FBI Investigate Case After Tape Was Shown on YouTube

LOS ANGELES, Nov. 10 -- A video of Los Angeles police officers punching a suspect in the face set off a wave of outrage that crashed onto the doorstep of police headquarters Friday after the tape was posted on YouTube.

It was an uncomfortable echo of earlier Los Angeles Police Department scandals, including the videotaped Rodney King beating. The department, which operates under a federal consent decree, has instituted many reforms but has periodically suffered through police brutality embarrassments.

The lawyer for the suspect shown in the video said his client's experience shows little has changed. "The Los Angeles Police Department needs to make those reforms real, because they have not been made real," B. Kwaku Duren said at a news conference in front of police headquarters Friday. "That video speaks for itself."

The video of an August arrest came to light this week after portions of it appeared on the videosharing Web site YouTube and several thousand people watched it.

Shot by a bystander, it shows two police officers attempting to arrest William Cardenas, 24. As one officer sits on his thighs and holds his arm, the other places his knee across Cardenas's chest and throat and quickly punches him five times in the head. Cardenas can be heard crying, "Let go of me! I can't breathe! I can't breathe!"

Cardenas had a split lip, black eyes and a bloody face afterward, Duren said.

Police described Cardenas as a known gang member, which his lawyer disputed. Cardenas had run from officers who wanted to arrest him on a warrant for receiving a stolen gun, Duren said. Previously, Cardenas had been arrested for attempted murder but was never charged.

After reviewing evidence from prosecutors and seeing the video at a preliminary hearing, a judge found enough evidence to try Cardenas for resisting arrest.

The LAPD began investigating the incident on the day of the arrest, in compliance with a consent decree requirement to investigate all allegations of police abuse, police officials said. The FBI launched a separate investigation Thursday.

Both officers in the video, Alexander Schlegel and Patrick Farrell, were reassigned to desk jobs. Schlegel had two previous abuse complaints against him, officials confirmed. He was exonerated in one instance, and in the other the district attorney did not find grounds to file charges.

DOJ_NMG_0093299

"Police work is not always pretty," Chief William J. Bratton said. "But in my 36 years in law enforcement, I've learned not to make a judgment until I have all the facts."

According to preliminary hearing transcripts, Cardenas and two friends were drinking beer on a street corner when police recognized him and called for him to put his hands up. Cardenas ran.

When police caught him, Schlegel pushed him in the back, he fell, "and his face bounced off the sidewalk."

Cardenas tried to hit the officer, Schlegel testified. Then Farrell hit him twice, and Schlegel used pepper spray on him, Schlegel said. The officers reported the use of force that day, police officials said.

From her second-floor apartment, Melissa Aguayo, 17, watched it happen. "He kept saying, 'You're choking me, you're choking me,' " she said Friday. "They kept saying, 'You are resisting arrest,' and they kept hitting him."

Connie Rice, a civil rights lawyer who has watched the Los Angles Police Department for 20 years, said the incident is not atypical and reflects a "use of force culture" at the department that is "calibrated higher and more aggressively than other police departments."

Nonetheless, "This is not your grandfather's LAPD," she said. Rice credited Bratton with valuing community policing and with presiding over a changing culture, in which fewer officers see aggressive policing as acceptable.

Under Los Angeles's well-liked police chief, crime in the city has fallen 40 percent in four years.

"Twenty years ago, 99 percent of LAPD officers would have seen that video and would have said, 'What's the problem?' " Rice said. "In 2006, at least a third to half would say, 'We've got a problem.' That's a difference."

Police Beating Video From L.A. Demonstrates The Power Of YouTube Again (USAT/AP)

USA Today, November 11, 2006

LOS ANGELES (AP) — An FBI investigation prompted by video footage of a man being punched repeatedly in the face by police has demonstrated anew the power of the Internet sensation of the year, YouTube.com.

In addition to being a monumental time-waster around the office, YouTube could also become a tool for keeping police honest, some say.

VIDEO: Arrest investigated

This week, a clip on the post-it-yourself video website triggered a police-brutality investigation by the FBI. The footage shows the Aug. 11 arrest of alleged gang member William Cardenas, 24. Two Los Angeles officers can be seen holding him down on a Hollywood street; one punches him several times in the face before they are able to handcuff him.

The Los Angeles Police Department is also investigating the officers' conduct.

Police Chief William Bratton said he found the video to be "disturbing," but stressed that the 20-second clip amounts to only a fraction of what transpired.

The Los Angeles Times reported Friday that a Superior Court commissioner viewed the video nearly two months ago, heard the officers' testimony, and concluded that their conduct was "more than reasonable" because Cardenas was resisting.

Cop Watch LA, a police watchdog group, posted the video on YouTube, said organizer Joaquin Cienfuegos. Cienfuegos said the video was shot by a neighbor of Cardenas with a cellphone camera. The neighbor gave it to Cardenas' family, who then gave it to Cop Watch, according to Cienfuegos.

In recent months, videos posted on YouTube have rocked political campaigns, brought fame — or infamy — to previously unknown talents and cast unwanted attention on the gaffes of the famous. YouTube and similar video sites are also increasingly becoming repositories for videos that purport to detail wrongdoing by police.

Such amateur clips help cast a spotlight on police wrongdoing that could otherwise go unreported, said Ramona Ripston, executive director of the ACLU of Southern California.

"Unless we throw light onto activities of government, all activities, you never find out what happened," Ripston said. "This video is an example."

Police said Cardenas had been wanted on charges of receiving stolen property. In an arrest report obtained by the Associated Press, the officers said they tried to arrest Cardenas after spotting him on the sidewalk, but Cardenas ran.

DOJ_NMG_0093300

The officers caught up to him, tripped him and swarmed over him to apply handcuffs, the report said. In their report, they admitted hitting him repeatedly in the face, saying that he was resisting and that they feared he might grab one of their guns.

Cardenas suffered cuts and bruises on his arms, leg and face, and received stitches on an eyelid. His attorney, B. Kwaku Duren, accused the officers using excessive force.

Police spokesman Lt. Paul Vernon said Friday that such videos often do not show the whole story.

"The officers' actions in these situations are based on the totality of what is going on in the officers' mind," Vernon said. "You don't know in the total context of this what occurred."

As of Friday, the clip had received more than 155,000 views on YouTube. It was posted on Oct. 18.

A search on YouTube for the terms "police brutality" found more than 500 videos, including ones that claim to show police violence in the U.S. and as far away as Egypt and Hungary. A search of Google's video site also yielded hundreds of videos.

In response to the surge in amateur videos, some law enforcement agencies have installed cameras in squad cars to protect officers against false allegations.

Police defense attorney John Barnett said the public shouldn't draw conclusions when watching the clip of Cardenas' arrest. Barnett represented one of the officers in the 1991 Rodney King beating and an Inglewood police officer, Jeremy Morse, who was videotaped roughing up a 16-year-old boy.

Two juries deadlocked in Morse's case, and four officers were acquitted in the King trial, touching off riots in Los Angeles.

"It's very difficult to find jurors who haven't already come to a conclusion," Barnett said. "The public has the perception of what the facts are, but you have to figure out a way to get them back to square one."

Legal observers said the public has become somewhat desensitized to questionable police tactics caught on tape because such videos have become more prevalent since the King beating. In many cases, officers have been exonerated.

"The first reaction by people is one of outrage," said Eugene O'Donnell, a professor of police studies at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York City. "But the more you see police officers using force on tape, the more you get used to it."

Landscapers Cause Furor By Shunning Gay Clients (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

HOUSTON, Nov. 10 — Last month, a local landscaping firm prompted a furor here by telling a gay couple in an e-mail message, “We choose not to work for homosexuals.”

The message quickly made its way around the Internet, and the company, Garden Guy Inc., was bombarded with threats and hate mail. But since then, the company’s owners say they have gained far more business than they have lost.

In an interview Friday, Sabrina Farber, 34, co-owner of the company with her husband, Todd, 37, said the company had picked up $40,000 in new business in the past two weeks, while losing only two clients worth about $500 each a year.

“I’m not saying that to gloat,” said Mrs. Farber, who described the frenzy as ugly and emotionally draining. But she said they would not do it differently and deserved credit for not masking their refusal with excuses.

“Why can’t people handle it when you say the truth?” she said.

One of the two gay clients, Gary Lackey, said, “We’re hoping things would die down” and declined to comment further in a telephone interview. The other member of the couple, Michael Lord, did not return a call.

The law appears to be on the Farbers’ side, said Lisa Graybill, legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Texas.

“The federal law of public accommodations says if you hang out a shingle or open your door you don’t get to say, ‘Only to whites,’ ” Ms. Graybill said. But sexual orientation is not protected. And while some localities, like Seattle, have adopted ordinances extending antidiscrimination protection to gay men and lesbians, she said, Houston has not.

The uproar began after Mr. Lord contacted Garden Guy, whose Web site contains this slogan: “Treating you with respect and honesty are the cornerstones of our reputation.”

DOJ_NMG_0093301

It also carries citations from the New Testament — Mrs. Farber volunteered that her husband was Jewish and now practices Christianity — and a message against same-sex marriage that the gay couple evidently overlooked: "The God-ordained institution of marriage is under attack in courts across the nation and your help is needed."

Mrs. Farber and Mr. Lord talked business on the phone, but after Mr. Lord's references to his "partner," Mrs. Farber e-mailed Mr. Lord to cancel their appointment.

"I am appreciative of your time on the phone today and glad you contacted us," she wrote. "I need to tell you that we cannot meet with you because we choose not to work for homosexuals."

In the ensuing uproar, the family had to change its private phone numbers, Mrs. Farber said, and turned over to the police copies of threatening messages like "I will sodomize their children."

Mrs. Farber said her husband, who holds a degree in horticulture from Texas A&M University, had done landscaping for gay clients before but had become increasingly "grieved" over visiting their homes to discuss design and plantings.

Dumbfounded by the e-mail message, Mr. Lord and Mr. Lackey forwarded it to friends, and it circulated widely on gay Web sites. A copy reached The Houston Chronicle, where a columnist, Rick Casey, broke the story on Oct. 20, suggesting that the Farbers "should refuse to do business with all sinners."

With the affair spreading to the radio airwaves, Houstonians have piled on.

"It seems to me the Farbers must be a little naïve," a letter writer, Joseph Carroll, wrote The Chronicle. "Don't they realize they are probably doing business with homosexuals every day? They should check out their pharmacist, hair dresser, bank teller, the nurse at their doctor's office, the waiter at their favorite restaurant and the church secretary."

The Association of Professional Landscape Designers condemned the action of the Farbers, whose membership has lapsed, and instituted a requirement for members to abide by an antidiscrimination clause.

In addition to the criticism of the Farbers, there was also widespread support. Mrs. Farber cited one e-mail message from "Eric in St. Louis," who wrote: "Life to the Farbers who have planted themselves like solid oak trees against these strong winds of perversion."

Mrs. Farber said she and her husband never claimed to be perfect.

"We're sinners, Todd and I," Mrs. Farber said. But she added: "My husband made a personal choice, according to something he felt in his heart. It was never a judgmental choice or a hating choice or even a choice that said, 'Well, we're better than them.' "

Gain For Same-Sex Marriage In Massachusetts (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

BOSTON, Nov. 9 — Lawmakers in Massachusetts, the only state where same-sex marriage is legal, dealt what appeared to be a fatal blow Thursday to a proposed constitutional amendment to ban it.

In a flurry of strategic maneuvering, supporters of same-sex marriage managed to persuade enough legislators to vote to recess a constitutional convention until the afternoon of Jan. 2, the last day of the legislative session.

On that day, lawmakers and advocates on both sides said, it appeared likely that the legislature would adjourn without voting on the measure, killing it.

"For all intents and purposes, the debate has ended," said Representative Byron Rushing, a Boston Democrat and the assistant majority leader. "What members are expecting is that the majority of constituents are going to say, 'Thank you, we're glad it's over, we think it has been discussed enough.' "

The measure had been expected by both sides to gain easily the 50 votes required from the 200 legislators as the first step toward making same-sex marriages illegal.

Kris Mineau, president of the Massachusetts Family Institute, which sponsored the amendment, called the recess vote a "travesty," and, waving a copy of the State Constitution, said the legislators had "just said that it's irrelevant."

As for whether the fight was over, Mr. Mineau said, "We're assessing the situation."

DOJ_NMG_0093302

Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican who opposes same-sex marriage, said the vote was a "triumph of arrogance over democracy." He said that he would "explore any alternatives" to try to force a vote, but that "my options are limited."

Eric Fehrnstrom, a spokesman for Mr. Romney, said: "The fact that they put this off until the end of the year makes it easier for them to adjourn. If they were giving consideration, I think they would have recessed until tomorrow or maybe Monday or Tuesday next week."

The action on Thursday came two days after Massachusetts voters elected Deval L. Patrick, a same-sex marriage supporter, as the state's first Democratic governor in 16 years. Democrats were also elected to all of the statewide offices, leaving the state's Republican Party in shambles.

But the fact that the amendment had enough supporters to pass the first 50-vote round indicated that the issue of same-sex marriage remains divisive three years after the state's highest court ruled that such marriages were constitutional in Massachusetts. More than 8,000 same-sex couples have since married.

To bring the amendment before the legislature, the Massachusetts Family Institute had gathered 170,000 petition signatures. If the amendment were to get 50 votes, it would then require the votes of 50 legislators in another constitutional convention in the 2007-8 legislative session. Then it would be voted on in a referendum in November 2008.

Polls have generally found that just more than half of the citizens surveyed supported same-sex marriage, but about the same number wanted the constitutional amendment to come before voters.

The vote to recess followed a day of intense politicking and strategizing by supporters of same-sex marriage. Many legislators, even supporters of such marriages, had said they planned to vote for the amendment for fear that if they did not they would appear to be shirking their responsibility.

Gay rights advocates persuaded the legislators to first take up another amendment to ban same-sex marriage, one introduced nearly two years ago by a conservative lawmaker, but which was now considered by Mr. Mineau and other same-sex marriage opponents to be unable to pass constitutional muster because it would nullify the same-sex marriages that had already taken place.

Because that amendment had been initiated by a legislator and not a citizens' group, it would have needed 101 votes to pass. On Thursday it was defeated unanimously.

Arline Isaacson, co-chairwoman of the Massachusetts Gay and Lesbian Political Caucus, said the plan was to give the legislators political cover with their constituents, because they "can all point to the fact that they fully debated same-sex marriage and took a vote on it."

Same-sex marriage advocates also persuaded lawmakers to vote for a recess and not an adjournment because if they adjourned, Governor Romney could call them back into session.

Representative Michael A. Costello, a Democrat from Newburyport and a strong opponent of the amendment, said: "The way I looked at it was that we would kill it with a handgun or a hand grenade. It's never been proper to put civil rights on the ballot. So we killed it through procedure, rather than on substance."

The debate in the House was full of impassioned speeches.

"I'm 3,000 feet to the right of Attila the Hun, they tell me," Representative Marie J. Parente, a Democrat from Milford who had lost her re-election bid on Tuesday, told her colleagues. "But you're not. You're the other side. The gracious people, the liberal people, the socially conscious people."

For the 170,000 people who signed the petition and want a referendum, "does your graciousness end?" she asked. "Give the people the right to be heard."

Senator Jarrett T. Barrios, who is gay and married, told the chamber, "It's time for a little straight talk."

Pointing to his wedding band, he said: "You don't have to live next to us. You don't have to like us. We are only asking you to end the debate," so that "we will at least have the right to enjoy the same rights that the rest of you have enjoyed from time immemorial."

The Court And Abortion (NYT)

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093303

The Supreme Court unnecessarily returned to the politically charged area of abortion this week, hearing arguments in a case testing some of the core principles of Roe v. Wade and the court's own credibility as an institution removed from politics.

At issue, once again, is a deceptively broad ban on so-called partial-birth abortions. The court struck down a similar measure just six years ago, but since then two new justices have arrived. In the interest of women's privacy and health — and in defense of the court's own reputation — the justices should strike down this far-reaching assault on reproductive freedom.

In 2000, the court struck down a nearly identical Nebraska law for essentially two reasons. It found that the law's imprecise language applied not just to a single late-term abortion method — as the ban's supporters claimed — but would criminalize other common abortion procedures that are constitutionally protected. The court also ruled that the law was unconstitutional because it provided no exception to protect a woman's health.

In a cynical move in 2003, Congress passed a law remarkably similar to the one the court had just struck down — with a definition of the procedures it was outlawing about as sweeping as Nebraska's. Defying the Supreme Court, moreover, Congress refused to include an exception for protecting the health of the woman. Instead, it simply made the medically inaccurate assertion that the ill-defined procedure it outlawed was never necessary to preserve a woman's health. Every lower federal court that has considered the Congressional ban has held it to be unconstitutional.

If Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who cast the deciding vote in 2000, had not retired, it is highly unlikely the court would have agreed to entertain this rerun. But without her, it is not clear that there are still five votes to defeat this assault on Roe , or to uphold the bedrock requirement that abortion restrictions have an exception for protecting a woman's health.

It seems unlikely that Chief Justice John Roberts or Justice Samuel Alito will provide the fifth vote. That means that Justice Anthony Kennedy, the current swing justice, is likely to decide this case. In 2000, Justice Kennedy joined those who would have upheld the Nebraska law. But at oral argument his questions suggested that he may take issue with Congress's assertion that the ban would not put women's health at risk — an encouraging sign.

Even justices who oppose abortion rights need to be concerned about that. They also need to worry about how the court will look if the recent change in its membership produces a starkly different result on an issue so vital to women's privacy and health.

Choosing Choice (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

THE BALLOTS CAST across the nation spoke so unambiguously about abortion that even the most intransigent anti-abortionists should be able to construe the message: Voters do not want Big Brother opening the doors of private homes — or the doctor's office — and coercing people's most personal medical decisions.

Anti-abortionists have been craving a test case to put before the U.S. Supreme Court, in hopes of overturning Roe vs. Wade — and thought they had it when the South Dakota Legislature passed a ban on abortion. Instead of challenging the law in court, though, pro-choice forces cleverly put the matter to a popular referendum. Even in that socially conservative, anti-abortion state, a decisive majority Tuesday preserved a woman's right to choose. To some extent, they were bothered by the ban's extraordinary lack of compassion, refusing to exempt even the victims of rape and incest. But a frequently voiced complaint about the ban was that government simply shouldn't interfere with private lives.

That's a closely held American value and one that Republicans should embrace again lest they want to see this midterm election be a harbinger of a long-range trend.

Both California and Oregon voted down attempts to require parental notification before a minor can obtain an abortion. In several other states, anti-abortion congressional candidates were defeated, and Kansas' Phill Kline, the state attorney general who notoriously overreached the powers of his office in his single-minded attack on family planning and abortion clinics, was turned out of office.

In California, Proposition 85 was the second attempt within a year to impose parental notification on girls, most of whom already talk to their parents before opting for an abortion. Both efforts failed at the polls.

DOJ_NMG_0093304

Heedless of this abundantly clear message, anti-abortion forces are redoubling their efforts. Their latest idea: requiring pregnant women to view a 3-D ultrasound of their fetuses, thus forcing patients to undergo a certain medical procedure before seeking the treatment of their choice. For what other medical situation would this kind of government interference be tolerated?

The voters have spoken resoundingly on abortion and the right to privacy. Those who want to turn government into Big Brother need to heed the message and give it up.

Keeping The Voting Clean (NYT)

By Richard L. Hasen

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

AS election mishaps hindered voting on Tuesday from Cleveland to Denver, some people were already calling for giving up on the new electronic voting machines, which were themselves put in place to prevent another hanging-chad fiasco like that in Florida in 2000.

The calls will only get louder as the public learns more about Florida's 13th Congressional District — coincidentally, Katherine Harris's old district — where voting machines apparently lost or failed to record up to 18,000 votes in a race where the Democratic and Republican candidates are just a few hundred votes apart. If everyone just voted by mail or with pencil and paper, the argument goes, our voting problems would be solved.

But this reaction to the bugs and glitches shows that Americans have not learned the right lesson from 2000: the problem is not with the technology of running our elections but rather with the people running them.

The United States should join the rest of the world's advanced democracies and put nonpartisan professionals in charge. We need officials whose ultimate allegiance is to the fairness, integrity and professionalism of the election process, not to helping one party or the other gain political advantage. We don't need disputes like the current one in Florida being resolved by party hacks.

Critics of electronic voting raise two main issues: machines are susceptible to fraud (or hacking) and they are difficult to use.

Fraud problems would not go away if we switched to vote by mail, as Oregon has. Such voting — let's call it mandatory absentee balloting — takes the voter out of the polling booth and puts him at home or elsewhere, someplace where votes could be sold to the highest bidder. Most of the documented cases of voting fraud in the United States in recent years involve absentee ballots. At the beginning of the last century, voter turnout declined as states adopted secret, in-person balloting, most likely because corrupt politicians stopped buying votes since they couldn't verify that people were really voting for their candidate.

True, squeaky-clean Oregon has been able to use the vote-by-mail system. But it is not clear that clean elections could be held in places with more rancorous partisan disputes over election rules and vote counting. And mail-in ballots don't eliminate the problem anyway: losers still have an incentive to claim fraud and try to get a close election result overturned. Public opinion on the integrity of the election process is volatile, and surveys show losers have less confidence in the fairness of the process than winners do.

Voting with pencil and paper creates its own problems. With long ballots like California's it would take many days to calculate results, and the potential for election administrator error or fraud — if votes were really to be counted by hand, as opposed to optically scanned — would be enormous.

Nor would a switch to vote by mail or pencil and paper necessarily solve anything. Across the country last Tuesday we saw all kinds of mundane problems: not enough ballots, polls opening late, disputes about which voter identification rules applied. Problems arose with absentee ballots, too. Some were mailed to the wrong address, or with incorrect postage, or with inaccurate or incomplete information. Then there's the question of accurately counting only the validly cast absentee ballots.

The point is not that electronic voting is the best system; maybe it should be scrapped. The real solution is to create a cadre of dedicated, professional nonpartisan administrators with enough money to run a scrupulously fair and voter-friendly system of election administration to resolve such questions.

To improve the chances that states will choose an independent and competent chief elections officer, states should enact laws making that officer a long-term gubernatorial appointee who takes office only upon confirmation by a 75 percent vote of the legislature — a supermajority requirement that would ensure that a candidate has true bipartisan support. Nonpartisanship in election administration is no dream. It is how Canada and Australia run their national elections.

DOJ_NMG_0093305

We've moved in exactly the wrong direction. Election administration reform has become more, not less, politicized since Bush v. Gore. Since 2004, voter identification laws have been supported only by Republican legislatures and opposed by Democrats. The debate over election integrity versus election access makes administration just another locus for partisan debate. This should and can end with nonpartisan professional administration.

Even with divided government coming again to Washington, there is an opportunity to take steps that would keep each party from gaining partisan advantage, and that can end our biannual anxiety over whether we are headed for another election meltdown.

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Targets 36 Markets In NAR Antitrust Suit (INMAN)

By Glenn Roberts Jr., Inman News

Inman News, November 11, 2006

Realtor association seeks rule change for separate contested listings policy

NEW ORLEANS -- The Justice Department, as a part of its antitrust lawsuit against the 1.3-million-member National Association of Realtors trade group, has identified 36 market areas in which association policy for the online display and sharing of property information has allegedly caused anticompetitive effects, said Laurie Janik, general counsel for the group.

Filed last year, the lawsuit charges that the Realtor group's policies are illegal because they could potentially be used to squelch real estate competition, while the Realtor group has maintained that its policies provide for ample online information about properties.

"They've identified 36 markets to us where they intend to prove anticompetitive effects," Janik said Friday during a meeting for multiple listing service executives at a Realtor conference in New Orleans."We'll be waiting to see just what types of proof they plan to advance from those marketplaces."

Lawyers for the association, meanwhile, are conducting interviews with MLS officials in those markets to gather information for its defense.

Issues of data protection and control are at the core of the legal scuffle, as some brokers have pushed the association to better serve their interests by helping to safeguard control over property information that they say is a vital part of their business.

A major contention in the Justice Department lawsuit is on a policy provision that allows brokers who are members of Realtor-affiliated MLSs to block their listings from display on other MLS participants' Web sites, Janik said. "We believe it's a very justifiable position, but the government seems to think that once a broker has decided to participate in the MLS then you also must allow your listings to be displayed on a competitors' ... Web site."

Also, Justice Department officials object to a Realtor policy which requires that Realtor MLS participants must "actually be engaged in listing or selling the type of property that's listed in the MLS," while the former policy simply required that an MLS participant possess a broker's license.

"The reason for the rule change is largely driven by the Internet," she said. "We all know there are plenty of people out there with brokers' licenses -- so you get the license, you get the valuable data feed, you get to display it on your Web site and make all sorts of money even though you never list or sell a property. We don't think those people belong in the MLS and so that's what I think will be the second biggest issue in the lawsuit."

The association is also grappling with other legal issues, Janik noted, including eight Federal Trade Commission investigations and seven Justice Department investigations that have focused on a specific classification of property listings. The federal agencies are targeting MLS rules restricting the display of exclusive agency listings on some public property-search Web sites -- exclusive agency listings provide that sellers do not have to pay a commission to a real estate broker if they locate a buyer without the assistance of the broker.

DOJ_NMG_0093306

The MLSs' restrictions did not affect exclusive right to sell listings, a more common form of listing in which the broker is guaranteed compensation whether or not the seller independently locates a buyer.

A group of Realtor-affiliated MLSs have eliminated the policies after the federal agencies began investigating their policies, while some of the investigations are still outstanding and the FTC has announced legal action against two MLSs in Michigan.

In July, the National Association of Realtors hosted a "fly-in" event in Chicago and invited all of the lawyers for MLSs involved in the investigations, Janik said. The participants of that meeting signed a joint defense agreement and a confidentiality agreement, she said.

After that meeting, Janik and an antitrust lawyer representing NAR met with FTC and Justice Department staff to discuss the issues surrounding exclusive agency listings.

"We wanted to make sure they understood that MLSs had a legitimate concern and a legitimate reason not to be advertising exclusive agency listings on the Internet ... and that those MLSs that excluded these listings from (distribution to some public Web sites) were doing it because it is not consistent with the purpose of the MLSs to be helping home sellers sell their homes themselves and cut brokers out of commissions."

In some cases, Janik said, sellers in exclusive agency listings contracts have displayed for-sale-by-owner signs on their properties.

In response, Janik said that the association is considering a proposal to change listings policy so that brokers -- rather than MLSs -- could make independent choices about whether or not to exclude exclusive agency listings from their Web sites.

"Brokers are always entitled to make independent business decisions. There's no collusion, there's nothing illegal about that," she said. "The MLS as a group of competitors ... would not be making a joint decision; there would be no agreement among competitors." And that represents an important legal distinction, she said.

The association has shared its proposed changes to listings policy with the Justice Department and FTC, and Janik said she expects the association would be safe in adopting this policy change, though she added that the agencies have not provided written approval of the proposal.

The proposed changes would also provide that MLSs can choose to exclude exclusive agency or exclusive right to sell listings from being sent to public Web sites when the street address of the property is being shown on the Internet and when a for-sale-by-owner sign or other sign on the property indicates that the seller is soliciting direct contact from buyers.

This is intended to prevent situations in which sellers receive the benefit of MLS visibility but could potentially block MLS subscribers from participating in the real estate transaction, she said. This proposed change may be a tough sell to the federal agencies, she added.

"There is some disagreement with us and the FTC over that portion and no one is obviously promising this a clean bill of health," Janik said. "And there are some risks of adopting this policy. The risk of doing nothing I think is far greater," she said. "I think narrowing the policy -- narrowing it or getting rid of it entirely ... are probably the only two viable choices we get," she said.

If the proposal is adopted by the association's leadership, it will be an optional policy "for those who love to take risks," she said.

MLSs that do not have the staff to actively visit MLS-listed properties to ensure that there are no for-sale-by-owner signs could rely on "the age-old MLS rules enforcement practice of 'tattle-taling,'" she said. "And it seems to work pretty well."

While the rule would prevent sellers from displaying a for-sale-by-owner sign on their properties when listing a home with an MLS, sellers could still use other non-MLS venues to market their homes, such bulletin boards, Web sites such as craigslist.org, and fliers at the local church, "because it has nothing to do with the resources of the MLS," Janik said. "The only way the MLS connection can be made is with the address and the for-sale sign. It's a very narrow exception."

Also during her legal update, Janik said, "There is a movement among some states to put some definitions in the state law as to what constitutes an exclusive right to sell listing," citing an example of one state that may be considering language stating that "any property that is marketed for sale by owner is not an exclusive right to sell listing."

Motorola To Buy Rival Of BlackBerry (AP)

By The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0093307

AP, November 11, 2006

CHICAGO, Nov. 10 (AP) — The cellphone maker Motorola said Friday that it would buy Good Technology, a rival of BlackBerry, in a deal that should improve the prospects for its new Q hand-held device.

The financial terms were not disclosed.

The deal underscores efforts by Motorola, a leading maker of handsets, to sell more mobile devices that offer access to e-mail and other business-oriented services. In September, it agreed to spend $3.9 billion to buy Symbol Technologies, a maker of portable bar code scanners and customized hand-held computers.

Motorola said Good Technology, a privately held firm based in Santa Clara, Calif., that provides computing software and services for the Treo and other smartphones, will join its mobile devices unit. That unit has flourished in the last couple of years thanks to the success of the Razr phones.

Ron Garriques, president of the mobile devices division, said Good Technology's services, products and customers all complement its business.

"This acquisition will continue to strengthen Motorola as a leading provider of mobility devices and solutions both for enterprise customers and consumers," he said.

Hoping to come up with another Razr-like blockbuster in the fast-growing smartphone category, Motorola introduced a Qwerty hand-held device, called the Q, this year to compete against the BlackBerry and the Treo, which also runs on Good Technology software.

Albert Lin, an analyst for American Technology Research, said Good Technology was probably the best available acquisition for Motorola in the category short of buying Research in Motion., the Canadian maker of the BlackBerry.

"The Q has been somewhat disappointing and they're looking for ways to reinvigorate that product line," he said. Good Technology, founded in 2000, originally offered its own handheld device but now focuses on software and services.

Shares in Motorola rose 18 cents, to $21.38 on the New York Stock Exchange, down 5.4 percent this year.

Bulldog Edition Clash Of Cultures Exacerbates Woes For Tribune Co. (WSJ)

By Sarah Ellison

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

L.A. and Chicago Newspapers Are Riven by a Big Debate Over Process and Purpose 'It's a Tragic, Bad Marriage'

LOS ANGELES -- Earlier this summer, Dennis FitzSimons, chief executive of Tribune Co., traveled here to meet a group of Los Angeles Times editors and reporters. Mr. FitzSimons was running late and, according to two people in attendance, the assembled group joked about saving all the hard questions for the top executive of their parent company.

When Mr. FitzSimons finally arrived, a reporter asked: "Why do you hate the L.A. Times?"

When Chicago-based Tribune Co. acquired Times Mirror six years ago, it was more than an $8 billion fusion of two media companies. The merger also threw together two competing and incompatible cultures, each rooted in the traditions of their respective flagship newspapers, the Chicago Tribune and the Los Angeles Times.

Some Tribune executives think the Times is arrogant, spoiled and overstaffed, a paper with global ambitions that has ignored local readers. Some Times people consider the Chicago Tribune an inferior, provincial product. Times denizens, proud of their city's position as the nation's second largest, see the paper's owners as bean counters in business suits. Tribune thinks its Californian charges are too slick and prefer to take pride in the company's Chicago roots.

Unlike many battles between journalists and corporate bosses, which focus largely on spending, this one is also driven by fundamental differences between the philosophies of the two newspapers.

"It's a tragic, bad marriage," L.A. Times editor Dean Baquet has told colleagues. Mr. Baquet's own tenure was cut short amid the infighting and his last day is today.

Across the country, once-profitable newspapers are being ravaged by the Internet in a historic industry shift. The traditionally high margins of newspaper publishers have been squeezed as both readers and advertisers abandon the medium. Investor confidence has plummeted over the industry's uncertain growth prospects.

DOJ_NMG_0093308

Even in 2000, some executives saw trouble looming. The solution dreamed up by Tribune and Times Mirror was to merge their operations in a way that allowed them to sell combined packages of newspaper and local TV advertising in the same big, urban markets. The strategy was a dud. In September, Tribune said it was exploring various strategic options, which may include a sale of the entire company or some of its divisions.

The deteriorating financial environment exposed tensions at Tribune that had been simmering for years. As the company tried to consolidate, a common industry response, it ran into problems merging two disparate cultures amid serious economic travails. Some of the battles, such as whether to focus on local news at the expense of national or international coverage, reflect a broader soul-searching under way across the industry.

Matters came to a head this week when Tribune forced out Mr. Baquet as Times editor. Mr. Baquet had taken up the cudgel against Tribune's attempt to cut costs that culminated in a feisty speech at an editors' conference in New Orleans two weeks ago. Tribune executives took his comments personally, say people familiar with their thinking. Back in Los Angeles, staffers wore Dean Baquet T-shirts and have adorned their cubicles with his picture.

Many inside the company sensed the growing collision of cultures during the summer meeting with Mr. FitzSimons. Simon Li, the paper's foreign editor at the time, asked whether Tribune wanted the Times to concentrate on local stories, according to people who were there. The Times has long prided itself on its international presence, which editors felt the Tribune didn't appreciate.

Scott Smith, Tribune's president of publishing, said the need for local coverage was increasing. According to Henry Weinstein, the paper's legal-affairs reporter, who was at the meeting, Mr. Smith added that readers get their foreign and national news from a lot of places, such as Google or Yahoo Web sites.

Some in the room were stunned. Google and Yahoo do virtually no newsgathering of their own. Their sites publish stories from other news sources, including the L.A. Times. "It was mind-boggling that they thought there was some elf who plunked those stories there," says Mr. Weinstein. Mr. Smith recalls the conversation differently. He says he cited news sources such as broadcast TV, cable and online, and also talked of the company's commitment to national and international coverage.

In the same meeting, according to attendants, Mr. FitzSimons told the group that he didn't hate the Times and that the paper's success was important to Tribune. A reporter countered that when the L.A. Times won five Pulitzer Prizes in 2004, the chief executive hadn't come to the celebration. Mr. FitzSimons said he hadn't been invited.

Asked to comment for this article, Mr. Smith said in a written statement: "Each of our newspapers is committed to serving their communities exceptionally well through the very best locally focused journalism plus great coverage of national, international news and features." He added: "This broader coverage is enhanced through collaboration where each newspaper has access to the best stories created by talented journalists throughout the company."

Times Mirror and Tribune were both founded by conservative civic boosters. Tribune was started in 1847 and came into its own under Colonel Robert R. McCormick, who railed against Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal. The Tribune carried an American flag on its front-page banner, which also proclaimed it "World's Greatest Newspaper." It still occupies what was one of Chicago's earliest skyscrapers, heavy with fine stonework and quotations about press freedom on the walls.

Gen. Harrison Gray Otis founded Times Mirror in 1884. Under his family's ownership, the Los Angeles Times supported the expansion of the city's water supply, an event fictionalized in the movie "Chinatown." In the center of its lobby is a giant globe.

The two papers started to part ways when a fourth generation took over the L.A. Times. Under Otis Chandler, who was publisher from 1960 to 1980, the paper beefed up staffing levels and overseas reporting. He wanted to emulate East Coast institutions such as the New York Times and Washington Post. Photocopies of Mr. Chandler's image now festoon the Times newsroom.

The sprawling Los Angeles area is a patchwork of sometimes-disconnected communities, making local coverage a tricky proposition. The Times publishes ambitious, lengthy front-page features. But some locals complain that events halfway across the world are more thoroughly covered than news in their own backyard. The Times doesn't dominate its market the way many Eastern newspapers do. An exploding Latino population exacerbated that problem. So did the Internet.

"I didn't want to come back to work for a really good local newspaper and I still don't," says Douglas Frantz, who was coaxed from the New York Times to become a managing editor under Mr. Baquet.

DOJ_NMG_0093309

Chicago, by contrast, is a venerable prairie city of neighborhoods and strong civic identity. In 1988, the Tribune won a Pulitzer for coverage of corruption at Chicago's City Council. Two of the honored reporters were Mr. Baquet and the Tribune's current editor Ann Marie Lipinski. She cites a feature that tracked a Chicago fugitive living in Mexico as an example of how the paper marries local and international coverage.

The paper has a folksy feel. One column, called "What's Your Problem?", allows readers to write in with everyday complaints. A few weeks ago, the paper held a lunch to celebrate the column's one-year anniversary. "It was a virtual lovefest with readers," says Ms. Lipinski.

In 2000, when Tribune first announced the merger with Times Mirror, it seemed like a savior. The L.A. Times had barely emerged from a major scandal. Departing from basic journalistic ethics, the paper published a special edition of its Sunday magazine focused on the new Staples Center while agreeing to share the resulting profits with the arena owners.

The conflict hurt the paper's credibility and led to the departure of a series of top executives and editors. It also helped convince the controlling Chandler family to give up their publishing empire. Times Mirror was notoriously poorly managed, and Tribune, known for its disciplined management, had been eyeing the property for years.

Tribune, which also owned the Orlando, Fla., Sentinel and two smaller papers, initially invested in the Times. It put Baltimore Sun editor John Carroll in charge and paid for a new California production facility.

But the deal was struck at the height of the dotcom boom. Its rationale quickly faltered as newspapers became a less appealing venue for national advertising. Readers and advertisers instead flocked to cable television and the Internet.

In response, in 2002, Tribune began cutting costs heavily. Some of the most high-profile cuts came at the Baltimore Sun and Long Island, N.Y.'s Newsday, both Times Mirror properties, where there was an exodus of top editors. The Los Angeles Times proved the most difficult terrain. Tribune executives and Times editors were almost immediately at loggerheads.

The Tribune company wanted to encourage centralization and cooperation between its papers, allowing it to eliminate overlapping positions. Under the Chandlers, Times Mirror operated as a confederation of separate newspapers.

"They came into this deal with an idea of making a lot on national advertising and finding a lot of synergies, and none of that worked," says Mr. Carroll. "So they went on a cost-cutting binge."

On paper, Tribune saw obvious opportunities to eliminate redundancies. The Washington bureaus could theoretically be combined into one operation. Executives asked why the company needed to publish four different reviews of the same book.

Jack Fuller, a Pulitzer Prize winner at the Chicago Tribune and Tribune's publishing president, wanted to proceed carefully. Even though the L.A. Times was generally seen as overstaffed -- at the time it had 1,160 editorial staffers compared with the Tribune's roughly 680 -- Mr. Fuller didn't want to preside over the paper's decline, according to people familiar with his thinking. He was also conflicted, these people say: He wanted to hold up journalistic standards, but his job was also to make money.

"Broadly, his position, which none of us disputed, was that we didn't buy the L.A. Times, this great newspaper, to screw it up," says Howard Tyner, who succeeded Mr. Fuller as editor of the Chicago Tribune and has since retired. "And to go in with an ax was a good way to screw it up."

Mr. Carroll's approach to the 2002 budget pressures was to cut staffing at local editions in areas such as Orange County and the San Fernando Valley to preserve jobs in Washington and overseas. "We can either be five pretty good papers or one great one," he told staffers after he took the job, according to several Times staffers.

Some at Tribune say that likely contributed to declining circulation in Southern California, according to people familiar with their thinking. Mr. Carroll blames other problems for the declines, such as tighter controls on circulation following a scandal at the company's Newsday, and cutbacks in the paper's promotional budget.

Mr. Tyner says the Times Mirror papers resisted cooperating because they resented the loss of control. "I think it comes down to the fact that some of the big Times Mirror editors felt that working together was more of a threat to their style of journalism than a way to save it," says Mr. Tyner.

Tribune Co.'s Washington bureaus became a symbol -- some said an obsession -- of how the company wanted its newspapers to cooperate. At the time of the merger, Tribune's papers were already housed in the same building. After months of planning, Tribune moved five bureaus belonging to its Times Mirror papers to the same location, including the L.A. Times. Now, all of Tribune's nine Washington bureaus are "co-located" in the same building, with a common reception area and a centralized open meeting place where daily meetings to coordinate coverage take place around a U-shaped conference table.

DOJ_NMG_0093310

When the idea of joining Washington bureaus first was raised, many Times Mirror editors objected strenuously. They argued that their stories needed to be tailored to individual markets and they couldn't share reporters with a paper from Chicago or Virginia.

Tribune is famous for benchmarking studies that compare its papers to one another. The company uses various measures, such as editorial costs as a percentage of revenue, number of staffers, average pay, newsprint and nonpayroll expenses.

In 2003, to push back on the question of the Washington bureau, Gerould Kern, Tribune's vice president of editorial, took a number of stories over a period of several months and compared them. "There was a high degree of overlapping coverage of routine events," Mr. Kern recalls. "There weren't a lot of stories that were related to their markets."

At that time, Mr. Kern says Tribune's D.C. bureaus were sharing as little as 8% of their content. Today, 35% to 40% of the content from D.C. is shared between papers, he says. The Los Angeles Times takes stories "less so than others," he says, but they do use some from the Chicago Tribune and other papers, while still debating about how to credit them.

The changes have allowed Tribune to cut the size of its D.C. newspaper and TV operations from 130 reporters in 2003 to 107 today.

Mr. Kern's studies also revealed another source of tension. In comparison after comparison, the Chicago Tribune was putting out its paper with fewer employees. L.A. Times executives countered that their product was of a higher quality.

In the summer of 2005, Mr. Carroll retired, citing the budget cuts as a primary reason. He was succeeded by Mr. Baquet. The paper's publisher, John Puerner, had left earlier that year for similar reasons.

In the last weeks of Mr. Carroll's tenure, Tribune surveyed the staffs of all its 11 papers. At the L.A. Times, the results showed that staff members supported Messrs. Carroll and Baquet and yet were "devastating in their attitude towards Tribune," Mr. Baquet says. When he first took over as editor, "I wanted to ease that."

Mr. Baquet went to Tribune-wide editors' meetings held roughly twice a year. Mr. Carroll didn't engage in such events. "John may as well have taken his shoes off to clip his nails at those meetings," says one top Tribune company editor, an assessment Mr. Carroll doesn't dispute. At one such meeting earlier this year, Mr. FitzSimons, Tribune's CEO, pulled Mr. Baquet aside and said how much he appreciated his participation in the discussion, according to people familiar with the matter.

In fall 2005, shortly after Mr. Baquet took the job as editor, Mr. Kern, Tribune's editorial vice president, said all of the company's newspapers needed to cut 25% from their foreign budgets, according to people familiar with the matter. Mr. Baquet told colleagues he planned to take a lead role in the project to maintain as much control as possible.

As part of that year's cuts, the Times shut down one of its three printing plants and cut about 300 jobs, or between 8% and 10% of its work force. Roughly 90 of those were newsroom jobs.

As cost pressures increased, the two papers continued to spar, even about seemingly insignificant details. Last year, the Los Angeles Times won two Pulitzers -- one for a series on racial injustice and another on Russia's struggle with terrorism. The Chicago Tribune won one, for an account of a deadly 10-second tornado in Utica, Ill. When Tribune Co. sent out a congratulatory note to employees, the Chicago Tribune was listed before the Los Angeles Times. Staffers at the L.A. Times felt that Tribune had again shown preference for its hometown paper.

Earlier this year, the L.A. Times sent a reporter to cover a murder in Wisconsin, something that irked some Tribune executives, according to people familiar with their thinking. They thought such a story should have been left to the Chicago Tribune.

In May, Jeff Johnson, then publisher of the L.A. Times, went to Chicago to discuss budgets for 2007. He was told to cut another $45 million, roughly the same amount he had cut the year before, according to people familiar with the exchange. That was roughly twice what the Chicago Tribune was asked to cut from its budget, according to people familiar with both paper's finances.

DOJ_NMG_0093311

Mr. Johnson, having suffered through one round of cost cutting, balked. After he returned to Los Angeles, Mr. Johnson, along with Mr. Baquet, was quoted in an L.A. Times story opposing the proposed budget cuts. Mr. Johnson's words carried a special edge because he had worked on the Tribune side of the house before moving to Los Angeles.

L.A. Times columnist Steve Lopez supported Mr. Johnson's apostasy. In an interview with the New York Times, he said the publisher had taken "a stiff drink of the Dean Baquet Kool-Aid."

Many predicted Mr. Johnson would be fired. Los Angeles civic leaders sent a letter to Mr. FitzSimons complaining about budget cuts. Wealthy Angelenos, including entertainment mogul David Geffen and real-estate tycoon Eli Broad, have expressed interest in buying the paper.

In early October, David Hiller, then publisher of the Chicago Tribune, flew to Los Angeles with Mr. Smith and several other Tribune executives. Tribune had decided that Mr. Hiller was going to take over at the L.A. Times and that Mr. Johnson was out.

People at the paper say an L.A. Times reporter received a tip that the men were in town. The reporter had also heard that Mr. Hiller's reservation was for a longer stay than that of the other executives, these people say. He passed the news onto a few editors, who surmised it meant that Mr. Johnson was out.

That Wednesday and Thursday, as the rumor spread, a steady stream of senior editors went into Mr. Baquet's office and urged him to stay, regardless of what happened to Mr. Johnson. Mr. Baquet didn't make any promises, according to several of the people who talked to him, but said he would put the paper first in any decision he made about his future.

Tribune planned to announce the change of publisher on Thursday. At breakfast that day, Mr. Hiller met Mr. Baquet at the Omni hotel in downtown Los Angeles, a few blocks from the Times's headquarters. When the waiter came by to pour Mr. Hiller's coffee, Mr. Baquet says he raised his hand to block the move, adding: "He'll have Kool-Aid." Mr. Hiller laughed, Mr. Baquet recalls.

Mr. Hiller said he was coming to the job with no preconceived notions, both men say. He asked Mr. Baquet to stay on at the paper and try to reach an accommodation. Mr. Baquet says he agreed.

In his first day on the job, Mr. Hiller went to the paper's news meeting. He was asked about the differences between the Tribune and the Times. Some L.A. Times staffers wanted him to acknowledge that theirs was a better paper, according to people who were there. Mr. Hiller ducked the question. He talked about how the two cities were different and how the papers were similar.

Earlier this week, Mr. Hiller put out a memo to the Times staff, saying that the paper needed to "focus relentlessly on growing local audience," unlike, he said, the New York Times, a paper that has been steadily increasing national coverage. He concluded: "We cannot allow ourselves to feel victimized by change or be in denial of what needs to be done to move us ahead." Many saw the news as a sign of more cuts to come.

On Tuesday, Mr. Baquet announced he was leaving. His replacement, James O'Shea, a longtime editor at the Chicago Tribune, takes over from Mr. Baquet as editor of the L.A. Times on Monday. In an interview last week before his appointment was made public, he said reporters should be worrying more about readership than about cost cutting.

"The whole damn industry is focused on the wrong thing," he said. "We're all worried about how many people we have, and what we should really be worried about is declining readership."

At Mr. O'Shea's going-away party earlier this week, he got an ovation from the Chicago Tribune newsroom, say people who were there. They also gave him a gift: a plastic shield and body armor.

Write to Sarah Ellison at sarah.ellison@wsj.com1

ENVIRONMENT:

EPA Wants Man Fined For Silence On Pollution Role (SPT)

By Carrie Weimar

St Petersburg (FL) Times, November 11, 2006

TAMPA - A Dover business owner is facing fines of $32,500 a day for failing to comply with requests from the Environmental Protection Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0093312

In a criminal complaint, the federal agency accuses Hugh Johnson, owner of Johnson's Oil Service, of ignoring requests for information regarding his alleged involvement in the pollution of what became a Superfund site in Polk County.

The site, 5015 State Road 60 in Mulberry, is the former home of Sadler Drum, which specialized in the washing and reconditioning of chemical drums. The owner abandoned the site in 1997, leaving hundreds of empty containers.

The EPA investigated the site and discovered the presence of dozens of dangerous chemicals. The cleanup cost more than $900,000 and 65 potentially responsible parties were identified, including Johnson, according to court documents.

Johnson did not return messages left at Johnson Oil Service on Friday.

The EPA sent a registered letter to Johnson in June 2003, requesting more information. Johnson signed for the letter but did not respond, the court documents said.

Letters also were sent in July and August 2004. Again, Johnson signed for them but did not respond, the documents said.

In June 2006, the Justice Department intervened, sending notice to Johnson he must respond or face judicial enforcement. Johnson did not respond.

The EPA is asking a judge to fine Johnson up to $27,500 a day for each day of noncompliance between June 2003 and March 2004. The amount increases to $32,500 a day after March 2004.

No trial date has yet been set.

Carrie Weimar can be reached at 813 226-3416 or cweimar@sptimes.com

Lawsuit Says Family Damaged Wetlands In Chesapeake (VP)

By Scott Harper

Virginian-Pilot, November 11, 2006

NORFOLK - The Justice Department has filed a federal lawsuit seeking fines and restoration of nontidal wetlands in southern Chesapeake that the government says were damaged in 1999.

But the property owners, the Bosher family, said this week that they did nothing wrong and that they were cleaning out existing ditches on their farmland at the time.

Family members say they have since spent thousands of dollars trying to clarify the issue with federal regulators, to no avail.

"It's been the most expensive, prolonged and painful experience," said Kitty Bosher, president and secretary of Sea Bay Development Corp. and Green Sea Farms LLC.

The two entities, both family-run, are listed as the owners of the site in question, known as the Bosher tract. At 1,560 acres, the tract is one of the largest undeveloped properties left in southern Chesapeake.

The case is another in a series of federal actions in recent years intended to protect nontidal wetlands - low-lying fields and forests found throughout Hampton Roads that filter pollutants, control flooding and provide wildlife habitat.

Such land features often are hard to differentiate from slightly squishy, unregulated properties, however, and do not resemble cattail-lined marshes and swamps, which are considered tidal wetlands.

Energy Demand Is Expected To Rise In 4th Quarter (WSJ)

By Spencer Swartz

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

LONDON -- The International Energy Agency said global energy demand will jump in the fourth quarter because of U.S. consumption, while demand for oil produced by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries will rise to its highest level in four years.

The energy watchdog Friday said global oil demand will rise 2.6% from the year-earlier period, when demand was crimped by mild weather and the impact of Hurricane Katrina in the U.S., the world's biggest energy market.

In its widely watched monthly oil-market report for November, the IEA said global demand for OPEC oil is expected to rise 1.6 million barrels a day in the fourth quarter from the third quarter because of weaker output from non-OPEC countries.

The IEA trimmed its outlook for growth in 2006 global oil demand to 1.1% from 1.2% in its October report. Demand growth for 2007 was unchanged at 1.7%, the agency said. The IEA revised its fourth-quarter forecast for non-OPEC supply to 51.7 million barrels a day, a decrease of 200,000 barrels a day, and pegged 2006 growth at 700,000 barrels a day, saying weaker supplies in the North Sea, Russia, China, Brazil and Angola will counter "upward adjustments for North America, Australia, Azerbaijan and non-OPEC biofuels."

DOJ_NMG_0093313

The Paris-based IEA's outlook points to tighter market conditions and higher energy prices just as OPEC oil-production cuts take effect. OPEC's output cuts, aimed unofficially at supporting oil prices back to the $60-a-barrel level, were sharply criticized by some oil analysts because of the onset of winter in the Northern Hemisphere and uncertainty about the strength of the global economy.

"To make an output cut in the fourth quarter is clearly going to tighten the market, the extent of which depends on how much output is actually cut and that's an uncertain situation," said Lawrence Eagles, editor of the IEA's monthly oil report.

Overall, the IEA expects OPEC's Doha deal to bolster falling oil prices by cutting 1.2 million barrels a day of actual output that will yield a physical reduction of 600,000 barrels a day to 900,000 barrels a day. "Depending upon compliance by non-Gulf members, some 600,000 to 900,000 barrels a day might be removed from the market as a result of the Doha decision," the report said.

Bill Allowing More Drilling Along Coasts Appears Dead (NYT)

By Clifford Krauss

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

HOUSTON, Nov. 9 — Just a few months ago House Republicans and representatives of the energy industry were poised to rewrite a quarter-century of national energy policy and open the seas off the Atlantic and Pacific coasts to oil and gas drilling, which environmentalists had fervently resisted.

But Tuesday's Democratic victory in midterm elections has changed the legislative landscape, obliterating the chances that anything close to the aggressive drilling bill passed by the House of Representatives will be enacted for years to come.

Now, with the Democrats' mid-term election victory, the proponents of drilling off the nation's beaches are reluctantly jockeying to settle for a small patch of new offshore exploration allowed in a competing and more modest Senate drilling bill. "I don't want to end up having no progress," said Representative John E. Peterson, a Pennsylvania Republican who is a leading proponent for expanded offshore drilling. "Something is better than nothing."

He added, "With Nancy Pelosi as speaker it will be difficult to talk about producing in the outer continental shelf."

Dave Parker, president of the American Gas Association, which represents utilities, said: "It's a matter of being pragmatic. The Republicans who had thought they would retain control basically now have one option, which is to accept the Senate-passed version."

The Senate bill opens to bidding 8.3 million acres of federal waters in the Gulf of Mexico. The waters, south of the Florida Panhandle and 235 miles west of Tampa, are thought to hold 5.8 trillion cubic feet of natural gas and 1.3 billion barrels of crude oil.

Exxon Mobil, Shell, BP, ConocoPhillips and many independents are expected to make bids in the area, known as Lease Area 181, which is attractive because it is relatively shallow and close to pipelines and other infrastructure built previously.

Many lawmakers and energy industry officials had expressed little enthusiasm for the Senate bill before the election. They said it was too limited because it would produce, at most, only the equivalent of two months of domestic demand for oil, along with enough gas to cool and heat six million homes for 15 years.

Unlike the House version, the Senate bill would prohibit drilling over a far greater area, in particular a section 125 miles off most of Florida's west coast.

The House bill, passed in June, would virtually eliminate a federal moratorium on drilling on most of the outer continental shelf off the Atlantic and Pacific coasts that has been in place since 1982. In the summer, energy industry leaders were in strong support of the House bill.

Industry officials said drilling off the two coasts would add enormous amounts of oil and gas to the national inventory over many years, though the exact amounts are not known.

DOJ_NMG_0093314

Brian J. Kennedy, deputy chief of staff for the House Committee on Resources, conceded that there was now no chance of expanding offshore drilling at anything close to what the House had hoped for, but he expressed hope that a law could be enacted in the lame-duck session.

Speaking of Representative Richard W. Pombo of California, chairman of the Resources Committee and chief backer of the House bill, Mr. Kennedy added, "The chairman wants a bill and he'll do everything he can to make sure we get a bill." Mr. Pombo lost his re-election bid.

Mr. Kennedy said Senate and House leaders had already agreed to some compromises, a provision to recover up to $13 billion in lost revenue from energy companies and a set-aside of some future energy production revenue for rural schools.

Some Senate Republicans would like to amend the Senate bill to give Virginia an option to opt out of the moratorium, according to Congressional sources. But it remains doubtful Senate Democratic leaders would go along with such a version.

Before the midterm election was tallied, lobbyists for energy and manufacturing companies switched tack and began pressing Congressional leaders and the White House to enact the Senate bill passed in August and discard most if not all of the far more ambitious House bill.

Industry officials said the lobbying campaign began weeks ago when it became clear that Democrats had a good chance of taking the House. "I would hope that the House could appreciate what is possible and try to help move forward for the American people," John Hofmeister, president of Shell Oil, said in an interview. "Let's get a bill cleared that the president can sign."

IMMIGRATION:

Democrats To "Revisit" Law Creating Border Fence (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, November 11, 2006

Democrats will look again at the legislation mandating 698 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border and might seek to scrap the plan altogether when they take control of Congress next year.

Rep. Bennie Thompson, Mississippi Democrat, told reporters this week that he expected to "revisit" the issue when he becomes chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee in the 110th Congress.

Mr. Thompson said the Department of Homeland Security's (DHS) new border enforcement program, known as the Secure Border Initiative or SBI Net -- which includes monitors, cameras and other integrated surveillance systems -- is a viable alternative to fencing.

"We might do away with it, or look at [integrating it into] SBI Net," he said. "A virtual fence rather than a real one."

President Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff have voiced similar concerns about building the fence.

DHS spokesman Russ Knocke told United Press International that in remote border areas, "virtual fencing ... is more advantageous," whereas "traditional fencing has a core role in our border security strategy ... especially in urban areas."

"We're optimistic that working with Congress we'll get the flexibility to integrate traditional fencing into a seamless, high-tech border security system," Mr. Knocke said.

Mr. Thompson also pledged more aggressive oversight of the department, saying that improving its responsiveness to congressional requests for information and reports would be at the "top of my agenda."

He said his committee would seek to boost funding for rail and mass transit; strengthen security regulations for chemical plants and container cargo; and implement what he said were a number of recommendations from the September 11 commission that have yet to be addressed.

Mr. Thompson pledged to pass an authorization bill for the department. The committee has approved an authorization bill the past three years, but the legislation hasn't passed the full Senate, which some attribute to turf conflicts with other committees.

Mr. Thompson acknowledged that "there will still be some split jurisdiction," but maintained that Democrats would be in a better position to work out turf issues. "We can make it work," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0093315

He pledged to demand answers from Mr. Chertoff on what he said was an unacceptable level of vacancies in the department's senior ranks.

"The secretary needs to come clean with the committee and tell us why he can't fill these positions," Mr. Thompson said, adding that Mr. Chertoff would need to come up with ideas to address the situation, "or we will have to provide some ideas for him."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush, Pelosi Pledge To Work Together (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - After demonizing each other on the campaign trail, President Bush and House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi met over plates of pasta at the White House on Thursday and agreed to seek common ground on Iraq and other national problems.

The bipartisan pledges of cooperation generated considerable skepticism in Washington, a city accustomed to partisan warfare. But Bush has reached effectively across party lines before, both as governor of Texas and early in his presidency.

"We won't agree on every issue," Bush told reporters after the peacemaking lunch. "But we do agree that we love America equally, that we're concerned about the future of this country and that we will do our very best to address big problems."

Pelosi, a California liberal who's in line to become speaker of the House of Representatives, said she would use her leadership role to represent "all of the House, not just the Democrats."

Bush also reached out to Senate Democrats, who took control of their chamber Thursday when Sen. George Allen, R-Va., conceded defeat to Democrat James Webb. Bush placed a congratulatory phone call to Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and invited him to the White House on Friday.

Some Democrats who have worked with Bush in the past said Tuesday's elections brought out a side of him that's been missing in recent years.

Former Texas state Rep. Paul Sadler, a Democrat who considers Bush a friend, said he was puzzled by the style the president adopted when he moved to Washington in 2000. "It's almost like he was hijacked," Sadler said.

In Texas, Bush worked closely with Sadler and other Democrats on a host of issues, including an unsuccessful effort to overhaul the state's tax system. The late Lt. Gov. Bob Bullock, the state's leading Democrat at the time, became so fond of Bush that he supported his re-election as governor.

As a presidential candidate, Bush pledged to bring that spirit to Washington, saying he wanted to be "a uniter, not a divider." He started out that way, at least on some issues. During his first year in office, Bush joined forces with Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., to pass his No Child Left Behind education law.

"The folks at the Crawford Coffee Shop would be somewhat shocked when I told them I actually like the fellow. He is a fabulous United States senator," Bush said when he signed the legislation in January 2002 with Kennedy at his side. "When he's against you, it's tough. When he's with you, it is a great experience."

The fracture in bipartisan cooperation widened during the 2002 election, when Bush cast Democrats as soft on terrorism. It became a chasm with the bitterness over the Iraq war.

Former Texas State Rep. Mark Stiles, another Democrat who worked with Bush, blamed party politics for Bush's transition from uniter to divider. Stiles, who quit politics and is now a political independent, said he has been surprised by the harshness of Bush's campaign attacks.

"That's not the George Bush that I know. He can work with anybody," Stiles said. "When you get up there, things change. Maybe the system's changed him."

Both Sadler and Stiles speculated that political adviser Karl Rove pushed the president to become more partisan. Rove, who's known for hardball politics, is one of the few presidential advisers who came with Bush from Texas and remains on the job. He's considered Bush's closest adviser, eclipsed only by the president's wife.

DOJ_NMG_0093316

To be sure, Democrats also have played a big role in escalating partisan warfare. But on Thursday, both Bush and Pelosi tried to distance themselves from their previous attacks on each other.

"The elections are now behind us," Bush said. "But the challenges still remain."

On A Shifting Field, A Sense Of Rising Expectations (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 9 — It was no doubt inadvertent, but it was hard not to find some symbolism in the moment Thursday in the Oval Office when President Bush seemed to forget that Vice President Dick Cheney was in the room.

Representatives Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader who is soon to become the first female speaker of the House, and Steny H. Hoyer, the Democratic whip, had come to the White House for lunch. As the two Democrats, Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney sat in front of a fireplace, the president spoke about the importance of working together to get things done.

"Both of us recognize — all three of us," Mr. Bush said, apparently referring to himself, Ms. Pelosi and Mr. Hoyer, "recognize that when you win, you have a responsibility to do the best you can for the country."

The omission of Mr. Cheney, the embodiment of the administration's approach to national security, raised an intriguing question. As Mr. Bush grapples with the loss of his Republican majority in Congress, how far will he go to reinvent himself, and who — or what philosophies — is he willing to jettison along the way?

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has already been pushed out the door, and there were questions on Thursday about the future of Karl Rove, the political strategist whose divide-and-conquer tactics failed on Tuesday for the first time. Asked what role Mr. Rove would play now, Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, offered little insight.

"That's a good process question," Mr. Snow said, "for which I don't have an answer."

It has been six years since Mr. Bush was elected on a record of working with moderate Democrats in Texas and a promise of being "a uniter, not a divider." In that time, his efforts at unity have been intended mostly to hold together and motivate his conservative base: social conservatives who oppose same-sex marriage, fiscal conservatives who demand spending restraint, neo-conservatives whose muscular foreign policy vision provided the foundation for the democracy agenda and the Iraq war.

Now that Republicans have taken what he calls "a thumping" — losing control of both the House and Senate in a virtual political earthquake — Mr. Bush is striking a conciliatory note. Last week, Democrats were weak on defense and wrong on taxes. By Thursday, Mr. Bush had this to say about them:

"We won't agree on every issue, but we do agree that we love America equally, that we're concerned about the future of this country and that we will do our very best to address big problems."

It might seem like the new George W. Bush — or maybe the old one, returning to his Texas governor roots. But, Republicans say, it is really just the same President Bush — the first M.B.A. president, pragmatic enough to recognize, as he himself might say, that he must adjust his tactics to changing conditions on the ground.

"You're seeing the George Bush who has always been adept at playing the hand he is dealt," said Charlie Black, a Republican strategist with close ties to the White House.

Vin Weber, a Republican former congressman and lobbyist, put it this way: "I've never thought that George Bush was a rigid ideologue; I've never thought that he was a hardened partisan. He is a businessman first, and in business you don't spend a lot of time crying about changed circumstances. You figure out quickly how to adapt, and that's what he's doing."

But Mr. Bush demonstrated Thursday that he is not going overboard to adapt.

With his cabinet arrayed behind him, he greeted reporters in the Rose Garden to say that, before Republicans ceded control of Congress at the end of the year, he wanted them to pass legislation codifying his authority to run a once-secret domestic wiretapping program — anathema to many Democrats. Mr. Bush is also pressing the lame-duck Senate to confirm John R. Bolton, whom he installed as ambassador to the United Nations during a recess, circumventing Democrats who oppose Mr. Bolton.

Mr. Snow, the press secretary, was told that did not exactly sound like an olive branch, and he replied, "Let me put it this way, olive branches work in two directions."

DOJ_NMG_0093317

Neo-conservatives, though chastened by Tuesday's results, said they did not expect radical change, despite Mr. Bush's announcement that he would nominate Robert M. Gates, a former C.I.A. director, to succeed Mr. Rumsfeld.

"I don't think Gates means the president is looking for a way out of Iraq," said William Kristol, the editor of The Weekly Standard, a conservative magazine. "Gates means he knew he had to make a change and get a fresh face in to build public support. So long as Bush is president, he's not going to want to withdraw from Iraq, and he's not going to want to go back to a pre-9/11 foreign policy, and that's really the core of it."

Democrats, not surprisingly, were a tad suspicious. Tom Daschle, who served as Democratic leader of the Senate during the brief period when Democrats were in the majority under Mr. Bush, said he saw little evidence that the White House could depart from its "arrogance and extraordinary single-mindedness."

Mr. Daschle invoked Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California, who famously repaired his relationship with Democrats. "But I don't think he's motivated in the same way," Mr. Daschle said of Mr. Bush. "Arnold Schwarzenegger wanted to get re-elected. There's no real motivation for Bush."

But there is motivation for Democrats — and Mr. Bush intends to exploit that if he can.

"Their whole theme has been the do-nothing Congress," Mr. Black, the Republican strategist, said. "Now, if they get in there and make themselves vulnerable to that charge, it hurts them in '08. He knows that they have an incentive to get things done, and he's going to take advantage of that."

If it works — and that is a big if — some Republicans say it could be an opportunity for Mr. Bush to refurbish his presidency. It is an old saw of politics that you never win by losing, but Tuesday's drubbing leaves Mr. Bush a liberated man, free to cooperate with Democrats without worrying about his base or the next election.

"It could be the saving grace of his administration," said Kenneth M. Duberstein, chief of staff to President Ronald Reagan, "because it gives him an opportunity to demonstrate real presidential leadership that is inclusive, right of center but not far right of center, which is where the American people are."

Gridlock Need Not Be Inevitable For Bush (AP-Y)

By Laurie Kellman, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

Now that voters have rejected one-party rule in Washington, can a president of one party and a Congress led by the other play nicely enough to accomplish anything in the next two years?

It's been done in the past.

Still, President Bush and lawmakers on both sides of the aisle will have to put aside at least some of their pre-election rancor and suppress any desire to get even.

For his part, Bush tried to move past the bitter tone of the campaign within hours of its end by granting a top demand of the Democrats: the ouster of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. And he invited newly empowered Democratic leaders to lunch at the White House — serving Speaker-in-waiting Nancy Pelosi her favorite food, chocolate.

For her part, Pelosi stopped calling Bush incompetent and dangerous. Instead, she made a point of deeming the lunch lovely and speaking of "some areas" where bipartisanship was possible.

Yet to be seen is whether the conciliatory gestures and promises to work together can endure long enough for Congress and the president to produce laws addressing big problems and restore trust in the government.

Role models exist. So does the motivation to follow their lead as the two years before the 2008 elections tick away. Providing the opportunity: a slate of stalled legislation on immigration, Iraq and terrorism that voters named as important in exit polls this week.

Bush and Congress might follow the lead of President Eisenhower and the new Democratic majority of 1954, which established the Interstate highway system less than two years later.

They can look to President Nixon, who signed into law major environmental initiatives — the Clean Air Act and the Environmental Protection Agency — negotiated with Democratic majorities on Capitol Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0093318

Ronald Reagan and the Democratic House and Senate passed legislation sustaining Social Security for another three decades. A key deficit reduction program and the Americans With Disabilities Act became law when Democrats ran the Congress and Bush's father was president.

And in the 1990s, President Clinton and a new Republican majority overhauled the nation's welfare laws, an achievement each side hailed as one of its best.

Many experts say that Democrats and Republicans are too polarized for that to happen now, despite the initial overtures of good will.

"White House officials do not expect that a Democratic-controlled Congress would work with them in any sincere or meaningful way," said George C. Edwards III, a political science professor at Texas A&M University. "True or not, this perception could become a self-fulfilling prophecy."

Democrats admit to struggling with the temptation to get even for six years of being shut out of final negotiations with the White House and majority Republicans on major issues like homeland security, tax cuts and the Medicare prescription drug program.

But both Bush and the Democrats have reasons to mend fences. In the twilight of a wartime presidency, Bush could polish his legacy by reviving his uniter-not-a-divider campaign promise of 2000.

Lawmakers in both parties, some of them beginning what amounts to a two-year job interview for the presidency, also have an incentive to move away from confrontation politics. If they need a reminder, they might look at the 61 percent disapproval rating Congress received in the exit polls this week.

As for Bush, he's got a long way to build on the 43 percent approval rating those same polls gave him.

"There's no way in the world that Democrats can achieve anything if we try to get even," cautioned Rep. Charlie Rangel of New York, the likely next chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

Opportunities for forging compromises addressing serious problems include:

• Overhauling immigration policy to bestow legal status on some of the 11 million illegal immigrants in the country.

• Agreeing on a course for the war in Iraq, the top issue voters identified in pre-election polls.

• Fixing the alternative minimum tax, a measure that was intended to close tax loopholes for millionaires but that now, through inflation, threatens to impose higher taxes on millions of middle-income families.

_Addressing looming insolvencies in the Social Security and Medicare programs as post-World War II baby boomers retire.

_Improving health programs for the nation's 24 million veterans and the tens of thousands more who will pile into the system as a result of Iraq and Afghan wars.

Bush Meets With Pelosi; Both Vow Cooperation (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Jonathan Weisman, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

President Bush, confronted face to face with the reality of divided government, broke bread with the two top House Democrats at the White House and vowed not to allow partisan divisions to hobble the remaining two years of his presidency.

After meeting separately with his Cabinet and the outgoing GOP congressional leadership, Bush laid out an agenda for the lame-duck congressional session that begins next week, including a nuclear technology deal with India, a free-trade agreement with Vietnam and his plan to permit wiretapping of terrorism suspects without a court warrant.

But prospects for controversial items such as wiretapping legislation seemed remote yesterday, as the concession of Sen. George Allen (R) in Virginia made it official that the Democrats will control that chamber as well as the House come January.

Meeting with reporters in her office after meeting with Bush at the White House, the House speaker-to-be, Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), said Democrats could reach accord with Bush on the legislation but will insist on some kind of judicial review of each wiretap the Justice Department seeks.

Pelosi and Bush offered smiles and pledges of cooperation as they faced reporters in the Oval Office after a lunch of pasta salad in the president's private dining room. "We won't agree on every issue," Bush said. "But we do agree that we love America equally, that we are concerned about the future of the country and that we will do our very best to address big problems."

DOJ_NMG_0093319

"We both extended the hand of friendship," said Pelosi, who will be the first female speaker of the House in history when the new Congress convenes.

The meeting was the first substantive discussion between Bush and Democrats since the election Tuesday returned the opposition party to power on Capitol Hill. In recent years, Bush has governed without the support of congressional Democrats on most issues, and the new political reality will require him to work much more closely with Pelosi and the soon-to-be Senate majority leader, Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). Bush is to meet today with Reid and Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), the next Democratic whip.

Despite deep philosophical differences and sharp election-year rhetoric from both sides, the White House and congressional Democrats may share some interest in finding common ground on such issues as overhauling the immigration system, education and energy, according to lawmakers and administration officials. Democratic leaders seem anxious to show they can deliver as a governing party after years in opposition, while Bush is aware that his final two years will be bereft of any significant initiative unless he can work with the party he demonized on the campaign trail.

Despite conciliatory rhetoric, there were flashes yesterday of the potential obstacles ahead. The White House once again asked the Senate to approve the nomination of controversial U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton, who holds the post after a recess appointment, but Democrats -- and a key Republican -- quickly moved to block the action. In her interview with reporters, Pelosi said Democrats will act immediately to reinstate lapsed budget rules, which mandate that any new tax cuts or spending increases be paid for with equal spending cuts or tax hikes. That would all but shut the door on Bush's main economic priority, making his first-term tax cuts permanent.

The new House and Senate leadership will also quickly challenge Bush on stem cell research, Pelosi said. Democrats expect to pass legislation early next year that would be almost identical to the only bill he has vetoed, a measure to expand federal funding of stem cells beyond the few lines already in existence. The addition of 29 Democratic seats in the House and six in the Senate is probably not enough to override a veto, Pelosi conceded, but Democrats hope to "build public support for a signature."

But Pelosi and the House's No. 2 Democrat, Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (Md.), who also attended the White House lunch, indicated they came away from their meeting with a sense that they could work with Bush. In an apparent effort to demonstrate goodwill, Pelosi added that Democrats will take up the "innovation agenda" laid out by Bush nearly a year ago in his State of the Union address, and pass his proposals to increase funding for basic scientific research and alternative energy programs.

Hoyer said in an interview that he believed the two sides could also reach agreement on a comprehensive immigration bill that includes both tough enforcement measures and some kind of guest-worker program. Such legislation has been blocked by House GOP leadership, and Hoyer pointed out, "The Senate Democrats and the Senate Republicans and the House Democrats are more in agreement than the president and House Republicans."

Hoyer, who faces a challenge for the job of majority leader from Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), described the lunch session as a cordial meeting in which a variety of topics -- fiscal policy, Social Security, Medicare and Iraq, among others -- were discussed in general terms. He said Vice President Cheney also attended but said little beyond pleasantries.

"There was no point in time where we said, 'We'll support this, and the president would support that.' That was not the point of the meeting," Hoyer said. He said Pelosi "clearly made the point that the American people believe that we are doing in Iraq is not working, and we need to address it. . . . The president said, 'I hope we can discuss that.' "

Pelosi has indicated that the first order of business when the new House convenes will be a package of bills touted during the campaign that include raising the minimum wage, cutting student loan rates and allowing the federal government to negotiate lower drug prices with pharmaceutical companies -- which Congress barred when it approved a new Medicare drug plan for seniors.

On some issues, Democrats are plainly hoping to put Bush on the defensive with legislation they believe is popular with the American people -- confronting Bush with a choice of whether to go along or fight on unfavorable terrain.

"They are not going to invite each other to their respective Christmas dinners, but I think there's an agenda that Pelosi has put on the table that the president could embrace," said John Podesta, the president of the Center for American Progress and a former Clinton White House chief of staff. "It's kind of galling to him to do it, but the public would reward him. Having to explain to the American people why you wouldn't want the authority to negotiate with drug companies about prices would be hard to do."

DOJ_NMG_0093320

Edward Kutler, a Washington lobbyist and former aide to onetime GOP Speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.), said the Democrats seem to be dangling "veto bait" before the president that could "poison the well" before too long. "There's possibility for bipartisan compromise," he said, "but there's a limited window and there's a limited universe of issues."

"A lot of Republicans are going to say, the Democrats won -- let's let the Democrats produce legislation and see what can be done," he added.

Once the honeymoon ends, said John J. Pitney Jr., a congressional expert at Claremont McKenna College, "not a lot" will get done. "The relationship is going to be a mix between cooperation and confrontation, but given the chemistry, confrontation is going to be much more prevalent," he said.

Bush could work w ith a Democratic legislature when he was a governor. But, referring to the late conservative Democratic legislative leader in Texas, Pitney asked: "Does Nancy Pelosi look like Bob Bullock? Congressional Democrats are quite different from their counterparts in Austin."

White House counselor Dan Bartlett said of the Pelosi-Bush-Hoyer session: "It genuinely was a positive meeting. The attitude of the Democratic leaders was one of cooperation."

Referring to energy, immigration and education, Bartlett added: "There are issues when you peel back the rhetoric where you find greater consensus."

Democratic Victory Raises Spirits Of Those Favoring Citizenship For Illegal Aliens (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

PHOENIX, Nov. 9 — Supporters of granting citizenship to some or all illegal immigrants say the Democratic takeover of Congress has galvanized their cause and could lead to sweeping changes in immigration law.

Democrats will take over leadership of committees in the House and the Senate that could guide new immigration legislation, while President Bush and the presumptive House speaker, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, have cast changes to immigration laws as an opportunity to demonstrate bipartisan bonhomie.

“We have never had the table set for the possibility of action as we do now,” Andrea LaRue, a Democratic political consultant, said in a conference call with reporters.

Some immigration experts, however, predict a more arduous debate. Although conservative Republicans have led the opposition to accommodating some illegal immigrants, a handful of the newly elected Democrats, including Claire A. McCaskill of Missouri and Jim Webb of Virginia in the Senate, campaigned promising a tough approach to illegal immigration.

Some Democratic incumbents who won re-election did the same.

“It is still a long way from a deal,” said Roberto Suro of the Pew Hispanic Center, a Washington research group. “The question is, can somebody illuminate a middle ground where people who come at this issue from all different directions can reach a settlement.”

Supporters of more relaxed policies on illegal immigration count among the casualties of the Democratic victory at least 11 House members who had opposed giving illegal immigrants an opportunity to gain legal residency and, ultimately, citizenship.

Representative J. D. Hayworth published a book on immigration titled “Whatever It Takes” and campaigned heavily on a platform of sealing the border and ejecting illegal immigrants.

Although Mr. Hayworth, a six-term Republican from the suburbs of Phoenix, has not conceded defeat, unofficial tallies indicate that he has lost his seat by four percentage points to a Democrat, Harry Mitchell.

Mr. Mitchell, who is a former mayor of Tempe, had said that a path to citizenship made sense in some cases.

Also in Arizona, a self-described Minuteman border vigilante, Randy Graf, a Republican seeking an open seat near the border, was soundly defeated by Gabrielle Giffords, a Democrat willing to consider citizenship for some illegal immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0093321

The Republican-controlled Congress failed to pass a broad immigration bill this session, stuck over whether to provide steps toward citizenship for illegal immigrants, although a measure calling for 700 miles of fencing on the 2,000-mile border was approved, with the backing of several Democrats, and signed by Mr. Bush.

Many political analysts, however, called the fence an election-eve effort to placate conservatives that stood little chance of being completely built.

Still, the Federation for American Immigration Reform, a Washington group favoring tighter limits on immigration, said six state ballot initiatives making life harder on illegal immigrants were approved by voters on Tuesday, four of them in Arizona, where immigration is intensely discussed, and two in Colorado.

The Arizona measures include blocking illegal immigrants from collecting punitive damages in civil lawsuits, being released on bail for serious felonies and taking state-subsidized adult education and child care programs.

In Colorado, the measures require the state attorney general to sue the federal government for failing to enforce immigration laws and deny tax credits to employers who knowingly hire illegal workers.

Bruce Merrill, an Arizona State University pollster, said the measures were popular because voters believed the federal government was not taking action.

"My feeling is that the frustration with nothing being done was so strong that if there had been 10 initiatives dealing with cracking down on illegal immigration, all 10 of them would have passed," Mr. Merrill said.

"In other words," he said, "what the initiatives were proposing substantively may not have been as important as giving people something, anything, they could vote for to feel something was being done."

Advocates of a get-tough approach said that despite their losses they had gained in the battle of ideas.

"When the incumbent Democrat runs a race on securing the border and cutting taxes, our ideas are doing just fine, let's remember that," said Len Munsil, the Republican candidate for governor who was soundly defeated by the incumbent, Janet Napolitano, a Democrat.

The governor had declared an emergency on the border last year and called for National Guard troops to go there.

Senator Jon Kyl, a two-term Republican who supports a temporary guest worker program but not provisions that would lead to citizenship for illegal workers already here, won re-election by a healthy margin.

The final days of the race, however, focused less on immigration than on the backgrounds of the contenders.

Still, immigration advocates said the Democratic gains had brought new energy to a cause that seemed to flag after a round of demonstrations in the spring were followed by disappointing results in legislation and voter registration drives that fell short of goals.

The election "shows what we have been saying all along, that the anti-immigrant, enforcement-only rhetoric to motivate conservative voters was not reflecting where the majority of Americans are on this issue," said Angela Sembrano, director of the Central American Resource Center in Los Angeles, one of the groups that helped organize large pro-immigrant marches in the spring.

Ms. Sembrano and other protest leaders said that, in the afterglow of election night, they would refrain from detailing what they will ask of Democrats until they meet with the new leadership in the coming weeks. But Chung-Wha Hong, executive director the New York Immigration Coalition, said the goal would still be "legalization for as many people as possible."

People on all sides of the immigration debate had watched Arizona closely because illegal immigration has surged dramatically here in the past decade while its politics drifted toward the center from the right.

Earl de Berge, a veteran pollster here, said Republicans who made a hard-line approach the centerpiece of their campaigns misjudged a moderating shift.

"The fact is immigration was not, never has been, and is not the No. 1 issue in this state," Mr. De Berge said. "The big issues were the same as the ones nationally, the war, the economy and Bush and so on."

"The mistake Graf and Hayworth made," he said, "is that they simply were outmaneuvered by their own insistence on beating on that one issue."

"This," he added, "is a moderate state, not a conservative Republican state."

DOJ_NMG_0093322

Harry Reid, An Infighter With A Sharp Jab (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 9 — Harry Reid began Election Day with 50 situps and 80 push-ups (very red state of him) and 40 minutes of yoga (very blue state of him).

He spent most of the momentous day in his Senate office, waiting. Just after 2 p.m., he finally heard some actual news: Britney Spears was filing for divorce.

"Britney Spears," Mr. Reid said, shaking his head. "She loses a little weight, and now she's getting all cocky about things." He added, "Britney has gotten her mojo back."

Few would peg Mr. Reid, 66, as someone with anything to say about Britney Spears or, for that matter, someone who would ever use the word "mojo." But he is a tricky figure to pigeonhole or predict, a Democrat who is a Mormon opposed to abortion and who looks more like a civics teacher than someone set to become the most powerful person in the Senate.

He makes an unlikely front man, a role that was displayed Thursday amid chants of "Harry, Harry" at a Capitol Hill rally shortly after Senator George Allen's concession in Virginia ensured that Democrats would have a majority in the Senate. Mr. Reid is low-key, deferential and somewhat sheepish, qualities that make it easy to misread or underestimate him.

"People can say he is a nice guy, but that just totally misses it," said Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York. "He's got a spine of steel, and he will go toe-to-toe with anyone."

Harry Mason Reid is the product of the tiny desert town of Searchlight, Nev., whose father, a hard-rock miner, battled alcoholism and depression before killing himself at 58. The future senator hitchhiked 40 miles to attend high school in Henderson, where he became an amateur boxer.

He came to Washington to attend law school, working nights as a Capitol police officer. He was elected to the Nevada State Assembly at 28, served as lieutenant governor and later led the state's Gaming Commission, a job that pitted him against organized crime figures. (Mr. Reid's wife, Landra, once found a bomb under the hood of the family car.) He was elected to Congress in 1982, and moved to the Senate four years later.

Mr. Reid has brought his pugilistic sensibility to his career, often taking jabs at those he deems unworthy. In Mr. Reid's two-year run as minority leader, he called Alan Greenspan, the former Federal Reserve chairman, "a political hack"; Justice Clarence Thomas "an embarrassment"; and President Bush a "loser" and a "liar." Within that litany, Mr. Reid says he regrets only calling Mr. Bush a loser.

All of which has made Mr. Reid a reliable bogeyman among Republicans on the stump. But he has also enjoyed the loyalty and, for the most part, the unity of a potentially fractious Democratic caucus that includes several would-be presidential candidates.

That devotion was displayed and returned on election night, as Mr. Reid placed phone calls to successful Democratic Senate candidates from his suite at the Hyatt Regency Hotel.

"Bob, you did it, my man," Mr. Reid said to Senator Robert Menendez, who was re-elected in New Jersey.

"Hillary, you're the best to work with," Mr. Reid told Mrs. Clinton. "Love you," he signed off. (Mrs. Clinton offers that she ended the call by saying, "Love you, too, Harry.")

Mr. Reid also professed his love to Senator Kent Conrad, who was re-elected in North Dakota. ("Love you, man.")

Later, when Claire C. McCaskill, another Democrat, was declared the winner in Missouri, Mr. Reid kissed the television.

He and Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New Yorker who leads the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, kept whacking each other like kids. "Remember, Chuck, when they said Sherrod was too liberal?" Mr. Reid said of Sherrod Brown, the newly elected senator from Ohio.

Mr. Schumer said nothing, but gave Mr. Reid something between a pat on the head and a noogie.

By Thursday, the elation of early Wednesday had given way to exhaustion and talk of working with Republicans. "It is time for bipartisanship," Mr. Reid said at the rally, a few seconds after he was introduced for the first time as the majority leader of the Senate. (It is not official until January.)

DOJ_NMG_0093323

He took the stage to the blare of Sheryl Crow's "A Change Would Do You Good," but it looked as if a good night's sleep would do him better. His makeup could not hide the bags and crags on his un-Botoxed face.

People who know Mr. Reid say he is much more suited to work with Republicans than his partisan reputation would suggest.

"His personality will be more conducive to being a majority leader than minority leader," said Sig Rogich, a Republican consultant from Nevada and a close friend of Mr. Reid. "He has always been more of a consensus-building type than the over-the-top partisan that his current role has demanded."

Some of those considered the most effective recent majority leaders have been strategists and rule-book students, like George J. Mitchell, Democrat of Maine, or Bob Dole, Republican of Kansas. Mr. Reid's supporters say he fits in that tradition. "I doubt that anyone knows any more rules of the Senate than Harry," said Frank J. Fahrenkopf Jr., the former chairman of the Republican National Committee and a longtime friend of Mr. Reid.

Mr. Reid is often credited with outmaneuvering his predecessor, Senator Bill Frist, Republican of Tennessee, who had relatively little legislative experience when he became majority leader in 2003. Mr. Reid once shut down the Senate, invoking a little-used procedure to force closed-door discussion about the intelligence the Bush administration used to justify war in Iraq, and he succeeded in holding his caucus together to defeat efforts by Republicans to prohibit filibusters over judicial appointments, retaining a long-held Senate precedent. Mr. Reid voted against Mr. Bush's nominations of John G. Roberts Jr. and Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Supreme Court; opposed Republican efforts to abolish the estate tax; and supported giving the president authorization to invade Iraq, though he now advocates a phased withdrawal of American troops.

Mr. Reid will not venture a guess about what kind of majority leader he will be. "I'm going to throw bombs sometimes — I'm going to be conciliatory other times," he said in his office late Thursday. "If it comes to me that Alan Greenspan is a political hack, I'm just going to say that. I'm just going to be who I am. "

Mr. Reid added that he would "try not to be obnoxious," but also allowed that "the Senate is not a place for hugs and kisses." He said he realized that as a legislator, he could not get anything done without compromising with the president, whom he was scheduled to meet with Friday morning. He said he could not remember the last time he was invited to the White House.

"I have hope it will change," Mr. Reid said of his largely nonexistent working relationship with Mr. Bush and other administration officials. "Whether it will or not, I can't say."

Mr. Reid is nothing if not battle-worn and realistic, friends say. He describes himself as "a pessimist about everything in life," which is generally not something politicians admit.

"I never thought we could do it," he said of winning the Senate. "I knew it was possible in my head, but I never let my heart believe it."

Bush, Democrats Pledge To Work Together (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

President Bush opened the Oval Office Friday for a second day in a row to Democrats who will rule Capitol Hill next year, and both sides promised cooperation. But Democrats' heads were shaking over Bush demands for the current lame-duck GOP Congress to enact measures they oppose.

"It's a little bit of a mixed message, sure," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid, who is set to be majority leader when his party assumes power in January. "Folks are scratching their heads a little bit."

Bush invited Reid and the Senate's No. 2 Democrat, Dick Durbin, to his office for a nearly hourlong meeting aimed at charting a way forward in a government to be divided between a Republican White House and a Democratic Congress.

Bush had had lunch a day earlier with House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, expected be the next speaker of the House.

"My attitude about this is that there is a great opportunity for us to show the country that Republicans and Democrats are equally as patriotic and equally concerned about the future, and that we can work together," said Bush, appearing in a good-natured mood when he, Reid and Durbin appeared before reporters in the Oval Office afterward.

DOJ_NMG_0093324

Reid and Durbin agreed. "The only way to move forward is with bipartisanship and openness, and to get some results," Reid said. "And we've made a commitment, the four of us here today, that's what we're going to do."

Vice President Dick Cheney, who completed the foursome, did not speak in public.

Bush found common ground in the Western roots he shares with Reid, who is from Nevada. "We tend to speak the same language, pretty plainspoken people, which should bode well for our relationship," the president said.

But one of the president's first public acts after his party's losses in Tuesday's elections — voting that was widely seen as a rebuke of his leadership and policies — was to press for an aggressive agenda while Congress remains in GOP hands for the next two months.

On his list are at least two items deeply controversial to Democrats: legalizing his warrantless eavesdropping program, stalled in the Senate because of a Democratic filibuster threat, and confirming John Bolton to be U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, which Democrats have said is unlikely to happen.

Durbin had said on Thursday, "For a Republican Congress to have gone forward for two years and produced so little, and then for the president to come up with a huge agenda for the next two weeks, you have to ask him, 'Why didn't you use some of the time you spent arguing on some less important issues before?'"

White House press secretary Tony Snow said both the eavesdropping and Bolton-nomination issues were crucial, and that Democrats should see their merits.

"Bipartisanship works both ways," he said. "I don't think you should look at these as necessarily provocative."

Bolton has held the post on a temporary basis for more than a year, and Bush cannot make a second recess appointment of him. Without confirmation, Bolton would have to leave the job in January. Snow said the White House doesn't consider his nomination dead, despite statements from the Hill that make it seem that way.

Snow left open the possibility that Bolton could play the same role at the U.N., just with a different title.

"I'm not aware of that, but I am not going to rule anything in or out," he said.

Both Pelosi and Reid complimented Bush after the meetings. Pelosi said "I think we can find a way to have agreement on" the eavesdropping bill while making clear that would involve changes, such as adding some form of judicial review.

Manley said it was important that Bush was reaching out, noting Reid and the president probably had not met since the summer. But he also said many Democrats on Capitol Hill are skeptical after six years of being largely ignored.

For their part, Democrats are not shrinking from an agenda that Bush clearly does not like, including funding for embryonic stem cell research, government negotiation of drug prices and reinstating budget rules that would make extending the president's tax cuts difficult.

Bush, Pelosi Look Ahead Over Lunch (WT)

By Joseph Curl, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 10, 2006

President Bush and Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the likely speaker of the House, yesterday buried the hatchet -- gently -- as the two sat down for an Oval Office lunch after a vitriolic campaign that put Democrats in control of Congress for the first time in 12 years.

"Both of us recognize ... that when you win, you have a responsibility to do the best you can for the country," the president said. "The elections are now behind us, and the congresswoman's party won. ... Therefore, we're going to work together to address those challenges in a constructive way. We won't agree on every issue, but ... we will do our very best to address big problems."

On a day when Republicans conceded the last two contested Senate seats and made official the Democratic sweep of Congress, Mrs. Pelosi agreed that the leaders at the two ends of Pennsylvania Avenue wouldn't agree always -- or even often -- but offered her own olive branch after the bruising campaign.

"I look forward to working in a confidence-building way with the president, recognizing that we have our differences and we will debate them, and that is what our founders intended. But we will do so in a way that gets results for the American people," she said. "We've made history. Now we have to make progress. And I look forward to working with the president to do just that."

DOJ_NMG_0093325

Yesterday, Republican Sens. George Allen of Virginia and Conrad Burns of Montana formally acknowledged defeat in their re-election bids, giving the Democrats 49 seats in the chamber. Along with two Democrat-leaning independents, that will make Democratic Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada the next majority leader.

"It's time for results," Mr. Reid said at a raucous celebratory rally yesterday afternoon outside the Capitol.

But the campaign left a bitter trail between Mr. Bush and Mrs. Pelosi. She called him "incompetent," "oblivious, in denial, dangerous" and "shallow," and often implied that he was stupid, a man with "no judgment, no experience and no knowledge."

He mocked her as a liar who talked tax cuts but must be a "secret admirer" and warned that if she took the helm, "terrorists win and America loses."

When asked about yesterday's lunch menu, presidential counselor Dan Bartlett joked that "for the president, it's probably a little bit of crow."

Since the president suffered what he called a "thumping" in Tuesday's elections, he has already acquiesced twice to the San Francisco liberal's demands. On Wednesday, he accepted Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld's resignation, and yesterday, he offered an olive branch by saying he is "open to any idea or suggestion" on how to prosecute the war against terror and "and ensuring that Iraq's democratic government succeeds."

The new conciliatory stance is a far cry from what the president said repeatedly on the campaign trail.

"This debate on Iraq -- if you listen carefully for a Democrat plan for success, they don't have one," he said at one rally. "However they put it, the Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses. ... The Democrat goal is to get out of Iraq. The Republican goal is to win in Iraq."

But Mr. Bush, humbled by losing Republican control of both the House and the Senate, struck a new tone of bipartisanship yesterday after a morning meeting with his Cabinet. "It is our responsibility to put the elections behind us and work together on the great issues facing America. ... The American people expect us to rise above partisan differences, and my administration will do its part."

In the end, Mr. Bush, who has spent much of his time in office irking Democrats by going it alone, vowed with Mrs. Pelosi at his side that their luncheon was "the beginning of a series of meetings we'll have over the next couple of years, all aimed at solving problems and leading the country."

The president's priorities include the passage of spending bills funding government's continued operation "with strong fiscal discipline and without diminishing our capacity to fight the war on terror"; legislation retroactively authorizing his warrantless domestic surveillance of terror suspects; energy legislation; and congressional approval for a landmark civilian nuclear cooperation agreement with India and for normalizing trade relations with Vietnam.

The president hopes to be able to convince Democrats that those issues "rise above partisan difference." But Democrats have opposed many of his proposals in the past, and because they hold gavels in both chambers of Congress, they will be in the position to scrub his legislation.

With Democrats holding only the thinnest edge in the Senate, that chamber's Republicans can use all manner of procedural rules to have a major say in what happens.

"With 49 Republican senators, we still have the ability to shape and, when necessary, to block legislation," Sen. John Cornyn of Texas said on Fox.

For her part, Mrs. Pelosi has vowed not to seek Mr. Bush's impeachment or to tie up the House with punitive investigations of the executive branch, and yesterday repeated that pledge.

"Democrats are not about getting even. Democrats are about helping the American people to get ahead," she said.

At the Capitol Hill rally, Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York, who led Senate Democrats' re-election team, sounded a similar note.

"Our joy today will vanish if we can't produce for the American people," he said.

Still, Democrats fired plenty of warning shots on a variety of issues yesterday, including judicial nominations and the terrorist-surveillance bill.

"My message to the president would be: Send us moderate judicial candidates," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the Democratic whip. "Don't send us extreme candidates, because I think the president will run into trouble if he does."

DOJ_NMG_0093326

The two sides also remain divided over Iraq.

" 'Full speed ahead'? I don't think so," Mrs. Pelosi said on CNN, mocking Vice President Dick Cheney's assertion that the administration would continue its war strategy without change.

But Mr. Bush dug in his heels as well, saying that he will not consider pulling U.S. troops from Iraq before victory is achieved.

"If the goal is success, then we can work together. If the goal is get out now regardless, then that's going to be hard to work together," he said.

The president did acknowledge that although both sides can move away from their rhetoric, neither party will compromise their core values.

Mrs. Pelosi is "not going to abandon her principles and I'm not going to abandon mine," he said.

Bush In Overture To Democrats (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo, Edward Luce And Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington

Financial Times, November 10, 2006

President George W. Bush on Thursday said he would welcome new policy ideas on Iraq as he adopted a conciliatory tone following the capture of both houses of Congress by the Democrats.

Mr Bush's overture came as the Democrats sealed their election victory by securing the Virginia Senate seat they needed to clinch the narrowest of majorities in the upper house.

George Allen, the Republican senator and one-time presidential hopeful, conceded defeat to Jim Webb, his Democrat challenger, on Thursday evening.

The win gave the Democrats far greater control over foreign policy than their control of the House of Representatives alone would have offered.

Flanked by his cabinet in the White House Rose Garden, Mr Bush, who was already in danger of becoming a lame duck president after the Democrats took the House, urged both US parties to set aside differences on Iraq and domestic policy. He said: "I'm open to any idea or suggestion that will help us achieve our goals of defeating the terrorists and ensuring that Iraq's democratic government succeeds."

The Democrats remain divided on Iraq with some, such as John Kerry, the losing 2004 presidential candidate, arguing for a timetable for withdrawal and others, such as Hillary Clinton, resisting explicit deadlines.

Steve Clemons, of the liberal New America Foundation, said: "If the Dems had just controlled the House, they could have got away with posturing and public hearings. With the Senate, people are looking to the Democrats to govern. It changes the strategy completely."

Mr Bush will next week meet members of the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan commission led by James Baker, the former secretary of state, which is expected to recommend new policy options for Iraq.

The president also urged lawmakers to finish working on spending bills, energy legislation and other measures, such as the Terrorist Surveillance Act, before the next session of Congress begins in January.

The Democrats' victory in the Senate paves the way for a more aggressive legislative agenda in Congress, which will be spearheaded by the new chairmen of the congressional committees. Two fierce critics of administration policy in Iraq – Carl Levin and Joseph Biden – are to take over as chairmen of the Senate armed services and foreign relations committees, respectively.

Jeff Bingaman, incoming chairman of the energy committee, will probably put climate change at the centre of his agenda.

Opposition to Mr Bush's social security proposals will be strengthened with the expected appointment of Max Baucus as chair of the finance committee.

Bush Asks Congress To Approve Bolton (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, November 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093327

President George W. Bush has asked Congress to approve John Bolton, his controversial ambassador to the United Nations, for a second term, in the face of opposition from key Democrats.

The move comes in spite of conciliatory rhetoric from Mr Bush on Thursday that he wants to work with Democrats after they routed the Republicans in the congressional mid-term elections.

Mr Bolton, who once remarked that "If the UN secretary building in New York lost 10 stories, it wouldn't make a bit of difference", received a recess appointment last year after the Senate foreign relations committee opposed his nomination. Recess appointments do not require Senate approval.

Democrats, and one Republican, on the committee opposed sending Mr Bolton, who has a poor reputation internationally, to the UN following multiple allegations that he twisted intelligence and bullied colleagues who failed to endorse his hardline views.

Tony Snow, White House press secretary, on Thursday said Mr Bush discussed his desire to keep Mr Bolton at the UN at a breakfast meeting on Thursday with Republican congressional leaders.

"This is something that we think is important, that he stay there," said Mr Snow.

But White House hopes of keeping Mr Bolton in New York were immediately dashed when Lincoln Chafee, a Rhode Island Republican member of the foreign relations committee who just lost his seat in Tuesday's elections, said he would oppose Mr Bolton.

Joseph Biden, the Delaware Democrat who will become chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee in January, on Thursday said there was no point for the committee to even discuss the appointment.

"I see no point in considering Mr Bolton's nomination again in the foreign relations committee because regardless of what happens there, he is unlikely to be considered by the full Senate," said Mr Biden.

The push to give Mr Bolton another term comes as the Security Council must deal with a number of crucial issues, including on Iran, North Korea, Sudan and Lebanon. Mr Bolton has also been the US point man on UN reform.

Sean McCormack, the State department spokesman, said Mr Bolton deserved an "up-or-down vote", meaning the Senate foreign relations committee should approve his nomination so it can be brought to the Senate floor for a final vote.

"He has been extraordinarily effective up there at the UN. And now is not the time to have a gap in your UN ambassador."

Mr Bush could give Mr Bolton a second "recess appointment" but Senate rules would then require that he does not receive a salary. Asked whether that was a possibility, Mr McCormack replied: "I don't know how enthusiastic he would be about working without pay. I haven't asked him that question. That's kind of a personal question."

Additional reporting by Mark Turner at the United Nations

Bolton Unlikely To Win Senate Approval (AP-Y)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

John Bolton's prospects for staying on as U.N. ambassador essentially died Thursday as Democrats and a pivotal Republican said they would continue to oppose his nomination.

It was another blow to President Bush, two days after Democrats triumphed in elections that will give them control of Congress next year. On Wednesday, Bush had announced that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, a polarizing figure and face of the Iraq war, would step down.

On Thursday, the White House resubmitted Bolton's nomination to the Senate, where the appointment has languished for more than a year. Bush appointed him to the job temporarily in August 2005 while Congress was in recess, an appointment that will expire when the Congress adjourns, no later than January.

Sen. Lincoln Chafee, R-R.I., who was defeated by Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse on Tuesday, told reporters in Rhode Island that he would continue opposing Bolton. That would likely deny Republicans the votes needed to move Bolton's nomination from the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to the full Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0093328

"The American people have spoken out against the president's agenda on a number of fronts, and presumably one of those is on foreign policy," Chafee said. "And at this late stage in my term, I'm not going to endorse something the American people have spoke out against."

Democrats indicated that even should the Senate try debating Bolton's nomination when lawmakers reconvene next week — still under Republican control — they would stretch out debate on Bolton with the aim of killing it. Republicans lack the 60 votes needed to force a vote on the nomination.

"I see no point in considering Mr. Bolton's nomination again in the Foreign Relations Committee because, regardless of what happens there, he is unlikely to be considered by the full Senate," said Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware, top Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee.

Bolton's 2005 recess appointment came after Democrats blocked repeated attempts by GOP leaders to grant him Senate confirmation. Democrats said Bolton was a bully who lacked the diplomatic skills necessary to broker international deals.

In 2005, Chafee wavered on his support for Bolton, citing concerns at one point about Bolton's tie to a government investigation into faulty prewar intelligence on Iraq. In September, Chafee — who was in a tight re-election race — said he would oppose Bolton's nomination until the administration answered questions about its policy in the Middle East, which in effect delayed any vote until after the elections.

Bush asked congressional Republicans Thursday morning at the White House to confirm Bolton during their "lame duck" session beginning next week, said White House spokesman Tony Snow.

Asked if Bush thinks Bolton will be confirmed, Snow said, "We'll find out."

___

Associated Press writer Michelle R. Smith in Rhode Island contributed to this report.

Bolton May Not Return As U.N. Envoy (WP)

By Dafna Linzer, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

Key lawmakers said yesterday they would block the nomination of John R. Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations, all but killing chances for him to remain in the post past December.

For nearly 20 months, President Bush has tried, unsuccessfully, to get Bolton confirmed in a job he has held since August 2005. Bolton then received a recess appointment after not getting enough support in the Senate.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.), the ranking Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee and its presumed chairman when the Democrats take control of the Senate in January, said yesterday that Bolton's nomination is "going nowhere."

"I see no point in considering Mr. Bolton's nomination again in the Foreign Relations Committee because, regardless of what happens there, he is unlikely to be considered by the full Senate," Biden said in a statement.

The White House had hoped Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.), a moderate Republican who earlier raised questions about Bolton and the administration's policies in the Middle East, would support Bolton after the election. But Chafee lost his seat Tuesday.

"On Tuesday, the American people sent a clear message of dissatisfaction with the foreign policy approach of the Bush administration," Chafee said in a statement. "To confirm Mr. Bolton to the position of U.N. ambassador would fly in the face of the clear consensus of the country that a new direction is called for." Chafee said Bolton lacks the "collaborative approach" needed to make the United States "the strongest country in a peaceful world."

Without Chafee's support, Republicans on the committee do not have enough votes to recommend Bolton's confirmation.

Bolton's nomination, in early spring of 2005, fell apart within weeks. The Senate committee hearings were dominated by heated testimony from former colleagues and several intelligence officials; they described Bolton as a bully who pressured analysts, cherry-picked intelligence and hid information from the secretary of state. The committee did not support the nomination but agreed to send it to the full Senate for consideration.

DOJ_NMG_0093329

Several Republicans then joined with Democrats to block a vote on the nomination until the White House turned over documents relating to Bolton's tenure as undersecretary of state for arms control during Bush's first term. The White House refused, insisting that Bolton deserved a vote by the full Senate.

Bolton's recess appointment is set to expire at the end of December, when the current Congress goes out of session. With only a few months remaining, the White House tried again to get Bolton confirmed during the summer. The American Israel Public Affairs Committee came to the administration's aid, lobbying heavily for Bolton's nomination. It persuaded several Democrats to support Bolton but the nomination was snagged by Chafee.

White House spokesman Tony Snow would not predict yesterday whether Bolton would get confirmed or say what the White House's contingency plans are if the nomination falls through again. "This is something that we think is important, that he stay there," Snow told reporters.

National security adviser Stephen J. Hadley urged senators to judge Bolton solely on his performance at the United Nations over the past year. "I would hope that people would step back, take a look at John's record up there, and reach the judgment that the president has reached -- that he does a terrific job for the American people."

In a statement yesterday, Bush named five congressional priorities he hopes will be tackled before the end of the year. Bolton was not on the list.

Yesterday, a White House official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the administration had explored options for keeping Bolton at the United Nations. A second recess appointment is not possible, but officials considered making Bolton an "acting ambassador." But the official, who would discuss internal deliberations only on the condition of anonymity, said none of the options is appealing, especially given the strong opposition shown by the Democrats, who are poised to take over Congress.

If there is no confirmation, "we assume he'll probably resign," the official said. Several administration officials speculated that Zalmay Khalilzad, the ambassador to Iraq, could be a candidate to replace Bolton.

U.N. Envoy Confirmation Unlikely (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, November 10, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — John R. Bolton's prospects for remaining the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations dwindled Thursday as Democrats and a key Republican senator rejected efforts to have the still-Republican- controlled Senate confirm his nomination.

The White House continued to explore ways to keep Bolton at the U.N. without going through a confirmation process.

Outgoing Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), who holds the swing vote that would determine whether the evenly split foreign relations committee reconsiders Bolton, said he would not support the nomination, which the White House resubmitted Thursday.

"To confirm Mr. Bolton to the position of U.N. ambassador would fly in the face of the clear consensus of the country that a new direction is called for," he told a news conference in Rhode Island. Chafee lost his reelection bid Tuesday.

"I have long believed that the go-it-alone philosophy that has driven this administration's approach to international relations has damaged our leadership position in the world," Chafee said.

When senators blocked Bolton's nomination last year, Bush put him in the position using a special recess appointment that expires upon Congress' adjournment this year.

In September, Bolton's nomination came up again. Chafee, who had expressed reservations about Bolton's style of diplomacy and his effectiveness, came under intense pressure from Democrats and Republicans.

Chafee requested then that the hearing on Bolton be delayed until after the election, citing unresolved questions about the administration's Middle East policy.

Chafee said Thursday: "Mr. Bolton does not demonstrate the kind of collaborative approach that I believe will be called for if we are to restore the United States' position as the strongest country in a peaceful world."

Chafee's comments echoed those of Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), who is expected to be chairman of the foreign relations committee when the Democrats take control of the Senate in January.

DOJ_NMG_0093330

Biden said Thursday that Bolton would not get a Senate hearing until the White House provided relevant National Security Agency documents that the committee requested last year.

"I see no point in considering Mr. Bolton's nomination," Biden said.

That leaves the White House to decide how hard it wants to push Bolton for the post in the face of a decisive defeat in Tuesday's election, and how he could stay in the job without going through confirmation hearings.

He could technically receive a second recess appointment, but under U.S. law, could not be paid for his work under those circumstances.

Other possibilities include creating a position that would allow him to continue his work at the U.N., such as ambassador-at-large for U.N. issues, or special advisor to the president for the United Nations, said one U.S. diplomat.

White House lawyers have also proposed appointing Bolton as deputy ambassador, which does not require a Senate confirmation, and allowing him to perform as the acting ambassador.

Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), said Bush was making a political error by "trying to jam this nomination through" in defiance of the demand for change expressed by voters this week. "Sadly, Mr. Bolton doesn't represent change but a failed status quo."

Names being floated as possible contenders to replace Bolton include former Sen. George Mitchell (D-Maine); Zalmay Khalilzad, now U.S. ambassador to Iraq; and Paula Dobriansky, undersecretary of State for democracy and global affairs. Chafee's name has also been mentioned.

On Thursday, White House spokesman Tony Snow said the administration considered it important for Bolton to stay at the U.N.

And the White House national security advisor, Stephen Hadley said the administration hoped "people will step back and look" at Bolton's record at the U.N. over the last year.

"John has done a terrific job," Hadley told reporters at a news briefing. "He has gotten out of the United Nations some very important resolutions on some of the most important issues for our national security."

Hadley pointed specifically to resolutions on North Korea, "which many people thought we could not get."

"He has been a champion of reform, and he has been a clear advocate of American values," Hadley said.

At the United Nations, reviews of Bolton's performance have been mixed, but most diplomats agree that he hasn't turned out to be the destructive force that they feared he would be.

Though he threatened to withhold U.S. contributions to the U.N. until institutional changes were made, last-minute compromises by the State Department minimized the diplomatic damage.

His prediction that the new Human Rights Council would be worse than the dysfunctional body it replaced turned out to be true, though some diplomats say that U.S. failure to support the body made his prophecy a self-fulfilling one.

In the Security Council, Bolton has forged agreements with colleagues on several difficult issues, including two unanimous sanctions resolutions on North Korea. He also counts as victories putting Myanmar, formerly Burma, on the Security Council agenda, and blocking Venezuela from a seat on the Security Council, where it would have had a high-profile anti-U.S. platform.

"He is like Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," said Edward C. Luck, director of Columbia University's Center on International Organization. "He has done remarkably well on big issues in the council, but he treats the rest of the institution with disdain."

Luck continued: "If he wants to achieve reform, which was supposed to be his strength, his performance is highly disappointing. But if he wants to show that the U.N. is unreformable, he is doing a good job of it."

In New York on Thursday, Bolton received the news about Chafee's rejection as he was about to meet with key ambassadors on a sanctions resolution for Iran. He declined to comment.

But Bolton has been giving hints that his days may be numbered. This week, when a loyal staffer returned from a vacation with a new beard and told Bolton he wasn't going to shave until the ambassador was confirmed, Bolton quipped, "You may be waiting awhile."

Bush Renominates Bolton Ahead Of Change In Senate (WT)

By Stephen Dinan, The Washington Times

DOJ_NMG_0093331

The Washington Times, November 10, 2006

President Bush yesterday renominated John R. Bolton in a power play designed to force the U.N. ambassador through the Senate before Republicans lose control at the end of this year.

The nomination comes as Mr. Bush has spent the past two days talking about striking a bipartisan chord on domestic policies and suggests that, even with Democrats in control of the Capitol, the president will assert his constitutional role in foreign policy.

White House officials said Mr. Bolton, who is currently serving as a temporary recess appointment, deserves Senate approval.

"I would hope that people would step back, take a look at John's record up there, and reach the judgment that the president's reached, that he does a terrific job," said National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley.

Democrats last year blocked Mr. Bolton's nomination with a filibuster, forcing Mr. Bush to use his recess-appointment power. That appointment expires as the new Congress takes over under Democratic control next year.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., who is in line to become chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said Mr. Bolton still can't win confirmation and that it's a waste of time for the committee to take up his nomination.

The Delaware Democrat said his party blocked Mr. Bolton last year because the administration wouldn't let them see intelligence documents the Democrats believe would prove Mr. Bolton led a retribution effort against a State Department employee.

"Unless the administration provides the Senate with the documents it is entitled to see, Mr. Bolton should not get a vote," Mr. Biden said.

Republicans have to overcome more than just Democrat objections. Sen. Lincoln Chafee, Rhode Island Republican, who lost his bid for re-election, had opposed Mr. Bolton. As a member of the committee, he could keep the nomination bottled up and never let it get to the floor.

Asked whether the White House would pressure Mr. Chafee to change his mind, Mr. Hadley suggested a slightly softer strategy.

"You say pressure, I would say explain and persuade," he said.

He said Mr. Bolton has been instrumental in winning U.N. resolutions on North Korea's nuclear program and missile tests and that it would be a mistake to replace him.

One Senate aide familiar with Republican leaders' thinking said if they can get over Republican objections and are left solely with Democrats' opposition, they will probably try to force Democrats into a filibuster.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said it's too early to talk about whether the White House might give Mr. Bolton another recess appointment, should his nomination fail again.

In two different votes last year, Mr. Bolton fell four votes and six votes shy of the 60-vote threshold needed to overcome a filibuster in the Senate.

With Power Set To Be Split, Wiretaps Re-emerge As Issue (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 9 — The Bush administration escalated its defense of the National Security Agency's domestic wiretapping program on Thursday, even as Democrats in Congress vowed to investigate the program aggressively once they assume power.

In Washington, President Bush urged that during the lame-duck session that starts next week, Congress pass a bill effectively authorizing the program. And in San Francisco, the Justice Department told a federal court that public scrutiny of the operation risked "exceptionally grave harm to national security."

But Democrats sounded impatient to begin getting more answers after what they characterized as 11 months of stonewalling by the administration since the program was publicly disclosed last December.

DOJ_NMG_0093332

"This administration first hid its domestic spying program from Congress and Americans for years, and when it was discovered, has ducked and weaved on its legal justifications," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, who is to become chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee when Democrats take control.

"We all believe that monitoring the communications of suspected terrorists is essential," Mr. Leahy said. "But especially when the monitoring involves Americans, it needs to be done lawfully and with adequate checks and balances to prevent abuses of Americans' rights and Americans' privacy."

The shift in power on Capitol Hill sets up the likelihood of a showdown between the White House and Congress over the direction of not only the N.S.A. program but also a range of other aggressive counterterrorism operations that the administration has undertaken since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

This September, the House approved legislation that would effectively authorize the government to continue the program, in which the agency, without warrants, carries out surveillance on communications into and out of the United States that are suspected of involving terrorism. But Senate legislation on the issue, backed by the White House, stalled last month.

Republicans have held out hope of getting such legislation approved by the full Congress during the lame-duck session, and Mr. Bush pushed anew on that front Thursday, calling passage an "important priority in the war on terror."

Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who currently leads the Judiciary Committee and is the main advocate of wiretapping legislation there, acknowledged the difficulty of getting his bill through the Senate now.

"There's been a seismic change in the Senate landscape," Mr. Specter said in a telephone interview, "so I'm not sure exactly how all that is going to work out."

Emboldened by their electoral victory, Democrats said they believed it would be all but impossible for the Republicans to pass wiretapping legislation before the current Congress adjourns, or to win approval of separate legislation immunizing telephone companies from liability over their cooperation in wiretapping operations.

"There's no chance of that happening," predicted a senior Democratic aide for the House Judiciary Committee, who spoke only on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the issue.

"This is a program a lot of people here thought was excessive," the aide said of the N.S.A. operation. "There's a history of concern here."

Indeed, rather than move to authorize the program, Democrats said they would push in January to investigate how the program had been run and would seek legislation to restrict or ban outright the use of wiretaps without warrants.

Representative John Conyers Jr., the Michigan Democrat who is all but assured of taking over the House Judiciary Committee, has been one of the fiercest critics of the program and some other counterterrorism operations, saying he considers them abusive and potentially illegal infringements on civil liberties.

Groups that are suing the government and the telecommunications companies over the wiretapping program said Thursday that they hoped more aggressive oversight would help their cause.

"If Congress has some hearings and digs into this, we may know a lot more," said Cindy Cohn, legal director of the Electronic Frontier Foundation, which is suing AT&T.

The Justice Department urged a federal district judge in San Francisco on Thursday to delay considering any further issues in that suit until an appeals court considers an earlier ruling of his against the government.

The government is invoking a "state secret" privilege in opposing such lawsuits, and it argued Thursday that further proceedings delving into intelligence operations "could lead to serious consequences" by compromising national security.

The judge, Vaughn R. Walker, has already rejected that argument once, ruling in July that the case involving AT&T could proceed without a "reasonable danger" that it would harm national security. It is this ruling that the government is appealing.

Bipartisanship On Hold (NYT)

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

President Bush was back on TV yesterday, without the scowl he'd been sporting the day after the election but with the surviving members of his Cabinet. He talked about how much he was looking forward to lunching with Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid and working on "the great issues facing America." Mr. Bush said his team would "respect the results" of the election.

DOJ_NMG_0093333

Just maybe not right away.

Without missing a beat, Mr. Bush made it clear that, for now, his idea of how to "put the elections behind us" is to use the Republicans' last two months in control of Congress to try to push through one of the worst ideas his administration and its Republican allies on Capitol Hill have come up with: a bill that would legalize his illegal wiretapping program and gut the law that limits a president's ability to abuse his power in this way.

Mr. Bush listed his priorities for the forthcoming lame duck session of Congress. It was an odd list that included only two really urgent items — the bills that keep federal money flowing and the nomination of Robert Gates as the next secretary of defense. The rest was a grab bag that included one worthy but hardly urgent idea (getting Vietnam into the World Trade Organization) and a series of ideas ranging from bad to truly awful that Mr. Bush has been unable to get through Congress and hopes to ram through in the Republicans' last weeks.

For example, he wants the Senate to ratify his recess appointment of John Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations. That vote, which is likely to be strongly debated, can easily wait for the new Congress, and should. Mr. Bush also pressed for quick passage of "the bipartisan energy legislation," which had Congressional officials scratching their heads in puzzlement about which bill he might mean. And he wants immediate approval of his administration's deal to sell civilian nuclear technology to India despite that nation's refusal to sign or abide by the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

That was a bad idea from the start. But the wiretapping bill is simply outrageous, and it has no business being discussed in this lame duck session.

The bill Mr. Bush wants was drafted by Vice President Dick Cheney's lawyers and by Senator Arlen Specter, the outgoing Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee. Mr. Specter presented it as a compromise that would regulate the president's ability to spy on Americans' phone calls and e-mail without a court order. It really was a cave-in to Mr. Bush's effort to expand his power beyond limits that have existed for nearly 30 years.

Mr. Bush has acknowledged that he authorized the National Security Agency to conduct certain kinds of domestic wiretapping without obtaining the warrant required by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. He has claimed that the law hindered the hunt for terrorists, but has not offered a scrap of evidence for that claim. He has also never described the program's overall scope, and almost none of the lawmakers who will vote on this bill if Mr. Bush has his way have any idea what it entails.

Senator Dianne Feinstein, the California Democrat who is one of the few members who does know, has said there is nothing in the program that could not be done legally. She has proposed a more modest bill that would give the government more flexibility to eavesdrop first and get permission later. But Mr. Bush is not interested. He wants the bill that would gut the law, absolve him of illegal behavior and turn over the task of determining the constitutionality of his program to a court that is not equipped to make that judgment.

Since the White House has continued the wiretapping without legislative approval, there is no conceivable reason why Mr. Bush should see this as an emergency. His real motive could be to create a bargaining chip that would allow him to get a narrower bill giving the telephone companies immunity for helping the administration conduct the unlawful eavesdropping. That's an absurdly bad idea.

There are plenty of responsible lawmakers in both parties who are sympathetic to the idea that the executive branch needed more flexibility to pursue terrorists after 9/11. It has been obvious all along that if the president feels current law is too restrictive, he should explain its shortcomings to members of Congress and ask them to amend it. The Republican majority was never going to insist on that, but the new Democratic leadership might.

The White House refuses to explain itself because this has never been about catching terrorists. It is about overturning the crucial limits placed on executive authority after Watergate and Vietnam. Mr. Cheney and a few other hard-liners have been trying to turn back the clock and have succeeded in some truly scary ways, including the military commissions act they pushed through Congress before the elections. It is vital that they not be allowed to do any more harm.

Democrats Are Set To Subpoena (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt And Richard Simon, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093334

The new majority is expected to hold hearings on military spending and the Iraq war -- just for starters.

WASHINGTON — Rep. Ike Skelton knows what he will do in one of his first acts as chairman of the Armed Services Committee in the Democratic-led House: resurrect the subcommittee on oversight and investigations.

The panel was disbanded by the Republicans after they won control of Congress in 1994. Now, Skelton (D-Mo.) intends to use it as a forum to probe Pentagon spending and the Bush administration's conduct of the Iraq war.

It has been 12 years since Democrats were in control of both the House and Senate. But they are looking to make up for lost time, and in some cases, make the Bush administration and its business allies sweat.

With control of every committee in Congress starting in January, the new majority will inherit broad powers to subpoena and investigate. And that is expected to translate into wide-ranging and contentious hearings.

The agenda is likely to be dominated by the Iraq war, but could include probes into the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance, environmental policies and new prescription-drug program for seniors. Industries, such as oil companies, could also come under closer scrutiny.

"The American people sent a clear message that they do not want a rubber-stamp Congress that simply signs off the president's agenda," said Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), who is in line to become chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. "Instead, they have voted for a new direction for America and a real check and balance against government overreaching."

Conyers and other Democrats say that sort of scrutiny has been noticeably absent over the last six years. Democrats accuse Republicans of being complicit as Bush has led the nation into an unwinnable war and adopted economic polices that favor the affluent and big business.

Under Republican control, Congress did subpoena baseball players to discuss steroid use and summon oil industry executives to justify record profits at a time of high gasoline prices.

"What we have to be wary of, and the American public will be wary of, is a subpoena bazaar here on Capitol Hill, and government by investigation by Democrats," said Kevin Madden, a spokesman for House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

But even some scholars say recent GOP oversight has been lax. "This could be remembered as a historically unique period in which an administration got immunity from Congress to engage in errors with impunity," said Charles Tiefer, a University of Baltimore law professor and a former House counsel.

Democrats face a delicate balancing test, mindful of a public backlash if they focus more on investigating than legislating.

Their leader, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), has already ruled some investigations out of bounds. Conyers has wanted Congress to determine whether there are grounds to impeach Bush. But Pelosi has said that will not happen.

While there is pent-up demand among Democrats in Congress and their constituencies to oversee the Bush administration, their new caucus will also include a number of moderates and conservatives, which may force the leadership to tone down its act.

"The Democrats are going to be cross-pressured. They could hold impeachment hearings. They could make people in the Bush administration look absolutely terrible. It wouldn't be hard," said Joel Aberbach, a UCLA political science professor. "But there may be a little restraint because of their political needs in terms of consolidating themselves and looking to the 2008 election."

Democrats are expected to bore into the Iraq war, including review of no-bid contracts for reconstruction, intelligence failures and decisions to ignore the advice of military commanders about troop levels.

"Rather than focus on the failings of the war, though, these events will be staged in order to highlight the administration's incompetence and inflexibility," said William Howell, an associate professor at the Harris School of Public Policy at the University of Chicago.

Rep. Bart Stupak (D-Mich.), the ranking member of the House Energy and Commerce subcommittee on oversight and investigations, said, if he becomes chairman, he would look into "security at our nuclear labs, oversight of the Food and Drug Administration, and energy policy."

Now that they have the power of the subpoena, Democrats expect to be able to get the administration's attention. A number of senior Democrats have complained that the administration has ignored their inquiries.

DOJ_NMG_0093335

Rep. James L. Oberstar, the top Democrat on the House Transportation Committee, this year was in the middle of grilling Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff on the administration's response to Hurricane Katrina when the Republican chairing the hearing cut him off. He had used his allotted five minutes.

Now that Oberstar, of Minnesota, is in line to become the committee chairman, among his first acts is expected to be scrapping the five-minute rule established by the GOP majority.

"I would guess that we're going to have some fairly long hearings," said Jim Berard, an Oberstar spokesman.

The new Congress will also be marked by the ascendancy of some old watchdogs.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) is set to head the House Government Reform Committee. Waxman used another committee to push for landmark laws reducing pesticides in food and regulating nursing homes in the 1980s and 1990s. He also famously put tobacco company executives on the spot at a high-profile hearing in which they testified under oath that they did not believe that nicotine was addictive.

Since Bush took office, Waxman has written letters to the White House seeking information on a wide range of subjects — often getting no response. Now, with the power to issue subpoenas, he is likely to get answers.

Waxman wants to investigate waste, fraud, profiteering and "whether government is doing the job it's supposed to do."

"When Clinton was president, there was not an accusation too small for them not to launch investigations and issue subpoenas," Waxman said of congressional Republicans. "When Bush became president, there wasn't a scandal big enough for them to ignore. I think they've given us a good model on how not to behave."

The most senior member of the House, Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), is also scheduled to play a crucial role in the new Congress, again becoming chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

He already has a number of subjects he wants to look into, including the Medicare prescription drug benefit and an overhaul of energy policy, two of the GOP's proudest achievements.

"We're not after anybody," Dingell said, but he said if anyone from the administration has "useful things to tell us," they will be "invited to come forward."

rick.schmitt@latimes.com

richard.simon@latimes.com

Democrats Poised To Flex New Muscles (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen, Jay Solomon And Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

Lawmakers Vow to Probe Bush's Prewar Case, Katrina Contracts, Corporate America

WASHINGTON -- The Democrats' sweep of the House and the Senate gives the party powerful tools for probing certain controversies of the Bush administration's years in office, from its use of faulty prewar intelligence on Iraq to its effort to rebuild New Orleans.

With President Bush retaining his veto pen, the Democratic majorities may have a difficult time passing laws, especially in areas like health care and Social Security. But some Democrats in both the House and the Senate already are signaling a willingness to conduct tough oversight of the Bush administration's policies and to reopen lingering controversies -- particularly over pre-Iraq intelligence -- the Republican-led Congress largely ignored.

In the Senate, the likely new Intelligence Committee chairman, Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, says he will complete an investigation into the White House's case for invading Iraq that Republicans were accused of stalling. Michigan Sen. Carl Levin is in line to take over the most powerful congressional oversight body, the Senate's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, which routinely sends staffers to Iraq and other overseas countries. Mr. Levin, a critic of the Iraq war, has previously promised to conduct tougher oversight of the administration's use of no-bid contracting in Iraq, where the $21.8 billion U.S.-led rebuilding effort is winding down without having restored prewar levels of water or electricity. (See related article.1)

In the House, Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, expected to take over the House Committee on Homeland Security, is promising to haul Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff before the panel to face questions on issues ranging from the no-bid contracts awarded after Hurricane Katrina to the number of vacancies in the department's senior management.

DOJ_NMG_0093336

"The secretary only came before our committee two times this entire year, and that is not enough," Mr. Thompson said. "He cannot be a stranger before the Homeland Security Committee. He is going to have to be fully engaged, and I am going to demand that of him."

ELECTION FALLOUT

• What a Democratic House Means for Industry Interests2
• Election Q&A: What Happens Next?3
• Exit poll analysis: Five states4; national data5
• Vote-tallies, map6
• Chief Concerns: Committees in Senate7, House8
• For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20069.

Mr. Thompson is likely to be one of the largest burrs in the side of the Bush administration, as is California Rep. Henry Waxman, who will run the House Government Reform Committee. Mr. Waxman, an unrelenting critic of the White House, said he will boost oversight of the Bush administration and broad swaths of corporate America, with a particular focus on prescription-drug prices, oil-company profits and Halliburton Co.'s contracting work in Iraq.

The Democrats' choices about how to use their expanded oversight powers, which enable them to subpoena information, call hearings and compel witnesses to appear, will shape the next two years in Washington.

But Democrats will face internal divisions as they decide where to focus their investigative muscle. Liberal Democrats such as the membership of the activist organization MoveOn.org want the party to investigate the administration's case for the Iraq war and instances of possible corporate misconduct. By contrast, centrist and conservative Democrats like New York Sen. Hillary Clinton and many of the newly elected lawmakers from Southern and Western states argue the party should avoid taking too harsh a stance against big business or the Bush administration.

Democrats already are signaling they will proceed cautiously on Iraq. A spokeswoman says Mr. Rockefeller "will press to complete the remaining sections of the committee's Iraq review," but noted the lawmaker also was aware the panel "has other pressing issues that must be a priority going forward."

The reports concern one of the most controversial aspects of the Bush administration's years in power, its prewar case that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction and an active nuclear-weapons program.

When no weapons were found, the outgoing chairman of the Senate intelligence panel, Kansas Republican Pat Roberts, agreed in 2004 to conduct a five-part study of prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Two parts of the study were made public in September, including one that criticized Bush administration efforts to link Saddam Hussein to al Qaeda. But the most politically sensitive sections of the reports, say officials involved in them, have yet to be completed.

One will contrast prewar statements made by Mr. Bush and other senior administration officials about Iraq's military and terrorist capabilities with the underlying intelligence available at the time. Another looks into the work of Douglas Feith's office; at the time, Mr. Feith was a senior political appointee to the Pentagon, and his office promoted intelligence linking Iraq to al Qaeda.

Mr. Rockefeller's decision about how fast to proceed with the Iraq investigations will be watched by his fellow Democrats, many of whom believe the Bush administration willfully misled Congress and the American people in the run-up to the war. Mr. Rockefeller also will face intraparty pressure to conduct inquires into the Central Intelligence Agency's secret-prison programs for al Qaeda suspects and the White House's efforts to monitor telephone calls without seeking warrants. An aide to Mr. Rockefeller said those "are two areas that are ripe for aggressive oversight."

In the House, Democrats like Mr. Thompson will oversee domestic security for the first time since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and the creation of the Department of Homeland Security. Party officials said the Democrats are going to set the agenda on issues ranging from immigration enforcement to improved support for local responders. But their intentions to close the gaps in the nation's defenses are almost certain to go hand in hand with their desire to use their new power to bash the administration's security failures.

Mr. Thompson's legislative staff already is crafting bills designed to boost the counterterrorism skills of the nation's police departments through the creation of training centers and grants allowing the departments to send liaison officers to work overseas. Democrats have also vowed to move legislation for greater rail and mass-transit security, as well as allocate additional money to inspect cargo carried on commercial airliners.

DOJ_NMG_0093337

The ambitions, however, go far beyond bolstering hometown police and helping secure railways. House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi said she plans to pass all 41 of the 9/11 Commission's recommendations within 100 legislative hours of the Democratic takeover of the House. While Republicans' failures to embrace all the report's proposals have provided the Democrats with political fodder, the party doesn't have a bill drawn up to carry out Ms. Pelosi's plan or estimates of the costs.

Mr. Thompson said he will work with Mr. Chertoff and the Republicans on his panel to find solutions to pressing homeland-security issues, but makes clear he is prepared to go it alone if consensus proves elusive.

"If the secretary has some ideas, then he needs to lay them out," he said. "If not, I am convinced that our committee will step forward and provide some ideas for him."

Write to Yochi J. Dreazen at yochi.dreazen@wsj.com10, Jay Solomon at jay.solomon@wsj.com11 and Robert Block at bobby.block@wsj.com12

Democrats Weigh New Power As Leaders (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 9 — When Democrats take control of the Senate in January, they will immediately assume far more power to influence President Bush's agenda, particularly his choice of executive and judicial nominations that must pass through the chamber.

By virtue of their de facto 51-to-49 majority, Democrats will now control the committees and the floor schedule — a factor Mr. Bush will have to weigh in his selection of high-level candidates. (The Senate split 49 to 49, but tipping the scales toward the Democrats are Senator-elect Bernard Sanders of Vermont, an independent who caucuses with Democrats, and Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, a Democrat who ran as an independent after losing in the primary.)

"It means send us more moderate people or don't waste your time," said Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the second-in-command and a member of the Judiciary Committee, which considers judicial nominees.

Republicans acknowledge that the shift will be a significant factor in high-profile nominations, such as any to fill Supreme Court vacancies, in the remainder of the president's term. But they also say that the Senate tradition of respecting the rights of the minority gives them the same opportunities to influence the agenda that Democrats used during their years out of power.

"It is clearly going to be harder to get his people through, not easier," said Senator John Cornyn, a Texas Republican and White House ally who also sits on the Judiciary Committee. "But the Senate is different from the House, and 49 Republican senators can certainly shape a piece of legislation that goes through, or if they feel it is bad enough, they have the power to kill it."

The new majority leader, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, promised Thursday to have a more collegial relationship with the minority Republicans than he said was shown to the Democrats over the past four years of partisanship and procedural gamesmanship.

"They've set a bad example in not working with us," Mr. Reid told cheering supporters who gathered across from the Capitol to celebrate the Democrat victory. "We're not following that example."

In contrast to the House, the Senate has experienced more regular shifts in party control over the years — Democrats were last in the majority in 2002 — and many current members are accustomed to suddenly going from committee chairman to ranking minority member. In fact, many of the Democrats in line to take over important committees have wielded the gavel before, sometimes alongside the Republican who will be leaving the chairmanship.

For instance, Senator Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat and a leading party voice on military issues, has led the Armed Services Committee and has a good working relationship with senior Republicans on the panel. He will now play a major role in determining the approach on Iraq.

But there are pronounced ideological differences between the incoming leaders and those they will be replacing, as well as other lingering issues. On the Intelligence Committee, Senator John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, the top Democrat, has feuded with Senator Pat Roberts of Kansas, the Republican chairman, over Mr. Roberts' reluctance to challenge the administration's handling of intelligence preceding the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0093338

In what could be the biggest policy divide on the panels, Senator Barbara Boxer, the liberal California Democrat and environmental advocate, is in line to take control of the Environment and Public Works Committee from Senator James M. Inhofe of Oklahoma, who has disputed that humans are causing global warming.

"He thinks global warming is a hoax and I think it is the challenge of our generation," said Ms. Boxer, who said she has a cordial working relationship with Mr. Inhofe. "We have to move on it."

In other notable changes, Senator Robert C. Byrd, 88, the West Virginia Democrat elected to his ninth term, is expected to resume his role as chairman of the Appropriations Committee. Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, also re-elected, will be back at the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware will be at the helm of the Foreign Relations Committee.

With new power, Senate Republicans said Democrats will now have to do more than criticize. "Now that Democrats will have control of Congress for the next two years, they have a new responsibility for one of the most important issues of our time," said Amy Call, a spokeswoman for Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader who is retiring at the end of the year. "Quite simply, how shall we win the war on terror?"

While there will no doubt be clashes with Mr. Bush, there are also some issues where he could find the new Senate easier to work with than the old one. Democrats have been much more supportive than Republicans of Mr. Bush's broad approach on immigration and that issue could get new traction.

Democrats have been cheered by Mr. Bush's new bipartisan tone in recent days and say they are willing to reciprocate. But some also noted that the president laid out a very ambitious agenda for the post-election session scheduled to begin Monday under Republican control, including seeking approval of the nomination of John R. Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations. Mr. Bolton is serving as ambassador under an interim appointment after his nomination stalled in the Senate.

"The president has indicated that he understands the significance of Tuesday's election and the need to work in a bipartisan fashion to move our nation forward," said Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut and a Bolton critic.

"But," he added, "trying to jam this nomination through during a lame-duck session may indicate that the president didn't fully hear the voice of the American public — and that is troubling."

Democrats have complained for years that Republicans have run roughshod over the minority party in both the House and Senate, and they promise to restore more traditional processes, including having open negotiations between the House and Senate over major legislation.

With the pickup of six Senate seats that even he did not anticipate, Mr. Reid is more than secure in his post as party leader, with Mr. Durbin as the assistant leader. The party is exploring ways to recognize the leadership role of Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York. Mr. Schumer, the architect of the Democrats' triumph as head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, has been invited to lead that group for the 2008 elections if he chooses.

In the House, Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who led the successful campaign effort there, announced Thursday that he would seek to lead the Democratic conference — the fourth-ranking leadership slot. The decision could earn Mr. Emanuel, 47, further goodwill by averting a potentially divisive contest for the majority whip position with Representative James E. Clyburn of South Carolina.

"I seek this post, and not any other, because I believe what we need now is a unified Democratic caucus, focused squarely on the business of moving this country forward," Mr. Emanuel said in a statement.

Sweep Gives Dems Power To Put Plans Into Action (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence, Usa Today

USA Today, November 10, 2006

Allen concedes to Webb, won't seek recount

DOJ_NMG_0093339

WASHINGTON — The resolution of the Virginia Senate race Thursday completed a Democratic sweep of Congress, setting the stage for a rush of ideas, investigations and confirmation skirmishes from a party largely left out of national decision-making for the past four years.

The Democratic Senate takeover became official when Republican Sen. George Allen conceded to Democrat Jim Webb in Virginia. Earlier Thursday, Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., conceded defeat to Democrat Jon Tester, who had already been declared the winner. House Democrats sealed their majority Wednesday.

The loss of both chambers will hamper President Bush's ability to advance proposals on Capitol Hill or kill what he doesn't like. "Bush won't have anyone to sweep the Democrats' ideas under the carpet," says Bruce Reed, a former White House aide who is president of the Democratic Leadership Council (DLC). "If Democrats on the Hill don't want to deal with Bush's agenda, they don't have to."

The new Senate will have 49 Democrats, two independents who vote with them, and 49 Republicans.

Allen was about 9,000 votes behind Webb as a statewide canvass continued, close enough to request a taxpayer-financed recount. Allen said that could drag on until Christmas and he had decided against it.

"I do not wish to cause more rancor by protracted litigation, which would, in my judgment, not alter the results," Allen said in a bittersweet speech to supporters in Alexandria, Va.

Webb, a onetime Republican who served as Ronald Reagan's Navy secretary and supported Allen in 2000, told cheering Democrats down the road in Arlington that Allen had called to congratulate him. "We will begin the process of putting this country back on the track where it needs to be," Webb said of new Democratic majorities.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., surrounded by his jubilant leadership team on Capitol Hill, said Democrats will prove they can work with Republicans. "They've set a very bad example in not working with us," he said. "We're not following that example. We're reaching out to them."

Bush, after meeting Thursday with House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, in line to be speaker, said the election was over and her party had won. "We won't agree on every issue, but we do agree that we love America equally, that we're concerned about the future of this country, and that we will do our very best to address big problems," he said.

Some Republicans facing voters in two years may work with Democrats even if Bush doesn't, says Julian Zelizer, a political scientist at Boston University. "There is a lot of frustration and fear about 2008," he says. "People don't care about Bush anymore," he adds, they just want a big domestic policy achievement and "a way out of this war."

Norman Ornstein, co-author of The Broken Branch, a book about Congress, predicts "double-barreled investigations" of Iraq war contracts and the conduct of the war, with House and Senate Democrats "calling in generals left and right" to testify. "That's a nasty thing for a president to have to deal with," he says.

Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Ind., a 2008 presidential prospect, says there is "pent-up demand" for oversight of the Bush administration, but Democrats should not pursue investigations that seem like "partisan payback." He says the standard should be whether people at home would say "if I were there, I'd be asking those questions, too."

Scrutiny of clear problem areas such as the conduct of the Iraq war or the response to Hurricane Katrina is fair game, he told reporters and editors from USA TODAY and Gannett News Service.

The Senate's constitutional responsibility to advise and consent on presidential nominations presents more opportunity for conflict. Ornstein says he expects Democrats to do "just what Republicans did in (Bill) Clinton's final two years" when it comes to judicial nominations: "sit on them and let very few of them out" of committee for votes on the floor.

The DLC's Reed says Bush will have to consult with Democrats on nominees, including Supreme Court justices, if he wants them to succeed: "If Bush chooses to send up extremely conservative nominees, they're not likely to go anywhere."

Reed was domestic policy adviser to President Clinton when Republicans captured Congress in 1994. He says it will take time for Bush and his aides to adjust to losing Congress. "They're in shock," he says, speaking from personal experience. "They're going to flop around for a while trying to figure out what to do. They're going to have to grieve."

Now The Decider Must Listen (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

DOJ_NMG_0093340

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

Short of actual insurrection, I don't think the country could have spoken more clearly than it did Tuesday. But there's one question still to be answered, and in honor of Donald Rumsfeld, who now can devote full time and attention to stretching the boundaries of modern philosophy, let's call it a "known unknown": Did George W. Bush really hear what the nation told him about Iraq?

I think he did, but I'm pessimistic that he'll listen.

Since the election, the president has been saying all the right things about bipartisanship, about how eager he is to work with the new Democratic leadership on Capitol Hill. But what choice does he have after an electoral "thumpin' " of such historic proportions?

Power rules in Washington the way money rules in New York or celebrity in Los Angeles, and the White House has measurably less power today than it had a week ago. If Bush doesn't find a way to work with the opposition, he might as well spend the rest of his term at the ranch out in Crawford, riding his mountain bike and clearing all that pesky brush.

Never mind that after each of his slim victories, Bush claimed the kind of mandate that can be conferred only by a landslide. Never mind that he made no effort to govern from the center, with bipartisan support. He acted as if Democrats didn't exist, except as foils for his overheated rhetoric. Now they are indispensable to the remainder of his presidency and to the legacy he ultimately leaves behind.

There are indeed issues on which Bush and the Democrats will find the "common ground" that everyone claims to be seeking. The president's plan on immigration was blocked by Republicans, and now that the Great Wall of Arizona has been approved, maybe Washington will be able to come up with a reasonable, workable solution to the problem of undocumented migrants.

In exit polls, voters said they were deeply concerned about "corruption" in Washington -- a perfect issue to tackle in the new bipartisan spirit. Both parties will agree to ignore the basic problem, which is the corrosive effect that money has on our whole political system. The president and Congress will bravely declare their opposition to influence-peddling and various other sins. Then they will join in crafting "reform" legislation that might have some effect on the margins and that definitely will create more paperwork for lawyers -- but that leaves the current system pretty much in place.

Hey, Republican lobbyists have been gorging themselves at the public trough for a decade. Wouldn't be fair to deny Democratic lobbyists their turn, would it?

Iraq is another story. The election was also a referendum on George W. Bush's war, and clearly he understands that. He had been working on Rumsfeld's ouster for some time, but announcing it the day after the thumpin' seemed to be a concession.

What I haven't heard from Bush is any willingness to change his basic policy in Iraq. In his news conference Wednesday, he essentially retracted the aspersions he had cast on the Democratic Party's patriotism. But his message was that he's happy to work with the Democrats -- as long as they agree to his basic war policy, which is to keep American troops in Iraq "until the job is done."

I haven't heard an admission from Bush that the conflict has fundamentally changed, that American soldiers are now dying not to overthrow a tyrant (done that) or, primarily, even to fight an insurgency (still doing that), but to tamp down a sectarian civil war. I haven't heard an admission from Bush that the war was poorly planned, that the occupation has been poorly handled or that our supposed Iraqi allies have their own interests that don't necessarily coincide with ours.

I haven't seen any indication that Bush is ready to ask himself the questions that millions of Americans posed on Tuesday: What are we accomplishing in Iraq? What kind of country, realistically, will we leave behind? Will leaving Iraq, in, say, five years make us any safer than leaving Iraq now? Will our extended presence even make life better for Iraqis?

Democrats were restrained during the campaign, which was smart. But now it's time for them to ask those hard questions -- and use their new power to compel answers. Even if they have to be unfashionably partisan about it.

eugenerobinson@washpost.com

New Majority Plans Early Security Push (USAT)

By Thomas Frank And Mimi Hall, Usa Today

DOJ_NMG_0093341

USA Today, November 10, 2006

Aviation officials say that may mean policies that could cripple industry

WASHINGTON — Democrats say they will use their majority in Congress to strengthen domestic security by putting millions of dollars into technology at airports and ports and increasing government oversight.

But they also may push policies that aviation officials say could cripple the industry, such as requiring screening of all cargo before it's put on passenger planes.

House Democrats made domestic security a centerpiece of their campaign this year and vowed to fulfill all the 9/11 Commission's recommendations. "Real security" is the first of six policies Democrats will push when they take control of Congress in January, according to a manifesto they recently published to highlight differences with Republicans.

Democrats won control of the House and Senate in Tuesday's elections.

That could mean more money for the Transportation Security Administration to buy machines that better detect weapons on passengers and in carry-on bags, and to hire additional screeners.

"I expect a much more supportive attitude on better funding TSA to get them the equipment they need and maybe more personnel," said Rep. Peter DeFazio, D-Ore., a senior member of the TSA oversight committee.

Government reports blame screener staffing shortages for longer security lines and outmoded machines for bombs and guns slipping past screeners in tests by undercover investigators. The number of screeners dropped from 45,000 to 43,000 in the last year. Funding for new bomb detectors fell from $180 million two years ago to $141 million this year.

Rep. Dan Lungren, R-Calif., chairman of the TSA oversight committee, said Democrats may struggle to find extra money for TSA. "I hope that we're going to try to work for better government, but that means doing it in the context of what's affordable," Lungren said.

DeFazio suggested a possible increase in security fees that are added to every airplane ticket — an idea the administration has proposed in the past two years but which Congress killed amid airline protest.

Other areas that Democrats will push:

•More grants for local emergency responders and better organization of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. This is a priority for the likely new chairman of the subcommittee that sets Homeland Security Department spending, Rep. David Price of North Carolina, a state vulnerable to hurricanes.

"After 9/11, many local first responders got additional responsibilities, but the federal government has done an inadequate job in supporting them," said Price spokesman Paul Cox.

•Stronger port security through more grants and possibly requiring more screening of cargo containers being unloaded.

"Most major seaports are in Democratic strongholds," said retired Coast Guard officer Stephen Flynn of the Council on Foreign Relations think tank. "This is a visible issue for them as they look to be seen as energetic on security."

•Forcing chemical plants to check employee backgrounds and use safer materials that would make them less of a terrorist target. Democrats have sought such measures through bills that have failed in the past three years.

They will still face opposition from the chemical industry and Republicans who oppose mandates on businesses.

•More intensive scrutiny of Homeland Security and TSA leaders. "There'll definitely be a lot of investigation into what TSA has done to date in terms of new technologies and screening air cargo," said Peter Kant, a lobbyist for Rapiscan Systems, which sells TSA screening equipment.

•Setting a deadline for full screening of the 3 million tons of cargo loaded onto passenger planes each year. The TSA has proposed steps to screen more cargo. "A key difference is setting a firm deadline," said Tom Blank, TSA's former acting deputy administrator.

Jon Kent, a lobbyist for air-cargo groups, said requiring all air cargo to go through bomb detectors before being put on passenger planes "would be a disaster for air commerce" because screening would take so long.

Kent wonders if Democrats will be as adamant as they were when they were out of power. "It's far easier to take an absolute position," Kent said, "when you don't have to worry about the consequences."

Dingell Wants To Cut U.S. Oil Habit (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0093342

By James R. Healey, Usa Today

USA Today, November 10, 2006

Democrat set to rule again over energy

Conventional wisdom says that Democrats, who will control both houses of Congress next year, will somehow cut America's dependence on oil, especially imported, and trim the average American's fuel bill.

That could be hard.

“A lot of things have been said in the campaigns, but when you finally have to sit down and govern, you see things differently,” says John Felmy, economist and spokesman for the American Petroleum Institute, Big Oil's trade association.

In the catbird seat — perhaps the hot seat — is Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., who again becomes chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, a post he held before the Republicans took control of Congress. The committee's wide-ranging mandate includes authority over consumer affairs and energy policy.

Dingell says he wants to cut the U.S. oil habit, promising the committee's help in “making the United States energy-independent.”

At the same time, though, he must represent the interests of the Michigan-based auto industry. Energy-conservation initiatives can cost automakers hundreds of millions of dollars for research and development of fuel-efficiency hardware and software for which new car buyers won't pay extra.

“John Dingell has traditionally done a great job representing his constituents in Michigan. People in the House and the Senate look to him for guidance on” auto-related issues, says Marchant Wentworth, legislative representative on energy issues for the Union of Concerned Scientists.

UCS believes automakers could make vehicles much more fuel efficient using off-the-shelf components and systems that would add little or nothing to the cost and price.

Dingell is not eager to force automakers to improve fuel economy by boosting what's known as CAFE, for corporate average fuel economy. In an interview, he said, “The committee only has so much time,” and noted that the CAFE standards recently were boosted. Fuel economy standards, he said, “can be addressed very well, automobile or light trucks, within the framework of existing law,” which “gives an awful lot of freedom to the administration” to adjust the standards to keep up with improving technology.

“If you're talking about straight CAFE, you can't regard the arrival of John Dingell in that position as good news,” said Therese Langer, transportation program director for the American Council for an Energy-Efficient Economy.

However, she noted, Dingell “gave a speech to the industry in Detroit a couple of years ago, saying, ‘I've been sticking up for you, and now we want you to get more efficient.' ”

She said energy and alternative fuel issues will become more visible in a Democrat-controlled Congress, but, “It's hard to say if something new and significant will pass. I don't regard it as a big change; there are a lot of the same players. But these things will get a lot more air time.”

Energy, in fact, might not be Dingell's and the committee's priority.

“We'll try to see which issues are ready, and go into them as fast as the business of the committee permits,” he said. “We'll kill the closest snake first.”

Dingell is passionate about overhauling health care by getting cheaper generic dugs to market faster; giving the government the authority to negotiate Medicare drug prices with pharmaceutical companies; stopping what he says are “almost certain overpayments” to health insurance companies; and regulating dietary supplements, which, he says, “are killing people.” He wouldn't name the supplements he considers dangerous.

Cheaper health care would be a boon to the Detroit auto industry, which has more retirees to support and an older workforce than the U.S.-based foreign automakers.

Likely to get attention:

•Alternative fuels. Look for moves to extend tax benefits to wind and solar power and for producing so-called biomass fuels, such as ethanol, typically made from corn, and new tax breaks for non-petroleum fuels.

DOJ_NMG_0093343

Both parties already agree, more or less, on such benefits, so extending and boosting them "will be the quickest thing Congress can do" to act on the energy-independence promise, notes UCS' Wentworth.

And it'll be good politics, considering that corn for ethanol mainly is grown in the Midwest. "All paths lead through Iowa for the presidency," noted Tom Kloza, veteran analyst at consultant Oil Price Information Service. Iowa's early political caucuses often make or break presidential hopefuls.

•Big Oil subsidies. "We'll take a look," Dingell said. Wentworth said that halting some subsidies — begun when oil prices were low but suspect now that prices and profits are high — would provide the money Democrats want to invest in alternative-fuel technology.

•Conservation. "If you went through the (1973-74) Arab oil embargo, as I did, we found that … failing to be prepared and have good conservation practices was hideously costly," Dingell said.

Before then, Japanese cars were a curiosity. When Americans discovered the Japanese machines got double or triple the mileage of big American cars, a rush to buy Japanese began. Detroit is still reeling from that shift.

First, Ethics Reform (WP)

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

The 'culture of corruption' helped Democrats win. Now they need to fix the mess.

ONE OF THE loudest messages from Tuesday's elections was disgust with the way Washington does business. In exit polls, 42 percent of voters said corruption and scandals in government were extremely important in their decisions -- a greater share than for the war in Iraq, terrorism or the economy. House Democrats have vowed to quickly adopt new ethics rules; their package is good but could be improved. Senate Democrats, who, after yesterday's gracious concession by Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), will control the chamber, say they too have heard the voters' demand for change.

The House Democrats' package, which incoming speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) promised to enact during the Democrats' first day in control, would prohibit lawmakers and their staff from accepting meals, gifts and trips paid for by lobbyists or organizations that employ lobbyists. To end a Jack Abramoff practice -- the use of nonprofit groups to disguise trips paid for by lobbyists or other interested parties -- the Democrats' measure would require advance approval for other travel. Lawmakers would be barred from riding corporate jets for official travel but could still do so on campaign and political trips, a loophole that ought to be plugged. Lawmakers and staffers would have to wait two years, not one as currently, to lobby their former colleagues.

The weakest link in the House package concerns enforcement. A new Office of Public Integrity would review lobbyists' filings, but lawmakers would remain under the jurisdiction of the House ethics committee, whose sorry performance this year argues for a system less susceptible to partisan stalemate. Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) and Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.) have proposed an independent investigator who would provide greater scrutiny and accountability while leaving ultimate authority to elected officials. The new House leaders should incorporate that plan into their package.

Changing Senate rules is more complicated because doing so requires a two-thirds vote, but the office of the incoming majority leader, Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), said yesterday that he is also committed to swift action. Only the House Democrats promised before the election to make ethics a priority, but if the election results helped refocus Senate Democrats on ethics issues, that's all to the good. One major shortcoming in the proposal endorsed by Senate Democrats this year involved the use of corporate aircraft. Simply requiring that lawmakers disclose their acceptance of such cut-rate flights isn't adequate; if they fly on corporate jets, they ought to be required to pay market rates.

Then, after changing ethics rules, the new Congress needs to pass the lobbying reform legislation that its predecessor neglected to its peril.

The Family-Friendly Congress? (NYT)

By Judith Warner

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

Washington

DOJ_NMG_0093344

WHILE the excitement over Nancy Pelosi, most likely to be our first female speaker of the House, is still fresh, and while those of us who care about these things are still bubbling over the election of the highest number of women to Congress in history, I'd like to issue a challenge: Ladies, step up to the plate on behalf of the rest of America's women — and their families.

This shouldn't be a radical idea. Ms. Pelosi has, after all, spent months now reminding us that she is not merely a capable leader, not just a whiz-bang political fund-raiser, but, first and foremost, "a mother and a grandmother."

That's lovely for her; but if Ms. Pelosi's experience of motherhood is to have any meaning for the rest of us, or any relevance to her life as a politician, we've got to see some follow-through. Because if, as Ms. Pelosi has repeatedly said, she'll be taking up the speaker's gavel "on behalf of America's children," there's a lot of work to do. For children can't thrive if their families are stressed and, at every point on the socioeconomic spectrum now, it seems that American families are cracking at the seams.

The Center for WorkLife Law at the University of California Hastings College of the Law released a study last month noting that "workplace inflexibility, the lack of family supports and workplace bias" are forcing American mothers out of the work force — whether they can really afford to "opt out" or not.

This comes on the heels of news articles showing how working-class moms are putting their youngsters in all-night child care, and how couples are increasingly enduring split-shift work schedules — putting their health and marriages at risk — to avoid the costs and anxieties of day care. All this paints a picture of family life in America that is very grim for all but the very privileged.

For years now, there have been murmurings — and more — from various corners of Congress in favor of change. Representative Lynn Woolsey's Balancing Act bill, which calls for a wide array of measures to reduce the stresses on working families, has been languishing for years. Senators Christopher Dodd and Ted Kennedy have gestured toward legislation on paid family leave and guaranteed sick leave. There was even a much-overlooked bill introduced in the Senate by Hillary Clinton this summer (and in the House by Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut) to provide low-income parents with subsidies to stay at home and care for their infants themselves.

It's time to light a fire under these kinds of initiatives. Ms. Pelosi's current promises — to raise the minimum wage, cut the interest rates on student loans and make some college tuition tax deductible — are a laudable start, but American families, whose needs have been increasingly neglected since the early 1980s, need so much more: quality after-school programs; national standards for child care; voucher programs and tax subsidies to help pay for that care; universal, voluntary public preschool; paid family leave; and incentives for businesses to make part-time and flex-time work financially viable.

In short, we need to make the kind of glorious life that's enjoyed by upper-middle-class mothers and grandmothers like Ms. Pelosi and her colleagues possible for everyone else.

This isn't a radical leftist agenda. In fact, there's no better antidote to the selfish individualism and empty materialism that Americans of all political stripes say is corrupting our country than policies that allow families to spend more, and better, time together.

In recent years, pro-family Democrats were out in the legislative wilderness. Now, there's simply no excuse for inaction. It's time to shoot for the moon. Risk a presidential veto. And let the proponents of "family values" show their true colors.

Alternative Minimum Tax Targeted (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

Democratic leaders this week vowed to make the alternative minimum tax a centerpiece of next year's budget debate, saying the levy threatens to unfairly increase tax bills for millions of middle-class families by the end of the decade.

The complex and expensive tax was designed to prevent the super-rich from using deductions, credits and other shelters to avoid paying the Internal Revenue Service. But because of rising incomes, the tax is expected to expand to more than 30 million taxpayers in 2010 from 3.8 million mostly well-off households in 2006.

Fixing the AMT has long been a top priority for Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), who is in line to head the Senate Finance Committee. Last year, Baucus co-authored a bill to repeal the tax with Senate Finance Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa).

DOJ_NMG_0093345

Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), the presumptive chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, this week put fixing the AMT at the top of his agenda, calling it far more urgent than dealing with President Bush's request to extend the 2001 and 2003 tax cuts, which are scheduled to expire in 2010.

And yesterday, House Democratic Whip Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), who is campaigning to keep his leadership post, said Democrats will make "fixing the AMT . . . a priority of tax policy next year."

The focus on the AMT is hardly surprising, given that victims of the tax have been concentrated in high-cost urban areas such as Washington, New York and San Francisco -- places that tend to vote Democratic. Rangel, Hoyer and Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the presumptive House speaker, all represent states hit hard by the AMT, which is sometimes called the "blue-state tax." To map states with the highest concentrations of AMT taxpayers is to draw bull's-eyes over California and the Northeastern seaboard.

Locally, an estimated 240,000 families and individuals in the District, Maryland and Virginia will have to pay the AMT at tax time in April, according to projections by the nonprofit Citizens for Tax Justice. That is an increase of nearly 100,000 local families since 2003.

These taxpayers would owe the IRS $6,813 in additional taxes on average, according to an analysis by the Tax Policy Center, a joint project of the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution.

"Seventy percent of my friends are on the AMT. We're the demographic," said the center's co-director, Leonard Burman, a senior fellow at the Urban Institute who lives in Arlington and, like many interviewed for this story, has been hit by the AMT. "If you have children, if you pay high state and local income taxes, you're going to be subject to the AMT. That's the professional class in the Washington and New York suburbs, and Los Angeles and San Francisco. You can see it in the data."

In simple terms, the AMT is sort of a flat tax with two brackets, 26 and 28 percent, and fewer deductions. Credits for dependents, medical expenses, and state and local taxes are all disallowed. Instead, taxpayers get a single big deduction, called the AMT exemption, which is set this year at $62,550 for married couples and $42,500 for singles. Taxpayers must compute their taxes both ways and pay whichever is higher.

The impact is harshest on taxpayers with annual incomes of $100,000 to $500,000. The truly rich typically are not affected because their regular tax rates already are higher than under the AMT.

This year, the AMT is expected to ensnare 3.8 million taxpayers. Next year, the AMT exemption is scheduled to drop precipitously, causing that number to balloon to 23 million households, according to the congressional Joint Committee on Taxation.

By 2010, "the AMT will become the de facto tax system for filers in the $200,000 to $500,000 income range, 94 percent of whom will face the tax," according to a report by the Tax Policy Center. About half of tax filers making $75,000 to $100,000 will have to pay the tax, including 89 percent of married couples in that income bracket who have at least two children.

In the past, Congress has patched the AMT one year at a time, primarily by increasing the exemption amount. Next year, to hold the number of affected taxpayers steady at about 4 million, the patch would cost about $50 billion, according to the Joint Committee on Taxation.

Getting rid of the tax altogether would be even more expensive: more than $1 trillion over the next decade, by various estimates. Budget experts doubt that Democrats can do it without reneging on their promise to reduce the budget deficit or winning an agreement from Republicans to raise taxes elsewhere.

In recent weeks, experts from both parties have called the nation's fiscal situation dire and called for a bipartisan summit to address a variety of ticking time bombs set to explode soon after the 2008 presidential election, including the AMT, Social Security, Medicaid and Medicare.

"You cannot solve this nation's fiscal problems without increased revenue," Robert E. Rubin, the Clinton administration Treasury secretary, told the Economic Club of Washington this week.

Political analysts see little chance for that kind of cooperation until after 2008. Bush is heavily committed to maintaining his tax cuts, arguing that they have spurred the nation's economy. And analysts say Bush is unlikely to participate in a summit that could produce the kind of tax increase that helped drive his father, President George H.W. Bush, out of office.

DOJ_NMG_0093346

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said this week that fixing the AMT is "absolutely a priority" for the president. But for now, Fratto said, "The Democrats have an opportunity to put their ideas on the table."

Rangel, it seems, is ready to rumble. When asked about whether he favored making the Bush tax cuts permanent during his first news conference after the Democrats claimed control of the House, Rangel demurred and raised the issue of the AMT.

Rangel's aides, meanwhile, have been marshaling evidence that Bush tax cuts have exacerbated the effects of the AMT by reducing regular taxes for many families but not their AMT rates, forcing them to pay the higher amounts. And families thrown into the AMT don't benefit from many of the deductions, rate cuts and credits that comprise the Bush tax cuts, said John Buckley, the Democrats' chief tax counsel on the Ways and Means Committee.

"The real story on the AMT is how it takes back the Bush tax cuts," Buckley said. "For people who are married with children or live in states with income taxes, the tax cuts are temporary unless you fix the AMT."

Ex-Treasury Head Rubin Urges Democrats To Mull Tax Increase (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin has some advice for the Democrats who will soon control Congress: Raise taxes.

Mr. Rubin, who helped engineer a budget surplus while serving under President Clinton, is advising Democrats that there's no way to deal with the "deep threat" posed by the nation's fiscal problems without a combination of spending control and higher taxes.

"We are at a critical juncture," Mr. Rubin told the Economic Club of Washington Thursday night. "You cannot solve the nation's fiscal problems without increased revenues."

But raising taxes is a message many Democratic lawmakers are unlikely to utter aloud -- at least for now. President Bush and other Republicans consistently warned during the midterm campaign that, if elected, Democrats would increase taxes and hurt the economy. President Bush has insisted that his 2001 and 2003 tax cuts have helped the economy and lowered the unemployment rate and that any tax increase or failure to make those cuts permanent would weaken the economy.

Since winning control, the Democratic leadership has insisted there are no plans for a wholesale rollback of President Bush's tax cuts. But they do acknowledge they're thinking about ways to raise revenue, including potentially rescinding some of the tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans, according to a spokeswoman for California Rep. Nancy Pelosi, who is in line to become the next House speaker.

Many political observers say Democrats may ultimately have no choice but to raise taxes if they follow through with their plans to implement "pay as you go" budgeting, which requires that any tax cut be offset by spending cuts or new revenue. Among the Democrats' priorities is to ease the burden of the alternative minimum tax, which could cost the government $1 trillion over 10 years.

Ms. Pelosi, along with New York Rep. Charles Rangel, who is expected to become chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, insist they are also looking at other approaches besides raising taxes, such as trying to close the estimated $350 billion "tax gap" -- the money the government says it's owed from individuals and businesses but can't collect. A senior aide to Mr. Rangel said Democrats may look to boost funding to the Internal Revenue Service to help close some of that gap.

In his speech, Mr. Rubin said the combination of the nation's budget deficit, the growing costs of programs like Medicare and Social Security and a heavy reliance on foreign borrowing pose "a deep threat to our economy and the global economy" and said politicians will need to employ "some combination of revenues and spending discipline."

But he said Democrats should rest easy about what impact any tax increase would have. "I think if you were to increase taxes right now you would have probably about zero negative effect on the economy," he said.

The Wages Of Politics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093347

A hike in the national minimum wage seems all but certain to become one of the first fruits of the Democrats' victories this week. Nancy Pelosi, the presumptive Speaker of the House, has pledged to raise the minimum by over $2, to $7.25 from $ 5.15. And President Bush has already signaled he'd go along. At the state level, six states not only approved minimum wage hikes in referendums this week but indexed the minimum to inflation going forward. We hope Mr. Bush fights off any attempt at federal indexation and insists on a provision to protect small business.

Raising the minimum wage has been a hardy perennial of the left for decades now. What is striking is the degree to which is has come to be seen as an economic free lunch. Even some reputedly unbiased economists have started to tout the view that raising the minimum wage has no discernible effect on job creation.

But if this were true, they'd be calling for a $10, $20 or even $50-an-hour minimum wage. They're not, and neither is Nancy Pelosi. That's because the law of demand is one of the most dependable precepts of economics. It says that when the price of something goes up, demand for it goes down. An employee's wages are the price the employer pays for his services, so raising their wages means forcing employers to pay more for workers. The price goes up and there is downward pressure on demand for workers. Other things being equal, jobs are lost.

For a long time, this was so obvious that no serious person doubted it. But a couple of studies in the 1990s purported to find no evidence of job loss associated with minimum-wage hikes, and it's been off to the races ever since. Classical economics teaches that for a given job, there is a market-clearing price -- the price at which both someone is willing to do it and someone else is willing to pay them to do it. If you raise the legal minimum above that price, you may get more people willing to perform the job, but you'll probably also get less people (employers) willing to pay the new, higher price to get the job done.

To picture how this works, think about the grocery bagger in the supermarket, a classic low-wage service job. Supermarkets hire grocery baggers for the minimum wage, or close to it, because it's a perk that makes their customers' experience a bit nicer and helps move the lines along, possibly requiring fewer cashiers, who cost more to hire than grocery baggers.

Now, if you pass a law saying everyone, including grocery baggers, has to be paid $10 an hour, what happens? The supermarket probably hires fewer baggers, or has them work fewer hours. Perhaps they decide they only need baggers between 4 p.m. and 7 p.m. If you put the minimum wage up to $20 an hour, shoppers bag their own groceries. This is so clear that it's taken some time for the defenders of an ever-rising minimum wage to come up with an adequate theory to obscure it.

Most jobs do not involve bagging groceries. But most jobs don't pay the minimum wage. The Bureau of Labor Statistics puts the number of minimum-wage earners at 2% of the work force. The majority of these are under 25 years old and single. Minimum-wage jobs also tend to have higher turnover.

The theory propounded by the advocates of a higher minimum wage is this: The market for minimum-wage jobs is neither efficient nor fair. Workers don't have adequate information about the alternatives available to them, and employers don't know enough about what the true market-clearing price is. So employers impose an artificially low wage rate on the disadvantaged, who as a result don't work as hard and tend to quit more often than they would if they were paid "fairly." Raising the minimum wage increases productivity and decreases turnover (because workers are more satisfied), which lowers the real cost of the job as well as the frictional costs of constantly seeking and training new workers (costs the employer was unwittingly paying because he didn't know the "correct" price to pay his workers). Everyone is better off; no one suffers.

The problems that afflict this idyll are no different from every attempt to replace market-determined prices with planned ones. Even if it is true that some workers are underpaid, and it probably is (we've never met another journalist who thought ink-stained wretches, as a class, were overpaid), there's still the problem of determining what the right wage is. Why would anyone suppose that Nancy Pelosi knows that better than the supermarket manager?

As for the employer who supposedly harms himself and his business by driving off underpaid workers, who is to say he doesn't know what he is doing? Perhaps years of experience have taught him that grocery baggers leave after six months no matter what you pay them (within reason). In any case, we doubt that Ms. Pelosi loses a lot of sleep over the capitalists' misunderstanding of their own labor pool.

It is implicit in the logic behind raising the minimum wage that if we squeeze employers just a little, they won't even notice. Another argument, this one made explicitly, is that jobs are destroyed, but the wage gains more than make up for the reduced number of jobs. But this is only true if it's not your job that is destroyed. If you are a young black male, you are slightly more likely than the general population to be paid minimum wage, but you are almost 10 times as likely not to have a job at all. And if you're unemployed, raising the minimum wage not only doesn't help you find a job; it probably hurts. Welcome to Speaker Pelosi's ide a of progress.

DOJ_NMG_0093348

Time For The $5.15 Minimum Wage To Punch Out? (WSJ)

By Sarah Nassauer

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

Here's a look at some of the issues:

How many would be affected by the change? Because many states have minimum-wages that surpass the federal law, the Economic Policy Institute, Washington, D.C., estimates that only about 15 million people would be affected by a federal minimum-wage increase to $7.25. That number could decrease slightly after the six states that voted to implement a wage increase on Tuesday put their laws into action. The EPI includes some "spillover" in this figure -- that is, people who made more then $7.25 before the change but will likely get an increase in pay to stay in the same relative position on their company's pay scale.

Would some lose their jobs as a result? This is a hotly debated question. Traditionally, labor unions have pushed for wage increases, saying unemployment isn't a factor, while the restaurant, retail, and small-business industries have said raising the minimum wage will create job loses. Young and unskilled workers are the groups usually singled out as most at risk.

A watershed study by economists David Card and Alan B. Krueger in 1994 said that minimum-wage increases in New Jersey didn't result in job losses in the fast-food industry. But that stance has been challenged by other economists. A 2003 survey by Dan Fuller and Doris Geide-Stevenson said that 46% of academic economists in the U.S. agreed with the statement, "a minimum-wage increases unemployment among young and unskilled workers," while 28% partly agreed, and 27% disagreed. A similar study from 1978, published in the American Economic Review, said 90% of economists surveyed agreed or partly agreed with the statement.

Regardless of what economists say, public opinion has always been strongly in favor of lifting the federal minimum wage.

Do some earn less than the federal minimum wage? The U.S. Department of Labor estimates that about 1.4 million people earn below minimum wage and that 72% of those people work in the leisure and hospitality industry. This figure can be misleading because the Labor Department data are based on answers given by workers. Many people round down their salary to $5 an hour when they respond to the survey. The Labor Department says 300,000 people said they earned exactly $5 an hour on the 2005 survey.

Also, many people who work in food preparation -- waiters, for example -- take home paychecks of less than $5.15 an hour because of a federal "tip-credit" law, which allows employers to pay workers less per-hour if they meet minimum-wage standards based on tips.

All six states that put a minimum-wage referendum on ballots Nov. 7 passed an increase.

In the wake of the Great Depression, Congress set the first minimum wage in October 1938 at 25 cents an hour under the Fair Labor Standards Act. The act also established maximum working hours and banned most child labor.

Gallup Polls taken to gauge public opinion on minimum-wage increases since 1937 show that public opinion has never been against raising the minimum wage. The level of support varied from about 55% in 1945 to 83% in 2006.

Minimum-wage workers tend to be young. About half of workers earning $5.15 or less in 2005 were under 25 years old, and about one-fourth of workers earning at or below the minimum wage were 16 to 19. Among employed teenagers, about 9% earned $5.15 or less.

The industry with the highest proportion of workers with reported hourly wages at or below $5.15 in 2005 was leisure and hospitality, at about 14%. About three-fifths of all workers paid at or below the federal minimum wage were in this industry, primarily in food services.

DOJ_NMG_0093349

As of Dec. 2, the U.S. will have gone nine years, four months and one day without increasing the federal minimum wage, the longest stretch in the nation's history. The longest stretch to date is from 1981 to 1990, when the federal minimum wage was raised to $3.80.

Slow Track (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt, Neil King , Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Democrats' sweep of Congress is set to deliver a blow to President Bush's free-trade ambitions and could hamper impending trade deals both big and small.

Democrats' stances against free trade helped build the party's success at the polls and could tip the balance on trade matters. The new dynamic could put a definitive end to the already troubled effort to reach a global agreement to reduce tariffs and open markets, known as the Doha round. It also could put in jeopardy smaller deals such as those the U.S. has crafted with Peru and Colombia, intended to boost two-way trade by lowering tariffs and increasing intellectual-property protections.

Two dozen tightly contested races turned partly on Democrats' protectionist platforms, according to Public Citizen, a liberal advocacy group. All told, 16 incoming "trade skeptics" are set to replace "trade friendly" Republicans in the House, according to a study by the Swiss Institute for International Economics at the University of St. Gallen. Five new Senate Democrats are viewed as more critical on trade than were their opponents.

"The House and Senate are going to exert themselves on trade much more aggressively," vows Ohio Democrat Sherrod Brown, whose successful campaign against free-trade Republican Sen. Mike DeWine was built on opposition to the Bush trade agenda. In one television advertisement he stood before an abandoned local factory, contending Mr. DeWine had supported trade agreements that cost the state jobs. "Congress has given too much of its authority to the president," he says. "We've just ceded our power."

A lame-duck session of the current Congress is set to vote as early as next week on whether to lift Cold War-era economic restrictions on Vietnam, which has just joined the World Trade Organization, and grant it the same benefits as other U.S. trading partners. That vote is expected to pass easily, despite some opposition in the textile industry.

After that, Democrats are gearing up for a major pushback against the Bush administration on other trade fronts, most notably on a vote next year on whether to renew the president's authority to negotiate trade deals with other countries, without amendment from Congress. That authority expires in the summer.

The U.S. in the past 20 years has championed global and regional trade deals that have significantly lowered tariffs and have helped spur a boom in global trade. Advocates assert that the U.S. would benefit from more liberalization, both to bring in lower-cost imports and to increase exports. Opponents argue lowering trade barriers has hollowed out the U.S. manufacturing base and done lasting harm to many pockets of the economy.

Special presidential trade-negotiating authority, often called "fast track," is critical to getting deals done. Other countries are reluctant to negotiate with the U.S. if there is a chance the deals could changed by Congress instead of just approved or rejected. Democratic critics have long complained that the Republican Congress gave too much negotiating latitude to Mr. Bush and want to rein the president in.

Trade experts say Democrats may try to exact concessions from President Bush that would render a deal on fast-track nearly impossible. For instance, some Democrats have suggested significantly increasing the $1 billion the government gives yearly to workers displaced by foreign competition. Others are proposing compromises such as limiting fast-track authority only to the Doha talks.

Some business officials expressed cautious optimism that trade liberalization won't grind to a halt in the next Congress. "The trade agenda may change, may be done in a different way, but it isn't going to end altogether," says Bill Miller, a congressional liaison for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. He and others said past Republican dismissiveness of Democratic concerns on recent trade legislation -- such as labor rights and environmental protection in recent trade bills -- may have stirred some of the deepest opposition. A more cooperative environment could make a difference, they said.

DOJ_NMG_0093350

Charlene Barshefsky, President Clinton's trade representative, agrees, predicting Democrats could show real cooperation to try to secure the Doha round. "I see tougher sailing ahead, but not necessarily history-altering events," she said.

The first test may be the U.S.'s proposed trade pact with Peru, which the Bush administration had hoped would be voted on this fall, before the new Congress is sworn in. Many Democrats oppose the deal, including Rep. Charles Rangel, a New York Democrat who is poised to take over the House Ways and Means Committee. Mr. Rangel wants labor protections to be included. Though no final decisions have been made, Republican leaders are wary of bringing the deal forward for a vote, especially after the signal sent by Tuesday's vote.

Even in states that historically have rejected anti-free-trade campaigns, such as Iowa, Kansas and Missouri, candidates who ran heavily on such a platform won. While the dominant themes of the campaign were Iraq, terror and scandal, there were plenty of signs that economic insecurity was coloring voters' decisions.

In exit polls, half of voters said they felt the "state of the national economy" was "not so good," or "poor." Economic concerns were particularly big in the industrial Midwest, where free-trade critics won some of their biggest gains and voters in some states put economic concerns first.

Mr. Rangel said he wants to renew the president's fast-track authority but that the president would need to consider Democratic priorities in return. Extending the authority depends on whether Mr. Bush "wants both parties to participate in discussions," Mr. Rangel said in an interview before the election.

After the new Congress is seated in January, Democrats are all but certain to seek modifications to a trade deal with Columbia. As with the Peru deal, they are likely to push for stronger language on worker protections. Both pacts would give them their first real opportunity to wrangle more concessions in an area over which their party and Republicans have been fighting for years.

Another big issue is agriculture: Congress next year must either renew or rewrite the current farm bill, a huge mass of legislation that covers all U.S. farm policy, including subsidies. The biggest sticking point within the Doha round is the big subsidies the Europeans, Japanese and U.S. give to support farmers. Developing countries argue these payments distort the export market.

To reinvigorate the Doha talks, Democrats would have to be willing to enact steep farm-subsidy cuts, a move many analysts doubt they will take.

Democrats also could push tough measures of their own. They have floated various bills to squeeze imports from China or to try to manage the country's trade imbalance. Others seek to impose various restrictions or punishments for intellectual-property violations or its failure to allow its currency, the yuan, to strengthen further. Those have been shelved until now, partly because of a lack of support from the Republican leadership and the White House.

Congressional Democrats have long been moving away from free-trade support. In the 1990s, dozens of House Democrats regularly supported free-trade initiatives like the North American Free Trade Agreement backed by then-President Clinton, which won 102 Democratic votes. But only 15 Democrats backed the Central American Free Trade Agreement negotiated by the Bush administration in 2005.

The incoming batch of trade skeptics that unseated incumbent Republicans largely represents a new breed. Many are conservative on issues such as gun ownership and abortion and on economic issues like taxes, but veer populist on trade issues.

In the union-heavy areas north and east of Pittsburgh, Democrat Jason Altmire struck a starkly antitrade tone in his bid for a House seat, beating Republican Rep. Melissa Hart, who had ran on an overt free-trade plank. "I'm not protectionist, but my view is that future trade deals can't just give the store away," Mr. Altmire says.

Indiana's Joe Donnelly pointed to job losses in his own district and promised to insist on strong labor and environmental protections in future deals. He said he would have voted against Cafta and recent trade deals with Chile and Singapore.

In North Carolina, former National Football League quarterback Heath Shuler won on a campaign that was pro-guns and antiabortion but also strongly antitrade. He beat up on his opponent, Rep. Charles Taylor, for having cast no vote at all when Cafta squeaked through, which Mr. Taylor blamed on a technical glitch.

Economic Populism Pays For Democrats (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0093351

By Edward Luce, Alim Remtulla

Financial Times, November 11, 2006

Defeated Republicans have found solace in the fact that many of their victorious Democratic opponents are "social conservatives". They point to James Webb, who surprised everyone by winning the bitter and close Senate race in Virginia on Thursday, giving his party a majority of one in the upper house to complement its decisive victory in the House of Representatives.

However, neither Mr Webb nor the majority of the Democratic freshmen who won elections this week can so easily be fitted into that category. Punching the air and holding up the dusty boots of his son who is serving in Iraq, Mr Webb told cheering supporters in Arlington that his election was as much a vote for economic fairness as it was for a change of course in Iraq.

Although Mr Webb supports the right to bear arms – a virtual necessity for anyone wanting to represent the Commonwealth of Virginia – the Vietnam veteran is pro-abortion and only lukewarm in his opposition to homosexual marriage.

One or two of his colleagues, including Bob Casey, the new senator for Pennsylvania, and Heath Shuler, a Democratic representative for North Carolina, are "pro-life" but the large majority of new Democrat lawmakers support the woman's right to choose.

More significantly a majority of the intake, including Mr Webb, are economic populists who are deeply suspicious of free trade and quick to blame China and other developing countries for the loss of US jobs. Some, such as Sherrod Brown, the new Democratic senator for the key Midwest state of Ohio, which has lost 200,000 manufacturing jobs since Mr Bush came to power, won the election virtually on that issue alone.

"We will focus on economic fairness in a country divided too much by class in an age of the internationalisation of American corporations," said Mr Webb in a victory rally speech that devoted more to the economy than all other themes combined. "At a time when profits are at a record high and wages are at a low, we will focus on bridging the class divide."

Labelled the "middle-class squeeze" by Democrats and "median wage stagnation" by economists, the incomes of median American households have barely shifted since George W. Bush was elected on a ticket of "compassionate conservatism" in 2000. However, in important parts of America, including large swathes of the Midwest and the north-east, which provided a majority of the Democratic gains, economic anxiety came a close second to the Iraq war in motivating voter turnout.

In a study of the election campaign, Robert Borosage, head of the liberal Campaign for a Fairer America, said there were more political advertisements "painting big oil [companies] and big pharma as threats than advertisements warning about bin Laden". According to Stan Greenberg, a Democratic pollster, 41 per cent of those who voted Democrat cited their disquiet over the Iraq war as their main reason for voting compared with 26 per cent on jobs and the economy. However, if the 23 per cent citing "corruption in Washington" is included, then domestic concerns trumped Iraq.

Democratic campaigns overwhelmingly linked middle-class economic anxieties to the Republican Congress's promiscuous use of tax breaks for large companies in exchange for campaign finance. "On the economy Democrats ran remarkably populist campaigns," said Mr Borosage. "Democrats linked corruption to economic woes, charging incumbents with being in the pockets of big oil and doing nothing about gas prices and being in the pockets of big pharma and doing nothing about drugs prices."

The most obvious economic consequence of the Democratic victory is that it will be virtually impossible for Mr Bush to renew his fast-track trade negotiating authority next year in order to revive the dormant Doha round of world trade talks. However, the administration's bilateral trade initiatives could run aground far more quickly.

Many leading Democrats, including Mr Brown and Mr Webb, campaigned for "fair trade" and "putting Americans first", which is code for including labour standards in bilateral trade agreements and being more critical of companies that "outsource" manufacturing jobs to China and service sector jobs to India. They are likely to be aggressive in pushing for tougher scrutiny of explicit and hidden tax breaks for large energy and pharmaceutical companies – known as "corporate welfare".

As the world focuses on the brewing debate over Iraq between the Bush administration and a Democratic Capitol Hill, the battle to define America's response to globalisation is also hotting up. "Both the Democrats and the Bush administration will want the other side to get the blame if their mutual promise of bipartisanship falls apart," said a senior Democratic strategist. "It could be over Iraq, it could be over the economy."

DOJ_NMG_0093352

Congress Likely To Clash With Bush On Trade (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — Congressional Democrats pledged this week to work with President Bush when they assume control of the House and Senate next year, but there is one issue where disagreement seems all but assured: U.S. trade policy.

For the last six years Bush has had little difficulty getting trade agreements through a business-friendly Republican Congress, but the new Democratic majority will include several members who campaigned against free trade.

One of the first battles could be over the president's authority to get trade deals approved quickly.

The U.S. Trade Promotion Authority Act, known as "fast track," streamlines the approval process by allowing the president to negotiate trade agreements without consulting Congress, and requires an up-or-down vote within 90 days. Passed in 2002, it expires in July, and the Bush administration is expected to seek reauthorization.

Senator-elect Rep. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio) — a foe of free trade while in the House — and a slate of new lawmakers plan to block fast track unless it's amended to include protections for domestic and foreign workers.

"It's not going to be the president's call on getting what he wants," Brown said Friday. "I don't think the Bush administration will go for [reauthorization] right away, but we need to start now."

Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.), who won reelection by promising legislation to create a trade prosecutor to investigate countries such as China that violate U.S. trade agreements, said Bush's trade policies have failed to protect American workers.

"Our trade policy needs to be one that expands jobs in America and maintains our standard of living. It should not be about creating a race to the bottom on wages," Stabenow said Friday, adding that she plans to resubmit the trade prosecutor bill in January.

Democratic party leaders also have indicated that trade is among their top priorities. Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), set to chair the powerful House Ways and Means Committee that oversees trade agreements, is expected to tackle trade policy immediately.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), likely the next Speaker of the House, intends to address Democrats' trade concerns as part of the majority's "Six for '06" agenda — "looking at trade policies and making them more fair" for U.S. workers, according to spokesman Brendan Daly.

Republicans will push for approval of several specific trade agreements during this month's lame duck session, according to staffers on Capitol Hill and at the Office of the U.S. trade representative. The list includes agreements with Colombia and Peru and normalizing trade relations with Vietnam in time for the president's visit to Hanoi next week for the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit.

As for fast track, R. Bruce Josten, executive vice president at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, says he expects a limited extension, one that would only allow specific trade deals to go forward. But he worries the Democratic Congress will turn protectionist, bogging down trade agreements with extra requirements and penalizing countries like China.

He pointed to a bill proposed by Sens. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) earlier this year that would have imposed a 27.5% tariff on Chinese imports until that country revalued its currency. "Are you just going to do that with China?" Josten asked. "What about Japan? What about India?"

U.S. trade officials are optimistic that they can preserve the president's trade authority with the help of moderate Democrats. They are counting on more senior, moderate lawmakers to shape trade policy, including Rangel and Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), incoming chair of the Finance Committee, which oversees trade policy in the Senate.

"The chairmen who actually will map out the agenda have sort of said this is what we want to do, that they want to work with us," on reauthorizing fast track, said Sean Spicer, a spokesman for the office of the U.S. trade representative.

Rangel supports fast track "in principle," according to a congressional staff member, but believes trade policy needs to include more enforcement of worker protections.

"His view is that the confidence in U.S. trade policy has dramatically declined. There's been a broad perception that globalization is not being structured in a way that its benefits are being spread broadly," said the staff member, who asked not to be identified.

DOJ_NMG_0093353

Rep. Ellen A. Tauscher (D-Alamo), an investment banker who chairs the moderate New Democrat Coalition, told the pro-business group Thursday that she is circumspect about renewing fast track.

"We don't believe we've gotten the best agreements through the authority we gave this president," she said, "and frankly, unless there's some changes, I think we have to consider what we will do, whether it lapses and we wait until we have a Democratic president in 2008."

Tipping Point For Trade (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

The architect built his house of straw. The foundation -- the Republican base -- may have retained its brick-like solidity in support of its candidates Tuesday, just as Karl Rove predicted. But the house itself -- and the House itself -- was blown to smithereens, with massive shifts among moderate and independent voters to the Democratic column. And for all the talk of coming Democratic dissonance within their expanded congressional delegations, it's clear that on economic policy, a new progressive center has formed.

The Democrats' pickups came largely in the Northeast, Midwest and Mountain West. In the South, outside of Florida, they won just a couple of new seats. Moderate Northern Republicans in both houses -- including the most moderate, Rhode Island's Lincoln Chafee in the Senate and Iowa's Jim Leach in the House -- went down to defeat. The Republican Party that limps away from this election is rooted more firmly in the South -- which is precisely the party's problem. It was the Southernized GOP from which both moderates and mountain-state libertarians ran screaming in this election. The results from Arizona are particularly instructive. Not only did Democrats pick up two House seats there, but Arizona voters also became the first in the nation to reject a ban on gay marriage. The gap between Goldwater libertarianism and Southern religious traditionalism widened to a gulf this week.

But what of the Democrats? Is the incoming congressional majority a powder keg of veteran liberals and rookie moderates just primed for explosion? Can Nancy Pelosi navigate the treacherous shoals of gay marriage and school prayer?

Well, sure. It will be Pelosi who will control the agenda in the House, which means the issues that unite Democrats will be the ones that come to a vote. And the Democrats are far more united on a range of key issues than is commonly believed.

Ironically, one issue that unites the new majority is an issue that has historically divided Democrats perhaps more than any other: trade.

Since the passage of the North American Free Trade Act in 1993, House Democrats have been moving steadily away from a trade policy that benefits globe-trotting corporations and investment funds while depressing wages here in the States. Senate Democrats, on the other hand, have split fairly evenly on trade legislation over the past decade.

Tuesday's election changed all that. Looking at the Democrats who picked up formerly Republican House seats, Public Citizen's Global Trade Watch tallies 27 who defeated (or replaced resigning) free-trade Republicans and who campaigned against the kind of trade deals that Congress has ratified. The fair-trade 27 insist instead on deals that stress labor rights and environmental standards. In North Carolina, Democrat Heath Shuler -- ostensibly one of the new conservative Democrats -- attacked his opponent, Republican Charles Taylor, for backing off his commitment to vote against the Central American Free Trade Agreement. "It's not right when Congress passes trade bills that send our jobs overseas," said one Shuler ad.

In the incoming Senate delegation, the contrast is even sharper. The Democratic pickups -- Missouri's Claire McCaskill, Montana's Jon Tester, Ohio's Sherrod Brown, Pennsylvania's Bob Casey, Rhode Island's Sheldon Whitehouse and Virginia's James Webb -- all unseated free-trade incumbents with campaigns that stressed the need to pay far greater attention to the downward leveling that globalization entails. Tester ran ads attacking trade agreements for putting "our jobs and the viability of family farms and ranches across Montana in jeopardy." Webb's Web site states, "We must reexamine our tax and trade policies and reinstitute notions of fairness."

Exit polling made clear that the fair-trade Democrats have tapped into a profound national anxiety. When asked whether life for the next generation would be better, worse or about the same as life today, 40 percent responded "worse," while just 30 percent answered "better." That's a stunning figure to emerge from what has historically been perhaps the most optimistic of nations.

DOJ_NMG_0093354

The Senate in particular will see real changes. The addition of Sherrod Brown and Vermont's Bernie Sanders will give fair-trade forces some passionate voices to go with their increased numbers; Brown is poised to emerge as a national leader in this fight.

When the president's fast-track authority expires next summer, it is plainly not going to be renewed. "Congress is done with ceding all trade authority to the president," Brown said Friday. A new majority on trade issues has formed. And having lost both houses in 1994 in part because of Democratic voters' discontent with NAFTA, the Democrats now seem to have won them back after a campaign in which they charged that our corporate-led globalization hardly seems to be building the best of all possible worlds.

Labor Movement Dusts Off Agenda As Power Shifts In Congress (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

After the Republicans took control of the House in 1994, perhaps no group was on the outs as much as organized labor. But now that the Democrats have swept both houses of Congress, the nation's labor unions feel as if they are back — and then some.

Eager to be treated as an important force, union leaders have worked overtime since Election Day reminding Democrats about all that organized labor did to help put them over the top, including spending more than $100 million and dispatching more than 100,000 volunteers to help get out the vote.

After years of being sidelined by the Republican majority, the nation's unions are now pushing Congress to act on a long list of issues: improving mine safety, putting a brake on outsourcing, making it easier to unionize workers and extending health coverage to millions of uninsured Americans.

"There's a lot of pent-up demand on organized labor's part," said Randel Johnson, vice president for labor, immigration and employee benefits of the United States Chamber of Commerce. "Money talks, and they dumped a lot of money into the campaign."

For now at least, organized labor sounds fully in tune with the presumed House speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, because they both want to raise the minimum wage, rein in drug prices and help students with high college tuitions.

Representative George Miller, a California Democrat and ally of Ms. Pelosi who is expected to become chairman of the House Committee on Education and the Workforce, said, "There's a strong sense among the members that a lot of middle-class workers are getting left out of the economic growth in this country, and we are eager to do something about that."

Mr. Miller and Senator Edward M. Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democrat who is expected to head the Senate Labor Committee, say that raising the federal minimum wage will be the first issue they address.

"Clearly the minimum wage is front and center," Mr. Miller said.

Even with Democrats back in power, organized labor faces serious hurdles. Republicans and even some Democrats are uncomfortable with labor's demand to deny the Bush administration trade promotion authority, which makes it easier to negotiate trade pacts because Congress would be barred from amending them.

In the Senate, Republicans are likely to use the filibuster to block one of labor's most coveted pieces of legislation, a bill that would in many ways make it easier for unions to organize workers. The bill would, among other things, greatly increase penalties for companies that illegally fire workers to undermine unionization drives. Labor sees the bill, which is co-sponsored by more than 90 percent of House Democrats, as pivotal for reversing labor's decline.

"The filibuster, there's no question it's a hurdle," said William Samuel, the legislative director of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. "We will have to build a movement behind this legislation because it will give workers more bargaining power to respond to the loss of pensions, health coverage and jobs with good wages."

DOJ_NMG_0093355

John J. Sweeney, the A.F.L.-C.I.O. president, said unions and the Democrats largely agree on most issues. Mr. Sweeney's wish list includes barring federal contracts for companies that send jobs overseas and making it harder for companies to shed their pension obligations when they file for bankruptcy protection.

Mr. Sweeney was eager to talk about how well labor did on Election Day. He pointed out that nonunion voters split more or less evenly between Democratic and Republican House candidates, while union members preferred Democratic candidates by a margin of 30 percentage points.

Union leaders said that among all voters nationwide, there was a 6.8 million-vote margin in favor of Democrats over Republicans in the House races. The A.F.L.-C.I.O. pointed to exit polls showing that members of union households accounted for 5.6 million of that margin.

"We were by far the most powerful turnout engine on the progressive side," Mr. Sweeney said.

Labor unions helped orchestrate successful minimum wage initiatives in Montana, Missouri, Ohio and three other states. Those efforts encouraged many low-income workers to vote, giving an additional lift to Democrats, especially in close contests like the Senate race in Montana.

"The Democrats wouldn't have won nearly as many seats without labor's money and manpower," said Larry J. Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia.

Professor Sabato said unions were not as demanding as they had sometimes been in past decades. "They're not pushing the Democrats far to the left on many subjects," he said. "They want to win, too. They were perfectly willing to back a lot of those moderate to conservative Democrats, who are Blue Dogs."

Representative Jim Matheson, a Utah Democrat who is co-chairman of the Blue Dog Coalition of moderate to conservative Democrats, said he strongly supported a higher minimum wage and the Employee Free Choice Act, the bill that would make it easier to unionize workers.

"A lot of Blue Dogs have a strong labor record," Mr. Matheson said. "But I'm a pro-trade Democrat, and that's where labor and I are on different sides of some issues. I'm a strong believer in the economic growth benefits of free trade."

Labor is urging Congress to block the ratification of free-trade accords negotiated with Peru and Colombia unless President Bush includes stronger protections on worker rights, human rights and the environment. Many unions have also pledged to oppose granting Mr. Bush new trade promotion authority to help him complete a worldwide trade agreement as well as free-trade accords with individual countries.

"If you look at the new Democrats elected, if they mentioned trade it was almost always unfavorable," said Gary C. Hufbauer, a senior fellow at the Peterson Institute for International Economics. "Those Democrats are replacing a lot of pro-trade Republicans. There's been a substantial shift."

Mr. Hufbauer said Mr. Bush might have to do a lot of horse trading, like agreeing to a higher minimum wage and higher housing subsidies for the poor, to persuade Mr. Sweeney not to block some trade pacts and legislation.

When several unions quit the A.F.L.-C.I.O last year, many Democrats feared that the schism would hurt labor's effectiveness in election campaigns.

"People said the split would be terrible for labor in politics," said Anna Burger, chairwoman of the breakaway coalition, Change to Win. "Labor had its best year ever."

Ms. Burger said the two union federations were seeking to cooperate on a lobbying program. Her coalition is making a big push for universal health coverage.

"More and more workers are losing their health coverage," Ms. Burger said. "We need a way to stop that once and for all. One way to do that is extend the health insurance program that covers everyone in Congress. If it's good enough for them, why isn't it good enough for every American?"

Choice For Intelligence Panel Poses Early Test For Pelosi (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093356

WASHINGTON, Nov. 9 — Her boss may want her gone, but Representative Jane Harman happens to think she is good at her job. And she has no intention of leaving it without a fight.

Ms. Harman argues that her role as the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee makes her the logical candidate to become chairman when the new Congress begins in January.

Representative Nancy Pelosi, the party's leader and presumptive House speaker in the next Congress, has indicated she has other plans.

The two women, both from California, have long had a frosty relationship, and Ms. Pelosi has been angry with Ms. Harman for not using her position on the Intelligence Committee to attack the Bush administration aggressively.

But Ms. Harman said that making her chairman would be good politics, citing Tuesday's victories as proof that Democrats will thrive by taking a centrist stance on issues of war and terrorism — as she has done for the past four years.

"The new crowd coming into the House are mostly moderates and conservatives who were in substantial part elected on a security message," Ms. Harman said in an interview on Thursday. "To keep our majority, we need to keep a tough and smart message on security."

Ms. Pelosi has told colleagues she plans to replace Ms. Harman on the Intelligence Committee, possibly with Representative Alcee Hastings of Florida, although she has given no public indication of her choice for the post since the election.

Many Democrats are closely watching the decision for signs of two things: how the speaker-in-waiting will chart her party's course on national security issues and how she will handle her first postelection test in dealing with the often fractious Democratic caucus.

"This is the battle that nobody wanted," one senior Democratic strategist said. "For Nancy to start off her speakership with a fight is a great shame."

In addition to pointing to her record over the past four years, Ms Harman said she was once made a promise by senior Democrats that she would assume control of the Intelligence Committee if her party regained power in the House.

"My view of this has to do with what is fair in terms of the commitments that were made to me," she said.

The promise came in the form of a letter in 1999, when Representative Richard A. Gephardt of Missouri, who was then the House Democratic leader, recruited her to try to regain her Congressional seat in 2000 after she relinquished it in 1998 to run for governor of California.

But allies of Ms. Pelosi said that when she appointed Ms. Harman as ranking member of the Intelligence Committee in 2003, her intention was always to have Ms. Harman serve only two terms.

The selection of Mr. Hastings, a black member of the committee, would win Ms. Pelosi support from the powerful Congressional Black Caucus. But his past could provide ammunition for Republicans: Mr. Hastings was impeached and removed by the Senate from a federal judgeship in 1989 on a bribery charge. (He was acquitted in the related criminal case.)

Some leading Democrats said that choosing Mr. Hastings over Ms. Harman would send exactly the wrong message at a time when Democrats were struggling to prove their bona fides on national security.

"A lot of people would be astonished," said Leslie H. Gelb, a former president of the Council on Foreign Relations and a State Department official in the Carter administration. "I think it would send a signal that Democrats are not going to be as serious about national security as they need to be."

Representative Silvestre Reyes. Democrat of Texas and also a committee member, has emerged as a possible compromise candidate. But Ms. Pelosi has also told colleagues that she could select someone who is not currently on the committee.

Appearing Wednesday on CNN, Ms. Pelosi said that it was her prerogative to select an entirely new Intelligence Committee at the beginning of each Congress, and that it is the one committee on which seniority rules are not recognized.

Reid, Pelosi Expected To Keep Tight Rein In Both Chambers (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jonathan Weisman, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093357

After two days of watching Rep. Nancy Pelosi hailed as a political pioneer and the toast of her party, Sen. Harry M. Reid joined her yesterday atop the first Democratic-controlled Congress in a dozen years thanks to a razor-thin election in Virginia.

What seemed almost unthinkable a year ago -- Pelosi as House speaker and Reid as Senate majority leader in the 110th Congress -- suddenly is reality, sending the two into overdrive as they approve committee chairmen, set priorities, and referee disputes between colleagues who are planning to hire more staffers and move into larger offices.

The Democrats' success in the Bush presidency's final two years will depend largely on the compatibility and forcefulness of the two barely tested leaders, according to some lawmakers and political experts. Reid, a former boxer from Nevada, is a camera-averse Senate insider who has used rear-guard tactics to bedevil Senate Republicans on Social Security, nominations and other issues in recent years. Pelosi is a wealthy San Franciscan who grew up in a Baltimore political family and now has reached the highest elected post of any American woman.

They know that voters will expect results. But the Democrats' majorities in the House -- and especially the Senate -- are so slender that they will have to make at least modest accommodations to President Bush and Republican lawmakers on many matters. Reid and Pelosi are not particularly close, associates say, but they are disciplined realists who value party loyalty and are unafraid to tell colleagues or supporters not to overreach in a still-divided political climate.

"Both have shown how good they are at counting noses and enforcing party discipline," said Bruce Reed, a former Clinton White House aide who heads the centrist Democratic Leadership Council. Under their leadership, "the House and Senate Democratic caucuses have been more united than ever," he said. "They'll need that trait even more in the majority because they can leave no nose behind."

Yesterday, Reid echoed Pelosi's earlier assertion that Democrats will push an agenda to help middle-class families and reduce the deficit while also treating Republican lawmakers more generously than the GOP had treated Democrats during their years in the minority.

"The election is over, and it's time for a change," Reid told a cheering throng of Democratic aides outside the Capitol. They assembled shortly after Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) conceded defeat to James Webb, handing Democrats their 51st vote in the 100-member chamber.

Aides and friends say Reid and Pelosi are strongly partisan people who fumed under the heavy hand of GOP majorities, especially in the House, and who made no secret of their distaste for Bush's handling of the Iraq war and other policies. But the sources said the two also realize they must minimize differences within their caucuses. And they know they must balance the stridently anti-Bush sentiments of some liberal constituents against the more pragmatic pocketbook concerns of moderate and unaffiliated voters who were crucial to this week's election results.

"You have to govern from the center," Pelosi said yesterday. "We are in a completely different place now. We are setting our legislative agenda."

At the outdoor rally, where Reid was joined by Sens. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) and Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), the future majority leader stuck to generalities about his party's intentions.

"It's time for bipartisanship, it's time for open government, transparency, and it's a time for results," Reid said. "There must be a new direction in Iraq," he said, along with more affordable college tuition and health care, greater energy independence, and smaller deficits.

Reid did not say how Democrats would shrink the deficit while boosting college aid, and insiders said such challenges will be the test of the effectiveness and savvy of a Reid-and-Pelosi-led Congress. Both leaders agreed on the "Six for '06" priorities, which include relatively popular measures such as raising the minimum wage.

"But it gets more complicated after that," said a former White House and congressional aide who knows Democratic lawmakers well. Especially in the Senate, he said, a party with a 51 to 49 majority will find it difficult to surgically raise, lower or leave alone certain taxes without opening the door for Republicans to push their own priorities.

Pelosi said that Democratic leaders want to demonstrate their effectiveness, and build up some trust with the White House, by tackling legislation that will have bipartisan support. Bush's "innovation agenda," laid out last year in his State of the Union address, has largely lain dormant. Democrats would like to take up Bush's proposals to expand funding for basic research and alternative energy sources such as ethanol, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0093358

Democrats would also work with Bush to resurrect his proposed overhaul of the nation's immigration laws, which would pair tough border security measures with new paths to legal work and citizenship for the country's 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants, Pelosi said. And she is convinced Bush will back a higher minimum wage.

But even Pelosi questioned how quickly such legislative efforts can come together. "I guess the word 'rapid' is what gives me hesitation," she told a handful of reporters in her office.

Pelosi continues to put flesh on the bare-bones proposals that Democratic candidates campaigned on. As soon as she is elected speaker -- which does not appear in doubt -- Democrats will vote on a substantive slate of changes to the way the House operates, she said. They will include rules to diminish lobbyists' influence, ensure that lawmakers and the public have time to read legislation before lawmakers vote on it, open House-Senate legislative negotiating sessions to the media, and reinstitute lapsed budget rules that say any new spending or tax cuts must be offset by equal tax hikes or spending cuts.

Democrats also will extend new rules mandating that each home-district pet project, known as an earmark, be identified by the name of the lawmaker who sponsored it. Earmarks would have to be authorized by policymaking committees before they are approved by the Appropriations Committee.

Democrats avoided a potentially brutal intraparty fight yesterday when Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) decided not to run for the post of House majority whip next week. That would have pitted Emanuel, who has a huge well of support from this year's successful campaign, against James E. Clyburn (S.C.), the current chairman of the Democratic Caucus and the only African American in the Democratic leadership.

After delicate negotiations with Pelosi, Emanuel agreed to stand for caucus chairman, leaving the whip post to Clyburn. Under the agreement, John B. Larson (Conn.), the caucus vice chairman, will stay at that post rather than seek promotion, but both Emanuel and Larson would be offered additional power and responsibilities, according to Democratic leadership aides.

Emanuel's decision raised pressure on John P. Murtha (Pa.) to drop his challenge to House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer (Md.) for the post of House majority leader. But that battle continued to heat up ahead of the Thursday vote.

Congress will reassemble next week for a lame-duck session devoted mostly to completing work on the spending bills needed to keep the government operating. But with Democrats assuming the majority in January, not much will happen, Senate Republican aides conceded.

Pride Of Baltimore (WP)

By Lynne Duke, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

Nancy Pelosi Learned Her Politics At the Elbow of Her Father the Mayor

BALTIMORE -- When she wasn't racing to school at St. Leo's in her blue uniform or buying sweets in Mugavero's Confectionery or playing on front stoops up and down the block, Little Nancy sometimes worked the front desk at the family home at 245 Albemarle St., taking down the requests and sad stories of the folks who arrived to seek help from Big Tommy, her dad.

Or maybe she was riding around with her dad and his bullhorn, as he touted his candidacy from a convertible.

The late Thomas J. D'Alesandro Jr., also known as Old Tommy or Tommy the Elder, was the flamboyant and legendary machine politician, a Roosevelt Democrat, whose only daughter is the woman poised to be the speaker of the House, second in line of succession from the presidency.

She grew up stuffing envelopes for her dad. She grew up watching how the political game was played. She saw how favors were handed out, how chits were called in. She watched her mother balance full-time motherhood with grass-roots organizing, and later followed her example. Albemarle Street was Nancy Pelosi's training ground, the center of a political universe forged from a community as tight-knit as an Italian village.

Critics deride Pelosi, 66, for a presumed lightweight liberalism they attribute to her latter-day home in San Francisco. But her liberalism -- and the keen political instincts and skill at the inside parry of the game -- can be traced more deeply and more precisely back to Albemarle Street, to the political empire that grew there when her father held court through decades of an intensely political life.

DOJ_NMG_0093359

In that brick rowhouse on the corner of Albemarle and Fawn streets, politics was a family business that became a local dynasty. Big Tommy served 22 consecutive terms in public office, from state delegate to city councilman to U.S. congressman to Baltimore mayor, followed by a low-level appointment from President John F. Kennedy to something called the Federal Renegotiation Board.

One of Pelosi's five brothers, Thomas J. D'Alesandro III, Young Tommy, served on the Baltimore City Council and became the city's mayor as well.

Theirs was the politics of the New Deal, of the hand up for those who were down.

"It was always about the progressive economic agenda for a fair economy, where many Americans, all Americans, could participate in the economic success of our country," Pelosi said yesterday when asked about the influence of her family's politics on her own.

"What I got from them was about economic fairness," Pelosi said. "That was the difference between Republicans and Democrats all those years ago." She also learned about the power of loyalty, both extending it and enforcing it.

And even though the D'Alesandros could have moved away from the neighborhood's narrow streets and tight rowhouses, they stayed, no matter the patriarch's success.

That is one reason for the degree of pride that folks there express for Pelosi's success -- her family stayed rooted right with the rest of them.

"She wasn't born with a silver spoon, growing up around here," says Marion "Mugs" Mugavero, 84, who ran his confectionery for 59 years. "She grew up like the rest of us."

Except that her father became the go-to guy for Baltimore politics, a man with visitors from high places.

"He was good friends with Harry Truman," recalls Dominic "Fuzzy" Leonardi, 80. "When Truman was running for president, [Big Tommy] went and picked him up and brought him to his house" in a 1936 Plymouth.

"We had a lot of politicians coming down here," Leonardi said, seated on a bench along High Street yesterday as he is most days with his pal, Michael Trombetta, also 80. They listed Spiro Agnew, Jimmy Carter and Ronald Reagan as the pols they remember making a pilgrimage to see Big Tommy.

"They all came down to see him," Trombetta says.

Little Italy, where Pelosi grew up, occupies about a dozen square blocks near Baltimore's Inner Harbor, and was, in its day, the prototypical ethnic enclave in a city that was a patchwork -- and remains so, to an extent -- of Italian, German, Jewish, African American and Irish.

More than a civic duty, politics during her parents' day was about survival for the sons and daughters of Italian immigrants forging their way in a big city. It was about jobs. It was about favors of the political ward bosses. It was about patronage in a society in which the sons and daughters of immigrants often could depend only on themselves.

"There weren't a lot of vertical lines open to those kids, and the ward was where you got jobs. They would get you jobs," says Gilbert Sanders, a Baltimore historian and author of "The Neighborhood: The Story of Baltimore's Little Italy."

"And whole political machines were born out of these jobs. A job driving a car for city hall. A job picking up trash. Jobs were everything."

And Big Tommy "was the king of it," Sanders says. "It's just the way things were. It's not pejorative at all. These kids, you don't think they went off to Yale, do ya?"

John Pente, 96 and a lifelong Little Italy resident, remembers being destitute and with no prospects in 1930.

"It was the time of the Depression," Pente says. "I came out of Calvert Hall [high school] with a diploma under my arm and no job."

So he went to Big Tommy.

"He helped me get a job as a timekeeper" for the workers at a construction site.

And of course, such favors, such help, cemented a bond between patron and politician.

Pente shrugs and describes the ethic this way: "You scratch my back, I'll scratch your back. We all looked out for him."

Big Tommy tried to help people with scholarships, with education, with assimilation.

DOJ_NMG_0093360

"You had a lot of foreigners here that needed to get around and get their citizenships and they didn't speak English," Mugavero recalls.

Big-city machine politics, no matter where it was practiced, often was a magnet for criminality. If a person betrayed the boss's loyalty, the consequences sometimes weren't pretty. Corruption often went with the territory.

In 1953, one of D'Alesandro's longtime associates, also a relative by marriage, was caught up in a bribery probe related to off-street parking. But Big Tommy was not known as a politico with dirty hands. Not even when the Teamsters tried to strong-arm the mayor during a city garbage strike in 1956 did he buckle to mob pressure.

Tom J. O'Donnell, 95, was D'Alesandro's press secretary in those days and remembers well how the mayor ran afoul of the Teamsters when he declared one Friday that striking garbage collectors would be fired if they did not return to work on Monday.

That Saturday, he got a visit from a Teamsters official sent by Jimmy Hoffa himself.

"He told the mayor, 'Mr. Jimmy directed me to tell you that he is very unhappy with what you are doing,' " says O'Donnell, reading from a self-published book about his years with D'Alesandro. "And the mayor spoke up and said, 'You go back and tell Mr. Jimmy I'm very unhappy with the garbage piling up on the streets of Baltimore, and I'm not going to stand for it.' " And when Monday came, says O'Donnell, most of the striking workers were back on the job.

This political toughness runs through his daughter, who, as minority leader, has not been reluctant to bare her teeth or throw her elbows to enforce party discipline.

O'Donnell tells the story of D'Alesandro's entry into politics, when he entered the Maryland House of Delegates in 1926, an Italian boy making good for his people.

He wore patent-leather shoes and spats, an Oxford gray suit, a polka-dot bow tie and a derby, for he wanted to dress in the manner he thought would befit the men of high standing he would be joining.

"He said he thought he would encounter men of the stature of Thomas Jefferson, Patrick Henry and the like, and he was greatly disappointed when they were just ordinary people," O'Donnell said.

Through his political career, the polka-dot bow tie would remain his lucky charm. He told Sandler once that he'd lost an election the one time he did not wear that polka-dot tie.

Out of the political game, he remained a force. The house on Albemarle still received visitors seeking Big Tommy's blessing for political careers.

J. Joseph Curran Jr., the Maryland attorney general and the father-in-law of Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley, was among them.

"Tommy the Elder: I remember when I would want to run for office and they would say, 'Well, why don't you go see Tommy,' and you'd go down to the D'Alesandro house down on Albemarle Street and I said, 'Mr. Mayor, I want you to know I'm thinking about running and I'd appreciate your advice and help.' "

D'Alesandro appointed Curran's father to the City Council. He also attended grade school early in the last century with Curran's mother.

"It was smart politics, because then you have someone you like and who likes your mother and father," he said.

That was in 1968. By then, Pelosi was long gone -- to college, to marriage and family and then a political career of her own -- which started in 1987, the same year her father died.

But these many years since she pitched in as a girl on the fringes of her father's political machine, Little Nancy still bears the family imprint. Big Tommy's political world was her own.

Staff writers Jonathan Weisman and Juliet Eilperin contributed to this story.

The Determined Democrat (FT)

By Holly Yeager

Financial Times, November 11, 2006

Just days after the 2004 elections, when Democrats lost seats in Congress and John Kerry failed to oust George W. Bush from the White House, Nancy Pelosi, the party's leader in the House of Representatives, started planning for the midterm contests.

DOJ_NMG_0093361

While pundits were talking about the arrival of a permanent Republican majority, she began recruiting candidates, targeting key races, tightening party discipline and, with other leaders, developing a message – critical of the war in Iraq, united in opposition to Mr Bush's proposed Social Security reforms – that would change the playing field.

"Many of the Republicans who are out there . . . were masquerading at home as moderates and voting here with a rightwing radical agenda," she said angrily at a press conference in her Capitol Hill office, foreshadowing a theme that would be heard around the country two years later. "They got away with it once. But we'll shine the spotlight on their voting patterns, and people will see that they're not the moderates they advertised themselves to be at home."

The strategy was effective, helping to oust Republicans across the country and positioning Mrs Pelosi, 66, to become the first female speaker of the House in US history.

A workaholic and self-confessed chocoholic, Mrs Pelosi has long been a vocal cheerleader and effective fundraiser for her party (she raised more than $100m for Democrats in the past four years – a feat matched only by the Clintons). But that this mother of five who first ran for public office 20 years ago is also a keen political strategist should not come as a surprise. Her late father, Thomas D'Alesandro Jr, spent 10 years in Congress, then a dozen as mayor of Baltimore. Known as "Old Tommy", he kept a "favour file" in the living room of their Little Italy home, tracking good deeds that he and the Baltimore Democratic machine had done for people – in case they needed to ask for something in return.

Mrs Pelosi – "little Nancy" back then, the youngest of six children and the only girl – says she also learnt from him to count votes. "Going into an election, they'd sit around the table and they had these yellow legal pads and they'd say, 'How many votes does it take to win?' and it's still the same thing."

To get the votes Democrats needed on Tuesday, she travelled the country for months, appearing at fundraisers and campaign rallies, encouraging candidates and offering whatever help her Washington team could provide.

"She stood on a front lawn in Pennsylvania to help me champion the need for embryonic stem cell research," said Patrick Murphy, one of five Iraq war veterans elected this week. "For the minority leader to come to a race where most political analysts didn't give me a shot at winning – I will never forget that."

Republicans had hoped she would play a different role in the election. Mrs Pelosi, who married her college sweetheart, a wealthy investment banker, represents San Francisco in the House. In the closing weeks of the campaign, Republicans frequently invoked the famously liberal city, warning of the kinds of left-of-centre policies they said she would champion if Democrats took control.

But Rahm Emanuel, the Chicago congressman who ran the Democrats' campaign team, said the focus on Mrs Pelosi – who, until this week, was not a well known public figure – did not work. "In every district that the Republicans ran an ad against Nancy Pelosi . . . the Democrats will have that seat," he said.

However, questions about her politics persist. Mrs Pelosi's voting record is solidly liberal, and she has been a harsh critic of Mr Bush and the outgoing Republican congressional leadership, making many wary of her pledges to forge a bipartisan environment, on the Hill and with the White House.

"As speaker, I understand my responsibility: speaker of the House, of all of the House, not just the Democrats, and the responsibility to work with the administration to make progress for the American people," she said after a pasta lunch with the president on Thursday.

But close advisers say she is a pragmatic leader who has several reasons to run the House from the centre, rather than the far-left. Many candidates she recruited are moderates, including some whose views on social issues put them closer to Republicans. "It's not, 'do you agree with me?'" said George Crawford, her former chief of staff, of her approach. "It's, 'can you get elected in your district?'"

The election of several such candidates will increase the influence of centrists within the Democratic caucus, while the desire to protect the new majority – and elect a Democratic president – in 2008 will further encourage co-operation, he said. "She is not just interested in being speaker for two years."

That does not mean Mrs Pelosi will not be tough. Democrats have attacked what they called the Republican "culture of corruption" and she has shown little tolerance for misdeeds within her own ranks. Despite the objections of the black caucus, she quickly removed William Jefferson, a New Orleans congressman, from the powerful ways and means committee when he came under federal investigation in a bribery scandal.

DOJ_NMG_0093362

Mrs Pelosi has vowed to make a new rules and ethics package the first order of House business in January. While Howard Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, differed sharply with Mrs Pelosi and Mr Emanuel on campaign strategy, he thinks her stance on ethics will be one of her strengths.

"I think Pelosi is going to be really great on corruption issues. I don't think she'll tolerate it for a second," Mr Dean said.

A devout Catholic, Mrs Pelosi makes frequent mention of her family. She warned aides this week she might have to alter her schedule at short notice to fly to New York, where one of her four daughters, Alexandra, was due to deliver a baby – her sixth grandchild.

The younger Pelosi, a documentary filmmaker, may also prove to be an invaluable resource for her mother. Her award-winning film, Journeys with George, chronicles Mr Bush's 2000 presidential campaign. The film shows candidate Bush, then Texas governor, as "a uniter not a divider", before the bitter partisanship that has characterised recent relations between the White House and Capitol Hill.

"Maybe we can find some common ground," Mr Bush says to the filmmaker, as he lightheartedly tries to quell a disagreement between two factions of the press corps that travelled with him. Whether Mrs Pelosi can find that common ground with him now is the main question.

2 Democrats Vie For House No. 2 (WT)

By Charles Hurt, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 10, 2006

House Democrats face their first major internal battle since Tuesday's stunning victory, a fight that pits some of the chamber's anti-war Democrats against the ideological center of their party.

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, now the No. 2 Democrat in the caucus and thus in line to hold the majority leader's post, faces a challenge from Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, who has come to represent the party's anti-war movement because of his strong critique of the Bush administration's handling of the war.

Though Mr. Murtha is otherwise a fairly conservative Democrat, his position on the war appeals to many liberals in his ranks and, say Democratic staffers, he has the private blessing of Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, the caucus's head and the presumed next House speaker.

Within minutes of Democrats' capturing the 15th seat needed to take control of the House, Mr. Hoyer tried tightening his grip on the majority leader position by reminding fellow Democrats that he had been a central figure in their caucus during their darkest times.

"We have put forward responsible budgets, proposed smarter defense policies, advanced innovative ideas on energy independence and stood strong against the privatization of Social Security," he said. "I have been proud to be a part of all of those efforts every step of the way."

He also has said he has the votes to sew up the No. 2 position.

Mr. Murtha reminded colleagues that his strongest voice in recent years came in opposition to the Iraq war, which strategists on both sides credit in part for Democrats' enormous victories this week.

"Talk is cheap, which is why, up until Iraq forced me to, I didn't do a lot of it," the former Marine told colleagues. "But empty rhetoric is expensive. It has cost America three years in a failed war at nearly three thousand lives lost and will cost us a trillion dollars by the time we can extricate ourselves from it."

While the liberal Mrs. Pelosi must figure out how to unify an increasingly conservative caucus, she addresses the leadership fight for the No. 2 spot gingerly. She's officially staying out of the contest -- which will be decided next week -- but few wonder where she stands.

She has a long friendship with Mr. Murtha and, Democrats say, supports his candidacy. Mr. Hoyer, in contrast, has been Mrs. Pelosi's rival for leadership positions in previous years.

DOJ_NMG_0093363

But the last thing she wants is a nasty internal fight that exacerbates differences in her caucus between the fierce anti-war Democrats and those from the more conservative wing, many of whom were elected to Republican-held seats this week.

Some Democrats also worry about moving Mr. Murtha into a high-profile leadership position after running so many campaigns about cleaning up the corruption in Congress. Mr. Murtha was among eight members of Congress caught up in the so-called Abscam bribery scandal of the 1970s and 1980s. While Mr. Murtha told the FBI agents posing as representatives of a fictitious Arab sheik that he was "not interested," he pointedly left open the possibility of future dealings.

While much of Mr. Murtha's support stems from his anti-war credentials, Hoyer supporters are quick to highlight Mr. Murtha's conservative position on abortion and other issues.

"Steny has an unwavering commitment to core Democratic principles," a group of top Democrats wrote in a letter to colleagues on Mr. Hoyer's behalf. "There simply is no question that Steny is deeply committed to our Party's efforts on civil and human rights, our support for working men and women, our commitment to education and health care, and our fight to protect the environment -- to name a few."

The letter was signed by Democratic Reps. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, John D. Dingell of Michigan, John Lewis of Georgia, Henry A. Waxman of California and Ike Skelton of Missouri, among others.

Other leadership races got settled smoothly for Democrats yesterday.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois Democrat who is credited with picking up nearly 30 seats Tuesday, decided to avoid a fight for the No. 3 position of majority whip, which will go to Rep. James E. Clyburn of South Carolina. Mr. Emanuel -- in his second term in Congress -- will become conference chairman and the youngest member of leadership.

"I seek this post, and not any other, because I believe what we need now is a unified Democratic caucus, focused squarely on the business of moving this country forward," he said yesterday.

Meanwhile on the Republican side, Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana, who is challenging Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio for minority leader, will pick up the endorsement today of the conservative group Club for Growth.

Democrats Ready To Flex Congressional Muscle (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning, Washington Bureau

Chicago Tribune, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Democrats solidified control over both chambers of Congress on Thursday as Republican Sen. George Allen conceded defeat to Democrat James Webb in Virginia's tight Senate contest, giving Democrats a slender 51-49 majority in the Senate.

The resolution of that race ushers in an era of divided government amid voter discontent with Republican President Bush and the war in Iraq. It will be the first time Democrats have held both houses of Congress since 1994.

Democratic control of the legislative branch will raise pressure for a change of direction in Iraq and impede the Bush administration's efforts to move the federal judiciary rightward. Democrats also have promised to rapidly pass legislation to raise the minimum wage, expand stem cell research, reduce the price of prescription drugs offered through Medicare, make some college tuition expenses tax-deductible and more strictly regulate lobbying and congressional ethics.

With Democrats controlling Capitol Hill, the president stands a better chance of gaining passage of his proposals for comprehensive immigration reform that includes a path to legalization for undocumented immigrants and an expanded guest worker program.

Incoming Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) signaled that the chances of a re-appointment of controversial UN Ambassador John Bolton are effectively dead. Bush was unable to win Senate confirmation for Bolton to the UN post so he used a constitutional prerogative to grant Bolton a "recess appointment" that expires when this congressional session ends.

Outgoing moderate Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island also said Thursday he would block any attempt to use the post-election lame-duck session of the current Republican-controlled Senate to confirm Bolton.

"The election's over. It's time for a change," declared incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), speaking shortly after Allen's concession at a celebratory Democratic rally on the lawn of the Capitol.

DOJ_NMG_0093364

"Millions of people spoke on Tuesday night, and we heard the message," added Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), the party's second-ranking leader in the Senate. "America can do better. We can come together on a bipartisan basis to solve the real problems facing our country."

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), speaking Thursday in Chicago, said, ""I think there's no doubt that if the Democrats squander the opportunity we've been given over the next two years, we'll have problems in '08. We've now got joint responsibility."

Noting that Bush still has more than two years left in his term, Obama said, "The question is going to be how does the president react? If he's somebody who is willing to engage in a bipartisan discussion on issues like Iraq, on issues like budget reform… are those all issues that he wants to work on?"

Earlier in the day, Bush met with incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) for a private lunch at the White House.

"We won't agree on every issue," Bush said after the lunch. But "we will do our very best to address big problems."

Reid and Durbin are scheduled to meet with Bush Friday.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the Chicago Democrat who led his party's successful campaign to take over the House, announced late Thursday that he would forgo a bid he had been considering for the influential third-ranking leadership post, majority whip. Instead, he will run for a post one rung down the leadership ladder, Democratic Caucus chairman.

A Democratic source said Pelosi had urged Emanuel not to make a bid for the whip post in order to avoid a divisive internal fight with the Congressional Black Caucus, which is strongly backing the only declared candidate for the post, Rep. James Clyburn (D-S.C.). Clyburn is currently Democratic Caucus chairman and the only African-American in the party leadership.

"I seek this post, and not any other," Emanuel said in a statement announcing his candidacy for caucus chairman, "because I believe what we need now is a unified Democratic caucus, focused squarely on the business of moving this country forward."

The caucus chairman typically is a mostly ceremonial position but Democratic aides said Emanuel would be given additional duties, including responsibility for rapid response to Republican attacks, input into party policy positions and a role in strategy for re-electing vulnerable incumbents.

According to the Associated Press, Democrats have won at least 230 House seats, giving them 12 more votes than the 218 needed to control the 435-member chamber. Two more uncalled races appeared to be leaning Democratic Thursday evening. Republicans had won 196 seats, with 7 uncalled races leaning in their direction.

Two days after the polls closed in Virginia, Allen conceded defeat in a Senate re-election campaign that two months ago he had been comfortably leading in the polls as he considered a bid for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

But in August he was videotaped calling a Democratic campaign worker of Indian descent a "macaca," a term considered a racial slur by some. Afterward, several former teammates from his days of playing football for the University of Virginia said he had frequently used a racial slur for blacks—an accusation that Allen denied.

Democrat Webb held a lead of 8,942 votes among 2.37 million cast as of Thursday evening, according to the web site of the Virginia State Board of Elections.

Speaking to supporters in Alexandria, Va., Allen said a preliminary re-canvass of votes suggested an official recount would not change the result.

"The Bible teaches us that there's a time and place for everything," Allen said. "Today I've called and congratulated Jim Webb and his team for their victory. They had the prevailing winds."

Webb, a former Republican and the Reagan administration's secretary of the Navy, stressed his opposition to the war in Iraq during the campaign. One trademark of his campaign was to carry around the state a pair of combat boots that he was given by his son, who is serving in Iraq. At the rally, he waved the pair of boots to cheers from his supporters.

"We're going to work hard to bring a sense of responsibility in our foreign policy that will, in my view, result soon in a diplomatic solution in Iraq," he said.

Tribune staff reporter Gerry Doyle contributed to this report from Chicago.

mdorning@tribune.com

Scandals Have Touched Some Key Democrats (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0093365

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

Incoming Leaders in House And Senate Vow to Approve An Ethics-Reform Package

WASHINGTON -- After winning an election shaped by corruption as much as Iraq, Democrats are about to elevate a set of leaders in the House and Senate that will include lawmakers who have had their own brushes with scandal.

Sen. Harry Reid (D., Nev.), who is expected to be elected to majority leader in the Senate, has come under attack for his relationship with Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, a profitable land deal, and whether he inappropriately used campaign funds to give Christmas bonuses to employees at his condo complex.

In the House, West Virginia Democratic Rep. Allan Mollohan, whose conduct is being investigated by the Justice Department, is in line for a senior position on the Appropriations Committee. Meanwhile, Rep. Alcee Hastings, a Florida Democrat, is vying to become chairman of the Intelligence Committee. Once a federal judge, Mr. Hastings was impeached by Congress more than a decade ago after he was charged with -- and acquitted of -- taking a $150,000 bribe. Mr. Hastings declined to comment.

A fourth Democrat, Rep. William Jefferson of Louisiana, under Justice Department investigation for accepting bribes, came out ahead of 12 other candidates vying for his seat on Election Day, but faces a December runoff under Louisiana's unique election system. A spokeswoman for Mr. Jefferson said he has "consistently said that he is innocent of all the allegations."

Democratic leaders in both chambers say they will make it a top priority to approve an ethics-reform package that tightens rules for lawmakers, congressional aides and lobbyists. Republicans made the same promise a year ago after a Justice Department corruption probe garnered guilty pleas from a pair of one-time aides to former Republican Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas as well as from Mr. Abramoff, who was close to Mr. DeLay and other Republican lawmakers.

Democrats were successful in exploiting the corruption scandal on the campaign trail. Nearly three of four voters said that "corruption and scandals" in government were extremely important or very important in their votes, according to exit polls.

Indeed, four Republican lawmakers with ties to Mr. Abramoff lost their re-election bids, including Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana and Reps. Richard Pombo of California, J.D. Hayworth of Arizona and John Sweeney of New York.

Three other Republicans in the House gave up their seats due to federal investigations into their ties with lobbyists. Reps. Duke Cunningham of California and Bob Ney of Ohio gave up their seats after pleading guilty to accepting bribes from lobbyists. Mr. DeLay decided not to seek re-election after he was tied to the scandal involving Mr. Abramoff. Democrats won two of the three elections to fill those seats.

Now that Democrats are in control of Congress, however, some of those same corruption issues may come back to hound the party. Mr. Reid, for example, is one of a handful of Democrats in Congress who had ties to Mr. Abramoff.

Mr. Abramoff employed as a lobbyist one of Mr. Reid's former aides and the Democratic leader received more than $40,000 in campaign donations from the lobbyist's fund-raising network.

In 2002, Mr. Reid sent a letter asking the Interior Department to block an Indian tribe in Louisiana from opening a casino that would have competed with an existing casino operated by one of Mr. Abramoff's clients. The day after Mr. Reid sent his letter, Mr. Abramoff's client, a tribe called the Coushattas, sent a $5,000 contribution to one of Mr. Reid's fund-raising groups.

Jim Manley, a spokesman for Mr. Reid, said that the senator "has long opposed the expansion of off-reservation Indian gaming," and any official action he took was consistent with that view. Another top Democrat, Sen. Byron Dorgan of North Dakota, has returned $67,000 in donations received from Mr. Abramoff's lobbying firm and clients.

Mr. Reid admitted last month that he used campaign funds to pay $3,000 in Christmas bonuses to the employees of the Ritz-Carlton in Washington, where Mr. Reid lives. Mr. Reid said he often holds fund-raisers and campaign events at his condo and that it was appropriate to use his campaign account to reimburse the staff for extra work. Nevertheless, Mr. Reid agreed to write a personal check to cover the costs. Mr. Reid also amended his personal financial records to more clearly indicate his profits from a business deal in Nevada.

Mr. Manley said that "whenever a question has been raised, he has taken swift action to address it, which is far different from how Republicans handle things."

DOJ_NMG_0093366

Mr. Reid was born in the Nevada desert and was once an amateur boxer and Capitol police officer. A lawyer, Mr. Reid became head of the Nevada Gaming Commission in the late 1970s. He was elected to the U.S. House in 1982 and the U.S. Senate in 1986. When Democratic Sen. Tom Daschle of South Dakota was defeated for re-election in 2004, Mr. Reid took over as majority leader. He is considered a tough and smart legislator. His even-keeled manner has won praise from other Democrats. He holds a seat on the Appropriations Committee and takes credit for many of the federal dollars that Congress sends to his home state.

On the other side of the Capitol, Mr. Mollohan is being investigated by federal prosecutors who are examining his practice of directing federal funds to nonprofit groups he set up in his home state that are run by real-estate partners or political allies.

Some of the groups got grand-jury subpoenas, indicating an active investigation. No charges have been brought and Mr. Mollohan has denied the allegations. He stepped down as ranking Democrat on the House ethics committee earlier this year after his pattern of earmarking became public. The allegations became an issue in his campaign against challenger Christopher Wakim, a Republican state legislator. But Rep. Mollohan won easily, with 64% of the vote to 36% for Mr. Wakim. A spokesman for Mr. Mollohan didn't return a call or email yesterday.

Mr. Jefferson, the Louisiana Democrat, was kicked off the House tax-writing committee after the Federal Bureau of Investigation said he was hiding $90,000 in cash in a freezer in his home. No charges have been filed, but investigators said in court papers that he took the cash for his role in securing communications contracts. Mr. Jefferson has denied any misconduct and was the front-runner in a field of 13 candidates in Tuesday's results, winning 30% of the vote.

--John R. Wilke and Robert Block contributed to this article.

Write to Brody Mullins at brody.mullins@wsj.com1

Connecticut's Dodd May Lead Banking Committee (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff, Usa Today

USA Today, November 10, 2006

Among goals: More transparent markets

WASHINGTON — Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, a second-generation senator exploring a 2008 presidential bid, is in line to be chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, now that Democrats have a majority in that chamber.

In his 26 years in Congress, Dodd, 62, has been a strong advocate for the insurance and financial services industries in his state. Such firms as Bear Stearns, Lehman Bros. and Goldman Sachs are atop Dodd's list of political action committee donors, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

Insurance lobbyists are hoping Dodd will play a key role in a possible extension of federally backed terrorism insurance. Dodd was one of the authors of a current law, crafted after the 2001 terrorist attacks, that expires next year.

“We certainly hope there will be a long-term mechanism put in place. … It's fundamentally important,” says the American Insurance Association's Julie Rochman.

Kurt Pfotenhauer of the Mortgage Bankers Association calls Dodd the type of Democrat who is “not allergic to business.”

At the same time, consumer advocates note Dodd's progressive streak. He backs a minimum wage increase and pushed for greater disclosure of credit card interest rates and tougher standards for offering cards to people under 21.

“He's been very strong on credit cards. I would anticipate that consumers will have access,” says Allen Fishbein of the Consumer Federation of America.

In a statement this week, Dodd outlined general goals, including preventing outsourcing of militarily sensitive jobs, improving the transparency of markets, expanding affordable housing and beefing up market terrorism protections.

Dodd is the son of a former senator, Thomas Dodd, who was also a prosecutor in the Nuremberg trials of top Nazis after World War II.

Dodd was an author of the 1993 Family and Medical Leave Act and helped craft a law improving the voting process after the 2000 elections. In recent months, he's been traveling the country to test support for a possible presidential bid.

DOJ_NMG_0093367

Though he voted for the Iraq war, he is now a sharp critic of President Bush's handling of the conflict. Dodd has said he regrets letting fellow Democrats talk him out of mounting a filibuster against recent legislation governing military tribunals, which he says violates international law banning torture.

In a swing through Iowa, Dodd said the law was in stark contrast with the Nuremberg trials. He referred to letters his father wrote his mother during the Nuremberg proceedings, telling her he would never do anything as vital.

Dodd supported the Sarbanes-Oxley law after the Enron scandal, requiring more business transparency. The business community is now pushing to relax the law, but the outcome is unclear.

"I suspect, just because of the business community's focus, at some point (Congress) will be discussing Sarbanes-Oxley," says Mark Peterson of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants. "Legislation, probably not. Oversight hearings, sure, at some point."

Some Defense Firms More At Ease As McCain Denied Oversight Chair (WSJ)

By Jonathan Karp And Andy Pasztor

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

Democratic control of Congress has sparked uncertainty among defense contractors after six years of tremendous growth, but many industry executives are relieved that Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain, a strident critic of Pentagon weapons-buying practices, won't become chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

The anticipated Democratic chairman, Michigan Sen. Carl Levin, brings his own longstanding skepticism of the industry and some of its prized weapons programs, particularly missile defense. Yet the soft-spoken Mr. Levin is likely to change the tone and focus of the committee's oversight efforts.

Unlike Mr. McCain, whose investigations into Boeing Co.'s ethical lapses laid the path for the panel to examine weapons-contract details and contractor profit margins, Mr. Levin has signaled that his priority will be the war in Iraq.

He fired a salvo in a post-election conference call with reporters Wednesday by criticizing the Bush administration for failing to include war costs in the regular Pentagon budget, which must be approved by the Armed Services Committee. Instead, the White House has resorted to increasingly large emergency-spending requests, which don't have the same accountability. Mr. Levin said the U.S. needs "honest" and "rational budgeting."

Michele Flournoy, a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic & International Studies think tank in Washington and a former Clinton administration Pentagon official, predicts Mr. Levin will concentrate on bringing oversight to the conduct of the Iraq war and ensuring funding to equip overstretched U.S. forces.

"Unlike some other senators, Sen. Levin isn't known to harbor any deep grudges against defense companies," she said. "He'll be a friend to the military and a friend to industry."

Even though the defense industry has benefited greatly from recent Republican control, some defense executives grew so peeved at Mr. McCain that they privately rooted for a Democratic takeover of the Senate. Had Republicans retained control of the chamber, he was likely to succeed Virginia Sen. John Warner, whose tenure would have been terminated by party-imposed term limits. As a minority member, the Arizona Republican will have less clout in setting the committee's agenda, and because of his expected presidential run in 2008, Mr. McCain can't count on the same level of bipartisan support that has long been a committee trademark.

The setback to Mr. McCain may provide some relief to companies he has targeted, such as Lockheed Martin Corp. and Boeing. But it is less positive for Northrop Grumman Corp., which has benefited from his demands for a fair competition against Boeing to supply aerial-refueling planes. With the change in leadership, senior Republican senators from the South will be less able to help Northrop's Gulf Coast shipyards.

Mr. McCain's office didn't respond to requests for comment.

Industry officials expect heightened scrutiny by a Democratic-led committee, but say Mr. Levin's is likely to focus less on the industry and more on the vast sums being outsourced to support the troops. "He will look at whether we have appropriate safeguards for services contracts, and that leads to things in Iraq," said one defense-industry executive who had extensive experience in government.

DOJ_NMG_0093368

The 72-year-old Michigan Democrat, known for his collegial manner but also his persistence after more than two decades on the panel, sometimes can be a partisan and stubborn industry critic. When the military buildup of the 1980s was tainted by bribery and influence-peddling scandals, he blasted top Republican Pentagon appointees as "pitifully poor managers" who saddled the military with "more anticompetitive practices" than any previous administration.

These days, Mr. McCain is the defense industry's biggest irritant. He began by spearheading the drive that thwarted an Air Force plan to lease aerial-refueling planes from Boeing. Pentagon and Justice Department investigations backed up many of his allegations. Later, he used his position as a subcommittee chairman to browbeat senior executives and force the Pentagon to rewrite contracts, including the Boeing-led Army modernization program and Lockheed Martin's C-130J cargo plane.

His tenacious campaigns were cast as efforts to bring transparency and cost-savings to multibillion-dollar weapons programs. Pentagon officials, industry officials and Wall Street analysts complained about what they considered Mr. McCain's micromanaging. In June, however, Mr. McCain was dealt a rebuke when the full Senate easily approved a contract for Lockheed's F-22 stealth fighter jet he had argued against.

Write to Jonathan Karp at jonathan.karp@wsj.com1 and Andy Pasztor at andy.pasztor@wsj.com2

Treasury Chief Set To Seek Deals (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 10 — For his first months in office, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. kept to the shadows while cabinet colleagues were campaigning for a Republican Congress. He made it plain that he disliked politicking, and he irritated some Republicans the Friday before Election Day by not joining the administration chorus talking up a drop in the jobless rate.

But now the new Treasury chief is set to plunge in. Untainted by the harshly partisan rhetoric of the past, he hopes to use his prowess as the former head of Goldman Sachs not just to pursue critical economic deals with China and other American trading partners but — equally important for the weakened administration — to explore deal-making with Democrats in Congress, as well.

An objective is to restore the long-term financial stability of Social Security and Medicare as baby boomers head toward retirement.

While that may prove politically impossible, in the short term Mr. Paulson is also expected to be at the center of efforts to find economic issues on which Congressional Democrats and the Bush administration can agree next year.

Lawmakers in both parties say talks may include middle-class tax breaks and simplification of the tax code. Democrats, for their part, hope to use Mr. Paulson's comments this summer, in which he deplored income inequality, to press for a minimum wage increase.

The White House says it is counting on the best from Mr. Paulson. But the chances for real cooperation are limited.

Mr. Paulson could easily run up against hard-liners in the administration who are likely to doubt that negotiation with the Democrats is the best course for Republicans already looking ahead to the 2008 elections. And while there is much talk in Washington of finding common ground after the vitriolic campaign, the mood could sour as early as next week when Congress returns for a lame-duck session where Republicans will still be in control.

"I have every reason to believe that Paulson will have some influence with the president," said Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York, the expected Democratic chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. "The question is how much."

The day after the Democratic victory in the midterm elections, President Bush announced that he asked Mr. Paulson "to reach out to folks on the Hill" on Social Security and Medicare, subjects that inevitably will lead to discussions about taxes and spending.

"With the election over, there may be an opportunity for some renaissance of bipartisanship," said Joshua B. Bolten, the White House chief of staff. "Hank Paulson is an important ingredient in that chemistry."

In an interview after the voting this week, Mr. Paulson said he was determined to work with Democrats to get something done next year.

DOJ_NMG_0093369

"It has always been my view, even before the election, that on the major issues this country is facing, any solution was going to have to take a bipartisan approach," he said. "We were going to have to build a consensus, no matter who won the election."

Mr. Paulson is a professed neophyte in political and legislative warfare, but is recognized as a master at striking bargains in the business world. As chief executive of Goldman Sachs he made billions of dollars in investment banking deals in the United States, as well as in China, Germany and other countries.

"I don't think you'll find anybody as tenacious as he is," said John F. W. Rogers, a managing director at Goldman Sachs who served for a time as Mr. Paulson's chief of staff there. He added that it was instructive to go hiking with Mr. Paulson, an avid outdoorsman whose environmental views are not always in sync with the administration's.

"It's like a forced march," Mr. Rogers said. "If he sees a downed tree, he says, 'You can go over it, you can go under it, but you can't go around it.' There's an active sense of attacking problems head-on."

He has already delved into the issues presented by China. Mr. Paulson plans to lead an unusual delegation to China in December that will include at least a half-dozen cabinet colleagues dealing with issues like commerce, trade, energy and transportation. The trip underscores his first-among-equals status in the cabinet when it comes to economic matters.

For all his business experience, though, others who know Mr. Paulson say that he may have trouble navigating the egos and competing interests on Capitol Hill as well as those inside the administration.

Beginning to address government benefit programs could be an early test of Mr. Paulson's leadership and negotiating skills. The Treasury chief has repeatedly asserted that he wants to fix Social Security and Medicare, which are set to rise sharply in cost in the coming years, and to work with Democrats on solutions.

But Democrats say that if the Treasury chief revives Mr. Bush's emphasis on private investment accounts, as a partial replacement for Social Security for future retirees, it will be rejected — and seen as an act of bad faith.

"I once told President Bush that if he took private accounts off the table, I would go around the country with him in support of Social Security reforms," Mr. Rangel recalled. "He said, 'As long as I'm president, private accounts will be on the table.' Well, if he says that now, he's basically saying he doesn't want a deal on Social Security."

Mr. Bush said a couple of weeks ago that he would continue to push for private investment accounts. But the president also said that he would retain Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, only to reverse himself this week.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who will lose his position as chairman of the Finance Committee next year, said it appeared that Mr. Paulson was already advocating more efforts to listen to Congress. But it was not clear whether he could persuade Vice President Dick Cheney or Karl Rove, the political strategist, to go along.

"I don't know whether he's going to win or lose," Mr. Grassley said, "but I sure applaud what he's doing."

In recent weeks, the Treasury secretary has spent a lot of time courting lawmakers like Mr. Rangel, who will be at the center of any discussion of taxes and benefit programs, and Senator Max Baucus of Montana, his counterpart as the expected chairman of the Finance Committee.

"I'm very impressed," Mr. Baucus said. "Hank Paulson seems to have very few ideological bones in his body."

But there is also precedent to consider or — possibly for this president — to avoid. Mr. Bush's father, President George H. W. Bush, negotiated a grand budget and tax deal with Congress in 1990, only to have it shot down by Republicans in the House because it contemplated some tax increases. (Later that year, after a temporary government shutdown, lawmakers finally approved a budget that included limited tax increases.)

That budget deal remains a source of bitterness among conservatives. Some argued that it was an excellent model for cooperation — in that Democrats accepted some spending cuts — and helped usher in economic growth in the 1990s. But it also involved Mr. Bush's going back on his "read my lips: no new taxes" pledge in the 1988 presidential campaign.

If there are marathon negotiations to resolve tax and budget issues, an administration official said, they would not take place at Andrews Air Force Base, the scene of the 1990 talks.

Taking over as Treasury chief this summer, Mr. Paulson has surrounded himself with an eclectic team. The only top official he has brought from his time at Goldman Sachs is Robert K. Steel, now the under secretary of the Treasury for domestic finance.

DOJ_NMG_0093370

His chief of staff and top political aide is James Wilkinson, a veteran of Texas politics who has served as a top aide to Mr. Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

The environment in Congress on budget and tax issues will be tricky, because Democrats are loath to begin the discussion of increasing any taxes, having been accused by Republicans of being a bunch of tax raisers in the last election.

But Democrats all say they embrace enactment of a "pay as you go" regime in which any future tax cuts or spending increases will have to be paid for by spending cuts or tax increases elsewhere. While few insiders expect major changes to Mr. Bush's big tax cuts until after the 2008 election, the subject of increasing some taxes, or scaling back past tax cuts, may end up on the table next year.

Democrats, however, are determined to increase the minimum wage, now $5.15 an hour, to $7 or more. Mr. Paulson has not taken any stand on whether he would favor such an increase.

Mr. Paulson has declared that his other economic priorities are to combat protectionist sentiment in the United States and to engage in a widespread dialogue with China that could eventually prod the Chinese leadership to overhaul their nation's economic practices.

Mr. Paulson succeeded in persuading Mr. Bush to let him head an inter-agency committee of cabinet members on dealing with China. He did so by lining up support among the cabinet members and the White House staff first.

The mid-December trip is aimed at persuading the Chinese to liberalize their economy, crack down on piracy, discuss future cooperation on energy and encourage greater flexibility in currency practices.

Mr. Paulson is to be accompanied by Susan C. Schwab, the United States trade representative; Carlos M. Gutierrez, the commerce secretary; and Samuel W. Bodman, the energy secretary. Treasury officials say they would like quick progress on China's practice of keeping its currency artificially low in relation to the dollar, which aggravates the trade imbalance by making exports to America cheaper and imports to China more expensive. But many experts say the Chinese are resisting out of concern that such a step could damage their banking system, throwing people out of work.

Mr. Paulson will be raising the pressure on China, but political experts say his skills have mostly revealed themselves so far in getting United States lawmakers to withdraw a bill punishing China if it does not change its currency policy.

The Treasury secretary also hopes to help Ms. Schwab get a global trade deal that could be approved by Congress next year. But the consensus among Congressional leaders is that it is probably too late for that.

Beyond a possible breakthrough with China, they say that Mr. Paulson's greatest hope for success lies in striking smaller bargains on the budget and taxes. Mr. Rangel and Mr. Baucus said it would be better to reach agreements on incremental tax issues first to build up trust.

Mr. Paulson, in the interview, also said he thought that the approach of reaching for "low-hanging fruit" on economic issues might make sense.

"I'm hoping there will be some things that we can get some quick victories on," Mr. Paulson said. "Then if we can get some things done, it will be a good basis for going on to more difficult issues."

U.N. Post Will Test Bush On Pledge For Consensus (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 10 — President Bush has pledged to be a bipartisan consensus builder now that Democrats are to control Congress, and since Wednesday he has made conciliatory gestures. The question now is whether Mr. Bush is ready to junk all of his make-nice pledges in order to keep John R. Bolton at the United Nations.

Officially, administration officials say they plan to make all the necessary calls to Republicans and Democrats on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to try to persuade them to confirm Mr. Bolton for a new term.

"He has been extraordinarily effective up there at the U.N., and now is not the time to have a gap," said Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0093371

But with the announcement on Thursday by Senator Lincoln Chafee, Republican of Rhode Island, that he would deny Republicans on the committee the last vote needed to send Mr. Bolton's nomination to the full Senate, some administration officials privately acknowledge that Mr. Bolton's chances of confirmation are "nil," one State Department official said.

Mr. Chafee, who was defeated for re-election on Tuesday, said: "The American people have spoken out against the president's agenda on a number of fronts, and presumably one of those is on foreign policy. And at this late stage in my term, I'm not going to endorse something the American people have spoken out against."

In this situation, the usual next step would be for Mr. Bolton to withdraw from consideration and for Mr. Bush to nominate a less polarizing candidate. Names that have been floated both inside and outside the administration include Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador to Iraq; Philip D. Zelikow, the State Department counselor; Paula Dobriansky, under secretary of state for democracy and global affairs; and even Mr. Chafee.

But Mr. Bolton is keen to stay at the helm of the American team at the United Nations, administration officials say, and White House officials, including Mr. Bush's counsel, Harriet E. Miers, have been looking into whether the president can somehow bypass the Senate and keep him there. Administration officials said Vice President Dick Cheney was backing exploration of such a move.

Mr. Bolton "could be named acting permanent representative or deputy U.N. ambassador or something else that doesn't require confirmation," a senior administration official said.

Obviously, doing that will anger Democrats, the official said. "But we'll see."

When senators blocked Mr. Bolton's confirmation last year, Mr. Bush gave him a recess appointment, which expires when this Congress adjourns. Mr. Bush could give Mr. Bolton a second recess appointment as the United Nations ambassador, but under the law he could not be paid for his work.

White House officials are looking into whether he can be paid by some other entity and still serve as ambassador, or whether a de facto position could be created in which Mr. Bolton served as ambassador for all intents and purposes, but not in name.

Such a move would almost certainly enflame relations between the White House and the ascendant Democrats and would probably kill any further talk about bipartisan cooperation.

"It looks like an act out of Cirque du Soleil," said Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut and a member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. Dodd likened the proposed maneuver to "a vision of a contortionist" and said, "This John Bolton does not deserve to be promoted."

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, declined on Friday to speculate about Mr. Bolton's future if his nomination did not get through the Senate.

"I think what we ought to do right now is simply allow senators in the lame-duck session to see if they will give John Bolton a fair shake," Mr. Snow said. "After that, we'll talk about possibilities."

Mr. Bolton's allies argue that during his tenure as ambassador, the United States has been successful in getting several Security Council resolutions through the United Nations, including actions that seek to slow or halt the nuclear ambitions of Iran and North Korea. Mr. Bolton also helped to shepherd through a Security Council resolution to end the Israel-Hezbollah war in Lebanon and to establish a United Nations peacekeeping force there.

"The president believes," Mr. Snow said, "that John Bolton has done an exemplary job, and if people fairly will examine his record, his real accomplishments, his record at the United Nations, that he not only will have earned confirmation but will receive it."

Mr. Bolton's critics say he is abrasive and represents a hard-line, conservative ideology at odds with the multilateral approach at the United Nations.

Administration officials say Mr. Bush resubmitted Mr. Bolton's nomination as part of a public relations strategy to put the onus on the Democrats for not allowing a vote on his appointment to go to the floor.

Democrats say that if the administration circumvents the Senate by trying a special appointment, they will portray Mr. Bush as insincere in his pledge to seek a middle ground.

DOJ_NMG_0093372

"What all of this indicates is that the bipartisanship discussion we're seeing is very thin," said Steve Clemons, director of the American Strategy program at the New America Foundation.

Mississippians Rise Up Over Rangel's Comment (NYT)

By Anthony Ramirez

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

It was a remark, says Representative Charles B. Rangel, uttered with regional pride rather than rancor. But he apologized nonetheless.

On Wednesday, the day after the Democrats won a House majority, Mr. Rangel, the Harlem Democrat poised to become chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, which writes tax legislation, talked about winning back more of the tax revenue that New York State sends to the Treasury. He said, "Mississippi gets more than their fair share back in federal money, but who the hell wants to live in Mississippi?"

Apparently, a lot of people do, and they are not shy about saying so.

Charles W. Pickering Jr., a Mississippi Republican and a colleague of Mr. Rangel's, was the first to publicly take umbrage. He reacted as if he and his state had been slapped with a glove.

"Mr. Rangel owes the people of Mississippi an apology," he said in a statement. "I hope his remarks are not the kind of insults, slander and defamation that Mississippians will come to expect from the Democrat leadership in Washington, D.C."

Mr. Pickering, who is from Laurel, Miss., marched to his peroration.

"From the coast to the Delta to the Pine Belt to the hills and across Mississippi," he said, "there is beauty in every city, charity in every heart, love in every church, and majesty in every countryside."

In Jackson, the state capital, Mr. Rangel's remarks were discussed on local television and talk radio, said David Hampton, who edits the editorial page at The Clarion-Ledger. "A lot of it was post-election Republicans saying the evil Democrats this and that and a-ha, we told you so," he said. "Mississippi sort of has an inferiority complex."

Mr. Hampton said he had received about a dozen letters to the editor and five comments on his editorial page blog, and some of it was genuine outrage.

In a letter to the editor, Wendy Barthe Peavy of Biloxi wrote: "Congressman Rangel: As a proud Mississippian and resident of the Katrina-ravaged Gulf Coast, I would be happy to tell you 'who the hell wants to live in Mississippi.'

"I will not waste your time with the litany of world-class writers, artists, athletes, entertainers, scientists, surgeons, astronauts, musicians, soldiers and statesmen who have called Mississippi home," she wrote. "I will tell you of the 93,000 people still housed in FEMA trailers due to the loss of over 10,000 apartment units and over 150,000 homes to Hurricane Katrina."

She concluded, "Congressman Rangel, these people went through hell to live in Mississippi!"

Told of Representative Pickering's comments, Mr. Rangel said he was sorry. "I certainly don't mean to offend anyone," he said in a statement issued Thursday. "I just love New York so much that I can't understand why everyone wouldn't want to live here." Attempts to reach him by telephone and e-mail for further comment were unsuccessful.

Some Mississippians were skeptical about the regional chauvinism explanation.

"I don't know if he was joking," said Debbie Crapps, 46, who lives in Florence and works as a manager at Homer's Barbeque Store in Jackson.

"I think it was a bad thing to say," Ms. Crapps said in a telephone interview. "He doesn't live in Mississippi, he doesn't know anything about us. A lot of people here have a lot to say about it because we're not a big city like New York City. We are humans. We don't think that's right."

But Mr. Pickering, at least, was prepared to let bygones be bygones. In a statement yesterday, he said Mississippians were "quick to forgive a sincere person."

Beyond the bruised feelings, there were some fears that Mississippi's needs would be ignored by a Northerner in a powerful position. In his editorial page blog, Mr. Hampton wrote that Mississippi would have to adjust to Mr. Rangel.

DOJ_NMG_0093373

"Regional insults aside," Mr. Hampton wrote, "the more serious issue is Rangel will head the powerful Ways and Means Committee at a time when there already is reluctance to continue to address Katrina-recovery needs and a perception that Mississippi got more than it should have in recovery funds."

He said Mississippi's Democrats in the House, Bennie Thompson and Gene Taylor, "have their job cut out for them," and added, "They might start with a visit to Mr. Rangel."

Pelosi Affirms Support Of Full D.C. Voting Rights (WP)

By Yolanda Woodlee

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

U.S. Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the incoming speaker of the House of Representatives, supports District voting rights and is a co-sponsor of legislation that would give Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) a full vote in the House, a spokeswoman said yesterday.

The statement from Pelosi's office clarified her position after heated discussion on Washington Post Radio about her position on the issue. On Thursday, Pelosi said she would change House rules on the first day of the new Democratic-controlled session in January so that Norton could vote on proposed changes but not final approval of legislation on the House floor. That would be a temporary measure, Norton said.

"She wants D.C. to have full voting rights in the House," said Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Pelosi (D-Calif.). "She doesn't co-sponsor many pieces of legislation."

On Thursday, Crider had referred to Pelosi's opposition to portions of an earlier version of a voting rights bill. After changes were made, Pelosi signed on to the current bill, introduced in May by Norton and U.S. Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.).

City officials, including Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty and Vincent C. Gray, chairman-elect of the D.C. Council, said they are concerned that the temporary measure does not go far enough.

"This is going back to a proposal where we get a vote only if it doesn't count," Fenty said. "It doesn't make any sense. . . . We need to go to something more substantive."

The Norton-Davis bill links the D.C. vote to an additional congressional seat in Utah, raising the total number of House members from 435 to 437. Pelosi did not favor legislation that included redistricting in Utah, a move that some lawmakers feared would jeopardize that state's only Democrat representative. Pelosi later signed on to the bill after Utah made the congressional seat a statewide position.

The question for voting rights advocates is whether there will be time to consider and pass the bill before the current session ends.

Norton, who has championed voting rights for the District since she took office in 1991, said she prefers passage of the bipartisan bill this month rather than waiting until the Democrats take the majority.

Ilir Zherka, executive director of the nonprofit group D.C. Vote, is calling for an immediate vote.

"The next Congress is going to be very busy dealing with a lot of issues, and so our view is let's get this done now, because we have already dealt with the full range of questions posed about this bill," he said.

"Having got this far, to the 10-yard line, let's finish it."

Before the bill can move through Congress, however, Utah state lawmakers must vote on their portion of the measure. Aides to Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr. and Utah House Speaker Greg J. Curtis said this week that legislation creating the congressional seat could be approved in one day.

If this happens next week, Norton is optimistic that Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), chairman of the Judiciary Committee, will move the legislation to a floor vote in House. The Senate would also need to vote on it.

"The question is, is there time on their watch?" Norton said.

Full Vote Eyed For House Delegate Before Session Ends (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, November 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093374

D.C. voting rights advocates are encouraged by the recent Democratic takeover of Congress, but would prefer a bill giving their representative a full vote in the House be considered before the end of this legislative session.

"For us, it's not necessarily a matter of Democratic control versus Republican control," said Ilir Zherka, executive director of the nonprofit advocacy group D.C. Vote. "Going into a new Congress presents new challenges and additional challenges, and we would rather complete this process now."

The D.C. Voting Rights Act was introduced in May by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, and D.C. Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, a Democrat. It would give the historically Democratic city a House vote and add a seat in the House for Utah, a Republican stronghold.

The bill is now in the House Judiciary Committee, where proponents are pushing for committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican, to allow it to be voted on by all 435 House members.

But the bill's move out of the committee depends on Utah lawmakers approving a redistricting map. And with the current session of a Republican Congress set to end soon, time for further action is expiring.

"In sort of such a lame-duck session where you have so many members of Congress who lost their seats, I'd be surprised if the legislation came up," said Brian Schaffner, a professor of political science at American University.

Yesterday, Doxie McCoy, a spokeswoman for Mrs. Norton, said the delegate "had the confirmed, continuing support of the new" Democratic House leadership for the bill. However, the measure must be introduced before the new Congress if no vote is taken before the current session ends.

Mr. Zherka said having to re-introduce the bill to a new Congress could create new problems. For example, new Democratic lawmakers could have concerns about adding a seat for Utah.

Other objections could be raised -- again -- over the redistricting of Utah, and restarting the process could be a step backward.

"Starting the process over again raises new questions that we would prefer not to have to answer and consider," Mr. Zherka said.

Still, the prospects for D.C. voting rights may not suffer much if put off until next year.

The measure has received bipartisan support and has already gone from the House Government Reform Committee, of which Mr. Davis is chairman, to the House Judiciary Committee.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman, California Democrat who co-sponsored the measure, is in line to replace Mr. Davis as committee chairman.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat who likely will be the House's next speaker, also co-sponsored the bill and is advocating rules allowing Mrs. Norton to vote on proposed changes to legislation.

Democrats in general are historically more supportive of giving the District voting rights, said Garry Young, director of the Center for Washington Area Studies at George Washington University.

"I don't think the [bill's] prospects are markedly changed, but at the same time it's obviously an issue that's a pet issue of a lot of Democrats," Mr. Young said.

D.C. Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty, who has pledged to actively lobby Congress for voting rights during his transition and after he takes office Jan. 2, called the Democratic takeover a "win-win" for voting advocates.

"We can try to win in the lame duck and then when the Democrats take over, I think most people know that they're even more likely to want to have two Democratic senators" as well, he said.

OTHER NEWS:

Election Past, How High Can Stocks Go? (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

Now that the stock and bond markets have shrugged off the major shift of political power in Washington, investors are beginning to wonder how much higher the stock market can go.

DOJ_NMG_0093375

The markets seem to have welcomed the end of the divisive political campaign. Now, people's attention is turning back to more fundamental issues -- notably strong recent corporate profits and low interest rates.

For election week, the Dow Jones Industrial Average put in a gain of 122.39 points, or 1%, to finish at 12108.43. The price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note rose every day of the week, sending the yield down to 4.590% at week's end.

The Dow finished just short of the record close of 12176.54 that it achieved Wednesday. It rose on every day except Thursday, including a gain of 5.13 points, or 0.04%, Friday. It is up 13% in 2006.

Some sectors -- big drug companies, big telecommunications companies, big oil -- have suffered. Investors worry that Democratic legislators will try to regulate those industries more heavily, limiting profits.

But technology stocks have done well, boosted by hopes for the economy and by a reassuring sales forecast from Cisco Systems. The prevalent view among investors was that the political campaign meant little to stocks, and that low interest rates and a resilient economy meant a lot more.

"The Republicans couldn't pass much of their program when Democrats had 45 senators. Now the Republicans have 49, so the Democrats probably can't pass anything either," said Alfred Kugel, chief investment strategist at Chicago investment-management firm Atlantic Trust/Stein Roe. "In the meantime, the economy is doing fine if you aren't in the housing business. Earnings are doing well. Employment is good."

Hopes are spreading that inflation will remain tame and that this will permit the Federal Reserve to avoid any interest-rate increases, which would be good news for consumers and businesses alike. Some pundits, in fact, forecast that the Fed could cut rates next year, to give the economy a little boost.

The dollar has been suffering compared with the euro, hitting two-month lows, as Chinese authorities hint that they will diversify into things like the euro and gold.

Investors are nervous about crude-oil futures, which bounced above $60 during the week. But the slowing economy has helped keep oil futures well off this year's highs. On Friday, they fell $1.57 to $59.59 a barrel, down 2.4% for 2006 but up 0.8% on the week.

Another worry is that the Dow industrials haven't pulled back as much as 10% since 2003, which is a long time. The industrials are up 12.7% since July 14, a big gain with very little pause to digest. But the end of the year historically has been good for stocks, and many experts think any pullback will occur next year.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index and Nasdaq Composite index also rose for the week. The S&P 500 Friday was up 0.19%, or 2.57 points, to 1380.90, ahead 10.6% this year.

The Nasdaq Friday rose 0.58%, or 13.71 points, to 2389.72, up 8.4% in 2006. Neither is near a record, but the Nasdaq recorded its highest finish since February 2001.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms, including new highs for markets in tocks in India, Indonesia and New Zealand. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.26%, or 0.61 point, to 231.24.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.33 billion shares, as 2,182 stocks rose and 1,100 fell.

Bond prices gained. The 10-year Treasury note rose 10/32, or $3.13 for each $1,000 invested. The 30-year bond was up 18/32 to yield 4.697%.

The dollar weakened. Late in New York, the currency traded at 117.59 yen, down from 117.94, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2847 from $1.2823.

Shares Up, Led By Home Builders (NYT)

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

Stocks rose yesterday, wrapping up their sixth weekly gain in the last seven weeks, as falling oil prices lifted companies that thrive in an expanding economy. Treasuries had their biggest weekly gain since September on speculation that the government would curb spending.

DOJ_NMG_0093376

KB Home, D. R. Horton and Centex led a rally among home builders, the best performers in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index. Solectron, a maker of electronic components, had the index's biggest gain after saying that it would meet or exceed profit forecasts.

"I'm very positive on this market as the basic fundamentals are back in place," said John Merrill, who helps manage about $475 million as president and founder of Tanglewood Capital Management in Houston. "It's hard to have better earnings. The market does have further room to rise."

The S.& P. 500 rose 2.57 points, or 0.2 percent, to 1,380.90. The Nasdaq composite index increased 13.71 points, or 0.6 percent, to 2,389.72, its highest close since February 2001.

Walt Disney weighed on the Dow Jones industrial average, which added 5.13 points, to 12,108.43. Disney said that a higher tax rate might reduce earnings next year.

In the last five days, the S.& P. 500 rose 1.2 percent, the Dow gained 1 percent and the Nasdaq climbed 2.5 percent. Technology companies led the weekly advance on better-than-expected earnings and expectation that gridlock in Congress might forestall new regulations.

Treasuries also rose on expectations that demand for new securities would climb. Democratic control of Congress may lead to lower spending.

Yesterday's gain helped bonds erase losses from Nov. 3, when a government report showed that the national unemployment rate fell to a five-year low, raising concern that growth might be strong enough to allow the Federal Reserve to keep interest rates steady.

The 10-year Treasury note rose 6/32, to 1009/32. The note's yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, fell to 4.59 percent, from 4.63 percent.

Yesterday, crude oil fell the most this month after the International Energy Agency cut its demand forecast for the third consecutive month.

World oil demand this year will average 84.49 million barrels a day, 80,000 barrels a day less than estimated last month, the agency said. Slower growth in Chinese use of transport fuels, especially gasoline, was behind the revision, it said. China, the world's second-biggest oil consumer, behind the United States, is still expected to drive growth this year and next.

"The I.E.A. has cut its demand forecast for three months in a row, which could be the start of a trend," said Kyle Cooper, director of research at IAF Advisors in Houston. "This is very different from 2004 and 2005 when we saw demand revised higher repeatedly. This may be evidence that these high prices are putting a lid on demand growth."

Crude oil for December delivery fell $1.57, or 2.6 percent, to $59.59 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Prices were up 0.8 percent this week and are 3.1 percent higher than a year ago.

The dollar declined versus the euro and yen after the head of China's central bank, Zhou Xiaochuan, said the nation would keep diversifying its foreign exchange reserves.

The dollar fell after Mr. Zhou said China would "stick to the existing policy" of reducing the share of United States assets it holds. The European Central Bank president, Jean-Claude Trichet, and the Bank of Japan governor, Toshihiko Fukui, suggested this week that they would raise interest rates, adding to the allure of their currencies.

"It was just a timely reminder there is a potential the Chinese central bank will diversify out of dollars into euros and even sterling," said Mike Moran, senior currency strategist at Standard Chartered Bank in New York. "People have forgotten about this in a market where the dollar bears are winning out."

The dollar traded at $1.2847 per euro from $1.2824 on Thursday and $1.2718 a week ago. The dollar has declined about 1 percent this week versus the euro.

Virginia Sen. Allen Concedes Defeat (AP-Y)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

As Sen. George Allen entered the campaign season, he anticipated smooth sailing toward an all-but-certain re-election that would bolster his presidential aspirations.

DOJ_NMG_0093377

But on Thursday, suggesting that "the prevailing winds were against us," he conceded defeat to Democrat Jim Webb, ending not only his once-promising 2008 prospects but also GOP control of the U.S. Senate.

His rapid fall from political grace, aided by verbal gaffes and a nationwide Republican backlash, was complete.

Polite after a campaign that had been anything but, Allen said he would not demand a recount in a race Webb won by fewer than 9,000 votes out of 2.37 million ballots cast.

Allen said "the owners of government have spoken and I respect their decision," though a day earlier his campaign said it likely would wait for the State Board of Elections to complete its canvass before conceding.

"The Bible teaches us there is a time and place for everything, and today I called and congratulated Jim Webb and his team for their victory," Allen said.

The conservative Republican senator lost to a fellow Reagan acolyte who served as the former president's Navy secretary before becoming disenchanted with the GOP.

At a news conference and rally, Webb's supporters roared when he took his Marine son's battered combat boots from a bag and held them high above his head. Webb, whose son is fighting in Iraq, had worn the boots throughout what he called "an unnecessarily brutal campaign."

Allen chose not to demand a recount when initial canvassing of the results failed to significantly alter Webb's lead.

"I see no good purpose being served by continuously and needlessly expending money and causing any more personal animosity," he said. "Rather than bitterness, I want to focus on how best Virginians can be effectively served by their new junior senator."

Webb said Allen "was very gracious" in their conversation. He alluded to the nasty tone of the campaign, saying he told Allen that "it's vital to stop the politics of divisiveness, character assassination, distraction."

The Virginia contest was the last undecided Senate race in the country, and Webb's victory tipped the scales, giving the Democrats control of 51 Senate seats and majorities in both the House and Senate for the first time since 1994.

Earlier in the day, Sen. Conrad Burns conceded the Montana Senate race to Democrat Jon Tester, catching Tester on the phone as he headed for a barber shop to get his famous flattop hair trimmed.

The call was "very cordial, very professional. It was positive," Tester, a farmer and state legislator, told The Associated Press.

Burns, a three-term GOP senator whose campaign was also troubled by gaffes and voter discontent, made no public appearances. But he released a statement saying he was ready to "help as Montana transitions to a new United States senator."

"We fought the good fight and we came up just a bit short. We've had a good 18 years and I am proud of my record," he said.

In Virginia, Allen had been expected to cruise to a second term this year and make a run for the White House in 2008. The son of a Hall of Fame football coach, Allen served as governor in the 1990s and was popular for abolishing parole and instituting other conservative reforms.

But in Webb he faced an unconventional challenger. Supporters drafted Webb, a political neophyte, to run because of his early opposition to the Iraq war.

Allen, 54, was comfortably ahead in polls until August, when he mockingly referred to a Webb campaign volunteer of Indian descent as "Macaca," regarded by some as a racial slur. The incident, caught on videotape, became international news. Some former football teammates from the University of Virginia also charged that Allen had commonly used a slur for blacks — something he denied.

Webb, a 60-year-old Naval Academy graduate and decorated Vietnam veteran, tried to link Allen to President Bush and the war during the campaign. He also used a video in ads that showed Reagan praising him.

___

Associated Press writers Bob Lewis in Richmond and Matt Gouras in Helena, Mont., contributed to this report.

Democrats Take Control Of Senate As Allen Concedes To Webb In Va. (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Alec MacGillis, Washington Post Staff Writers

DOJ_NMG_0093378

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

Victor Vows New Approach To Iraq War

Democrat James Webb, who campaigned for Virginia's U.S. Senate seat by opposing the war in Iraq and calling for economic fairness, yesterday succeeded in his improbable bid to unseat Republican George Allen, giving the Democrats a 51-seat majority and control of both houses of Congress.

Webb's lead over Allen widened yesterday in the post-election vote canvass, and Allen graciously conceded to Webb to make the victory official. A short time later, Virginia's newest senator, who lives in Fairfax County, addressed a giddy crowd of hundreds of supporters in front of the Arlington County Courthouse.

His victory ended two days of suspense over which party would control the Senate. Going into Tuesday's election, the Democrats needed six seats for control, and it was Webb, a former Republican and Reagan administration official, who gave them the sixth seat.

"It is Virginia that turned the Senate blue," Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) told the cheering crowd.

Webb will take his place in a Congress in which Democrats will control both houses for the first time in 12 years.

"Mark Warner began a journey. Tim Kaine added on to it," a triumphant Webb said, referring to the state's back-to-back Democratic governors. "We are going to add on to it even more."

Webb said that Allen called him to concede and that the two former adversaries would have lunch next week. He called the campaign "unnecessarily brutal" and said he would talk to Allen about how they can help stop "the politics of divisiveness, character assassination, distraction."

A decorated former Marine with a son serving in Iraq, Webb wore combat boots throughout the campaign as a symbol of his early criticism of the conflict. Before speaking in Arlington, Webb took off the boots and held them in the air, delighting the crowd. He promised a new approach to the war that he said will lead to a diplomatic solution.

He also said, "We are going to work very hard on issues of economic fairness in a country that has become too divided by class."

Webb will join Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) in the Senate, where he will likely become a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a spokesman against the war with substantial credentials. Warner and Webb are part of a small fraternity, having both served as secretary of the Navy.

Webb, 60, was a Republican for most of his life and for a time served under the godfather of the modern GOP, President Ronald Reagan. But his election to the Senate delivered a final blow to the Republican Party.

"We will begin the process of putting this country back on the track where it needs to be," Webb said at yesterday's rally.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), who as chairman of the Senate Democrats' campaign arm helped Webb win the Democratic primary in June and later helped finance the campaign's expensive media barrage, stood by Webb yesterday, beaming as he thanked the newest member for delivering the Senate to the Democrats.

"What color is my tie? What color is my suit? What color is my Senate?" Schumer asked the Arlington crowd, which yelled, "blue!" in response to each question. "We couldn't have taken the Senate without Jim Webb."

Shortly before Webb's speech, Allen humbly conceded defeat, bowing to the electoral reality that he trailed Webb by an insurmountable lead and sparing the country a recount that could have left control of the Senate in limbo for weeks.

"It is with deep respect for the people of Virginia, and to bind factions together for a positive purpose, that I do not wish to cause more rancor by protracted litigation which would, in my judgment, not alter the results," Allen said in a 12-minute speech to supporters at the historic Carlyle House in Old Town Alexandria.

Allen campaign officials had initially put plans into motion to challenge Virginia's election after coming within 0.3 of a percentage point of Webb's lead. But after local election officials spent Wednesday and part of yesterday reviewing the totals as part of a routine post-election canvass, Webb's margin actually grew. Webb had a lead of 8,942 votes last night.

Allen concluded that further reexamination of the 2.3 million ballots in Virginia would not change the outcome. Speaking of the nearly even percentage split of votes in the contest, Allen said, "We have two '49-ers. But one of them has 49.55, and the other has 49.25."

DOJ_NMG_0093379

In a speech filled with humility and respect rarely seen on the campaign trail, Allen praised Webb and said he was not bitter about losing. The former governor, 54, hinted that his life in politics is not over despite his stunning defeat to a political newcomer who trailed him by 16 points just 12 weeks ago.

"Sometimes winds -- political or otherwise -- can blow the leaves off branches and even break limbs," said Allen, flanked by his wife, Susan, and Sen. Warner. "But a deep-rooted tree will stand, stay standing, will regrow in the next season. In this season, the people of Virginia, who I always call the owners of the government, they have spoken. And I respect their decision."

Under Virginia law, Allen could have asked for a recount because his Democratic opponent was ahead by less than 1 percentage point. But several Republican sources said Allen received pressure from advisers and GOP colleagues in Washington who believed that little would be gained.

Sources close to Allen said Republicans in Washington were in no mood for a quixotic fight over Allen.

President Bush yesterday extended an olive branch to Democrats, inviting likely House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and Steny H. Hoyer (Md.), the No. 2 Democrat in the House, to a private luncheon.

The supporters who gathered yesterday afternoon for Allen and Webb reflected the results.

Before Webb spoke, a dozen supporters milled about on Clarendon Boulevard, near the courthouse, holding signs. Laura Sonnenmark, of the Alexandria section of Fairfax, held a sign that read, "Thanks Jim. We knew you could do it."

She said, "We feel awesome, optimistic -- like we helped the country. To America, Virginia says, 'You're welcome.' "

The several hundred Allen staffers and supporters gathered outside the Carlyle House took the senator's concession hard, with several crying as he spoke in front of the 18th-century building. But most of those interviewed said they agreed with the decision not to pursue a recount.

"For what was best for Virginia and moving forward, he needed to do what he did today," said Anthony Bedell, 38, of Falls Church, who has worked or volunteered for several Allen campaigns. "It's a tough one to swallow, but the senator did the right thing today."

Several supporters commented on the conciliatory tone of Allen's remarks, which included a pledge to assist Webb in his transition. This tone reflected the gracious, congenial manner they have admired in Allen, supporters said. "He had class," said James Glenn, 64, of the Mount Vernon section of Fairfax. "He's a good man."

Staff writer Tim Craig contributed to this report.

Allen Concedes, Gives Senate To Democrats (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And Seth Mclaughlin, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 10, 2006

Virginia Sen. George Allen yesterday conceded defeat to Democrat James H. Webb Jr. in his re-election bid, allowing Democrats to take the reins of the U.S. Senate for the first time in many years.

"In this season, the people of Virginia, who I always call the owners of the government, they have spoken, and I respect their decision," the Republican told supporters gathered in Old Town Alexandria just after calling Mr. Webb to congratulate him.

Mr. Webb unseated Mr. Allen Tuesday by just under 9,000 votes, according to an unofficial count. Mr. Allen, a former governor, noted he is within his legal rights to request a taxpayer-funded recount because the margin is three-tenths of one percent, but declined to do so.

"It is with deep respect for the people of Virginia and to bind factions together for a positive purpose that I do not wish to cause more rancor by protracted litigation, which would, in my judgment, not alter the results," Mr. Allen said, standing next to Virginia's senior Sen. John W. Warner, a Republican.

A few hours later in Arlington, Mr. Webb, a former Republican who served as President Reagan's Navy secretary, pumped his fists in the air in front of thousands of supporters gathered to cheer on the senator-elect at his victory rally.

"I am indebted to you, and I won't forget my loyalties," he said as the crowd pushed to shake his hand and thank him for delivering the Senate to the Democrats.

Mr. Allen's loss -- the third consecutive top office lost by state Republicans -- leaves the Virginia Republican party in disarray.

DOJ_NMG_0093380

"George Allen is the patriarch of the modern Republican party in Virginia," said Lt. Gov. William T. Bolling, one of several Republicans jockeying to be the new leader. His win last fall buoyed depressed party loyalists after their candidate Jerry W. Kilgore lost the gubernatorial race to Democrat Timothy M. Kaine.

Now, conservatives can choose to unite behind former leaders with an anti-tax message -- such as James S. Gilmore III, the last Republican chief executive -- or centrists such as Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, who work with the opposing party. Mr. Davis won re-election Tuesday in a changing and growing Northern Virginia district that favored Mr. Webb.

The party has two years to figure out its message before two major elections -- the expected retirement of Mr. Warner from the Senate and the 2009 governor's race.

The soul-searching elevates Mr. Bolling and Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell, each of whom wants to be governor, and Mr. Davis, who is interested in being senator.

Mr. McDonnell, a longtime friend of Mr. Allen, praised him for his work eliminating parole in the 1990s as governor and for bringing jobs to Virginia. He said the concession is "an act of honor, character and putting the needs of his beloved Virginia first, attributes that have defined George Allen throughout his public career."

The anti-tax socially conservative wing of the party has struggled to woo voters in the growing Northern Virginia suburbs, which have voted Democratic in the past three statewide elections.

Mr. Gilmore, who is interested in seeking political office, said Republicans must "control spending" if they want to return to power. "This has been a chronic problem for quite a while," he said.

Mr. Gilmore would not name a new head of the party, saying it is the ideas that matter, not the personality. "The key is what is important to the people of Virginia and the United States. It is not about us, it is about them," he said.

But, the Democrats say Republicans need to realize the state has been changing, starting with Gov. Mark Warner's election in 2001.

"We have a much, much stronger Democratic Party," Mr. Webb said, standing with Mr. Kaine at his victory rally yesterday. "We have a situation in Virginia where Mark Warner began a journey, Tim Kaine has added onto it, we are going to add onto it even more."

Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles E. Schumer, sporting a blue tie and blue suit, asked the crowd what color his clothes were. "Blue!" the crowd shouted.

"We could not have taken the Senate without Jim Webb and his steadfastness," the New York Democrat said.

Mr. Kaine agreed: "It is Virginia that turned the Senate blue."

Specifically, Northern Virginia delivered Mr. Webb his slim victory, a trend Republicans are noting.

"We need to do something different," said Delegate David B. Albo, Fairfax County Republican. "From my standpoint it's not just Allen's loss. If you look at the trend, George got the same numbers Jerry Kilgore got in Northern Virginia. A lot of people think it's Iraq, I think it's that Northern Virginia is not voting for Republicans."

If Mr. Allen finds a way to motivate the region's voters, he might have a political future.

Standing at the finish of a bitter, mudslinging campaign, Mr. Allen took a conciliatory tone and said Virginians haven't seen the last of him.

Mr. Warner introduced Mr. Allen as one of Virginia's "favorite sons" and promised their friendship and working relationship would continue, a hint that the senior senator could coronate Mr. Allen to run for his seat in two years, should he retire.

"We live to fight another day for our vision of America's future," Mr. Allen said to the crowd, which was larger yesterday than some of his last few rallies combined.

Sobbing staffers and sad-faced supporters gathered around as he made his remarks, and cheered when Mr. Allen said, "come January, not as a senator but as an American citizen, you can count on me" to work on the issues he pushed during the campaign, including energy independence and competitiveness.

Many politicians say negative ads were the death knell to Mr. Allen's campaign, and Mr. Webb yesterday called on President Bush to tell members of his party to "stop the politics of divisiveness and character assassinations."

He also noted Mr. Allen was "gracious" in his phone call and that the two men plan to have lunch next week.

DOJ_NMG_0093381

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman attributed Mr. Allen's loss to "missteps in the campaign" and "a tough environment" for Republicans this year.

He also said Mr. Allen's past success played into his downfall. As governor, he brought many technology companies to Virginia, driving population growth among residents who have been voting Democratic in Northern Virginia.

• Amy Fagan contributed to this report.

After 2 Decades In Ascent, A Stunning Breakdown (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

The George Allen who conceded defeat yesterday in Virginia's nasty U.S. Senate campaign was the one who revitalized Virginia's Republican Party and the one who was considered a front-runner for the White House, with his folksy, football-and-cowboy charm.

Relaxed and smiling, ever gracious, he thanked his campaign staff, talked about his two-decade record of being tough on criminals and reforming schools and finished like the veteran campaigner who won two statewide elections: "Teammates, fellow patriots, stay strong and stand strong for freedom!"

But it was an Allen who was rarely seen on the campaign trail this year.

Instead, the relentlessly cheery politician who was an up-and-comer in the national GOP spent most of the fall during his campaign against challenger James Webb in a defensive crouch, trying to deflect accusations that, down deep, he is a bully or a racist.

Allen began the campaign with a 16-point lead in the polls. As a wildly popular governor and then senator, he was considered a shoo-in for reelection. As Allen visited Iowa and New Hampshire and prepared for a 2008 presidential bid, the conventional wisdom in August was that a stunning victory in the Senate race would position him as the darling of the party.

Then came the now-legendary "macaca moment." He called a Webb volunteer of Indian descent "macaca" and welcomed him to "America and the real world of Virginia." That was followed by his awkward handling of revelations about his Jewish heritage and accusations that he used racial epithets during and after college. He also got caught up in a tide of anti-GOP sentiment that cost Republicans control of the House and the Senate.

"The kind of meltdown that occurred here is a quintessential example about how 24 hours can be a lifetime in politics," said Robert D. Holsworth, director of the Center for Public Policy at Virginia Commonwealth University.

Allen's colleague Sen. John W. Warner (R) is the state party's senior statesman. But it is Allen who has been the face of a new generation of Virginia Republican activists. In his 1993 inaugural address, after overcoming a 34-point deficit to become the state's 67th governor, Allen called the activists his "insurgents."

"George Allen, I think, singularly, turned around the fortunes of the Republican Party in Virginia," said George Mason University political science professor Mark J. Rozell. "He unabashedly reached out to the religious conservatives. Yet, he still had that nice smile, that charisma, that sunny disposition that made him appeal to moderate and independent voters."

Allen rode that appeal first into the Virginia governor's mansion and then into the nation's most exclusive club, the Senate. From there, he hoped it might be a short hop to the White House.

By last December, others thought so, too. In an article in the conservative National Review, editor Richard Lowry wrote that Allen "combines the people skills of Bill Clinton, with the convictions of a Ronald Reagan, with the non-threatening persona of George W. Bush circa 2000, before he became a hate-figure for the left."

Lowry concluded that Allen was a leading contender for the 2008 GOP nomination because he blends "amiability with competitive ruthlessness in a way that makes him, at age 53, one of the nation's top politicians."

Now, Rozell said, "no one talks seriously about George Allen being presidential timber."

Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell (R) issued a statement yesterday calling Allen "the most effective Governor of the modern Virginia era." Lt. Gov. Bill Bolling (R) praised him for efforts "to abolish parole, reform welfare, promote higher academic standards in our public schools; and bring new business, industry and jobs to Virginia."

DOJ_NMG_0093382

But Richmond lobbyist Charlie Davis said Allen "lost his way" when he went to the Senate and failed to grasp the state's changing demographics and moderating politics, especially in population-rich Northern Virginia.

"Once he got inside the Beltway, he got absorbed and detached from the state," Davis said. "When he was governor and he was around the state capital, he was with real people every day who were not reluctant to share their feelings. You get to D.C., for some reason he did not realize the landscape here was changing dramatically."

Longtime Virginia Republicans say Allen also turned away from the insiders who had helped him succeed, bringing in a new team, led by campaign manager Dick Wadhams, who had little experience in Virginia.

It wasn't until September, after the scandals erupted, that Allen brought back his trusted Virginia hands.

G. Paul Nardo, Allen's chief speechwriter when he was governor, said he was sad to see his former boss lose: "I don't think you've heard the last of him."

But Democrats -- and even some of Allen's closest allies -- said yesterday that his defeat should serve as a political red flag that Virginia is no longer the conservative, Republican red state.

"The wrath of Northern Virginia can make Virginia purple," said Gerald E. Connolly (D), chairman of the Fairfax County Board of Supervisors.

At Allen's conciliatory concession speech, several supporters said it was unfortunate that voters had been unable to see more of the same humility from him during the hard-fought campaign.

"I know that on a personal level that was his tone, but how to translate that in the midst of a campaign, we have to learn that," said Brett Berlin, 56, of Alexandria.

Others said they expected, and hoped, that Allen would run again, for Senate in 2008 or governor in 2009. "By being as gracious as he was, he preserves those options," said Howard Lee, 57, of Fairfax County.

Allen also was joined during his concession speech by his daughter, Brooke, who clutched at her side the football Allen often has with him. The senator took the football from his daughter and tossed it to a supporter, who threw it back.

"Final toss. Done," said Allen after making the catch. "See y'all."

Democrats Gain Senate And New Influence (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 9 — Democrats gained control of the Senate on Thursday, giving them a majority in both houses of Congress for the first time since 1994 and increased influence over President Bush's policies at home and abroad, starting with the war in Iraq.

The Democrats picked up the seat they needed to capture the Senate when the Republican incumbent in Virginia, George Allen, conceded to Jim Webb, his Democratic challenger, completing a broad realignment of power in Washington. Including two independents who align themselves with the Democrats, Democrats will have a 51-to-49 advantage in the new Senate.

Within moments of Mr. Allen's announcement, Democrats rallied outside the Capitol to celebrate their victory, cheering and chanting, while their leaders began planning how to proceed after a dozen years in which their only taste of power in Congress was when they controlled the Senate for a period in 2001 and 2002.

"The election's over," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, who will be the new majority leader. "It's time for a change."

Mr. Bush continued adapting to the new political climate by having lunch with Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California, who stands on the cusp of becoming the first woman to serve as speaker of the House. He invited Mr. Reid to join him at breakfast at the White House on Friday.

But even as he was extending courtesies to his new partners, Mr. Bush was demanding action on several contentious measures before the Republican-led Congress disbands next month. The president renominated John R. Bolton to the post as United Nations ambassador and asked Congress to complete work on a bill authorizing domestic surveillance by the National Security Agency, both lightning-rod matters for Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0093383

As Washington was digesting the changed balance of power, there was a sign that the 2008 contest for the presidency had already begun. Tom Vilsack, the Democratic governor of Iowa, announced he was running for president, the first high-profile entrant in an expected parade of presidential hopefuls who will enter the race in coming months.

On the other side of the partisan ledger, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, Ken Mehlman, a close associate of Mr. Bush's political strategist, Karl Rove, said he would step aside.

In Virginia, the margin separating the two Senate candidates was roughly 9,000 votes, or less than one-half of 1 percent of more than 2.3 million votes cast. Under Virginia law, Mr. Allen was entitled to request a recount at state expense, but it was clear from a preliminary review of the ballots that Mr. Allen had little hope of reversing the verdict through recounts or lawsuits.

Senior Republican officials, including a lawyer deeply involved in the 2000 Florida recount battle, counseled Mr. Allen on Wednesday to withdraw rather than fight what would ultimately be a futile battle. After deliberating a day, Mr. Allen decided not to fight.

Mr. Allen said Thursday that he did not want to subject the people of Virginia or the nation to a recount fight that could have lasted until Christmas.

"I do not wish to cause more rancor by protracted litigation that would not, in my opinion, alter the results," Mr. Allen said, speaking on an unseasonably warm mid-autumn day in Alexandria, Va., to a crowd of staffers and supporters, some in tears. "I see no good purpose being served by continuously and needlessly expending money and causing any more personal animosity."

He congratulated Mr. Webb on his narrow victory and made note of the favorable environment for Democrats this year. "They had the prevailing winds," Mr. Allen said.

Mr. Webb, a novelist, Marine combat veteran and former secretary of the Navy, claimed victory 90 minutes later at a rally in Arlington.

He brandished the sand-colored combat boots he wore throughout the campaign in tribute to his son, a Marine lance corporal serving in Iraq.

"Hoo-ah," shouted several marines in the audience as Mr. Webb started speaking, using the military cheer to show their support.

Mr. Webb, occasionally glancing at a three-by-five card of notes, said Mr. Allen and Senator John W. Warner, a Republican and Virginia's senior senator, had called to congratulate him, but he then spoke bitterly of the campaign, calling on Mr. Bush to denounce slice-and-dice political tactics.

"This was a brutal campaign and in many ways an unnecessarily brutal campaign," Mr. Webb said, "and I think it's hurting the country."

Mr. Webb also said that when he took his seat in the Senate he would continue to agitate for a rapid end to American military involvement in Iraq, even if it put him at odds with fellow Democrats seeking a more gradual withdrawal.

"I am walking into the Senate with the independence to represent the people who have no voice in the corridors of power and I intend to do that," he said.

Senate Democrats celebrated their triumph at a rally on Capitol Hill on Thursday afternoon.

Senator Reid and his two top lieutenants, Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the Democratic whip, and Charles E. Schumer of New York, who ran the Senate campaign committee, appeared with flag-waving staff members.

While Mr. Reid called for bipartisanship and more openness in government, the war in Iraq was the central issue on his mind.

"We believe this country has spoken loudly and clearly," Mr. Reid said.

When Mr. Schumer spoke, his words were punctuated by shouts of "Chuck, Chuck, Chuck."

Also on Thursday, Senator Conrad Burns, Republican of Montana, conceded to Jon Tester, the Democratic State Senate president and an organic farmer, formally bringing to a close a race that members of both parties had declared over a day earlier.

Mr. Burns's phone call caught Mr. Tester on his way to the barbershop to have his distinctive flattop haircut trimmed, according to The Associated Press.

The call was "very cordial, very professional," Mr. Tester said.

DOJ_NMG_0093384

Mr. Burns, a three-term senator, said in a news release, “We fought the good fight and we came up just a bit short. We’ve had a good 18 years, and I am proud of my record.”

The new Senate will have 49 Democrats, 49 Republicans and two independents, Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut and Bernard Sanders of Vermont.

Mr. Lieberman and Mr. Sanders will caucus with the Democrats, giving the party effective control, with the right to name committee chairmen and dictate parliamentary rules.

Mr. Bush, who has practiced a muscular brand of partisan combat in the past six years, adopted a more conciliatory tone after his meeting with Ms. Pelosi and the Democratic House whip, Steny Hoyer of Maryland.

“The elections are now behind us, and the congresswoman’s party won,” Mr. Bush said as he and Vice President Dick Cheney met with the two Democrats. “But the challenges still remain and therefore, we’re going to work together to address those challenges in a constructive way.”

Ms. Pelosi said, “We’ve made history. Now we have to make progress.”

The president met with his cabinet in the morning and said he had instructed them to provide briefings for Democratic leaders in Congress and new members.

Mr. Bush, knowing that he has only a few weeks left with Republicans in control on Capitol Hill, urged quick action on budget bills, energy legislation and a bill to admit Vietnam to the World Trade Organization. He is to visit Vietnam this month.

But he will face considerable difficulty with other priorities he expressed on Thursday. Mr. Bush said he wanted the Senate to act before the end of the year on his nomination of Robert M. Gates to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld as secretary of defense and of Mr. Bolton, who is serving under a recess appointment, as the permanent representative to the United Nations.

Democrats have balked at the Bolton nomination and are not expected to change their views, although it was not clear that they would have the votes to derail his confirmation while Republicans hold the Senate.

One Republican who was defeated this week, Senator Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, said Thursday he would vote against confirming Mr. Bolton.

Republican recrimination over the Tuesday election wipeout continued another day, with conservatives criticizing Mr. Bush for dumping Mr. Rumsfeld the day after the election and not before, when it might have won some independent votes.

“I was very disappointed,” said Newt Gingrich, the former Republican speaker of the House.

“If the president had replaced Rumsfeld two weeks ago, the Republicans would still control the Senate and they would probably have 10 more House members. For the president to have suggested for the last two weeks that there would be no change and then change the day after the election is very disheartening.”

Wayne Semprini, chairman of the New Hampshire Republican Party, where two Republican members of Congress lost seats to antiwar Democrats, also said he was unhappy.

“I would have rather seen it announced a month or two months ago,” Mr. Semprini said. “It might have made a difference.”

Allen Concedes Defeat, Sealing Transfer Of Senate (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — Virginia Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) conceded today, putting the Senate in Democratic hands for the first time since 2003 and giving the Democrats a sweep of both houses — a seismic shift in the Washington political climate .

Montana Republican Sen. Conrad Burns conceded earlier today in his reelection bid after his Democratic challenger, Jon Tester, claimed victory Wednesday.

Coupled with Allen's defeat, those Senate victories give the party a 51-49 Senate majority, counting two independents who are expected to caucus with the Democrats.

In conceding to Democrat Jim Webb, Allen said a recount would only increase the acrimony that has recently characterized the political landscape.

"I do not wish to cause more rancor by protracted litigation which would, in my judgment, not … alter the results," he said. "I see no good purpose being served by continuously and needlessly expending money and causing any more personal animosity."

DOJ_NMG_0093385

Noting that the results were close, Allen urged supporters to stay strong. "Sometimes winds, political or otherwise, can blow the leaves off branches and even break limbs," he said. "But a deep-rooted tree will stand, stay standing. It'll regrow in the next season."

Within hours, Webb responded, saying that he and Allen plan to have lunch next week to ensure a smooth transition. Allen called on President Bush to "publicly denounce campaign tactics that have divided us," noting the midterms have seen "an unnecessarily brutal campaign."

Meanwhile, Bush met today at the White House with House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and Rep. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), appealing for bipartisanship in the next two years.

"All three of us recognize that when you win, you have a responsibility to do the best you can for the country," Bush said, calling the conversation "constructive and very friendly."

For her part, Pelosi said the meeting was "very productive" and said both sides had extended "the hand of friendship, of partnership." But in a subtle moment, she said she looked forward to working "in a confidence-building way" to bridge differences.

"We've made history," she said. "Now we have to make progress."

Senate Democrats held a rally this afternoon to claim the mantle of leadership in the upper chamber, shortly after Allen conceded his race to Webb.

Earlier, Bush met with his Cabinet and instructed them to brief key members of Congress on issues within their agencies. Conceding that many voters embraced Democrats out of frustration over the war in Iraq, Bush said he was "open to any idea or suggestion that will help us achieve our goals of defeating the terrorists and ensuring that Iraq's democratic government succeeds."

Control of both congressional chambers would give Democrats a powerful platform to advance their agenda. And for the first time during Bush's presidency, Democrats could make the legislative branch a meaningful counterweight to the White House.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada is poised to join Pelosi at the forefront of a newly energized national Democratic Party when the new Congress convenes in January. Both the Democrats and Republicans plan to select their new leaders in caucus meetings next week.

The GOP had grabbed control of the Senate and the House with its landslide win in the 1994 midterm election. Republicans have held the House since then; Democrats regained a Senate majority for about 18 months during Bush's first term, but lost it in the 2002 election.

Webb and Tester declared victory Wednesday. Their wins completed a strong showing by Democrats that seemed unlikely even to many of the party's leaders. Although most were confident they would take the House, fewer believed the Senate was within reach.

Reid was quick to characterize the results as a mandate for sweeping change.

"The days of the do-nothing Congress are over," he said. "From changing course in Iraq to raising the minimum wage to fixing the healthcare crisis to making this country energy-independent, we're ready to get to work."

Meanwhile, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow took a lot of questions about why the president answered elusively when asked a few days before the election whether Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would continue to serve.

Snow explained that Bush did not want to create a "political football." The idea, said Snow, was to send "an important signal to Capitol Hill, to the government of Iraq, to our military forces, and also to the terrorists that you can't jerk the president around on the basis of politics, period."

johanna.neuman@latimes.com

Times staff writer Janet Hook contributed to this report.

Webb Gives Thanks Early; Allen Aides Still Stunned (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093386

Virginia's U.S. senator-elect spent the day after clinching his victory by thanking his staff and beginning the process of making the transition from first-time candidate to freshman lawmaker.

The Democrat announced the addition of former state senator Leslie L. Byrne to his transition team, along with a lawyer from Abingdon. Byrne, also a former congresswoman from Fairfax, will help him set up his office, his spokeswoman said.

"He's tying up some loose ends from the campaign, thanking people, talking to people around the state who supported him," said Webb's campaign spokeswoman, Kristian Denny Todd. "He's working with staff to wrap up the campaign side of things."

Webb will take office when the 110th Congress begins its two-year session in January.

Since claiming victory Tuesday night, Webb has received several calls from his future colleagues, Todd said, including Arizona Sen. John McCain and Virginia Sen. John W. Warner, both Republicans.

As a first-time elected official, Webb also started receiving unsolicited advice from seasoned politicians.

State Del. L. Scott Lingamfelter (R-Prince William) said Webb's biggest challenge is likely to be his inexperience. Lingamfelter likened it to his own first year in the state legislature, when, he now admits, he was too eager to push controversial bills.

"Newly-electeds do come in sometimes with an inflated sense of their mandate," he said. "I didn't know much when I showed up, either. He certainly has the intellect to pick up on it."

Todd said Webb is planning a statewide "thank you" tour before the end of the year, but the trip's timing and details have not been determined. Next week, she said, Webb will attend a two-day Senate orientation.

She said Webb and his wife, Hong, who is pregnant, are also planning to take some time to prepare for the arrival of their child in early December.

In his speech to supporters Thursday, Webb said he had agreed to have lunch next week with Republican Sen. George Allen. Todd said that a time and place have not been determined and that Webb is waiting to hear from Allen.

"Jim is perfectly ready to schedule that when it fits into Senator Allen's schedule," she said.

But she said staff members for Allen and Webb will talk soon about how to transfer information about constituent concerns and other information to the Democrat.

Aides to Allen said they were stunned by the loss, despite knowing for weeks that the race against Webb was very close. Members of Allen's Senate staff, many of whom are young, cried Thursday when they found out he had decided not to seek a recount of the ballots.

Across the state, political observers began getting used to the idea that Allen would no longer be a Virginia senator come January.

"I'm not sure you write an obituary yet," Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) said Thursday. "This is a loss, but he could still come back and be governor again. He got caught up in a bad year, and it was a tough campaign."

Del. Brian J. Moran (D-Alexandria), who is contemplating his own bid for governor in 2009, said he was surprised that Allen's usually successful kind of politics did not carry the day.

"What always made George Allen attractive was his independence," Moran said. "Over the last six years, he was merely a rubber stamp for the administration. He lost his appeal."

Another Layer Of Winners And Losers (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

Some of the losers to emerge from the midterm elections on Tuesday were easy to spot, particularly the Republicans who were defeated.

But there were other, low-profile winners and losers along the way: the professionals who rode to victory or defeat on strategies they had created and put into place. And as the results settle in, the game of scoring their performance is under way.

DOJ_NMG_0093387

The most spectacular defeat was that of Senator George Allen of Virginia, who won the prize for most breathtaking downfall, not only losing his Senate seat to help hand power of the entire body to the Democrats, but also tarnishing a once-golden reputation in under three months flat.

Less obvious but no less real was the damage to Mr. Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, a strategist once celebrated as the "next Karl Rove."

Considered a sharp and sometimes hard-nosed operative — he engineered the defeat of Tom Daschle of South Dakota, then the Senate Democratic leader, in 2004 — Mr. Wadhams had been snapped up by the fledgling Allen presidential campaign to begin running it next year. After failing to contain the damage of a single "macaca" incident, Mr. Wadhams has suffered a tarnishing of his image in Republican circles.

Another adviser to emerge somewhat tainted is Scott Howell, Mr. Allen's media strategist. In addition to consulting for several losing candidates, Mr. Howell made the advertisement in the Tennessee Senate race featuring a blond woman suggestively asking the Democratic candidate, Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., to call her.

While some strategists believe that the spot worked — the Republican, Bob Corker, won — several Republicans distanced themselves from the tactic, which Democrats denounced as race-baiting.

At a slightly more visible level, strategists agreed that the chief Democratic winners were Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York and Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the top two engineers of the Democratic takeover of Congress.

"Rahm and Chuck are given great credit," said Representative Rosa DeLauro, Democrat of Connecticut and an Emanuel ally.

The jury is still out on Howard Dean, the Democratic National Committee chairman. Mr. Dean quarreled with Mr. Schumer and Mr. Emanuel, the heads of the Senate and House campaign committees respectively, over where to spend money, although they settled some of their differences in the end.

Mr. Emanuel, in particular, pushed hard to save money for "sneak attacks" in about a half-dozen districts in the last four days.

Mr. Dean, on the other hand, argued that rebuilding the Democratic Party by spreading money through all 50 states, including those that had not voted for Democratic candidates for many years, would have the greatest effect. While he cannot claim credit for any specific victories, his efforts may have broadly helped Democrats pick up seats in some Republican strongholds.

With rumblings of a movement to draft Mr. Ford to replace Mr. Dean at the national committee, several Democrats privately said Mr. Emanuel was winning the power struggle.

"It's pretty clear that the committees work and the D.N.C. works, but they don't work together," said James Carville, the Democratic strategist. "And now we're getting ready to gear up in a presidential year, and I think Harold Ford would be a great chairman."

Karen Finney, a spokeswoman for the D.N.C., responded by saying, "After President Bush and the Republicans have admitted to a thumping, why is it that the only one complaining on the Democratic side is James Carville, who today, in addition to trashing Howard Dean, praised the R.N.C., the outfit that brought us the racist ad that defeated Harold Ford, James's supposed candidate for chair?"

Ms. Finney was referring to a comment volunteered by Mr. Carville on Thursday that the Republican National Committee "did a better job than the D.N.C. this year."

Mr. Ford is not without his own problems, however, having lost his Senate race.

On the Republican side, Ken Mehlman emerged as less of a loser than many had predicted the day after the elections, despite the drubbing his party took. Although as chairman of the Republican National Committee Mr. Mehlman led — and lost — the charge to retain control of Congress, he is credited with pushing candidates hard and performing as well as possible in a hostile climate.

Republicans generally said they did not blame him for the disastrous midterms; Mr. Carville said the losses should be pinned "95 percent on President Bush and 5 percent on Liddy Dole."

DOJ_NMG_0093388

He was referring to Senator Elizabeth Dole, Republican of North Carolina, who as chairwoman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee drew widespread criticism as having failed to recruit magnetic candidates and raise enough money. Mrs. Dole's appearances on weekend news shows were occasionally painful, and, in the end, Republicans lost under her watch.

And then there was Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts.

Mr. Kerry, already tarnished by his failed presidential campaign in 2004, came out of the current season looking the worse for wear, after botching a joke that Republicans portrayed as having insulted American troops in Iraq.

"He's a guy who was running second for the nomination," said Stuart Stevens, a Republican consultant. "Now I don't think a Democrat would invite him to a letter opening."

Burns Concedes Montana Race To Democrat (AP-Y)

By Matt Gouras, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

U.S. Sen. Conrad Burns conceded defeat to Jon Tester on Thursday, acknowledging that a tight election had gone to the Democrats' favor, Burns' campaign told The Associated Press.

Burns, a three-term senator whose campaign was troubled by verbal gaffes and voter discontent, congratulated Tester, a farmer and state legislator.

"I stand ready to help as Montana transitions to a new United States Senator," Burns said in a statement provided to the AP. "We fought the good fight and we came up just a bit short. We've had a good 18 years and I am proud of my record."

Burns, 71, did not plan any public appearances Thursday, his campaign said.

He also didn't say what he plans to do now, though he indicated he was looking forward to taking some time off. "I hope there is still a good-sized buck out there, because I am going hunting," he said.

Burns called Tester and conceded in a friendly and cordial conversation at about 11 a.m, said Tester spokesman Matt McKenna.

"This was a hard fought campaign and I think that Montana is glad it is in their rear view mirror and Jon tester is ready to move forward," McKenna said.

Tester, who was busy with chores Thursday, picking up a barrel of oil in Great Falls on the way to his grain farm in Big Sandy, ran as an outsider to the Washington culture — the same theme Burns had used nearly two decades earlier.

"It is absolutely, critically important that we change the direction of the country," Tester, 50, said Wednesday after declaring victory by a thin margin of about 3,400 votes.

Tester said he wanted to empower the middle class, working families, small businesses and family farms and ranches — "the people who have made this country so great."

"It really is time to put politics aside," he said. "We've got many, many issues that are facing this great state and this country, both in foreign policy and domestic policy. We've talked about them for the last 18 months. Now is the time to roll up our sleeves and get some things done."

Tester's win — and fellow Democrat Jim Webb's close victory in Virginia — gave the Democrats the 51 Senate seats they need to control the chamber.

With 100 percent of precincts reporting, Tester had 198,302 votes, or 49.1 percent, to Burns' 194,904 votes, or 48.3 percent.

Together, the two campaigns spent more than $12 million.

Burns had not helped his own cause, with gaffes that included cursing at a firefighting crew in a state that sees thousands of acres burned in wildfires every summer. He was first elected in 1988 as a folksy, backslapping outsider, but this year, he was joined on the campaign trail by President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney.

Tester resisted help from the national party during his campaign.

When Burns tried to paint Tester as a liberal who wants to raise taxes and "cut and run" from Iraq, the liberal tag didn't seem to stick to the man who sports scuffed cowboy boots and a flattop haircut.

DOJ_NMG_0093389

Tester portrayed himself as a Western moderate who owns guns, opposes gay marriage and has a libertarian's suspicion of the anti-terrorism Patriot Act.

He hammered Burns over his ties to Abramoff. Burns was a top recipient of campaign contributions from Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in January to corruption. Burns has since returned or donated to charity about $150,000 he receive that was connected to Abramoff. He maintains he did nothing wrong and was not influenced by the lobbyist.

Ballot-counting problems delayed results of the race by about seven hours, keeping the nation in suspense. Duane Winslow, election administrator for Montana's most populous area, Yellowstone County, said he made a computer error while tabulating absentee ballots that required officials to start the process over.

___

Associated Press reporter Mary Clare Jalonick contributed to this

Rural Montana Farmer Is Going To Washington (LAT)

By Sam Howe Verhovek, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

Locals are excited that one of their own is joining the Senate. They just aren't sure Jon Tester can help save towns like theirs.

BIG SANDY, MONT. — Big Sandy has had its moments in the sun.

Local boy Jeff Ament made good a few years ago as the bassist for Pearl Jam. The town's "chief claim to worldwide fame," as resident historian Keith Edwards puts it, is the Big Bud 16V-747, a custom-made behemoth that the Guinness Book of World Records lists as the largest tractor on Earth.

But in recent years, the story in Big Sandy, as in countless other farm towns across the Great Plains, has been one of loss.

So this week's win by Jon Tester — a wheat and lentil farmer who also has done stints here as a custom butcher, soil conservation board member, high school basketball referee and music teacher at Big Sandy Elementary School — was huge.

The 50-year-old Democrat eked out a win over Republican Sen. Conrad Burns in Tuesday's midterm election and is headed to Washington come January.

Tester's Western roots are genuine and about as deep as can be: He has never lived anyplace other than the family farm, which his grandparents homesteaded here in 1916.

"No question about it: This is a big deal," said Conrad Heimbigner, manager of Big Sky Auto & Ag. "I don't care if you're Democrat or Republican … this is pretty cool that we have a United States senator from Big Sandy."

In an interview, Tester agreed that his hometown could use some good news.

"It's very typical of rural Montana," the senator-to-be said. "It's struggling to survive."

Residents describe local history by ticking off what's gone: two of the three banks, the "picture show," also known as a movie theater; several restaurants and two-thirds of the student population, which peaked back in 1920. Big Sandy High School is so small that the football team plays the eight-man version, as many Plains towns do.

"Fewer farmers, fewer kids," said Edwards, 88, a retired wheat farmer, founder of the Big Sandy Historical Museum and a onetime cattle-drive partner of Tester's late father, Dave.

Some here are hoping Tester — who sports a trademark flat-top — can draw attention to the plight of dying farm towns, and perhaps even generate some solutions.

Others are not so sure.

"It's a hoot, but I'm not sure it's going to make any darn difference in the long run," said Charlie Briggs, a retired miner who was nursing a beer at lunchtime the other day at the Redneck Club & Casino, a Main Street hangout. "I'm not sure that anything can really help turn this town around."

Big Sandy, a town of about 700 in the north-central part of the state, is ringed by grain silos. It takes its name from a nearby creek, which the Blackfeet called Un-es-putcha-eka; white settlers opted for the "Big Sandy" translation offered by an Indian guide.

DOJ_NMG_0093390

It is classic amber-waves-of-grain, Big Sky country — spectacularly beautiful on a blue-sky day and tremendously foreboding when the sky is shades of gray and a chill, dusty wind blows.

In the early part of the last century, people like Tester's grandparents couldn't get to places like Big Sandy fast enough. For a time, until the late 1920s, the free land, plentiful rain and abundant harvests made for a sort of paradise.

But then came the dust bowl, and many settlers left in droves.

"Forty miles from water and 40 miles from wood, now I'm leaving Montana for good," read a sign, now famous, that was left behind by a member of the Big Sandy exodus.

Still, many folks held on and made a go of it.

Tester, who is 6 feet tall and pushing 300 pounds, farms organically on his 1,800-acre spread here — and he clearly loves it.

"I do a lot of my best thinking right here," he told a visitor over the summer, on the last day of the harvest.

More than one person here compares him to Jimmy Stewart in the famous 1939 film "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington."

But, said Edwards, "I wouldn't carry that analogy too far. I don't think it's realistic to idealize the farmer these days. He's not a straw-chewer; he's a businessman. He's out to get the last buck, even out of the federal government," which gives farmers subsidies.

"Besides, you don't get to be the president of the Montana state Senate by sitting around on your butt," Edwards added. Tester ran for state senator eight years ago and quickly rose up the ranks in Helena, the state capital.

Several people laughed when asked whether they would have thought 20 years ago that the burly butcher cutting up their cow would wind up in the U.S. Senate. But, they said, they detected clues to Tester's ever-rising ambitions over the years.

"I could tell Jon was getting real smart about politics when he decided to stop refereeing basketball games with me several years ago," said Verlin Reichelt, 56, a neighbor and fellow farmer.

"I asked him why, and he laughed and he said: 'Verlin, I'm a politician now. And no matter what you do, if you're a referee at a high school basketball game, that's going to lose you some votes. So I'm out.' "

sam.verhovek@latimes.com

Lawmakers Who Won't Be Missed (WP)

By Colbert I. King

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

"Conrad, how can you live back there [in Washington] with all those niggers?" When asked how he had responded, Sen. Burns is reported to have . . . said with a chuckle that he told the rancher that it was 'a hell of a challenge.' "

-- The Washington Post, Oct. 22, 1994

Election night in the nation's capital was a pretty tame affair, given that most of the important local races were decided in the September primary. But for some of us who live in the District, the real action on election night took place far beyond city limits.

My attention, for example, was focused on Big Sky Country, where three-term Republican Sen. Conrad Burns was locking horns with the president of the Montana Senate, Jon Tester. It wasn't until late Wednesday morning that we received the good news that Burns had been defeated. It was worth the wait.

Burns lost his seat, in part, because of his ties to corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff. But Burns hit rock bottom with some of us 12 years ago when we learned about his slur against the District's African American population.

At the time, Burns was the senior Republican on the D.C. appropriations subcommittee. A former livestock auctioneer and radio announcer, Burns liked to affect a folksy, aw-shucks manner. A Montana newspaper, the Bozeman Daily Chronicle, reported that during a campaign visit with the paper's editors, Burns told an anecdote about an elderly Montana rancher who wanted to know how he could stand living in the nation's capital "with all those niggers." Asked how he responded, Burns reportedly said he told the man it was "a hell of a challenge."

After Montanans raised a stink about the slur, making it clear they didn't think it was as funny as the senator did, Burns apologized.

DOJ_NMG_0093391

Thanks to the wisdom of the people of Montana, Conrad Burns no longer is forced to bear the burden of living among those of us of color. The "hell of a challenge" that Burns faced for lo these many years has ended, and with it his career as a United States senator. To which I shout: "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow."

Grace was also flowing back east in North Carolina on election night. Republican Rep. Charles Taylor lost his job to Democratic challenger Heath Shuler, who once labored for our hometown National Football League team -- a fact better left undiscussed.

Taylor was defeated for reasons having little to do with his former service as chairman of the House D.C. appropriations subcommittee. But, again, we in the District had reason to follow the North Carolina vote count as closely as we watched the D.C. returns.

I'd like to believe that Taylor's loss was retributive justice for the dastardly way he treated the District when he was the chief House overseer of the city's budget.

Who can forget his Jan. 9, 1998, "Dear Colleague" letter to members of the House of Representatives? Emblazoned in large, bold type near the top of the page was this announcement: "The average D.C. student can't read this letter."

It was a Taylor taunt hurled at our public school system and at students' math and reading test scores.

This was the same barbed-tongued Charles Taylor who:

--Directed the city to immediately close the University of the District of Columbia's law school and send the students to other schools. (He didn't succeed.)

--Used to tell us how many cops should patrol the streets and how pay raises should be awarded.

--Had his meat-ax approach to the District's budget, which then-financial control board chairman Andrew Brimmer said tore at the "very fundamental operations of government," overruled by his own House Republican leadership.

A few years ago, Rep. John Hostettler (R-Ind.) introduced legislation to overturn a D.C. Human Rights Office ruling that ordered the Boy Scouts of America to pay two gay Eagle Scout troop leaders $50,000 in damages for discrimination. Mr. Hostettler won't do that sort of thing anymore. His constituents told him to take a hike on Tuesday.

The Democratic takeover of Congress offers the prospect of relief from amendments, or riders, that House Republicans loved to attach to the D.C. budget.

Under Republican rule, Congress banned the District from spending locally raised tax dollars on free needle-exchange programs to curb the spread of HIV -- even though local jurisdictions in half the states provide such services. A Republican Congress also extended a federal restriction on abortion funding to all federal and local money spent in the District. And it adopted a rider that prevented the city from using its own money to lobby for voting representation in Congress. One Republican-led appropriations subcommittee even added a provision to the city budget imposing federal penalties on D.C. children caught smoking.

Under House GOP rule, efforts were made to repeal the District's law prohibiting residents from possessing firearms. Another Republican measure would have allowed residents, except for convicted felons, to own handguns and keep them in their homes. The city was spared that fate only because the House ended up scrapping the national gun bill to which those amendments would have been attached.

Tuesday night's election hardly catapulted the District to the Promised Land. But the regaining of Congress by Democrats may have brought the city some relief from odious Republican budget riders and a welcome respite from the District-bashing in vogue in certain quarters on Capitol Hill for the past 12 years.

Just Call Him Joe Democrat (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

Sen. Joe Lieberman, who won reelection as an independent, has a message for his Senate colleagues in the next Congress: Call me a Democrat.

The three-term Connecticut lawmaker defied party leaders when he launched his independent bid after losing to Ned Lamont in the Democratic primary. During the campaign, he vowed to be an "independent-minded Democrat" if he were reelected.

DOJ_NMG_0093392

At a postelection news conference, Lieberman said he was reassured by Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid that he would retain his seniority in the new Senate.

Democrats Win Bigger Share Of Religious Vote (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

As the results of the midterm elections sank in this week, religious leaders across the ideological spectrum found something they could agree on: The "God gap" in American politics has narrowed substantially.

Religious liberals contended that a concerted effort by Democrats since 2004 to appeal to people of faith had worked minor wonders, if not electoral miracles, in races across the country.

Religious conservatives disagreed, arguing that the Republican Party lost religious voters rather than the Democrats winning them.

Either way, the national exit polls told a dramatic story of changing views in the pews: Democrats recaptured the Catholic vote they had lost two years ago. They sliced the GOP's advantage among weekly churchgoers to 12 percentage points, down from 18 points in 2004 congressional races and 22 points in the 2004 presidential contest. Democrats even siphoned off a portion of the Republican Party's most loyal base, white evangelical Protestants.

"The God gap definitely didn't disappear, but it did narrow. And it narrowed in part because evangelical voters had major questions about the direction of the country," argued Democratic pollster Celinda Lake.

In House races in 2004, 74 percent of white evangelicals voted for Republicans and 25 percent for Democrats, a 49-point spread, according to exit polls. This year, Republicans received 70 percent of the white evangelical vote and Democrats got 28 percent, a 42-point spread.

Democratic activists joyfully compared the overall seven-point shift in the evangelical vote to the inroads that President Bush made in a core Democratic constituency -- African Americans -- in battleground states in 2004. "Boy, have we come a long way since 2004," said Mara Vanderslice, who was director of religious outreach for Sen. John F. Kerry's presidential campaign.

"We still have a long way to go, but what this election showed is that Democrats can begin to compete for the evangelical vote. Moving seven points within a community that large can absolutely swing tight races," she said.

Evangelical leaders blamed corruption and big spending by Congress -- rather than the party's positions on social issues such as same-sex marriage -- for the GOP's defeat.

Evangelical Christians are "fed up with the Republican leadership, particularly in the House," said the Rev. Richard Land, head of the public policy arm of the 16 million-member Southern Baptist Convention. "They're disgusted that Republicans came to Washington and failed to behave any better than Democrats once they got their snouts in the trough."

Roberta Combs, chairman of the Christian Coalition, said responsibility for the GOP's loss of the House and Senate "goes right back to the leadership, the corruption among Republicans."

And James Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family, issued a statement saying that "many of the Values Voters of '04 simply stayed at home this year" because the Republican Party has "consistently ignored the constituency that put them in power."

In fact, white evangelical Protestants turned out this week as heavily as they did in 2004, making up roughly 24 percent of the electorate both times. "This is a solidly Republican voting bloc that there was reason to believe might stay home. Given the polling before the election, the amazing thing was that the Democratic swing wasn't bigger," said John C. Green, a senior fellow at the nonpartisan Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life.

The finger-pointing came as conservative Christians absorbed the gravity of their losses, including the defeat of congressional standard-bearers such as Rep. John N. Hostettler (R-Ind.), Rep. Jim Ryun (R-Kan.) and Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.).

In addition, voters in South Dakota overturned the nation's tightest abortion ban. In Missouri, they passed a measure supporting stem cell research. In Kansas, they defeated Phill Kline, an attorney general who had aggressively investigated abortion clinics.

DOJ_NMG_0093393

Seven states passed constitutional amendments barring same-sex marriage, but by much tighter margins than in the 11 states that adopted similar measures two years ago. In Arizona this week, voters rejected a marriage amendment, the first time gay rights advocates have beaten such an initiative anywhere in the country.

In the view of religious liberals, the results showed that wedge issues have lost some power.

"People really care about right and wrong more than right and left, and their antennae were up about corruption and the war in Iraq and kitchen-table moral issues -- health care and poverty," said Alexia Kelley, executive director of Catholics in Alliance for the Common Good, a group that set out this year to challenge the religious right's hold on moral issues.

Kelley noted that Democrats received the support of 55 percent of Catholic voters and Republicans got 44 percent, a sharp reversal from 2004, when the GOP won a narrow majority of the Catholic vote in congressional races.

In the states where Democrats fielded candidates who were able to speak credibly about their faith, they made larger gains, according to Vanderslice, who served as a consultant to half a dozen Democratic candidates. Among her clients was Ted Strickland, a minister who won 58 percent of the Catholic vote and 51 percent of the white evangelical vote in the Ohio governor's race against Ken Blackwell, a Republican who has championed conservative Christian causes.

As they contemplated the results, religious conservatives anticipated attacks by business interests and fiscal conservatives within the GOP who think the party should focus on budget deficits and Iraq -- and put less emphasis on culture-war issues such as opposing embryonic stem cell research and keeping Terri Schiavo on life support.

David Barton, head of WallBuilders, a Texas-based evangelical group, predicted that fiscal conservatives would cite California's Republican governor, Arnold Schwarzenegger, as a model.

"They will say, 'Schwarzenegger won and won big; the guys that lost are the social conservatives -- Hostettler, Ryun.' And so there's going to be a push within the Republican caucus to move further away from social conservatives," Barton said.

Even before the election, former House majority leader Richard K. Armey (R-Tex.) called Dobson a "bully" who diverted the GOP from its core mission as the party of small government. On Wednesday, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said the GOP needs to become "a lot more progressive and a lot less ideological."

Despite the GOP's losses, conservative religious leaders gave no indication they plan to engage in the kind of introspection and repositioning that religious liberals did two years ago. And despite their anger at congressional Republicans, they did not suggest that they were about to abandon the GOP.

"Even though a lot of Democratic candidates talked about faith, and even though a lot of them are devout people who hold similar values, they are part of a party that is liberal," said Janice Shaw Crouse, director of Concerned Women for America's Beverly LaHaye Institute, a conservative Christian think tank. "So the only hope social conservatives really have is the Republican Party."

The Architect Speaks (TIME)

By Mike Allen

Time.com, November 10, 2006

At the White House senior staff meeting in the Roosevelt Room at 7:30 a.m. on Wednesday, Chief of Staff Josh Bolten thanked Karl Rove for his hard work in the elections, and the group around the big table burst into spontaneous applause. It was a much-needed moment of cheer for Rove, the President's chief strategist, after Republicans lost the House and were headed toward the same fate in the Senate in midterm congressional elections that turned into a blue rip tide of voter ire.

"The profile of corruption in the exit polls was bigger than I'd expected," Rove tells TIME. "Abramoff, lobbying, Foley and Haggard [the disgraced evangelical leader] added to the general distaste that people have for all things Washington, and it just reached critical mass."

Exit polls showed heavy discontent with the course of the war, and Bush announced the departure of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld the next day. But Rove took comfort in results of the Connecticut Senate race between the anti-war Democratic nominee, Ned Lamont, and Sen. Joseph Lieberman, who ran as an independent after losing the Democratic primary over his support for the war. "Iraq mattered," Rove says. "But it was more frustration than it was an explicit call for withdrawal. If this was a get-out-now call for withdrawal, then Lamont would not have been beaten by Lieberman. Iraq does play a role, but not the critical, central role."

DOJ_NMG_0093394

And he does not believe his data let him down. "My job is not to be a prognosticator," he said. "My job is not to go out there and wring my hands and say, 'We're going to lose.' I'm looking at the data and seeing if I can figure out, Where can we be? I told the President, 'I don't know where this is going to end up. But I see our way clear to Republican control.' "

Rove, who is Deputy Chief of Staff and Senior Adviser to the President, had long been warning in speeches that Democrats suffered defeat in 1994 after ossified thinking and an entitlement mentality took over the party: "What I was trying to say was: What happened to them could happen to us," he told TIME.

White House Counselor Dan Bartlett said Bush is "deeply appreciative for the time and effort put in by Karl, and for all the political team's effort." Bartlett pointed to the President's statement at his day-after news conference that as the head of the Republican Party, he shares a large part of the responsibility. "He's not the one that's going to sit there and point fingers at others," Bartlett said.

Despite this week's repudiation of the GOP, Rove said he believes the party can still achieve a long-term majority. "I see this as much more of a transient, passing thing," he said. "The Republican Party remains at its core a small-government, low-tax, limit-spending, traditional-values, strong-defense party. I see the power of the ideas, even in a tough year." He added that he has "fundamental confidence in the power of the underlying agenda of this President," and cited fighting the war on terror, entitlement reform, energy, tax cuts, immigration reform, No Child Left Behind reauthorization, democracy agenda in the Middle East, reducing trade barriers, spending restraint and legal reform.

Rove is famous for his political statistics, and his team has come up with an array of figures to contend that the Republicans' loss of 29 seats in the House and six in the Senate is not so out of whack with the historic norms. In all sixth year midterms, the President's party has lost an average of 29 House seats and 3 Senate seats, according to these figures. In all sixth-year midterms since World War II, the loss was an average of 31 House and 6 Senate seats. And in all wartime midterms since 1860, the average loss was 32 House and 5 Senate seat.

The Republican get-out-the-vote program Rove helped invent precluded even deeper losses, he says. "People were talking 35, 40 or more and it didn't happen," he said. "There were a number of elections which were supposed to be close and ended up not being close."

The Republican National Committee has been pointing out that a small shift in votes would have made a big difference. A shift of 77,611 votes would have given Republicans control of the House, according to Bush's political team. And a shift of 2,847 votes in Montana, or 7,217 votes in Virginia, or 41,537 votes in Missouri would have given a Republicans control of the Senate. In addition, the party has calculated that the winner received 51 percent or less in 35 contests, and that 23 races were decided by two percentage points or fewer, 18 races were decided by fewer than 5,000 votes, 15 races were decided by fewer than 4,000 votes, 10 races were decided by fewer than 3,000 votes, eight were decided by fewer than 2,000 votes and five races were decided by fewer than 1,000 votes.

Rove is an enthusiastic historian, but even he has trouble coming up with a parallel for this wild week. "We may look back and see this as a unique expression," he said. Republicans can only hope.

R.I. Senator May Leave Republican Party (AP-Y)

By Michelle R. Smith, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

Two days after losing a bid for a second term, Sen. Lincoln Chafee said he was unsure whether he would remain a Republican.

Chafee lost to Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse in a race seen as a referendum on President Bush and the GOP. On Thursday, he was asked whether he would stick with the Republican Party or become an independent or Democrat.

"I haven't made any decisions. I just haven't even thought about where my place is," Chafee said at a news conference. When pressed on whether his comments indicated he might leave the GOP, he replied: "That's fair."

DOJ_NMG_0093395

Chafee, 53, is a lifelong Republican who has represented Rhode Island for seven years. His father held the same seat for 23 years before that.

He is the most liberal Republican in the Senate and was the sole Senate Republican to vote against the war in Iraq. But that was not enough to prevail against Whitehouse, who shared many of Chafee's views but was a Democrat in a heavily Democratic state.

Chafee said he has not decided what to do after leaving office, but he hoped to stay involved in public life. He said his loss may have helped the country by switching control of Congress.

"The people have spoken all across America. They want the Democrats and Republicans to work together," he said. "I think the president now is going to have to talk to the Democrats. I think that's going to be good for America."

Chafee said he waged a lonely campaign to bring the party to the middle. He described attending weekly lunches with fellow GOP senators and standing up to argue his point of view, often alone.

"There were times walking into my caucus room where it wasn't fun," he said, adding that he stayed with the GOP largely because it helped him bring federal dollars home to Rhode Island.

Republicans Are Ahead In Remaining House Races (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

See updates to Washington Wire each weekday at www.washwire.com1.

REPUBLICANS LEAD in most House races that remain undecided.

Narrow margins for some candidates, such as Buchanan in Florida and incumbent Rep. Hayes in North Carolina, make recounts likely. But "it's very unusual for recounts to alter races," says Carl Forti of House Republican campaign committee, which hopes to keep Democratic gains below 30 seats.

Women gain in Congress. Female senators number 16 with wins by Klobuchar in Minnesota and McCaskill in Missouri. House increase hinges partly on undecided races in Washington, where Darcy Burner hopes to unseat Rep. Reichert.

Three undecided races feature female opponents, including Republican Rep. Wilson vs. Patricia Madrid in New Mexico.

GINGRICH EMERGES as top conservative prospect for Republican 2008 field.

Ebbing fortunes of Santorum, Allen and Frist leave opening for architect of Republicans' 1994 sweep. Gingrich faults Bush for "very disturbing" post-election news conference, saying earlier replacement of Rumsfeld might have saved control of the Senate and 10 House seats.

"He can win some primaries," says Bush ad-maker Mark McKinnon, now with 2008 front-runner McCain. Anti-Washington mood helps departing Arkansas Gov. Huckabee compete with Kansas Sen. Brownback in wooing religious right.

ECONOMIC CONSERVATIVES court incoming Democratic tax chief Rangel.

The American Council on Capital Formation invites Rangel to breakfast next week. Despite campaign attacks labeling the New York Democrat a tax-raising liberal, the council's Mark Bloomfield predicts he'll be "a centrist legislator" who "understands the importance of economic growth."

Democratic and Republican strategists predict Congress will reauthorize the Clinton-era State Children's Health Insurance Program in 2007. Some states have tightened enrollment standards, and in 2005, the number of uninsured children rose for the first time since 1998.

Joseph Antos of American Enterprise Institute says Republicans won't want to look "hard-hearted" on the issue.

TURNOUT RISES to highest midterm election level since 1982. Curtis Gans of American University's Center for the Study of the American Electorate estimates that 40.4% of those eligible to vote did so, up from 39.7% four years ago.

STARTING GUN: Departing Iowa Gov. Vilsack's entry into Democratic presidential race creates early obstacle for 2008 rivals. "What we have to do is win Iowa," says an adviser to former vice presidential nominee Edwards. In 1992, Democrats generally sidestepped Iowa because of favorite son candidacy of Sen. Harkin.

DOJ_NMG_0093396

HOOSIER POWER: Democratic strategist Steve Elmendorf calls Indiana Sen. Bayh "the front-runner" for conservative slot vacated by ex-Virginia Gov. Warner's departure from 2008 field. Bayh touts Democratic pickup of three Indiana House seats; he had also dispatched staffers to help campaigns in Iowa and New Hampshire.

OBAMA COULD cite opposition to Iraq war in a 2008 race, but one potential competitor for that constituency looms. Liberal strategist Bob Borosage says Gore would capture antiwar left "immediately" by entering.

ACTIVISTS SEEKING end to Cuban trade embargo say Democratic control of Congress improves chances. Twelve groups seeking new policy write Rangel and Sen. Baucus, incoming chairman of Senate Finance Committee.

ENVIRONMENTALISTS CLAIM big win with defeat of Rep. Pombo.

As House Resources Committee chairman, Pombo sought to overhaul Endangered Species Act. Green groups poured more than $1 million into the Republican's California district.

Wind-energy consultant Jerry McNerney, once written off, won with 53%. "We have the political strength to...defeat extreme anti-environmental politicians," says Rodger Schlickeisen of the Defenders of Wildlife Action Fund.

Pombo cited the role of "outside groups" in his defeat.

MINOR MEMOS: Blaming "arrogant Republicanism" for losses, one former Bush administration official says "I'm ticked off, too." ... Republican Rep. Tom Cole, seeking support to run House campaign committee for 2008, reminds colleagues, "The most important election is not the last one -- it's the next one."

RNC Asks Steele To Replace Mehlman (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 10, 2006

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, whose party just lost both chambers of Congress, will leave his position in January, and the post as party chief has been offered to Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele.

"It is true," Mr. Mehlman told The Washington Times when asked about reports last night that he would resign. "It's something I decided over the summer. No one told me I needed to. In fact, folks wanted me to stay."

Mr. Mehlman said he "told the White House over the summer it was my decision" to leave the RNC post, "win, lose or draw."

Also last night, Republican officials told The Times that Mr. Steele, who lost his bid for the U.S. Senate on Tuesday, has been sought out to succeed Mr. Mehlman as national party chairman. Those Republican officials said Mr. Steele had not made a decision whether to take the post, as of last night.

Other Republican Party officials said some Republican National Committee (RNC) members, including state party chairmen, have mounted a move to have Mr. Steele succeed Mr. Mehlman.

But they said that President Bush's political adviser Karl Rove, who is Mr. Mehlman's mentor, would rather see Mr. Steele serve in the president's Cabinet, perhaps as secretary of Housing and Urban Development. These officials said no one has actually offered Mr. Steele either the RNC post or a Cabinet post.

Steele spokesman Doug Heye said last night that "I don't know of any conversations that Lt. Gov. Steele has had on this topic, but I can tell you that there are many people who have said he would be an ideal candidate, based on the race he ran this year."

"I talked to him very briefly about it today. He has not made any decisions yet about what he will do next. He is still focused on his role as lieutenant governor," Mr. Heye said.

Mr. Steele is one of the most successful and respected black Republicans in the country. He served as the elected Maryland Republican Party chairman before running for lieutenant governor.

The White House, RNC and National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) were pleased with what they called his tough but dignified performance as senatorial candidate in a liberal state that last elected a Republican senator in 1980. The NRSC had enough confidence in him as a candidate that it directed large amounts of money into independent expenditures on behalf of his campaign in the closing days.

Mr. Mehlman also told The Times he will not step down as Republican national chairman until the RNC's annual winter meeting in Washington. He said he also "will do an intensive after-action review" of the campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0093397

The outgoing RNC chief was a regional political director for the 2000 Bush presidential nomination and general election campaigns and then was named White House political director after Mr. Bush's election.

Mr. Mehlman managed the successful 2004 Bush re-election campaign and implemented the vaunted "72-hour task force" -- the final days program to get out the vote for Republican candidates using the latest and most sophisticated technology and massive grass-roots, door-to-door volunteer program. That Republican "ace in the hole" failed to materialize in 2006, however.

After the 2004 election success, he was the choice of Mr. Rove for national party chairman and Mr. Bush let it be known that he agreed. As is traditional when a Republican occupies the White House, the 165-member RNC then elected Mr. Mehlman as chairman at its winter meeting following the 2004 elections.

Earlier yesterday, Mr. Mehlman was asked at a luncheon with reporters whether he would announce his future plans at the RNC. He said he had made a decision, which he would announce at a future time.

He stressed, however, that he had made that decision before the election losses, and the two weren't related.

Asked about talk that he would join a possible presidential bid by former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, Mr. Mehlman said, "I have no plans to do the 2008 primary. I will focus on private sector, the party generally and ultimately on [whoever is] the nominee."

"After seven years of this kind of this [brutal] schedule, I am ready -- and really looking forward to -- the private sector.

"Don't worry," Mr. Mehlman added. "I will remain committed to the cause" of conservatism.

•Jon Ward and Amy Fagan contributed to this report.

Mehlman To Step Down From RNC Post (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, whose party lost both chambers of Congress in the midterm elections, will step down from his post when his two-year term ends in January, GOP officials said Thursday.

The officials spoke on the condition of anonymity because Mehlman had not yet made his intentions public.

Brian Jones, an RNC spokesman, declined to comment beyond saying that an announcement about Mehlman's future with the party would be made in the days ahead.

Democrats won control of the House and Senate on Tuesday by capitalizing on voter frustration with President Bush, the war in Iraq and the scandal-scarred Congress. Democrats also took a majority of governors' posts and gained a decisive edge in state legislatures.

The officials said Mehlman made the decision not to run for a second term more than a month or two ago — well before the election.

During his tenure, Mehlman, 40, traveled extensively to promote the Republican agenda. When he became chairman in January 2005, he said he hoped to tighten the GOP's grip on power in Washington.

"Nothing is permanent in politics," he said then. "The goal is how do you — both in the short term and the long term — do things to make it sustainable?"

Mehlman also said then that he hoped to expand the GOP base and help Bush enact his agenda.

Last year, Mehlman told NAACP members that the Republican Party was wrong for ignoring the black vote for decades and said he hoped the groups could restore their historic bond.

"Some Republicans gave up on winning the African-American vote, looking the other way or trying to benefit politically from racial polarization," Mehlman said at the NAACP convention. "I come here as Republican chairman to tell you we were wrong."

A protege of Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove, Mehlman became RNC chairman after managing Bush's re-election campaign in 2004, when the president won re-election and Republicans expanded their majorities in the House and the Senate.

Before that campaign, he served as White House political director under Rove. In 2000, he served as national field director for Bush's first presidential campaign, charged with coordinating the efforts of GOP leaders in every state.

DOJ_NMG_0093398

Previous to that, he worked on Capitol Hill and practiced environmental law in Washington. Mehlman, a Baltimore native, is a graduate of Harvard Law School and Franklin & Marshall College in Lancaster, Pa.

Republican Party Chairman Will Not Seek Another Term (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 9 — The chairman of the Republican National Committee, Ken Mehlman, said Thursday that he would not seek to retain the post when his term expires in January and would return to a job in the private sector.

"This has been a great ride, but at the same time I have a lot of interests in addition to politics," said Mr. Mehlman, who managed President Bush's re-election campaign in 2004 and was the White House political director before that.

The decision was not a surprise. Associates of Mr. Mehlman said in July that he would not seek a second term as chairman regardless of the outcome of the midterm elections.

He announced his decision two days after an election in which his party suffered sharp setbacks, losing control of both the House and the Senate.

Mr. Mehlman ruled out going to work for any of the 2008 presidential candidates.

"My intention is to focus on identifying a platform that will be professionally rewarding for me for the next decade, that will include politics but not be related to politics," he said.

Mr. Mehlman's time in office has been marked by strong fund-raising — the committee spent $77 million on candidates this year — as well as the pioneering of sophisticated voter identification and turnout technologies that Republicans and Democrats said helped account for his party's successes in 2002 and 2004.

"I'd love to have him come work for me," said Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, who is preparing for a presidential run in 2008. "He has revolutionized American politics."

Mr. Romney said Republican setbacks this year came about despite the advances Mr. Mehlman made in fund-raising and voter turnout operations.

"I don't think anyone has suggested that the Republican Party's challenges two days ago were due to party machinery," he said.

The praise from Mr. Romney was echoed in an unsolicited call from James Carville, a veteran Democratic operative who is married to Mary Matalin, a veteran Republican strategist.

"The R.N.C. did a better job than the D.N.C. this year," Mr. Carville said, referring to the Democratic National Committee.

He said Democrats succeeded because the party's House and Senate campaign committees compensated for what Mr. Carville described as the shortcomings of the Democratic National Committee, allowing the party to take advantage of a wave of voter resentment directed at Republicans.

"When one of these things hit, it doesn't matter who the party chairman is," he said.

Mr. Mehlman declined to comment on who might succeed him.

Some Republicans said that Maria Cino, the deputy secretary of transportation, had emerged as an early contender.

As the national chairman, Mr. Mehlman is paid $200,000 a year. Unlike recent party leaders, he did not do outside legal or lobbying work.

He said one of his motivations in leaving politics was to make more money.

Mehlman Won't Seek Another Term As Republican Party Chief (WP)

By Dan Balz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, who guided President Bush's reelection campaign to victory in 2004 and saw his party suffer the loss of the House and Senate on Tuesday, will not seek a second term as party leader, informed sources said last night.

DOJ_NMG_0093399

Mehlman is leaving his position voluntarily and has not come under any pressure from the White House or state party leaders to vacate his position as a result of Tuesday's elections. According to a Republican strategist familiar with developments at the RNC, Mehlman told the White House in August that he would leave after the elections.

Mehlman met with reporters yesterday to review the midterm elections at a lunch sponsored by the Christian Science Monitor and was asked whether he planned to stay on as party chairman. He declined to answer directly but said, "I will announce soon what my plan is in the future."

White House officials are trying to recruit a successor, but it was not known last night whether there was a leading candidate. One name that has emerged is that of Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, who just lost a bid for the Senate. But a GOP source said Steele is not likely to become chairman.

Others mentioned publicly as possible successors include Maria Cino, a former RNC official and now deputy secretary of transportation, and Mary Matalin, former communications director for Vice President Cheney and one of the party's most visible advocates. But a GOP strategist said, "From what I understand, all these names are not on the table."

Mehlman has spent the past seven years helping to advance the electoral fortunes of Bush and the Republican Party.

Assigned to help organize the Iowa caucuses in the 2000 campaign, he quickly rose through the ranks. He has been a protege and confidant of White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove and a key member of the Republican team that, until this week, had proved to be one of the most successful political units in modern American history.

Mehlman was named White House political director when the president arrived in Washington in 2001 and was elevated to campaign manager for the Bush-Cheney reelection campaign in 2004.

Mehlman used his chairmanship to strengthen the party's sophisticated machinery for identifying and turning out voters, an operation that has won plaudits even from his Democratic adversaries.

He also spent much of his time trying to enlarge the party's coalition, particularly among Hispanics and African Americans. He helped recruit three African Americans -- Steele among them -- as statewide candidates this year. All three lost, but Mehlman said yesterday that he remained committed to making the party more diverse.

The RNC came under criticism in this campaign, however, for sponsoring an advertisement in Tennessee's Senate race that critics claimed was a thinly veiled racial appeal against Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., who is black.

Mehlman's future plans were not disclosed last night. There has been speculation that he might join one of the 2008 presidential campaigns, but one knowledgeable strategist said he knew of no such agreement. One Republican said Mehlman, a lawyer, might join a politically connected law firm and might play a role in that capacity.

Redistricting: Home To Roost (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

How Republicans' Gerrymandering Efforts May Have Backfired

(See Corrections & Amplifications item below.)

WASHINGTON -- Gerrymandering was supposed to cement Republican control of the House of Representatives, offering incumbents a wall of re-election protection even as public opinion turned sharply against them. Instead, the party's strategy of recrafting district boundaries may have backfired, contributing to the defeats of several lawmakers and the party's fall from power.

The reason: Republican leaders may have overreached and created so many Republican-leaning districts that they spread their core supporters too thinly. That left their incumbents vulnerable to the type of backlash from traditionally Republican-leaning independent voters that unfolded this week.

That helps to explain why three of four Republican incumbents in the Philadelphia area were beaten this week, while the remaining incumbent hung on by just a few thousand votes. In Florida, meanwhile, state lawmakers had shifted some Republican voters from the secure district of former Rep. Mark Foley in an attempt to shore up the re-election chances of Rep. Clay Shaw without risking the Foley seat. Instead, Democrats took both. In Texas, former Majority Leader Tom DeLay's decision to transfer thousands of stalwart Republican voters from his district in 2004 to boost a neighboring seat heightened the burden on the write-in candidate trying to hold Mr. DeLay's seat. She lost it.

DOJ_NMG_0093400

"The trade-off in redistricting is between safety and maximizing the numbers," says Alan I. Abramowitz, a political scientist at Emory University in Atlanta. "You can't do both,"

Redistricting, the traditionally once-a-decade process of redrawing of House districts to adjust to population trends, has always been a contentious procedure. But Republicans, under the leadership of Mr. DeLay, took the opportunity to use it as a reward or punishment to new heights in 2002.

In so doing, Republicans created two new vulnerabilities: the dangerous dilution of core voters and the nurturing of a sense of invulnerability that contributes to corruption and scandal.

"You can do a little thing wrong and, if you were in a district where you might be punished, you probably wouldn't do the little thing," says Michael P. McDonald, a redistricting expert at George Mason University. Today, he said, most House districts aren't in jeopardy unless "you take a bribe for a vote and you are thrown into jail for it."

The drive to maximize seats was seen by Republicans as a matter of survival. Democrats regained ground every cycle after the 1994 Republican takeover. By 2000, the Republican majority had shrunk to 221 seats from 231 in 1994. Democrats, aligned with the chamber's one independent, needed just six seats to retake control in 2002.

So Mr. DeLay and House Speaker Dennis Hastert turned to their allies in the statehouses to redraw congressional district boundaries to erase Democratic seats and give Republicans new ones. "We wish to encourage you in these efforts, as they play a crucial role in maintaining a Republican majority," the two leaders wrote in a letter to Pennsylvania lawmakers.

There are three weapons to employ in redistricting. "Packing" involves concentrating a group of voters, such as African-Americans, in one district. "Cracking" means splitting up a group of voters to diminish their influence. "Pairing" forces two incumbents into the same district. Pennsylvania lawmakers used them all.

Philadelphia's urban voters were packed into Democratic seats, making them bluer than before. Since the state was losing two seats because of a population decline in the 2000 census, six incumbents were paired. That meant four Democrats were left to fight over two seats. And one Democrat was forced to run against an incumbent Republican in a district that favored the Republican.

Then, the legislators employed the supercomputers at Pittsburgh's Carnegie Mellon University to carve up the Philadelphia suburbs. The goal: make four Republican seats by cracking apart any Democratic strongholds left outside the city.

One of those districts, the sixth, starts at the city line and moves west to pick up several suburbs. Then it turns back east to capture conservative Chester County. And then it shoots north into the rolling farms of conservative Berks County where it splits four townships and ends in Reading. Reading itself was broken apart, precinct by precinct, to be shared by the sixth district's then-new congressman, Republican Rep. Jim Gerlach, and incumbent Republican Rep. Joe Pitts, of the 16th District.

"If you look at the Pennsylvania map, it's ugly," says Sam Hirsch, an attorney who argued against the constitutionality of the map before the U.S. Supreme Court. Democrats lost that case 5-4.

After the Pennsylvania redistricting, the partisan make-up of the state's House delegation shifted to 12 Republicans and seven Democrats from a pre-redistricting breakdown of 10 Democrats and 11 Republicans. That meant the balance of the state's delegation shifted from one that was split roughly evenly to one in which Republicans had a five-seat edge.

In 2002 the fruits of the work in Pennsylvania -- as well as similar efforts in Ohio, Michigan and Florida -- were clear when the Republicans' U.S. House majority widened to 229-204. Mr. DeLay wasn't done, though. The next year, he pushed through a new congressional map in Texas that produced another net gain of five Republican seats in the Lone Star state. By 2004, his House majority had grown to 232-202.

While Republicans lauded their Texas coup, pro-Democratic union leaders at the AFL-CIO headquarters in Washington, across the street from the White House, pored over the 2004 presidential and congressional results. They began to put together a pattern: Republican-held House seats where Democrat John Kerry narrowly won or lost also included high concentrations of union members.

In the summer of 2005, they created a target list for the 2006 campaign. The Philadelphia suburban seats of Mr. Gerlach, Rep. Curt Weldon and Rep. Melissa Hart were on it.

DOJ_NMG_0093401

Combined, the lawmakers' districts are home to 182,000 union members. With direct-mail literature and telephone calls, the labor leaders attacked the incumbents for their stands on Social Security and a host of other issues working their way through Congress.

Meanwhile, MoveOn.org, the liberal online group, was working through similar calculations. They put Rep. Michael Fitzpatrick on their target sheet. He won two years ago by 1,500 votes. MoveOn members made 102,000 telephone calls to inconsistent Democratic voters urging them to get out on Election Day. Its members donated $90,000 to his opponent's campaign.

On Tuesday, Mr. Fiztpatrick lost 50.3% to 49.7%. Ms. Hart lost 52% to 48%. Mr. Weldon, who also was stung by late disclosure of a federal investigation of his actions, lost 57% to 43%. Mr. Gerlach, the last Republican standing whose district was custom-made for him, is ahead amid final vote counting, 50.5% to 49.5%

"If Republicans had been a little less aggressive, they could have won several of those seats. If they gave the Democrats one more seat, they could have shored up by several percentage points the other seats," says Nathaniel Persily, a political scientist at the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia.

That isn't to say all the Republicans' 2002 redistricting plans went awry. Ohio lawmakers were more conservative than the Pennsylvanians. Before redistricting, their House delegation had 11 Republicans and eight Democrats. Like Pennsylvania, they lost two seats because of population losses. Statehouse Republicans took those two seats from the Democrats. But they only added one Republican seat, creating a partisan delegation split of 12-6.

That is one reason why today several of their incumbents are still hanging on. The state was besieged with scandals and Democrats easily won the governorship and the senate race. Seven of the state's 12 Republican incumbents were on watch lists. But Democrats only have pocketed three of them. Two incumbents were re-elected and two more are clinging to their seats, albeit with tiny margins.

Write to Jeanne Cummings at jeanne.cummings@wsj.com1

Corrections & Amplifications:

Pennsylvania Rep. Melissa Hart's district is located in a suburb of Pittsburgh. This article says it was outside of Philadelphia.

Evangelical Leader: GOP Abandoned Voters (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Talhelm, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

Conservative Christian leader James Dobson accused the Republican Party of abandoning values voters in the midterm elections — and paying the price by losing control of Congress. "What did they do with their power?" Dobson said in a statement. "Very little that values voters care about."

Finger-pointing abounded in the days after Democrats seized control of Congress after 12 years in the minority. Dobson, chairman of Focus on the Family, issued a statement railing against the Republicans for letting their majorities slip away.

"They consistently ignored the constituency that put them in power until it was late in the game, and then frantically tried to catch up at the last minute," said Dobson, who argued that religious conservatives ensured GOP wins in 2004.

Dobson also criticized other conservatives, including former Majority Leader Dick Armey, R-Texas — an architect of the 1994 GOP House takeover — for complaining recently that the religious right was "too involved" with the party.

"Without the support of that specific constituency, John Kerry would be president and the Republicans would have fallen into a black hole in '04," Dobson said. "In fact, that is where they are headed if they continue to abandon their pro-moral, pro-family and pro-life base. The big tent will turn into a three-ring circus."

Dobson said he had predicted in 2004 that Republicans might squander their opportunity and pay the price in future elections.

"Sadly for conservatives, that in large measure explains what happened on Tuesday night," he said. "Many of the values voters of '04 simply stayed at home this year."

DOJ_NMG_0093402

The cybersex scandal involving former Republican Rep. Mark Foley of Florida and the fall of Ted Haggard, the evangelical pastor who was fired amid allegations of gay sex and drug use, left some values voters dispirited.

More than four in 10 evangelicals said corruption and scandals were extremely important, and those who felt that way were more likely to vote for Democratic candidates than other evangelicals. About a third who were most concerned about corruption cast their votes for Democrats, according to exit polls conducted for The Associated Press and the networks.

About seven in 10 white evangelicals voted for the Republican candidate, slightly less than the eight in 10 who voted for Bush in 2004.

The relationship between religious conservatives and the GOP has frayed a bit.

Author David Kuo, a former aide in the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, wrote in his book, "Tempting Faith, An Inside Story of Political Seduction," that Bush aides privately called conservative Christians "nuts," "ridiculous" and "goofy."

Focus on the Family is based in Colorado Springs, Colo.

Schwarzenegger Welcomes 'New Blood' In D.C. (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 10, 2006

MEXICO CITY — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said here today that he was heartened by Tuesday's election resulting in a Democratic takeover of Congress, welcoming what he described as "new blood coming to Washington."

Speaking publicly for the first time about his party's apparent loss of both the U.S. House and Senate, Schwarzenegger said he was hopeful that the changes will jump-start a political system that was paralyzed.

"I think it's good that there are new ideas and new blood, because Washington was stuck," the governor said, after a meeting with Mexican President Vicente Fox at Los Pinos, Mexico's equivalent of the White House. "They could not move forward. Not much was accomplished. I think it was terrible."

Schwarzenegger said he was hopeful that the results would usher in a new era of bipartisan cooperation — similar to what he said he is bringing about in Sacramento.

"So I think the people have spoken in America, all over the United States," the governor told a roomful of California and Mexican journalists. "And they've sent a very clear message to Washington: We are not happy about the way things were going. And I think we want to see a new way of going, and we want to see bipartisanship."

Soon after the governor finished speaking, one of his aides, communications director Adam Mendelsohn, told reporters that Schwarzenegger was not saying he was necessarily pleased to see Congress under Democratic control.

Rather, Schwarzenegger was making the point that "it's good there is an infusion of new ideas and desire for bipartisanship," Mendelsohn said.

Still, Schwarzenegger's tone was a marked difference from that of President Bush.

Schwarzenegger arrived in Mexico City late Wednesday for a two-day trade mission where he is meeting with various political leaders and business executives.

In the meeting with Fox, the Mexican president raised the issue of illegal immigration, a raw subject on both sides of the border. Schwarzenegger said he told Fox that plans to make the border more secure through hundreds of miles of fencing amount to "an incomplete way of solving the problem."

While the U.S. builds its fence, officials in Washington must also enact a guest worker program so that employers have a steady supply of labor and find ways to create new jobs in Mexico so that there is less incentive to cross the border illegally, Schwarzenegger said.

Referring to the 63-person California business delegation that has joined him in Mexico, the governor said: "Right now I have with me a bunch of farmers from California and they're complaining because their crops are spoiling right now and we are losing millions and millions of dollars because we can't get the workers into California."

DOJ_NMG_0093403

Schwarzenegger was accompanied at the breakfast meeting by a dozen people, including his wife, Maria Shriver; his agriculture, business and environmental Cabinet secretaries; Claire Bilby, vice president for Walt Disney Parks & Resorts; and Allan Zaremberg, president of the California Chamber of Commerce, a major business lobbying group.

Schwarzenegger gave Fox and his wife a gift of silver spurs engraved with the California seal.

The governor went from Los Pinos to a supermarket, where he examined the California produce and drank from a glass of California red wine. Large pictures of Schwarzenegger touting California products were displayed near the vegetables and wine.

"This governor really enjoys selling California — all aspects of California, whether it's tourism or the 400 different commodities we produce," said A.G. Kawamura, the governor's secretary of food and agriculture.

peter.nicholas@latimes.com

Schwarzenegger Implores GOP To Follow Script Of His Sequel (WP)

By John Pomfret

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Nov. 10 -- In his victory speech Tuesday night to a confetti-swamped crowd at the Beverly Hilton, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger had a message for the rest of the Republican Party after its worst defeat in decades.

Follow "the California way," he said. "We are proving to the nation that there is another way to go, a better path to solve problems."

Schwarzenegger's landslide victory in a largely Democratic state illustrates the growing power of moderate candidates and the electoral appeal of bipartisanship, and it could contain important lessons for Republicans and Democrats as they seek to position themselves in the future, analysts and politicians said.

"If I was a Republican National Committee chair, I would hire Arnold out and teach Republicans what is necessary to put together a winning campaign," said Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a political analyst at the University of Southern California. "He really is the poster boy of what Republicans have denied for so long. Elections are won from the center."

In the 56-percent-to-39-percent triumph over Democratic nominee Phil Angelides, described even by his own partisans as a somewhat lackluster performer, Schwarzenegger owned the center. According to an exit poll of more than 2,000 voters done by CNN, almost 60 percent of California's independent voters chose Schwarzenegger, while 58 percent of the people who identified themselves as moderate cast ballots for him. Even 22 percent of Democratic voters voted for the governor.

The reason for this landslide, analysts said, involved the 180-degree reversal Schwarzenegger has undergone over the past year. Schwarzenegger rolled into office on the back of an unprecedented recall election in 2003, promising to govern from the center. For the first year of his administration he did just that. But in late 2004, he embraced partisan tactics. He addressed the Republican Convention, stumped for President Bush in Ohio during a critical period in Bush's reelection campaign, and then, in early 2005, decided to take on all the entrenched-Democratic Party interests in Sacramento at once, including teachers, nurses and prison guards.

"Arnold did this Karl Rove-inspired move to the right," said Bruce Cain, a professor of political science at the University of California at Berkeley. "He got carried away with the 'base' strategy because it worked in 2004. He tried a little bit of Bush politics in California."

The result? Miserable failure. Schwarzenegger pushed a series of ballot initiatives, and in June 2005 Californians defeated all of them.

"Schwarzenegger in 2005 was like an action hero playing Shakespeare," said Don Perata, the leading Democrat in the state Senate. "He wasn't comfortable."

The plot twists that followed rivaled any of the former action hero's movies. He apologized to the voters and changed character. He hired a Democrat as his chief of staff and cut bipartisan deals to limit global warming, boost the minimum wage and reduce the cost of prescription drugs. He clashed with Bush over sending the National Guard to the Mexican border and environmental issues. And he embraced a Democratic Party-inspired, multibillion-dollar bond package to rebuild California's crumbling roads, levees, ports and schools. Democratic lawmakers, including Perata, campaigned side by side with Schwarzenegger to get the bonds passed, which they did.

DOJ_NMG_0093404

As Schwarzenegger said Tuesday night: "I just love doing sequels."

Schwarzenegger's bipartisanship immunized him against attacks by Angelides that a vote for Schwarzenegger was a vote for Bush. Indeed, according to the CNN exit poll, 55 percent of the voters who said they "somewhat disapproved" of the president, voted for Schwarzenegger.

On Thursday, during a two-day trip to Mexico, Schwarzenegger actually sounded satisfied with a nationwide Democratic victory, theorizing that it might be what the country needs to force cooperation.

"I think this is good that we have new blood coming to Washington, that we have new people with new ideas coming to Washington," the governor told reporters, "because Washington was stuck."

A Democratic shift in the country might actually help Schwarzenegger's political future. He is rumored to be considering a run for the U.S. Senate in 2010 to replace Democrat Barbara Boxer.

Another factor that might hold lessons for the country involves California itself. For years, the state has been a laboratory for mean-spirited partisan political campaigns. It has been one of the leaders in spending on negative campaign ads and one of the first states where political consultants experimented with targeted mailings and robo-calls. The 2002 gubernatorial campaign is considered one of the nastiest in the nation's history.

"So," Cain said, "we've gotten sick of partisanship first." Schwarzenegger ran a reasonably clean campaign against Angelides. Perhaps the most negative ad was a lighthearted spot that showed Angelides moonwalking backward as it said he planned to take California back in time.

Patrick Dorinson, communications director for the California Republican Party, said he thinks the message in Schwarzenegger's victory is that results, not ideology, guaranteed victory.

The alternative, he suggested is "to be ideologically pure and lose."

Schwarzenegger, he said, subscribes to the "big tent" idea of the Republican Party as enunciated by Ronald Reagan in the 1960s. Despite his reputation as a hard-line conservative, as a California governor Reagan worked well with Democrats, raised state taxes and signed into law what was, for the time, one of the most liberal abortion laws in the nation.

"You mention 'big tent' to some Republicans now and they say, 'No way, we can't have that,' " Dorinson said. "We've gotten away from this idea, but that was a mistake. The center is where the future is."

Indeed, Schwarzenegger's victory reminded Republicans, said political consultant Allen Hoffenblum, that you cannot get elected by the base alone. Schwarzenegger kept his base; more than 90 percent of Republicans voted for him. But he won because of his broad appeal.

"The Bush obsession with the base, the base, the base doesn't work here," Hoffenblum said. "I think this election showed that it doesn't work anywhere else either."

Gingrich Sees Hope For Conservatives (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 10, 2006

Republicans, suddenly a minority in both houses of Congress and led by an unpopular president, need to restore their image as the party of small government but at the same time avoid the image of blind obstructionism, party leaders and analysts said yesterday.

"We have to recognize that this was a defeat for Republicans, not for conservatives," former House Speaker Newt Gingrich told The Washington Times yesterday.

There is hope to advance a conservative agenda, Mr. Gingrich said, if House Republicans can find allies among conservative Democrats.

"The balance of power in the House is now 50-plus blue-dog [conservative] Democrats," he said.

It won't be easy for Republicans to recover from Tuesday's defeat, because the party has "completely lost its brand as the party of limited government and low spending," said former Rep. Pat Toomey, president of the conservative Club for Growth.

A poll of 15 key congressional districts by the Club for Growth showed voters now think "Democrats, not Republicans, are the party of smaller government," Mr. Toomey said.

DOJ_NMG_0093405

By a 66 percent to 43 percent margin, voters think the "GOP used to be the party of economic growth, fiscal discipline and limited government, but in recent years, too many Republicans in Washington have become just like the big spenders that they used to oppose," the poll found.

"The American people sent a very important message to both parties and particularly to my party," Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman told reporters yesterday at a luncheon hosted by the Christian Science Monitor. "I think we've got to listen to that message. I think we've got to recommit ourselves to being the party of conservative reform."

One alumnus of the Gingrich-led 1994 "Republican Revolution" blamed Tuesday's loss on the Bush administration.

"The Republican Party ... needs to recognize that the Bush administration was largely the architect of its defeat, and that the party can no longer afford to play by yesterday's playbook," said former Rep. Bob Barr, Georgia Republican.

According to the "old, time-worn playbook, a sitting Republican president is the head of the party and his team can pick party leaders and dictate the agenda," said Mr. Barr, who warned that "if the party follows that paradigm, it will slip further into minority status."

Republicans "must break with the White House," chart their own course "with new, younger, bolder leadership" and provide "a true alternative" to Democrats, Mr. Barr said.

However, one House Republican said, the need to show legislative accomplishments means that Republicans will have to cooperate with the new Democratic leadership -- even at the risk of alienating conservatives such as Colorado Rep. Tom Tancredo and other opponents of an immigrant guest-worker program.

"There will have to be a guest-worker program of some kind and something that is not a full amnesty," said Rep. Ralph M. Hall, Texas Republican. "That will probably lose the Tancredo faction."

Mr. Hall predicted that Mr. Tancredo "is a smart man and will find a way" to make such a compromise work.

But some warn that bipartisan cooperation can be a trap.

"It is really important that the GOP not allow itself to be drawn into the 'can't-we-all-get-along' role that the liberal pundits and media will now hammer the GOP minority to play," said elections lawyer Cleta Mitchell, a conservative Republican.

She noted that Democrats won on Tuesday after successfully blocking much of the Republican agenda. "The lesson from the Democrats may well be that getting nothing done is better than doing the things that your base opposes," Mrs. Mitchell said.

Unifying Republicans could prove a difficult challenge, given a recent outburst of finger-pointing within the party. Former Rep. Dick Armey, Texas Republican, who has publicly blamed Christian conservatives for the party's declining fortunes, yesterday wrote a column in the Wall Street Journal excoriating congressional leaders who he said had attempted "to rally their political base on wedge issues like illegal immigration and gay marriage," and had thereby "alienated independents."

Mr. Armey's criticism -- and similar comments by Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican -- angered Focus on the Family Chairman James C. Dobson.

Republicans this year failed to motivate the "values voters" who helped Mr. Bush claim victory in 2004, said Mr. Dobson, who warned that some politicians are attempting to make social conservatives the scapegoats for Republican failures.

"The unfortunate thing is that Republican leaders still don't appear to get it," said Mr. Dobson, quoting Mr. Specter's Wednesday comments that the election results represented a "seismic earthquake" and advising Republicans to become "a lot more progressive and a lot less ideological."

Mr. Dobson said Mr. Armey "can't be serious" in urging Republicans to repudiate Christian conservatives.

"Someone should tell him that without the support of that specific constituency, John Kerry would be president and the Republicans would have fallen into a black hole in '04," said Mr. Dobson, who warned that the Republican Party's "big tent" could "turn into a three-ring circus."

Compounding the Republican Party's problem is the looming 2008 presidential campaign, said Rep. Ernest Istook, Oklahoma Republican.

Republicans "have a great challenge in trying to present a unified message, trying to bring House, Senate and presidential candidates all onto the same page," said Mr. Istook, who was defeated Tuesday in his campaign for governor of Oklahoma. "Unless the GOP nominee becomes apparent early, there will be a struggle to gain this unity."

DOJ_NMG_0093406

Noting the defeat of Virginia Sen. George Allen, once viewed by conservatives as a favorite for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, Mr. Istook asked, "Do we have a contender with credentials that can bring this conservative unity? Certainly not [former New York Mayor Rudolph W.] Giuliani or [Arizona Sen. John] McCain. This is why I say that it's overly optimistic to think that this is just a two-year setback that will spark an immediate rebound by the conservative movement."

• Amy Fagan contributed to this report.

Minority Report (WSJ)

By Jeff Flake

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

I was rummaging through my closet the other day when I came across an old T-shirt. Stamped across the front were the words "SCRAP THE CODE: The Armey-Tauzin Tax Reform Debates." On the back was a list of 25 cities on the "National Tax Reform Tour."

What a difference a few years makes. During this election season, Republican congressional leaders awarded members with a bronze bust of Ronald Reagan if they could prove they'd hosted town halls to explain to seniors how to sign up for the newly created Medicare Part D, which created a huge new prescription-drug entitlement in an already huge entitlement program.

And we wonder why we were beaten like a rented mule on Tuesday? * * *

The contest between the parties has come, for now, to a decisive close. But as Republicans, we have a choice to make, and we need to make it soon. The factions of the party must decide: Are we going to re-emerge as the party of ideas -- or be content as assistant hirelings of big government?

We might begin by asking why we lost. Taxes, first, is the easy one, and there is no need for a Republican mea culpa here. We've cut taxes, and Americans and the economy are better off for it. But recently we've been satisfied with putting Democrats "on record" supporting higher taxes. We need to do more. We will soon be bumping up against the deadlines to either repeal or extend the Bush tax cuts on income, estates, capital gains and dividends. This presents an excellent opportunity to rebuild momentum. Our congressional leadership should travel around the country -- concert tour style -- explaining why individuals spend their money better than the government.

Second, spending. This one is more difficult because it requires not just a mea culpa but abject apology. Not the politician-style -- "I'm sorry if you were offended by spending that our opponents have misinterpreted as offensive" -- but rather: "We've overspent, badly, and it was offensive to you as well as our conservative principles. We're sorry, and we're going to do better."

It is not only the level of spending, of course, that has been offensive. It is the manner of spending. Pork-barrel earmarks, or "member projects" (as we preferred to call them so as not to offend our own sensibilities), greatly multiplied under Republican rule. The Democrats were happy as long as enough crumbs fell from the Republican appropriators' table. Now that we are in the minority, will we be similarly satisfied or will we seek to change the practice?

On this issue, our constituents need no convincing. They know it is wrong. We need the courage to enact meaningful reforms, doubly difficult because of the present situation. But if we are chastened -- we ought to be -- perhaps we will emerge stronger for it. If Republicans are serious about changing direction, there will be ample opportunities in the next two years to translate our dormant beliefs into action.

The Farm Bill probably provides the best example of where we've gone wrong, and what we need to do to hew back to our first principles.

During the 1990s, then-Sen. Phil Gramm accurately described U.S. farm policy as "enough to make a Russian Commissar puke." The Republicans assembled the "Freedom to Farm Act," which, starting in 1996, put U.S. farmers on a glide path toward an end to subsidies. Somewhere between the field and the silo, however, we became mired in the political mud. In 2002, we repealed the Freedom to Farm Act and in its place installed the "Farm Security Act" -- those who value the adage about trading freedom for security can pause and shudder here -- with even more lavish subsidies.

Now, with reauthorization of the Farm Bill on the horizon next year, we have to decide whether we will up the ante with Democrats in terms of red state/blue state politics in the heartland, or whether we believe our own rhetoric about free markets.

DOJ_NMG_0093407

This debate will have implications larger than the fiscal one. Most notably, it will determine if we are serious about the future of free trade.

Of immediate concern to Republicans in the House of Representatives is deciding who will be our standard bearer. Can those who have been a part of the current leadership team convince the other members that they've had an epiphany? It's possible, I suppose. But I think we'd be best served with some fresh faces, congressmen like Mike Pence and John Shadegg, who haven't had to travel that road to Damascus.

Mr. Flake is a Republican representative from Arizona.

Bridge To Somewhere (WSJ)

A16

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

As they lick their wounds, Republicans are no doubt wondering what went wrong and what to do now. The answers aren't all that complicated: Revive the reform convictions that earned them power in the 1990s, and start that process in the House of Representatives by electing a new slate of leaders.

Twelve years ago, the Newt Gingrich-led Republicans swept into power as reformers who ran against corruption and pledged to make government "smaller and smarter." Somehow, across the years, that conviction was replaced by Tom DeLay and the quest for permanent incumbency, Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis and the "earmark" brigade, and a retinue of Beltway retainers symbolized by Jack Abramoff. The current leadership let it all happen, and if Republicans want a shot at regaining control in 2008 they'll turn to a new generation to lead them. * * *

If we had to pick the precise moment when House Republicans lost their way, it would be three years ago during the floor vote over the Medicare prescription drug bill. So unpopular was the bill among conservatives, and rightly so, that House leaders kept the vote open for an unheard of three hours as they dragooned reluctant Members to vote aye.

The other great symbol of GOP failure is the proliferation of earmarked spending. In 1994 there were 1,500 such projects stuffed into Democratic spending bills, and Republicans called this a fiscal disgrace. This year Republicans approved closer to 15,000 earmarks at a cost of more than $10 billion. The current leadership defended this earmarking even after such embarrassments as the Alaska Bridge to Nowhere were exposed. When they finally agreed to minimal transparency, it was too late.

Here's one telling exit poll result: In battleground districts, only one in five voters said Republicans would do a better job to "keep government spending under control"; almost twice as many voters said Democrats would do a better job. Yet this week a separate poll found that 59% of Americans still favor fewer government services and lower taxes compared with 28% who favor more government services and higher taxes. "Big government conservatism" was a nice think-tank proposition; it merely lacks support from actual voters.

As a minority party in Congress, Republicans must operate as the party of change, not of Washington insiders willing to sign away their principles for a courthouse or swimming pool in the home district. This doesn't mean they shouldn't work with Democrats when it makes policy sense. But they need to reclaim their fiscal conservative birthright.

Republicans also need to rediscover an agenda for reforming government programs that don't work or threaten to bankrupt future generations. The Gingrich Republicans did that with welfare reform in the 1990s, and they tried with Medicaid. Then President Bush gave Republicans a once-in-a-generation chance to reform Social Security and health care along free market lines, but GOP House leaders fought him behind the scenes. For this alone, they should be returned to the backbenches.

The Senate GOP also committed some of these sins, but likely Minority Leader Mitch McConnell isn't among the big offenders. He's made his mark on policy by fighting for free speech, among other things; he knows the intricacies of the Senate and is likely to prove formidable as an opposition leader.

The problem is the House, where Speaker Dennis Hastert has already announced he won't stand for minority leader. Others in the leadership are claiming to have learned their lesson and promise a new beginning. That's for Members to judge. But we'd be wary of leaders who stake their claim to power on their ability to soak the lobbying mecca of K Street, or who refused to challenge the Appropriators who did so much to besmirch the image of the current, and soon-to-vanish, GOP majority.

DOJ_NMG_0093408

Republicans might also recall what happened to Democrats when they tried to regain the House in 1996 by running with the same leadership and agenda that had been ousted in 1994. Those Democrats failed, despite Bill Clinton's victory at the top of the ticket, because too many voters saw the same old story. If Republicans lose again in 2008, they could be in the minority for a long time. * * *

The good news is that a younger generation does seem to be stepping forward. Mike Pence, of Indiana, has already declared for minority leader, and John Shadegg of Arizona is seeking the number two job as whip. Paul Ryan of Wisconsin, Jeb Hensarling of Texas and Jeff Flake of Arizona (see his essay nearby) are among the other Members who have tried to put ideas above mere incumbency. Republican Members will make up their own minds, but their willingness to consider new leadership will say a lot about the lessons they've learned from this week's drubbing.

Too many Republicans were corrupted and seduced by power and forgot why voters sent them to Washington. Winning back the majority requires new faces of leadership far removed from this year's debacle.

A Putsch At The DNC? (TNR)

By Ryan Lizza

The New Republic Online, November 10, 2006

Some big name Democrats want to oust DNC Chairman Howard Dean, arguing that his stubborn commitment to the 50-state strategy and his stinginess with funds for House races cost the Democrats several pickup opportunities.

The candidate being floated to replace Dean? Harold Ford.

Says James Carville, one of the anti-Deaniacs, "Suppose Harold Ford became chairman of the DNC? How much more money do you think we could raise? Just think of the difference it could make in one day. Now probably Harold Ford wants to stay in Tennessee. I just appointed myself his campaign manager."

Steele Still A Main Attraction (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow, Jon Ward

The Washington Times, November 11, 2006

Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele is being pulled in several directions -- to take over as the national leader of the Republican Party in two months, to take a Cabinet post in the Bush administration or to go into the private sector.

"No one from the White House or the Republican National Committee has formally offered me" the RNC chairmanship or a Cabinet post, Mr. Steele told The Washington Times yesterday.

Top national Republican leaders have told Mr. Steele they want him to succeed Ken Mehlman as RNC chairman in January and are discussing the move with White House chief political strategist Karl Rove.

Other top Republicans, including Mr. Rove, think Mr. Steele should be rewarded for what was widely regarded as his high-quality campaign for the U.S. Senate, even though black Marylanders remained loyal in numbers to the Democratic Party on Tuesday to elect Mr. Steele's white opponent, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin.

Mr. Steele, 48, sounded ready, even eager, to assume a post somewhere within the party, and to steer a GOP course distinguishable from the one that has disillusioned many voters in recent years.

"The GOP must return to efficient government, to appropriate spending priorities that are not out of line, that don't create deficits, that speak to a strong national defense without failing to understand the need for diplomacy, and the things that will keep this country strong," he said.

"My campaign opened up a lot of eyes about how we can be effective on the ground in urban communities and diverse communities across the country, and hopefully I'll have something to offer," Mr. Steele said.

Mr. Mehlman, as reported yesterday in The Washington Times, has decided to step down at the end of his two-year term when the RNC convenes its annual winter meeting in January in Washington.

Party campaign strategists and elected officials generally agree that Mr. Steele has the political experience, personality and campaign skills to continue a career in politics -- which is precisely what many in the Bush administration would like to see.

Spokesmen for the administration occasionally point out that President Bush has appointed more black, Hispanic and other minorities to top-level posts than any other president.

DOJ_NMG_0093409

Mr. Steele is said to be especially popular with the 165-member RNC -- made up of 50 state party chairmen and an elected committeeman and committeewoman from each state.

"I will be happy if he decides to run for national chairman," Florida Republican Chairwoman Carole Jean Jordan said. "I served with him on the [national] committee when he was the Maryland chairman. He's one of us."

He also appears to have unqualified support from top Republicans in his own state.

"Michael would be an excellent chair," said Joyce Lyons Terhes , an RNC member from Maryland. "He is admired and respected by the members of the committee who got to know him when he was chairman of the Maryland GOP."

Others were more reserved in their judgment.

"Steele was an excellent candidate in Maryland, and his experience from that race should be a tremendous asset to the party if he succeeds Ken Mehlman as chairman of the RNC," Texas RNC member Bill Crocker said. "However, I just don't know enough about his background and basic philosophy to know whether or not he would be the best choice to succeed Mehlman."

Mr. Crocker said the national chairmanship "is going to be critically important to the well-being of the Republican Party in the foreseeable future, and we need the very best we can put there."

Some backers of Mr. Steele fear that a two-year stint as RNC chairman and therefore chief defender of Mr. Bush and his polices will undermine his future in politics by tying him too closely to a president of uncertain popularity.

But as of now, Mr. Steele doesn't sound like a partisan pit bull defending the White House.

"This election was a show of a lack of confidence in the leadership and the direction of the party and the administration," he said. "I think that as a party we need to address that."

Mr. Steele is finishing up his first and only term in elected public office, though he had been an elected county and state party chairman.

He said he has "not heard from anyone" at the White House and has not entered any serious talks with the RNC.

"There has been no serious offer or anything put on the table," Mr. Steele said. "I have just for the last few days been enjoying being at home and actually getting reacquainted with the family."

Mr. Steele has one son in college and another about to enter college, and employment in the private sector might be an attractive financial option at this point, friends say.

Cabinet secretaries earn $183,500 year.

The RNC "chairman's salary equals what the speaker of the House makes, which is roughly $200,000 a year," RNC Communications Director Brian Jones said.

And Mr. Steele said he is not finished with politics.

"Losing is something that it strengthens me. I learn from it," he said. "It doesn't mean you won't win future races."

Corporate Donors Increased Their Support For Dems (USAT)

By Paul Davidson, Usa Today

USA Today, November 10, 2006

Big business hedges bets

Democrats won the most expensive midterm election in history with stronger financial support from big business.

Democratic congressional candidates amassed $616 million vs. $632.2 million for Republicans in the 2005-06 election cycle, according to figures through Oct. 18 from the Center for Responsive Politics.

Corporate donors traditionally favor Republican candidates. In the last midterm contest in 2002, Democrats raised $248.6 million vs. Republicans' $342.2 million.

While Democrats attracted money from longtime supporters, such as trial lawyers and labor unions, they also drew a greater share from industries that lean Republican, such as pharmaceuticals. Some businesses may have been hedging their bets as a Democratic victory appeared more likely late in the campaign.

“The reality is they have to play both sides,” says Sheila Krumholz, the center's acting director.

The total cost of the 2006 federal election was an estimated $2.8 billion, a 27% jump over 2002, the center says.

DOJ_NMG_0093410

Topping the list of Democratic donors was the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, which funneled 97% of its $2.2 million in contributions to Democrats. The union supports such Democratic-backed causes as raising the minimum wage.

The Association of Trial Lawyers of America kicked in $2.1 million, 95% to Democrats. The group is battling Republican efforts to limit big payouts in personal-injury cases.

"We're in favor of holding negligent actors accountable when their actions cause harm and injury," says Linda Lipsen, the group's senior vice president for public affairs.

Other big Democratic donors include the entertainment and publishing industries.

Media giant Time Warner channeled 71% of its $1.4 million in contributions to Democrats, the center says. The firm supports tougher digital copyright protections to prevent piracy.

The center's figures on top donors include political action committees and employees, such as top executives, and are based on government filings through summer.

Other Republican-leaning companies balanced out their giving. Wal-Mart Stores sent 31% of its $988,000 in donations to Democrats, up from 19% in the 2004 election. "We partner with elected officials from both sides of the aisle," says Wal-Mart's David Tovar. "We're finding doors are open to us across the political spectrum."

Wal-Mart is a strong supporter of free trade, an issue generally championed by Republicans.

Wall Street brokerages tilted more Democratic this year, giving 51% of their $48.2 million in political donations to Democratic candidates, up from 48% in 2004.

The industry favors extending lower capital gains taxes and bolstering retirement accounts.

Republicans Lose Ground Among Hispanic Voters (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely, Usa Today

USA Today, November 10, 2006

Democrats perceived as being on 'right side' of immigration issue

WASHINGTON — Republican gains among Hispanic voters evaporated in Tuesday's elections, and some party leaders are blaming harsh rhetoric on immigration for the reversal.

Cutting into the Democrats' traditional advantage among Hispanic voters was a key to both of President Bush's election victories. In 2004, when Bush was at the top of the ticket, 44% of Hispanics surveyed after they cast their ballots said they voted Republican. This year, the figure dropped to 29%.

The decline is significant because Hispanics are fast becoming a crucial voting bloc. Census figures show Hispanics make up at least 10% of the population in 11 of the 28 U.S. House districts that switched from Republican to Democratic hands on Tuesday.

Strategists from both parties say the vocal opposition of some Republicans to a proposed immigration bill that would give many of an estimated 12 million illegal immigrants a chance at citizenship drove Hispanics back to the Democratic camp.

"This time there is no doubt they felt Democrats were on the right side of the immigration issue," says Lionel Sosa, a Hispanic ad executive who has advised Republicans. One of the Democratic Party's top-ranking Hispanics, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, agrees. He says Bush's decision to bow to conservative pressure and sign legislation authorizing construction of 700 miles of fence along the U.S.-Mexican border "sent a terrible signal."

Bush backs citizenship for many of the people who are here illegally, as do a number of potential 2008 GOP presidential candidates, including Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Sam Brownback of Kansas. But House Republican leaders blocked a path to citizenship in the immigration bill and GOP conservatives such as Indiana's John Hostettler made their opposition a campaign issue. Some members of the party believe that backfired.

"There has been too much of an anti-immigrant tone," says Rep. Lincoln Diaz-Balart, R-Fla., a Cuban immigrant. He argues that Hispanics are "a natural" Republican constituency because they are entrepreneurial and socially conservative. But Diaz-Balart adds, "When people start to perceive that immigrants are being put in the same category as a threat to national security, it's hard to get your message across."

DOJ_NMG_0093411

In Hostettler's close race, the six-term congressman appeared with representatives of the Minutemen, a controversial citizens group that has been patrolling the border, and ran ads touting his opposition to "the nightmare of amnesty." In Arizona, Republican Randy Graf ran an advertisement showing a blond-haired child walking toward a slowly opening door as a voiceover delivered statistics about crime and other problems caused by the nation's "open door" border.

Both Hostettler and Graf lost, a point likely made by House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi when she talked to Bush Thursday. She asked for his help in passing a bipartisan immigration bill when she and fellow Democrats start running Congress in January. "Those candidates who ran largely on immigration did not succeed," she says.

Gabrielle Giffords, the Democrat who defeated Graf, also carried Cochise County, Ariz., along the U.S.-Mexican border where frustration with immigration is highest. Gifford says she believes voters there preferred her because "people want solutions, not slogans."

Immigration could be key in a House race still to be decided. In Texas, GOP incumbent Henry Bonilla is in a runoff with Democrat Ciro Rodriguez, a former lawmaker, in a district where more than half the population is Hispanic.

Bonilla is one of only two Hispanic lawmakers who backed a controversial House bill that would make it a crime to assist illegal immigrants. He says he's taking a get-tough approach to protect his border constituents from crime and illegal drug trafficking.

But Sosa, who lives in the district and describes himself as Bonilla's friend, worries that some Hispanic residents may misinterpret his stand. "I have told him that in my opinion he should soften his position," Sosa says.

He says the election results don't mean the GOP has lost the Hispanic vote. "It means Republicans need to have a much higher sensitivity about how Latinos feel about their worth and the worth of immigrants," he says.

For Latino Voters, Best Years Are Ahead (USAT)

Commentary By Marisa Treviño

USA Today, November 10, 2006

With another election completed, one has to wonder whether the much-hyped strength of the Latino vote is a reality or simply a spin on the classic fairy tale The Boy Who Cried Wolf.

Exit poll results from Tuesday's elections show an increase in Hispanic voting from 2002. Those results appear to confirm a pre-election report by the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials (NALEO), which predicted that Latinos would make up about 6% of the vote. That's at least one percentage point up from 2002, but hardly enough to get excited about.

A Pew Hispanic Center fact sheet titled "Hispanics and the 2006 Election" provides some interesting perspectives on why Hispanics might, in fact, be a powerful voting bloc that just hasn't yet arrived.

Hispanics eligible to vote are a smaller portion of the Hispanic population — as compared with other racial/ethnic groups — because many adults are not citizens, and many citizens haven't reached voting age. Only 39% of Hispanics are eligible to vote, according to the Pew study, compared with 77% of whites, 65% of blacks and 51% of Asian-Americans.

So are all the predictions of Latino voting clout to be dismissed? No. They're just premature. The coupling of Hispanic youth and technology just might change the equation. The U.S. Census reports that last year about a third of the Latino population was younger than 18. Couple that fact with a report by the Pew Internet & American Life Project that found English-speaking Hispanics use their cellphones to access the Internet and to text message in greater percentages than any other race or ethnicity.

Armed with this data, the non-partisan Voto Latino, which aims to increase Hispanic voter participation, has targeted young Latinos by entering their world of cellphone text messaging and online social networks, such as MySpace. A simple text message from an interested Hispanic youth, or anyone for that matter, prompts an immediate response on how to get a voter registration form. Voto Latino registered about 38,000 people from September to the end of October.

Maria Teresa Petersen, executive director of Voto Latino, says 50,000 Latinos turn 18 every month in the USA. Eighty-seven percent of them are eligible to vote. One can quickly see the potential in these numbers.

DOJ_NMG_0093412

Though Hispanics historically have had a poor civic participation rate, the immigration reform protests this year could be a sign of things to come. Exit polls this week showed that Hispanics voted heavily Democratic, in part because of the immigration debate.

The voices heard this past Tuesday will only grow louder in the years to come.

Marisa Treviño is a freelance writer in Dallas.

Immigration Losers (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

Republicans on Tuesday managed both to lose their majority in Congress and alienate a fast-growing bloc of Latino swing voters. Other than that, the House GOP strategy of trying to save itself by bucking President Bush and using immigration as a wedge issue worked pretty well.

Republicans can't say they weren't warned. Like trade protectionism, the immigration issue is the fool's gold of American politics. Voters like to sound off to pollsters about immigrants, yet they pull the lever with other matters foremost in mind. Elections seldom if ever turn on immigration, and the GOP restrictionist message so adored by talk radio, cable news and the nativist blogosphere once again failed to deliver the goods.

Worse, this time Republicans made "securing the border" a loud national theme, only to do nothing about it save for approving a 700-mile fence along a 1,951-mile Mexican-U.S. border. They thus managed to highlight either their fecklessness in failing to do something about an allegedly urgent problem, or their cynicism in raising it at all.

In Arizona, which is ground zero in the illegal alien debate, two Republicans defined by their opposition to immigration were defeated by wide margins. Representative J.D. Hayworth, who is so proud of his desire to turn the U.S. into a single gated community that he wrote a book about it, lost handily. So did Randy Graf, another anti-immigration absolutist who ran for an open seat in a district that borders Mexico and sees more illegal immigrant traffic than perhaps any other Congressional seat in the nation.

These Democratic gains came in solidly Republican districts that President Bush won easily two years ago. Mr. Graf was seeking to fill the slot now held by Representative Jim Kolbe, an 11-term Republican who's retiring. Mr. Kolbe is a supporter of the comprehensive approach to immigration reform favored by the President but spurned by GOP restrictionists. It would combine more border security with a guest-worker program for newcomers and a path to legal status for undocumented workers already here. Mr. Kolbe won 60% of the vote in 2004. Mr. Graf was trounced, 54%-42%, on Tuesday, after having won a primary against a Republican with views similar to Mr. Kolbe's who could have held the seat.

Indiana incumbent John Hostettler, who chairs a House subcommittee on immigration and is one of his party's most outspoken restrictionists, managed to win just 39% of the vote in his losing bid for a seventh term. Mr. Hostettler's district is so Republican that John Kerry won only 38% of the vote there in 2004.

Colorado Congressman Bob Beauprez made opposition to illegal aliens the centerpiece of his gubernatorial bid. He lost to his Democratic opponent by 15 percentage points. The GOP candidate who ran to replace Mr. Beauprez in the House and appropriated much of his anti-immigration rhetoric also lost by nearly as much.

GOP Senate candidates who thought immigration would put them over the top were disappointed as well. The issue didn't help the cause of challengers like Tom Kean in New Jersey and Mike McGavick in Washington state, both of whom tried to make illegal aliens an issue down the stretch but still lost to vulnerable Democratic incumbents. Nor was it the silver bullet for Pennsylvania's Rick Santorum, who fell 59%-41%. Senator Santorum spent the summer trying to link Mexican immigrants to the Iraq war. By the end of the campaign, he was accusing anyone who favored comprehensive immigration reform of being soft on terrorism.

In addition to losing seats, however, the GOP's restrictionist strategy has reversed significant gains among Latino voters. Exit polls show that 70% of Hispanics voted Democratic in House races this year. Meanwhile, some 29% voted Republican -- an eight-percentage-point drop from the 2002 midterm, and down 15 points from the 44% won by President Bush in 2004 (which had improved from 31% in 2000).

DOJ_NMG_0093413

The GOP has a long history of fumbling the immigrant issue. And Mr. Bush, a former border-state governor who knows the issue well, has wisely been trying to steer his party away from repeating those mistakes. Mr. Bush might yet save his party from losing generations of Latinos the way its xenophobic message in the early 20th century turned away Irish, Italian and Asian voters for decades. He told reporters this week that immigration is an area where "I believe we can find some common ground with the Democrats."

We hope his party lets him, having learned the hard way not to follow Lou Dobbs, Bill O'Reilly and the editors of National Review magazine down the garden path to defeat.

Recount Likely In Harris' House District (AP-Y)

By Phil Davis, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

The touch-screen voting machines Katherine Harris championed as secretary of state after the 2000 presidential recount may have botched this year's election to replace her in the U.S. House, and it's likely going to mean another Florida recount.

More than 18,000 Sarasota County voters who marked other races didn't have a vote register in the House race, a rate much higher than the rest of the district, elections results show.

Florida Secretary of State Sue Cobb sent a team to Sarasota County on Thursday to observe the expected recount and audit the county's touch-screen voting machines. The county's elections supervisor, Kathy Dent, had requested the team after one of the candidates reported complaints about voting machines malfunctioning.

Earlier, Dent defended her staff and the machines, arguing that the thousands of voters must have either overlooked the race — which was pushed to a second screen by a glut of minor U.S. Senate candidates on the ballot — or simply decided not to vote for either candidate in a race marked by mudslinging.

"My machines have recorded accurately for 40 elections," Dent said.

But she couldn't explain why the undervote rate in her county was so much higher than in the four other counties in the district.

Republican Vern Buchanan declared victory in the race with a 373-vote lead over Democrat Christine Jennings — less than 0.2 percent.

"Sarasota voters have been victimized by not having their votes count," Jennings said Wednesday.

Buchanan's campaign said a recount would confirm their candidate won.

"We want to ensure every vote is counted as well," Buchanan spokeswoman Sally Tibbetts said.

Florida law requires a machine recount if the difference between the top candidates is less than half a percent. If the machine tallies find a margin of less than a quarter percent, a manual recount is conducted.

To do a manual recount for touch-screens, officials go back over the images of the electronic ballots where the machine didn't register a choice. But state rules essentially say that if the machine doesn't show that a voter chose a candidate, the voter is assumed to have meant to skip the race — it would be tough to prove otherwise.

Final results must be certified by Nov. 20.

Harris, a congresswoman since 2002, ran for U.S. Senate this year but lost to incumbent Bill Nelson.

As secretary of state in 2001, Harris had pushed for an election overhaul that outlawed the punch-card ballots involved in the 2000 presidential race recount that made Harris a GOP star. The law now required counties to use touch-screen devices or optical scan machines that read paper ballots voters filled in.

Harris spokeswoman Jennifer Marks said Harris had no comment on the House race.

In Florida, Echoes Of 2000 As Vote Questions Emerge (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

SARASOTA, Fla., Nov. 9 — A Democrat who narrowly lost the Congressional race here is seeking a recount after dozens of people reported problems using Sarasota County's touch-screen voting machines and a significant number of ballots had no recorded votes in the high-profile race.

DOJ_NMG_0093414

The Democrat, Christine Jennings, lost to her Republican opponent, Vern Buchanan, by just 373 votes out of a total 237,861 cast — one of the closest House races in the nation. More than 18,000 voters in Sarasota County, or 13 percent of those who went to the polls Tuesday, did not seem to vote in the Congressional race when they cast ballots, a discrepancy that Kathy Dent, the county elections supervisor, said she could not explain.

In comparison, only 2 percent of voters in one neighboring county within the same House district and 5 percent in another skipped the Congressional race, according to The Herald-Tribune of Sarasota. And many of those who did not seem to cast a vote in the House race did vote in more obscure races, like for the hospital board.

More than 100 voters have told the Jennings campaign that their votes for her did not show up on the summary screen at the end of the touch-screen voting process, and that they had to re-enter them. The candidate's lawyers said they feared that not everyone had noticed the problem or realized that they could re-enter the vote.

"There is a spontaneous combustion of outcry in this county," said Kendall Coffey, a lawyer who was on Vice President Al Gore's legal team in the 2000 presidential recount and is now working for Ms. Jennings. "We are determined to do everything we can to make sure that every vote counts and everything we can to get to the bottom of this."

A recount will almost certainly be conducted because the vote was so close. State law requires machine recounts when the margin of victory is half a percentage point or less, and manual recounts when it is a quarter of a percentage point or less. But it is not clear that a recount can recover a vote that was never properly recorded.

The Florida Elections Canvassing Commission, which includes Gov. Jeb Bush and two other state officials, both Republicans, will meet Monday and decide whether to order a recount. Secretary of State Sue M. Cobb announced Wednesday that she would send a team to conduct an audit of the county's voting system.

Any recount results would be certified on Nov. 20, said Sterling Ivey, a spokesman for the Florida Department of State. In a manual recount of touch-screen voting results, Mr. Ivey said, canvassers try to determine whether voters who skipped making a selection in a certain race did so unintentionally.

But Rebecca Mercuri, a computer scientist and an expert on voting technology in Hamilton, N.J., who has been critical of electronic voting, said it would be impossible to figure out voter intent in a recount of touch-screen votes.

"If a vote is not recorded electronically inside the machine for whatever reason, there's no way to go back and recover it," Ms. Mercuri said. "Chances are that nothing's going to change, because those votes are gone."

A preliminary review by The Herald-Tribune found that if Ms. Jennings had won the same percentage of the 18,000 missing votes as she did among counted votes in Sarasota County, she would have won the race by about 600 votes instead of losing by 373.

Ms. Jennings, a banker, and Mr. Buchanan, a car dealer, ran a bitter and costly race to replace Representative Katherine Harris, who left her seat to run for Senate but lost by a landslide on Tuesday. Ms. Harris, a Republican, was Florida's secretary of state during the disputed 2000 presidential recount, supervising a balloting process widely considered flawed and certifying President Bush as the winner of Florida's electoral votes.

Mr. Buchanan declared victory early Wednesday and began preparing for his new job, but Ms. Jennings has refused to concede. She has not ruled out going to court, Mr. Coffey said, but she will first wait for a recount to be completed.

Some state officials, including Ms. Dent, the elections supervisor, theorized that many voters skipped the Congressional race because they were turned off by vitriolic campaigning. But Mr. Coffey said if that had been the case, other counties in the same Congressional district would have had similarly high "undervote" rates.

So many voters reported similar problems in the state's early voting period, Mr. Coffey said, that the Jennings campaign wrote a letter to Ms. Dent expressing concern. He said the results showed that an even larger portion of early voters — 20 percent of the total — did not vote in the Congressional race. By contrast, only 2 percent of voters using paper absentee ballots skipped the race, he said.

Mr. Coffey said Ms. Jennings wanted independent experts to come test the county's iVotronic voting machines, made by Election Systems and Software of Omaha. Ms. Dent did not return a call seeking comment on Wednesday.

"I don't think any of us would be satisfied with having the government do the verification," Mr. Coffey said, "because, honestly, the government appears to be part of the problem here."

DOJ_NMG_0093415

Mike Lasche, a boat captain here, said that when he voted his vote for Ms. Jennings did not show up on the final review screen until he cast it a second time.

"If I had not checked carefully I would have gone on without ever thinking about it," said Mr. Lasche, 50. "You have to wonder how many people it happened to and may not have even noticed it."

Voters Say Yes To Borrowing Billions For New Projects (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon, Usa Today

USA Today, November 10, 2006

Voters were in a borrowing mood this week.

State and local governments won approval for more than 88% of the $78.6 billion they asked to borrow in Tuesday's election, according to i-Deal, a New York company that tracked the results.

The money will be spent on schools, roads, sewers, fire stations and other projects.

California voters approved the biggest chunk of debt: $43 billion for five bond issues for roads, schools, flood control, parks and affordable housing.

"California is now leading the country in seriously addressing infrastructure needs, and we'll continue that," says Adam Mendelsohn, deputy chief of staff for Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger.

Big bond issues approved elsewhere:

•Wake County, N.C. Voters approved borrowing $970 million to build 17 schools, buy land for 13 others and improve another 100 buildings in the county, which includes Raleigh.

•Dallas. Voters approved borrowing $1.4 billion for parks, streets and libraries. The Cotton Bowl football stadium will get a $30 million renovation, and the local farmer's market will get a $6.6 million upgrade.

•The Hartford, Conn., area. Voters approved borrowing $800 million to start a massive sewer upgrade to stop untreated sewage from flowing into streets and rivers after heavy rains.

The biggest bond issue to fail: Los Angeles' proposal to borrow $1 billion to build affordable housing.

State and local governments now owe $1.9 trillion, up 8.2% from a year ago, the Federal Reserve Board says. By comparison, the federal debt is $4.9 trillion.

In the past 60 years, voters have approved 74% of the money requested in bond issues, according to Thomson Financial, a research firm. This year's rate will approach the record of 91.4% approval in 2004.

"States have the capacity to handle this debt. I'm not worried," says David Hitchcock, a credit analyst at the Standard & Poor's credit rating agency. He says governments, especially in the booming West, must build infrastructure to handle growing populations. Most bond issues are repaid from property taxes, and higher real estate values have made it possible to borrow more without raising tax rates, he says.

Issues driving voter approval:

•"The American people are clamoring for relief from traffic congestion," says Matt Jeanneret, senior vice president of the American Road and Transportation Builders Association.

•"People are weary of overcrowded schools," says Ed Davis, superintendent of schools in Union County, N.C. Voters there approved borrowing $174 million to build five schools.

Chris Edwards, director of tax policy at the libertarian Cato Institute, says he's surprised so many bond issues passed in a year of voter discontent. "Voters don't seem to understand that bonds are taxes," he says. "There's no such thing as a free lunch in economics."

Iowa Governor Declares For '08 (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

DES MOINES, Nov. 9 (AP) — Gov. Tom Vilsack began a long-shot bid for the White House on Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0093416

"Americans sent a clear message on Tuesday," Mr. Vilsack, a Democrat, said. "They want leaders who will take this country in a new direction. They want leaders who share their values, understand their needs and respect their intelligence. That's what I've done as governor of Iowa, and that's what I intend to do as president."

His announcement came two days after the midterm elections, which put Democrats in control of both the House and the Senate for the first time in a dozen years.

Mr. Vilsack, a two-term governor, filed documents with the Federal Election Commission in Washington to create a presidential campaign committee. His campaign started operating, with an office open and letterhead printed. His campaign Web site, tomvilsack08.com, was online by early Thursday.

He is the first Democrat to file for the presidency, although a number of better-known candidates are presumed to be running.

Although the favorite son in Iowa, Mr. Vilsack has trailed the other potential candidates in early polling, among them Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and John Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee and former senator from North Carolina.

Mr. Vilsack plans a multistate tour beginning Nov. 30 to announce his bid formally. The first stop will be his hometown, Mount Pleasant, where he served as mayor and which he represented in the Iowa Senate before being elected governor in 1998.

On the Republican side, Representative Duncan Hunter of California has announced the formation of an exploratory committee. About a dozen other candidates, including Senator John McCain of Arizona and Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, are weighing bids.

McCain Plans A Committee To Study '08 (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

Senator John McCain of Arizona is about to form an exploratory committee for a possible presidential campaign, advisers said, taking a concrete step toward a full-blown campaign in 2008.

Advisers to Mr. McCain said he had not made up his mind whether to run, although he has acknowledged that he is strongly considering doing so.

"There's not going to be a formal announcement this year," John Weaver, an adviser to Mr. McCain, said. The senator, who appears at or near the top of public opinion surveys about who should run for higher office, will wait until the Christmas holidays, when his children are home, to make a final decision, Mr. Weaver said.

"It's incorrect to characterize it as a formal decision or a final decision," he said.

Even so, the move is likely to speed up an already accelerated presidential race, in which candidates on both sides barely waited for the midterm elections to end before leaping ahead to the next campaign.

The sudden shift in power in Congress does not appear to have slowed the rush. On Thursday, Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa declared his intention to run; other Democrats, including Senators Barack Obama of Illinois and Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, have said they are thinking about it and have made trips to Iowa, the home of the first caucuses.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, widely considered the front-runner for the Democratic nomination, has been more coy about her intentions. Mrs. Clinton used her minimally contested Senate re-election campaign as an excuse to avoid questions about the presidency until last Tuesday; since her landslide victory she has said she is taking a break before addressing 2008.

But Mrs. Clinton has put together an imposing apparatus for a possible presidential bid and has more than $13 million left over from her nearly $38 million Senate campaign to roll into a national race. To spend that money on presidential activity, she would need to take the legal step of forming an exploratory committee along the lines of the one Mr. McCain is establishing.

Mrs. Clinton's advisers have said she is likely to make her intentions clear in December or January, although her financial advantage — particularly her expected ability to raise money down the road — gives her the option to wait until later.

Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, who is leaving office, and former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York, both Republicans, are also preparing for possible campaigns, although neither has taken any formal legal steps.

DOJ_NMG_0093417

Mr. McCain's advisers said he was moving forward with a committee — likely to be formed next week, and almost certainly by the end of the month — because he did not want to skirt regulations that forbid using money from his existing political action committee toward presidential costs, even preliminary ones like travel.

"He's preparing in case he does choose to run and gauging whether he has the support in order to make a successful run," Mr. Weaver said. "And in order to do that, we'll meet all legal requirements." He said that Mr. McCain had about $1 million in his Senate coffer, Friends of John McCain, which is transferable.

Election Doesn't Shutter Clinton Campaign Offices (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's re-election race may be over, but she is hardly closing up her campaign shop or worrying about deep debts.

Advisers to Mrs. Clinton say she has more than $10 million left in her political bank account, not to mention a priceless reservoir of speeches, issue research, and financial networks nationally for any future use.

Her advisers also say that she does not intend to disassemble her campaign apparatus and staff, as many candidates do when an election ends, nor does she plan to immediately close her New York City and Washington campaign offices.

Indeed, the Clinton camp has spent months building a re-election team that could easily shift into gear for a 2008 presidential bid. Fresh from her landslide victory, and with a fistful of I.O.U.'s from winning Democratic candidates nationally, Mrs. Clinton is comfortably positioned as she prepares to enter an important period of strategy talks, reading and reflection while deciding whether to run.

The millions left in her campaign account have helped fuel chatter about a presidential bid among supporters in the last few days because that money could be used for political activity if she chooses to run.

Also stirring talk about her presidential ambitions was a memo sent out on Wednesday by a senior Clinton lieutenant that highlights the senator's political gains on Tuesday in traditionally moderate and Republican areas of New York.

Mrs. Clinton is expected to make a decision on a presidential bid this winter, and there has been slightly more open discussion about 2008 between her inner circle and outer circle advisers in the last couple of weeks, members of both groups said this week. Still, some advisers and donors to Mrs. Clinton say that they do not see any urgency or signs about 2008 decision-making.

"She's so strongly positioned that she can set her own timetable for any decision she might make," said Alan Patricof, the finance chairman of her re-election campaign. "She hasn't asked anyone specifically to be at the ready; if and when she does that, it'll mean that she's in a mode to move forward."

Even if she does nothing in coming weeks, she still looms over the 2008 race: Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa even called her this week to give her a heads-up that he was planning to seek the Democratic presidential nomination, advisers to both of them said. Mr. Vilsack is a longtime admirer of Mrs. Clinton, his advisers said, and he is well aware that she has the standing and money to mount a formidable campaign.

Howard Wolfson, a Clinton adviser, said there were no specific plans for spending the rest of the campaign's money. He said he was not aware of any plans to dismantle the campaign staff, nor of plans to help other Democrats retire their election-year debts. At the same time, he did not rule out debt relief.

"Senator Clinton did everything she could to be as helpful as possible to candidates in the last cycle, and I'm sure if there are other things she can do to be helpful in the future, she will be," Mr. Wolfson said.

At least one of Senator Clinton's possible rivals in 2008, should she win the Democratic nomination, is already taking steps in that direction. Former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, who campaigned for more than 35 candidates this year, is looking into the campaign debts of Republicans and expects to help some candidates retire debt, according to his spokeswoman, Sunny Mindel.

DOJ_NMG_0093418

Mr. Giuliani is also making his first postelection foray to a presidential swing state, Pennsylvania, on Sunday, where he will give a speech on leadership, hold a brief news conference, and dine privately with a group of young entrepreneurs, according to organizers of the event at Wilkes University.

Advisers to Mr. Giuliani said they did not expect him to announce a candidacy for the presidency during the visit, noting that it had been on his schedule for many weeks.

Clinton advisers said she had no major political travel plans or speeches in the near future. Democratic strategists with ties to the Clinton camp say the next several weeks will be a particularly sensitive time for potential candidates like Mrs. Clinton on issues like Iraq, because their fellow Democrats in the House and Senate are assembling a governing agenda and message.

For now, at least, the Clinton team has been focused on assessing the victory in New York, drawing lessons from it and thanking supporters, as Mrs. Clinton did during a statewide tour on Wednesday.

Patti Solis Doyle, a chief campaign aide and longtime adviser to Mrs. Clinton, sent e-mail messages to supporters on Wednesday to note political high points of her victory: She won 61 percent of the vote upstate, compared with 48 percent in her 2000 race, and she won 64 percent of independent voters, up from 46 percent in 2000.

"Even as she campaigned for her own re-election, Hillary headlined 131 events in 57 different cities on behalf of other Democrats," Ms. Solis Doyle wrote, underscoring Senator Clinton's national profile as well.

"President Clinton had made 97 campaign stops by last weekend, and has probably done another 10 since then."

The fact that Mrs. Clinton drew only slightly fewer votes than Eliot Spitzer, the successful Democratic candidate for governor, also drew her advisers' attention. A criticism that has been made of Mrs. Clinton is that she is a polarizing figure, certainly more than Mr. Spitzer, who is broadly popular. Yet she won 67 percent of the vote compared with his 69 percent.

"That's a very, very strong indicator of how Hillary can sell herself to voters, in New York and nationally," said one Clinton adviser, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not permitted to discuss 2008. "She's within two points of Eliot — the most popular guy in state politics — yet you would've thought that more people would be gunning for her than for Eliot. Yet she convinced people to be with her."

The '08 Race For The White House Begins (CQ)

By Craig Crawford

CQ Weekly, November 11, 2006

The coming presidential campaign will be the most wide open in eight decades. The future of a war is at stake. There is the potential to elect the first woman, the first African-American — or even, possibly, the first African-American woman.

To most of the political world, the 2008 presidential campaign will be considered under way this week. But, in fact, activity on the hustings in the battleground states, those with the early nominating contests, began within weeks of the day George W. Bush was re-elected in 2004.

In the wake of this week's elections, the margins of control are so narrow that establishing a firm rule over the nation's direction will not be feasible until the 44th president of the United States is elected on Nov. 4, 2008.

If Tuesday's elections were the midterms, consider 2008 the final exam. And what a brutal test it should be.

By definition, any presidential election makes history. But this one is shaping up as the biggest, baddest, meanest and, quite possibly, the most historic race for the White House in at least a generation.

With Vice President Dick Cheney unambiguously ruling out a bid, the stage is set for an epic battle without an official heir apparent on either the Democratic or Republican side.

"It's the first cycle since 1928 with no incumbent president or vice president running for the White House," said University of Virginia political science professor Larry J. Sabato. "As a result, we are seeing the earliest campaigning ever, by the most candidates in both parties."

The 2008 contest began so early that we already have a dropout. Last month, former Gov. Mark W. Warner of Virginia said he would not be running after making several forays into Iowa, New Hampshire and other early-voting or big-money states — and earning standing among the pundits as a member of the emerging Democratic field's top tier.

DOJ_NMG_0093419

In Iowa, site of the first nominating test, more than two dozen potential presidential contenders from both political parties—including 10 percent of the current governors and 12 percent of the current Senate—have already racked up more than 100 campaign trips there since the last election. And the pace is picking up in early-primary states such as New Hampshire and South Carolina.

Many of the White House hopefuls set up their federal exploration committees long ago. As a group, they have already raised a cash total that is now climbing above the tens-of-millions range. Permanent staffs have been hired. Direct-mail campaigns are under way. Consultants have designed logos, tested slogans and even made bumper stickers.

Civilians not accustomed to the guerrilla warfare of a presidential campaign might well think it is amazingly early for so many candidates to be so active. Not so. To win the biggest political prize on Earth, it pays to start now. Indeed, those who have not at least begun testing the waters by now might already be too late — so much of the big money and so many of the smart campaign people having already been spoken for.

Lining up top-shelf strategists and policy experts almost becomes a primary campaign unto itself at this early stage.

Hillary Rodham Clinton is set to inherit the bulk of her husband's constellation of political stars, James Carville first among them. And John Edwards has won the services of a top rural strategist, Dave "Mudcat" Saunders. But many of the major Democratic operatives, while quietly placing their bets on potential candidates, are hedging those bets until Clinton makes a final decision on whether to run.

On the Republican side, John McCain is mainly sticking with the team he assembled for his run in 2000 and has added some interesting names on the policy front, among them former Clinton administration drug czar Barry McCaffrey. Mitt Romney, though, scored a coup in signing on Mike Murphy, who was McCain's top adviser last time. George Allen attracted the services of GOP super-nova Mary Matalin and former Republican Party Chairman Ed Gillespie.

But nobody has won the biggest prize of all in this subcampaign — the ear of Karl Rove, the president's longtime political Svengali, who has painstakingly avoided even hinting at who he might help, or even whether he will join the fray at all. No Exaggeration

Would-be presidents are scrambling to the field so soon thanks to a genuine power vacuum in both political parties. For once, it is not hyperbole to call an election one of the most important ever, as politicians tend to say every four years — especially when it's their moment to make history.

Republicans must debate what to do after the Age of Bush, a period that featured two decades of party rule by a single family — George W. Bush's two presidential terms following the four years that his father, George Bush, spent as president starting in 1989.

A threshold question for Republicans in their nomination struggle will test the fate of social conservatism's influence. President Bush built a victorious coalition squarely founded upon the support of evangelical Christians, who are one of the most effective grass-roots players in the history of American politics. But their intensely conservative social agenda disturbs enough Americans that many Republicans, including some of the major 2008 contenders, are eager to make this next campaign about moving the GOP toward the center.

Much will depend on who among the Republicans will claim the mantle of social conservatives' darling, which the president himself will be shedding, and whether that person will possess Bush's skill at leveraging the religious base without narrowing his appeal to the rest of the electorate.

On economics, Bush has struggled to bridge a widening gap between Wall Street and Main Street, and the next nominee will be pressed to manage that rift. This tension was at the root of the roiling Republican debate over immigration, for instance. Big business, with Bush at its side, pushed GOP congressional leaders for changes aimed at legalizing the status of millions of immigrants. But rank-and-file Republicans balked in a fury, scuttling the Bush initiative.

The officially leaderless Democrats, for their part, will be in search of someone who can pull the party's varied factions together into a winning coalition — a task that even this week's sweeping victory might not come close to accomplishing.

Trickiest for the crop of Democrats running for president will be how to win over the legions of party activists who want to immediately withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq. It will be tempting for candidates to get on the good side of these voters, who are likely to dominate the primary balloting, but the obvious risk is being tagged by Republicans as weak on national security, a brand that has hobbled the party more often than not since Vietnam.

DOJ_NMG_0093420

Of course, the best-case scenario for both party's candidates would be for the Iraq War to become a non-issue in the 104 weeks before Election Day 2008. But even if the Bush administration some day does begin significantly reducing troop levels, it seems a remote possibility that Iraq will not remain a national headache in two years.

The stakes for the country in the next election are as high as they are for the political parties. Polls show that voters are disgusted with the country's direction. With two years of bitterly divided government ahead of them, the voters are likely to be even unhappier when they choose the next president.

Look for the White House race to echo much of what was heard in the midterm elections, a tug of war between stay the course or time for a change. Republicans must offer some change, while making the case for keeping the status quo of a GOP-held White House. Democrats must argue for change, but without scaring people.

They have 14 months until the votes are counted in the living rooms, cafes and schoolhouses of Iowa. And then at least two people, one Republican and one Democrat, will start moving toward a place in history. They will probably come from the roster of people, a baker's dozen from each party, whose current strengths and weakness — political, ideological and financial — are sketched in alphabetical order below. The Democrats

Evan Bayh — Junior Senator, Indiana

Rationale: A red-state darling and the son of another Democratic senator from Indiana — Birch Bayh, who sought the presidency in 1976 — this telegenic graduate of Washington's prestigious St. Albans School is a proven vote-getter in his home state, winning two terms as governor (he served from 1989 through 1996) of a state that Democrats have not carried in a presidential campaign since the Johnson landslide of 1964. A dedicated centrist and a senator since 1999, he served from 2001 to 2005 as chairman of the Democratic Leadership Council, the middle-of-the-road policy group once headed by Bill Clinton and Joseph I. Lieberman. In a blitz of campaigning for Democratic congressional candidates in 25 states this year, he has aggressively positioned himself as a Washington outsider, telling stump audiences, "The gulf between our nation's capital and the people of our country has never been greater."

Resources: With more than $10 million in his account, Bayh should have no trouble meeting the cover charge to run a credible nomination campaign. His home state's relative proximity to all-important Iowa will help him muster a network of grass-roots activists. His frequent trips to Iowa and New Hampshire in the past year have attracted local media interest and favorable comments. And his movie-star looks helped make an instant hit of his profile on the popular Facebook.com, drawing more than 2,000 "friends" to sign up.

Hobby Horse: Stressing fiscal responsibility, lower taxes, job creation and lean government, this is one Democrat who hopes to dodge the liberal label so often pinned on his party brethren in national campaigns. His Capitol Hill voting record shows that, until recently, he sided with President Bush on key issues more often than not.

Hobble Horse: Coming across as a mild- mannered Midwestern deacon is not what presidential campaign audiences expect — and in Washington, he is viewed as an intellectual lightweight. To compensate, Bayh asks Democrats, "Do we want to vent, or do we want to govern?" He might find that primary voters prefer venting.

Back to top

Joseph R. Biden Jr. — Senior Senator, Delaware

Rationale: A Democrat who talks the way many people talk, Biden's vernacular style is frequently on display in his many appearances on radio and television news shows, such as his regular gigs with syndicated host Don Imus. Despite spending more than half of his life in the Senate, the world's most elite political club — he arrived in 1973, when he was 30 — he seems to have a genuine instinct for middle-class sensibilities. Before the Iraq War, most Americans knew him from a series of bruising Judiciary Committee battles for Supreme Court nominations as he delighted liberals with his ferocious assaults on Republican presidents' choices. In past years his seat on the Foreign Relations Committee afforded him the chance to travel frequently to Iraq and stand out as one of the most vocal critics of the Bush administration's handling of Iraq.

Resources: Biden never has faced genuinely difficult re-election races in Delaware, a small state where he has not needed to develop a large financial donor base — at least by presidential campaign standards. This has left him chronically unable to raise enough money to match his White House ambition, which manifested itself in a short-lived run in 1988 and dalliances almost ever since. Still, his popularity with broadcast news producers and personalities gives him a tool for reaching voters that most rivals envy.

DOJ_NMG_0093421

Hobby Horse: Despite voting for the 2002 resolution authorizing the Iraq War, Biden dissects the war's subsequent troubles with relentless passion and a knack for explaining his views in ways that average folks can grasp. And he takes great delight in pointing out that recent White House policy adjustments track his own longstanding suggestions.

Hobble Horse: If Biden could raise big bucks he would have been a serious contender in any of the last several presidential campaigns. And despite his average-Joe demeanor in public, his 33 years in the Senate — along with his reputation as the very model of a long-winded lawmaker — tag him as a creature of Washington. So, too, would the target-rich database of thousands of roll call votes from which opponents could cherry-pick.

Back to top

Wesley K. Clark — Retired General

Rationale: In an era of national security concerns that could last a generation, a retired four-star general who has been around the presidential-campaign block should be a most attractive commodity. Now a contributor to the conservative-leaning Fox News Channel, Clark has the opportunity to develop general- election appeal by reaching many voters who distrust the Democrats. Although unsuccessful in what experts deemed a disorganized 2004 bid for the Democratic nomination, he performed well enough to earn the undying loyalty of moderate voters attracted to his background as West Point graduate, wounded Vietnam veteran and NATO commander during the Kosovo conflict. Having run before and established modest political credentials, Clark — lacking experience as an elected official — might not be at as much of a disadvantage in a second run.

Resources: Raising $30 million in his first outing on the presidential field was not too shabby, but so far Clark has not begun to put together a serious war chest. Since most of his 2004 campaign funds came from individual donors, thanks to an effective Internet program, it is likely that he could raise plenty of start-up cash quickly if he decides to run again. But the major-league Democratic donors have shied away from him so far.

Hobby Horse: As the only potential contender in either party with such a distinguished military résumé, Clark commands attention as long as voters rate the war in Iraq as a top concern. His experience in handling the Kosovo conflict and helping negotiate the Bosnia peace accord give him unrivaled credibility.

Hobble Horse: Although Clark's lack of experience holding elective office is a plus to some voters, it is likely to remain a hindrance in the eyes of media and political elites. And he has not effectively used his time since the last campaign to shore up his credentials on the domestic front.

Back to top

Hillary Rodham Clinton — Junior Senator, New York; former First Lady

Rationale: Having evolved from Goldwater girl to first lady to player on the mighty Senate Armed Services Committee, Clinton is better known and more road-tested than any of her rivals and is by far the most politically viable woman ever to ponder the presidency. She is hugging the ideological center to shed the liberal, big-government image she acquired in a failed attempt during her husband's presidency to radically change the nation's health care system. But now she is tacking rightward, backing federal legislation against flag burning, refusing to recant her vote in 2002 to authorize the Iraq War — even sounding a distinctly centrist tone on abortion. And she seldom misses an opportunity to emphasize her conservative Republican roots growing up in the Chicago suburbs. A recent HBO documentary about Barry Goldwater prominently featured pictures of her as one of his teen supporters along with interviews of her warmly praising the father of modern conservatism.

Resources: Insiders say she will tap former Democratic National Committee Chairman Terry McAuliffe, a longtime Bill Clinton fundraiser, to oversee a nomination campaign with a donor budget expected to at least double the record-shattering $100 million that George W. Bush stockpiled in 2000. She has surprised observers by spending so much on her shoo-in second term Senate campaign, however, which means that she will not have as much left over for a presidential bid as she could have — and has fueled speculation that she might not actually run.

DOJ_NMG_0093422

Hobby Horse: Clinton is a passionate policy wonk with a think tank to prove it. Founded three years ago as a refuge for Clinton administration alumni, the Center for American Progress has become an emerging force within the Democratic Party, sometimes outdoing the party's congressional leaders in taking on the Bush administration.

Hobble Horse: A stilted and sometimes boring performer on the stump, she pales in comparison with her husband when it comes to rewing up crowds. And she seems cozier with the many Hollywood stars who are flocking to her cause than with the average folks she most needs to win over.

Back to top

Tom Daschle — former Senate Majority Leader, South Dakota

Rationale: Call it buyer's remorse, the notion that a nation once so high on George W. Bush might possibly embrace the man who led the Senate Democrats for a decade but lost his bid for a fourth term in South Dakota in 2004 after going toe-to-toe with the White House throughout the president's first term. Now that Bush is at rock bottom with voters, perhaps they would see Daschle's partisan warring — once so successfully targeted as "obstructionist" by the Republicans — as a badge of honor worth a belated reward. Grass-roots Democrats especially might be receptive to repaying a debt to Daschle. And with the pivotal state of Iowa neighboring his home state, he has a chance to play a role akin to that of the martyred favorite son in the first nominating contest of 2008.

Resources: As Democratic leader, Daschle was able to raise $20 million for his 2004 race back home, or $51 on every vote cast. Building the even more substantial war chest required for a presidential campaign could be an uphill struggle without the platform of an influential Capitol Hill post to help attract donors. Despite launching a new political action committee last year and testing the waters with trips to Iowa and New Hampshire last summer, Daschle has not revved up his fundraising sufficiently to convince skeptics that he can get his groove back on the cash front.

Hobby Horse: Daschle can argue that he was out front against Bush when it was hard, when the president was rated so high in the polls that many Democrats ran for the hills. And from his perch at the Washington lobby shop of Alston & Bird LLP, he has an opportunity to maintain access to party fundraisers who favored him in those heady days as a Senate leader.

Hobble Horse: Having pulled out of an expected presidential race last time, when he was at the height of his influence, Daschle could easily be written off as a has-been and a loser. Although a recent stint debating former GOP House Speaker Newt Gingrich in California earned them both points for across-the-aisle creativity, it seemed to make both men look very retro.

Back to top

Christopher J. Dodd — Senior Senator, Connecticut

Rationale: In an era when liberal Democratic partisans see the party's move to the ideological middle of the road as caving in to conservatives, Dodd is the true-blue alternative to centrism. Although he voted in favor of authorizing the war in Iraq, Dodd's liberal credentials are solid. He has a 91 percent support rating from the AFL-CIO and sided with President Bush only one-third of the time on the Senate floor last year. Dodd is a popular speaker in Democratic circles, easy-going and humorous even while hurling verbal spears at the opposing party. Within his robust résumé as a senator since 1981 — and as chairman of the Democratic National Committee from 1995 until 1997 — Dodd has the tools to bolster his case.

Resources: Dodd has raised more than $1 million to fund contributions to Democratic campaigns in the midterm election, but it will take much more to seriously get into the presidential game. Corporate givers are not fond of his longstanding opposition to their pet projects, such as restricting shareholder and class action lawsuits. Still, his home state is home to many wealthy givers, and his politics should appeal to the Hollywood money crowd.

Hobby Horse: Although he's a liberal, he is a pragmatist known for cutting deals at the last minute to shape legislation that he opposes more to his liking. In 2005, for instance, he gave in to Republicans on a bill to restrict class action lawsuits after winning concessions from them.

Hobble Horse: Another New England liberal might not be the ticket Democrats are looking for after walking the plank in 2004 with John Kerry of Massachusetts. And Republicans in Florida would have a field day with his strong support for opening up relations with Cuban dictator Fidel Castro.

Back to top

John Edwards — former senator, North Carolina; 2004 vice-presidential nominee

DOJ_NMG_0093423

Rationale: As one of the few political figures on the national stage who routinely talks about fighting poverty, Edwards was a natural for the debate on helping the impoverished citizens of the Gulf states after Hurricane Katrina hit a year ago. His come-from-nothing personal story — the first in his family to go to college, he became a multimillionaire personal-injury trial lawyer before his election to the Senate from North Carolina in 1998 — makes him the genuine article when it comes to appealing to the middle class. One of the most popular speakers on the Democratic chicken-dinner circuit, Edwards is keeping a high profile outside Washington. He impressed Beltway insiders weary with Democratic waffling on the Iraq War when he wrote a Washington Post op-ed last year plainly stating that he was wrong to vote for authorizing the war while in the Senate.

Resources: Edwards raised $2.5 million for his One America Committee in the 2006 election cycle, funding a full-time staff and other expenses for one of the most aggressive PACs of the presidential wannabes. As happened at the outset of his 2004 run for the Democratic nomination, his seed money — nearly $1 million — comes from lawyers, presumably drawn to Edwards' own background. Broadening that donor base will be a major objective for him.

Hobby Horse: Edwards is all but living in Iowa, where a poll last June showed him in first place, ahead of Hillary Rodham Clinton. Iowa insiders say he has natural appeal in the state — the Des Moines Register endorsed him in 2004 — and might have won the presidential caucus if he had maintained a stronger grass-roots organization.

Hobble Horse: Washington's political insiders tend to dismiss Edwards as a poor performer on the 2004 national ticket who came across as a lightweight in the debate with Vice President Dick Cheney and could not even help carry his home state of North Carolina.

Back to top

Russ Feingold — Junior Senator, Wisconsin

Rationale: The ultimate insider-acting-like-an-outsider, Feingold often breaks ranks with his party and sometimes the entire Senate. The campaign finance overhaul enacted in 2002 over the objections of the leadership in both parties is known as the McCain-Feingold law. Perhaps the most uncompromising liberal in the Senate, Feingold's name appears as the only dissenter in the occasional Senate roll call. His lone-ranger status forever endeared him to civil libertarians in 2001, when he cast the single vote in the Senate against the counter-terrorism law dubbed the Patriot Act — and did so just six weeks after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. More recently, party leaders refused to even seek a vote on his resolution to censure Bush for ordering "warrantless" surveillance.

Resources: Even Democratic Party insiders grumble that Feingold goes too far in spurning the campaign finance system by refusing to accept most forms of outside money, even before McCain-Feingold took effect. Still, he has managed to raise more than $2 million for his presidential exploration fund, most of it from individual donors. The law he helped write could level the playing field to his advantage, as rivals must play by the rules he set.

Hobby Horse: No one in the presidential field for both parties has a better track record for advocating clean government, even when his stands irritate his own party's leaders. Voters cynical about corruption in Washington should find him to be a refreshing exception and tireless champion.

Hobble Horse: Feingold's social liberalism — he opposes the death penalty and supports gay marriage — delights his loyal followers, but it could be a devastating target in a general election and severely limit his reach into middle America. He didn't help matters by once referring to Greenville, Ala., as a place of "check-cashing stores and abject trailer parks."

Back to top

Al Gore — former Vice President; 2000 presidential nominee

Rationale: Revenge-minded Democrats could have a champion in Gore if they want a do-over of the 2000 presidential election, which many believe he actually won. After wandering in the wilderness after that bitter loss, Gore re-emerged to popular acclaim as George W. Bush was tanking in the polls. It is tough to discount his claims that the United States would not be mired in Iraq if he had become president. And he restored some of the old luster by starring in a critically acclaimed film, "An Inconvenient Truth," alerting audiences to the dangers of global warming. While once rejecting any notion of another race, Gore has recently cracked the door open a bit. Party insiders believe that he will definitely run if Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton opts out.

Resources: Gone are the heady days when Gore, as the two-term incumbent vice president under Bill Clinton, raised well above $100 million for his second presidential campaign. (He first ran in 1988, the year he turned 40, when he was a freshman senator from Tennessee.) Four years ago, when he toyed with another try, many of his financial backers abandoned him, a major factor in his final decision to sit out the 2004 campaign. If Gore joined the 2008 field, associates say he would shun the big bucks — out of necessity — and try to make it an asset by running as an outsider.

DOJ_NMG_0093424

Hobby Horse: Global warming and the environment enthuse Gore like no other topic, although some observers note that he failed to make those issues much of a priority while he was vice president. On the Iraq War, he parted with Bush and most congressional Democrats in vehemently opposing the invasion early on.

Hobble Horse: Endorsing Howard Dean for president in 2003 was a sign to some Democratic insiders that Gore had simply lost his way, reducing his appeal to the party's fringe elements. And his global warming obsession is not viewed as a big enough platform to revive a presidential bid.

Back to top

John Kerry — Junior Senator, Massachusetts; 2004 presidential nominee

Rationale: The preferences of a few counties in southern Ohio cost Kerry the electoral votes that would have made him president last time. Since he came so close against an incumbent, he could put it over the top in a race for an open seat in the White House — especially considering that, since the 2004 election, the country has turned against Bush on the war in Iraq. Battle-worn from that race, the 22-year senator from Massachusetts says he has learned crucial lessons in how to run against Republicans. Primarily, he vows to fiercely defend attacks, evidenced by his initial refusal to apologize last week when Bush assailed him for joking that young Americans must get educated or "get stuck in Iraq." Instead, Kerry counterattacked, calling the president's aides hacks who are "willing to lie." He apologized for the gaffe the next day.

Resources: Money is the least of Kerry's problems. He raised nearly $350 million for his last presidential campaign and nearly $6 million in the 2006 cycle for his political action committee, Keeping America's Promise. His personal wealth, mostly from the fortune of his wife, Teresa Heinz Kerry, came in handy in his first national run, when he infused his Iowa caucus campaign with his family money in the final days and eked out a win that propelled him toward the nomination.

Hobby Horse: Kerry has determinedly used his Senate platform to extend his campaign against President Bush and fuel another presidential bid. He turned much of his 2004 campaign policy agenda into a legislative agenda. Just a few weeks after that election, for instance, he retooled his campaign health proposals into the first bill that he introduced.

Hobble Horse: Last week's imbroglio over what Kerry himself termed a "botched joke" — which, to many, appeared to suggest that American soldiers are uneducated — was yet another reminder to Democrats of how clumsy he can be on the stump. It forced him off the campaign trail as fearful Democratic candidates canceled his appearances.

Back to top

Barack Obama — Junior Senator, Illinois

Rationale: Right now he holds one of the hottest cards in American politics, his initial flirtation with a 2008 campaign generating so much enthusiasm that media pundits have labeled the nation beset with "Obama fever." With his deep baritone voice and Lincolnesque physicality, he has Oprah Winfrey swooning and Democrats cheering, attracting massive audiences on a White House exploration itinerary thinly disguised as a book tour. Although Obama once flatly ruled out a presidential bid so early into his first Senate term, on NBC's "Meet the Press" last month he acknowledged that he could well change his mind. On paper it would seem much too early in his career for such a run, but when you are holding such hot cards it is tempting to play them.

Resources: Anyone who can stir the waves as he has done usually finds that the money flows in. He raised $15 million for what was a cakewalk 2004 Senate campaign and more than $4 million this year for a federal political action committee that presumably would become his presidential exploration fund. Obama's biggest PAC contributors come from organized labor, and it seems he delivers, already earning a 100 percent support rating from the AFL-CIO for his Senate votes.

Hobby Horse: Obama has captivated the imagination of baby boomers in an ironic way, by arguing in his new book, "The Audacity of Hope," that it is time for American politics to move beyond them and the polarizing issues of their growing-up years in the 1960s. His forward-looking message clearly resonates with many Americans.

Hobble Horse: Although many political experts say the country would be open to electing an African-American president (his father is from Kenya, his mother is a white woman from Kansas), it would be a racial gamble for the Democratic Party to nominate only the third black senator since Reconstruction. And his far-from-ripe career on the national stage, while evoking memories of a youthful Jack Kennedy, is bound to give pause among some voters.

DOJ_NMG_0093425

Back to top

Bill Richardson — Governor, New Mexico

Rationale: For starters, ethnicity and geography argue in favor of Richardson, a Latino governor in a battleground state that backed Al Gore in 2000 but George W. Bush in 2004. Add to that his varied Washington experience — 14 years in the House plus four years in the Clinton administration, first as U.N. ambassador and then as Energy secretary — and on paper you have the ingredients for national office. Richardson is a larger-than-life character who is charming on the stump. On policy matters, he is a pragmatist who remains quite popular in his politically fluid state, recently winning kudos for making good on a 2003 campaign promise to save taxpayers $90 million in state budget costs. Governors do well in presidential contests, which is enough of a reason to consider Richardson a player.

Resources: Richardson raised more than $8 million for his bid for a second term as governor this year, a sizable sum in New Mexico politics. And his shoo-in standing in that race has allowed him to spread his money around to other Democrats in the state, always good for earning chits to solidify his home-state base in a presidential campaign. Also, the bulk of his campaign funds come from business interests instead of big labor, a good talking point for any Democrat in a general-election bid.

Hobby Horse: Richardson earned foreign- policy credentials as the ambassador to the United Nations, troubleshooting hot spots from Iraq to North Korea, and he also can emphasize his popular management of New Mexico and tout what is expected to be a lopsided re-election victory.

Hobble Horse: Richardson's closet is not entirely clean. At a minimum, a presidential bid will again bring to light his brush with the Monica Lewinsky scandal, in which he reportedly offered her a job, and revelations that for years he erroneously claimed to have been drafted as a pitcher by the Kansas City A's.

Back to top

Tom Vilsack — Governor, Iowa

Rationale: Vilsack's hopes are pinned to a four-letter word: Iowa. As the outgoing governor of the state that has the first presidential nominating contest, he owns the place. Democrats take note that he was the state's first governor from their party in 32 years. In recent years he has worked hard to broaden his portfolio with a heartland-focused message assailing Washington's pork barrel spending and arguing for an end to what he derides as corporate giveaways in federal budget and tax policies. He has a strong working knowledge of economics and knows how to appeal to middle class pocketbook worries. His wife, Christie, is a talented politician in her own right and was instrumental in helping John Kerry win the Iowa caucus last time.

Resources: Vilsack raised more than $6 million for his successful 2002 re-election bid, with contributions from business groups edging out labor donors. He has raised a bit more than $2 million for his current political action committee but would need much more to convince party bosses that he can move into the major leagues of fundraising.

Hobby Horse: As one of a handful of governors in the race from either party, Vilsack is well-positioned to run against Washington at a time when voters seem disgusted by corruption in the nation's capital. And he intends to make his views of the excesses of federal spending one of his primary targets in a presidential campaign.

Hobble Horse: Another Iowan, Sen. Tom Harkin, demonstrated in his 1992 presidential bid that being a favorite son might be enough to win the state's nominating caucus, but it was much discounted by the national media and proved not to be anything close to a momentum generator for the New Hampshire primary.

Back to top The Republicans

George Allen — Junior Senator, Virginia*

Rationale: A Ronald Reagan conservative with George W. Bush's down-home style, Allen has deep appeal to those social conservatives who dominate Republican presidential nominating contests. His background as Virginia governor and a solid conservative voting record during his term in the Senate present a powerful résumé. A year ago, Allen was seen as a top prospect to inherit the conservative chair in GOP circles. But a bruising re-election bid this year against Democrat Jim Webb has seeded ample doubt. Still, his troubles could be a blessing if he wins a second term. Despite his gaffes on the campaign trail and charges of racism in his past, Allen always could argue that these matters have now been vetted fully and dodge further discussion in a presidential run. All bets are off, of course, with Allen's loss this week.

DOJ_NMG_0093426

Resources: There once was no doubt that Allen, a fundraising machine, could fund a credible presidential campaign — until his Senate re-election campaign foibles surfaced. Raising almost $14 million for his current race, much of it from outside Virginia, Allen had hoped to save a chunk of the money as seed funds for a White House run. But, instead, he has had to shovel the bulk of it into television ads in a last-minute effort to save his seat.

Hobby horse: Before his political skills were called into question this year, Allen was seen as a major talent on the stump. Never considered much of a policy wonk, he has served the GOP well on the political front, such as his successful management of the Senate Republicans' 2004 campaign team.

Hobble Horse: Even some Republicans privately say that Allen is not too bright, an image reinforced by his stumbling this year on the campaign trail. With his loss on Tuesday, Allen will likely be seen as damaged goods. And his tough race kept him tied down in Virginia, unable to travel the country earning the favor of other Republicans.

* see note at the top of this story

Back to top

Sam Brownback — Senior Senator, Kansas

Rationale: Brownback has an opening to seek the social conservative mantle in Republican politics, especially if Sen. George Allen loses his re-election bid in Virginia — and with it his viability for 2008. Brownback is no poser on issues of concern to evangelical Christians, who have grown restive about the Republican Party's real commitment to their cause. In Brownback, they would have a true believer who passionately denounces what he sees as the decay of American culture and has made the championing of social conservatism a centerpiece of his decade in the Senate. He has remained steadfast in opposition to stem cell research — a litmus test for anti-abortion conservatives, who view the harvesting of embryonic stem cells in the cause of medical breakthroughs as the destruction of human life. While others in his party are looking for room to wiggle toward the center on that and other socially divisive issues, Brownback has stayed put. None of his potential 2008 rivals can beat his ties to politically active religious leaders on the right.

Resources: Although he raised a respectable $2.7 million for his breezy Senate re-election campaign in 2004, Brownback has no experience in the major leagues of presidential campaign fundraising. His current political action committee, Restore America, raised just under $600,000 over the past two years. But if he can ignite the evangelical grass roots for a White House drive, Brownback could overcome a money deficit.

Hobby Horse: Brownback has cultivated Mideast credentials since the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks when he began making use of his standing at the time as the top-ranking Republican on the Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations panel. Since then, he has developed a reputation for expertise on Afghanistan and the Muslim world.

Hobble Horse: As a darling of the religious right, Brownback might have a leg up for the GOP nomination, but his appeal in a general election could be quite limited. Pragmatic Republicans would likely argue this case against him in the primary campaigns.

Back to top

Bill Frist — Senior Senator, Tennessee; Majority Leader*

Rationale: Before his stunning promotion to majority leader four years ago, Frist was seen as the heir apparent to President Bush's command of the Republican Party. Many say he was handpicked by the White House for the top Senate job. Despite a lackluster-at-best performance during his four years as GOP leader — and his decision to retire from his Tennessee seat at year's end — Frist can still argue that his résumé as a transplant surgeon and his political base in the South keep him in the running for 2008. He has struggled to balance his party's ideological divide. On the one hand, he pleased social conservatives when he set a Senate vote to overturn Florida court rulings that allowed the comatose Terri Schiavo's husband to have her life support removed. But he irritated evangelicals by taking a strong stand in favor of stem cell research — and in opposition to the Bush White House.

DOJ_NMG_0093427

Resources: A very wealthy man, thanks to his own surgical prowess and a family fortune in the hospital business, Frist is comfortable and persuasive among the super-rich who fund major political campaigns. He raised nearly $6 million for his 2000 re-election and, naturally, health industry donors led the way. In the 2006 cycle, he has raised more than $7.5 million for his political action committee. If he runs for president, Frist could be one of the better-funded candidates in the field.

Hobby Horse: Frist is working hard to regain the trust of social conservatives after parting company with them on stem cell research. He got out front in the drive to ban same-sex marriage, even though it was a non-starter in the Senate. He knows that winning over the evangelicals is his first order of business for renewing interest in his presidential prospects.

Hobble Horse: The Senate got little done on his watch, and many conservatives hold him responsible for failing to enact their agenda. And as he tries to make it up to them, moderate Republicans accuse him of pandering to the right wing. Washington insiders who were once so high on his chances now all but write him off.

* see note at the top of this story

Back to top

Newt Gingrich — former Speaker of the House, Georgia

Rationale: In a twist on Jimmy Carter's 1976 campaign slogan, "Why Not The Best?," Gingrich could use as his campaign tag line the rhetorical question, "Why Not The Past?" And why not, indeed? Gingrich, who led Republicans to control of the House in 1994 for the first time in 40 years, could be just the one to revive his party's winning spirit. With one of the sharpest minds in politics and policy, he can outtalk anyone in the game. And none of the party's current problems, from the Iraq War to the swirl of scandal around lobbyist Jack Abramoff, can be laid at Gingrich's doorstep. He's been out of politics since he resigned his House seat eight years ago, giving him the right to chide his party for losing its way, as so many grass-roots Republicans seem to think has happened. All he needs is a new contract with America.

Resources: Having been out of politics and the fundraising game for so long, Gingrich might have trouble getting up to speed. But when he was at the top of his game, as Speaker in 1996, he amassed more than $6 million for one of his more competitive House re-election races in suburban Atlanta. He has kept up ties with the money crowd as a popular speaker on the convention circuit, where well-to-do business leaders congregate.

Hobby Horse: Gingrich gives no ground when it comes to national security, arguing that the nation is already embroiled in World War III and should act accordingly. Although concerns about terrorism were not at the top of the agenda during his days in power, he has written several books about war and misses few opportunities to join the national debate.

Hobble Horse: Some think that Gingrich just talks too much, sometimes sounding like a nutty professor, and is much too eager to be provocative even at the risk of being misinterpreted. Social conservatives distrust him, and it doesn't help that he's on his third marriage. And the last big campaign he ran, the 1998 midterm, was a big enough bust for the GOP that it forced him out as Speaker.

Back to top

Rudolph Giuliani — former mayor, New York City

Rationale: No one has ever moved from a city hall to the White House, but Giuliani could be the first for one reason: He still basks in the glow from his role as "America's Mayor" five years ago, when his considered but forceful stewardship of New York City after the Sept. 11 al Qaeda hijackers' attacks on the World Trade Center earned him comparisons to Winston Churchill and prompted Time magazine to name him "person of the year." Other hallmarks of his eight years as mayor, such as fighting crime and cleaning up Times Square, bode well for making his case as a competent manager. He is a sought-after speaker on management topics. And perhaps most important to his political ambitions, Giuliani has tirelessly trooped around the country to leverage his star power stumping for Republican candidates. Despite his moderate social views, he has made a sincere effort to reach out to religious conservatives and talk in personal terms about his own beliefs.

Resources: Giuliani raised $2.4 million for his political action committee, Solutions America, in the 2006 season and gave nearly a half-million dollars to GOP candidates or other campaign committees. Among the home states of his donors, Florida and Texas are in the top five, a positive sign that he can tap the deep wells there for Republican cash. Still, he is untested as a national fundraiser.

DOJ_NMG_0093428

Hobby Horse: Competence will be Giuliani's best argument. He takes pride in having run the nation's largest city and surviving the experience well-remembered as an able manager who actually got some things done. And his earlier days as a crime-fighting federal prosecutor could be cited as a credential for fighting terrorists.

Hobble Horse:Giuliani's views on abortion rights, environmental protection and other domestic issues are far to the left of the typical GOP voters' And his personal life, to put it mildly, is something of a mess. He has been married three times and his last divorce sparked a tabloid frenzy of charges and countercharges. Main Street Republicans and evangelical Christians might find it all a bit much to handle.

Back to top

Chuck Hagel — Senior Senator, Nebraska

Rationale: Call him the new John McCain. With two Purple Hearts earned as an Army infantryman in Vietnam and cozy relations with the press corps, Hagel comes across as the Republican maverick that McCain once was — before he began courting President Bush and the party's conservative wing. Early on, Hagel was a rare GOP voice in opposition to Bush's handling of the Iraq War. He did not let up, despite extreme pressure from party leaders to cool it. As a result, he is a favorite Republican to many Democrats. But he is no wild-eyed liberal, having once voted to overturn the Roe v. Wade protection of a woman's right to an abortion. For a presidential campaign, geography favors him: His home in Omaha is practically within walking distance of Iowa.

Resources: With just over $1 million raised by his political action committee during the 2006 cycle, Hagel shows no signs of being a campaign-finance powerhouse. He easily won re-election in 2002 with a modest $1.6 million in campaign funds. Chances are that if Bush and his friends have anything to say about it, Hagel will not be tapping a lot of traditional GOP resources. He has been a thorn in the president's side, and payback is probably on its way.

Hobby Horse: For Hagel, the word is maverick. In an era when voters are disgusted with blind partisanship, he is about as independent as they come. Like McCain and Rudolph Giuliani, his best argument to Republican primary voters is that he could appeal to a wide swath of general-election voters.

Hobble Horse: Plenty of GOP conservatives would rather set themselves on fire than see Hagel win the Republican nomination. They see his persistent criticism of the Iraq War as treason within his party, if not to the nation as a whole.

Back to top

Mike Huckabee — Governor, Arkansas

Rationale: If teaching Americans how to lose weight can make you president, then Huckabee is a shoo-in. After being diagnosed with diabetes in 2003, he set upon a life-changing course of eating less and running more. Now 110 pounds lighter than when he began his exercise and diet regimen, Huckabee last year published a book about his experiences, titled "Quit Digging Your Grave With a Knife and Fork." As governor, he has argued that promoting healthier living, among both citizens and state workers, ultimately saves taxpayers millions of dollars in medical expenses. Huckabee's weight-loss evangelism comes naturally. He is a Baptist minister accustomed to inspiring others. As Bill Clinton demonstrated, you do not get to the top of Arkansas politics and stay there without knowing how to charm a crowd. And Huckabee, who has been governor for a decade (and was lieutenant governor for three years before that), gets high marks as a crowd pleaser.

Resources:Huckabee raised $2.3 million for his last governor's campaign, in 2002. The bulk of his money came from Arkansas business interests and only a little more than 10 percent of his funds came from out of state, suggesting that he might have some difficulty financing a national race. Although Huckabee might possess some of Clinton's charisma, he does not share his fellow Arkansan's knack for fundraising.

Hobby Horse: In a party so dominated by religious conservatives when choosing presidential nominees, Huckabee's status as a Baptist minister should get him a hearing. He and his wife, Janet, entered into a "covenant marriage," a popular movement among evangelicals in which couples agree to limited legal grounds for divorce.

Hobble Horse: A penchant for granting pardons went awry for Huckabee when he released a convicted rapist, Wayne Dumond, who then committed a murder in Missouri. Look for this story to get plenty of play if Huckabee becomes a credible presidential candidate.

Back to top

DOJ_NMG_0093429

Duncan Hunter — Congressman, California's 52nd District; Chairman, Armed Services Committee

Rationale: In these times of national security worries, there is nothing like an ex-Army Ranger to the rescue. In the halls of Congress, where he's been since 1981, Hunter still comes across as a trained combatant. At the helm of the House Armed Services Committee for the past four years, he has earned a reputation as a blunt and ferocious advocate for the military, especially when it comes to protecting the troops from budget cuts. When the Bush White House wanted to redesign the nation's intelligence hierarchy, the president, the vice president and many others in the administration had to personally lobby Hunter to back off his firm stand against it. He finally signed on when satisfied that the changes would not threaten the access of soldiers in the field to intelligence data.

Resources: Considering the squads of defense lobbyists who traditionally swarm the Armed Services panel's offices, running from the Rayburn Building is a fine platform for raising money, and Hunter has mustered war chests in the $1 million range for each of his last three re-election bids — none of which has been remotely close. But if Republicans lose control of the House, Hunter would lose his chairmanship and not be in as strong a position to raise money.

Hobby Horse: Beyond his solid credentials as a defense hawk, Hunter presents a social conservative portfolio that has appeal in GOP presidential primaries. He has long sponsored legislation to ban abortions. And now that building a fence along the Mexican border is in vogue, he can point out that he has proposed doing so for years.

Hobble Horse: Hunter is a powerhouse on Capitol Hill, but outside Washington and his Southern California district he remains a complete unknown. Perhaps he is expecting to have plenty of time to get outside the Beltway and build name recognition after Tuesday.

Back to top

John McCain — Senior Senator, Arizona

Rationale: As close to a Republican heir apparent as anyone gets in the 2008 field, McCain has done his best to earn that title from tradition-minded voters in his party. His positioning as a straight-talking maverick continues to give him clear general-election appeal, so his challenge is winning over social conservatives to get the GOP nomination. Independent voters and more than a few Democrats flocked to his initial presidential campaign. At the risk of losing some of those voters, McCain has courted religious conservatives and buried the hatchet from that bitter rivalry for the GOP nomination six years ago. The result has been a swell of conventional wisdom in Washington that sees McCain as the party's most likely nominee. Look for the president himself to give that nod at some point if all goes well between the two former rivals.

Resources: Money was tight for McCain toward the end of his 2000 nomination bid, which played a role in his ultimate loss to the massively funded Bush machine. But no one on the horizon for 2008 seems able to duplicate what Bush accomplished, opening the way for McCain to play the role of the presumed nominee and attract the attendant onslaught of cash.

Hobby Horse: While the corruption scandal brought on by convicted ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff primarily tainted the Republican Party, it could make GOP voters all the more eager to nominate McCain, who has earnestly built a squeaky-clean image — he was, of course, a principal author of the 2002 campaign finance overhaul — despite himself getting caught up in the "Keating Five" savings and loan scandal of the 1980s.

Hobble Horse: Age and health are the biggest worries for McCain. He would be 72 on Inauguration Day 2009, meaning he would be the oldest person to become president. (Ronald Reagan was just shy of his 70th birthday when he first took the oath.) And although McCain says his bout with skin cancer is behind him, it left marks on his face that — along with injuries he suffered as a prisoner of war in Vietnam — deny him the appearance of robust health that Reagan projected.

Back to top

George E. Pataki — Governor, New York

Rationale: The governor's mansion in Albany was a good enough launching pad to get Theodore and Franklin D. Roosevelt into the White House — but it proved lousy for Mario Cuomo, who had to shelve his national ambitions in 1994 after losing his bid for a fourth term to Pataki, then a relatively obscure state senator. That upset earned Pataki the awe of Republicans nationally. They have watched him ever since, and his stewardship of the state — cutting taxes and creating jobs — has not disappointed them. (He's not seeking a fourth term of his own this year.) After the attacks of Sept. 11, Pataki was in the national spotlight, side by side with Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, demonstrating a calm competence that made their party proud. Instrumental in bringing the 2004 Republican Convention to New York, Pataki on paper is ready to play an even bigger role at the next convention.

DOJ_NMG_0093430

Resources: The state of New York by itself has enough money to potentially fund a presidential campaign, but in 2008 there could be three from the state dialing for dollars: Pataki, Giuliani and Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton. The Clintons have a tried-and-tested national network. Giuliani has been out of office with plenty of time to travel the country. Pataki, without the track record of the Clintons or the free time Giuliani enjoys, could face a tough challenge finding enough cash elsewhere.

Hobby Horse: A governorship has been the job of choice in four of the past five presidential elections, and Pataki is currently the nation's longest-serving governor — with plenty of policy achievements to boast about. Tax-conscious conservatives will find Pataki's tax-cutting record quite appealing. For compassionate conservatives, he can tout his 1999 health care plan extending insurance to those without employer-provided plans.

Hobble Horse: Pataki's charisma deficit — he's considered boring on the stump — will not help him charm his way into the hearts of religious conservatives who are not going to warm up to his abortion stand and support of gay rights. Rockefeller Republicans are still not welcome in such circles.

Back to top

Condoleezza Rice — Secretary of State

Rationale: She has said no in every imaginable way, but the political world cannot stop being fascinated with the idea of Rice on the national Republican ticket. She fits the bill for those who think only a solid conservative could ever become the first woman president, let alone the first African-American in the Oval Office. Rice, of course, is both of these — and she would make history just by running and winning a single primary. Careful and calculating in public, Rice makes very few mistakes despite having so many political foes gunning for her. A stalwart in the Bush White House's war on terrorism, from national security adviser in the first term to secretary of State since last year, she has the policy platform for a credible campaign despite lacking the experience of elected office.

Resources: If the Bush family gets behind her, all things are possible. The president is her biggest fan, and so far no one knows which of the 2008 hopefuls he might favor. Such high-powered backing is probably what it would take for Rice to mount an adequately resourced campaign. She has no experience raising the amount of money needed for such an undertaking, though her fame and rock-star appeal at GOP gatherings could make up the difference.

Hobby Horse: While she has legions of critics, no one can doubt her toughness in the national security arena. She gives no ground, whether on talk shows or in contentious Senate hearings. And the State Department turned out to provide some refuge from the brickbats being hurled at Bush's war policy, where Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has taken ownership of the hot seat.

Hobble Horse: As a presidential candidate, Rice would face endless questions that she now mostly dodges about uncomfortable matters, such as the warnings she received about terrorist activity before Sept. 11. That headache alone could be enough to dissuade her from joining the White House fray.

Back to top

Mitt Romney — Governor, Massachusetts

Rationale: If conventional wisdom is correct and John McCain is the one to beat for the Republican nomination, someone will emerge as the conservative alternative. Bet on Romney to at least have a turn in that spotlight. Most pointedly, he rushed to President Bush's defense when McCain was taking on the White House plan to expand the authority to interrogate terror suspects. On immigration, Romney has taken a hard line, in contrast to McCain's middle-of-the-road approach in support of the president's proposals. And Romney seems to show up in religious conservative country, such as South Carolina, every time McCain tries to make his way there. Romney is doing what Sen. George Allen was planning to do until his own Senate re-election became dicey in Virginia. If Allen is out of play, Romney stands to gain.

Resources: It is hard to know which is better for training as a major league fundraiser, being governor of a good-sized state or running the Olympics. Romney has done both. He raised nearly $9.5 million for his 2002 election as Massachusetts governor (he's not running again this year), and he compiled nearly $2.5 million for his federal political action committee in the 2006 cycle. And those ties to corporate biggies when he was CEO of the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City? Priceless.

DOJ_NMG_0093431

Hobby Horse: In an age when politicians cannot stop yammering about health care, Romney did something about it, signing into law last April an insurance plan that covers nearly all Massachusetts citizens without raising taxes. The plan's emphasis on individual responsibility for premium costs and subsidies for lower-income citizens is already becoming a popular model for Republican-style health care reform.

Hobble Horse: As a Mormon, Romney faces doubts among many evangelical Christians who are suspicious of the denomination. He does his best to disarm the doubters, once even cracking a joke about polygamy, saying that he believes marriage is "between a man and woman and a woman and a woman."

Back to top

Tom Tancredo — Congressman, Colorado's 6th District

Rationale:One-issue protest candidates are a hallmark of presidential campaigns, and Tancredo aims to make illegal immigration his cause. As Congress' leading advocate for tighter border controls and the deporting of people who have immigrated illegally, he is riding a wave of conservative sentiment that is roiling the Republican Party. Even some religious conservatives are getting as agitated about immigration as they are about abortion. And Tancredo was on this case long before it was hot. He says that he began focusing on it as a state legislator in the 1970s, when waves of immigrants moved into Colorado, eventually forcing the state to implement bilingual education programs. As a self-described religious-right Republican, Tancredo only gives way to liberals on gun control — a conversion brought about by the 1999 shooting deaths at Columbine High School, just blocks from his home in the Denver suburb of Littleton.

Resources: Protest candidates don't need a lot of money to maintain their candidacy. A cell phone and a rental car is about all it takes. But Tancredo is no slacker in this regard, having hit the $1 million mark in campaign funds when necessary for his re-elections since first winning his House seat in 1998. His alignment with anti-immigration groups and evangelicals should provide a healthy source of cash and direct-mail addresses to keep a campaign as long as he likes.

Hobby Horse: Tancredo's long-standing obsession with border fences and other measures to reduce illegal immigration is no longer burdened by the nutty image it once suffered. Last month, President Bush vindicated Tancredo's movement by signing into law a bill authorizing construction of 700 miles of fence along the Mexican border.

Hobble Horse: The inconvenient truth for Tancredo is that his own grandparents were immigrants. They came to the United States from Italy, but he says they always regarded themselves as Americans and not as Italian-Americans. And since they were legal immigrants, presumably he would not have them deported if they arrived today.

Denver Wooing Democrats For '08 (USAT)

By Tom Kenworthy, Usa Today

USA Today, November 10, 2006

Hopes for convention are mile high

DENVER — The Mile High City is hoping that a rising Democratic tide in Colorado and the West will lift its chances of hosting the party's 2008 convention.

Officials involved in Denver's bid for the convention say their prospects against rival New York City improved on Tuesday as Colorado voters put a decidedly Democratic stamp on the state.

"I think our chances are now better," says Denver City Council member Rosemary Rodriguez, who serves on the city's convention bid committee. If held in Denver, it would be the first Democratic convention here since 1908, when William Jennings Bryan was nominated.

Bryant Adams, spokesman for the Colorado Republican Party, says the GOP will bounce back from a "very difficult year" because "Republican values are in line with views and values all across the West."

Democrats in Colorado this week reclaimed the governorship after eight years of GOP rule, captured a House seat that had been Republican since 2002 and strengthened their majorities in the state House and state Senate. Colorado Democrats will hold four of seven U.S. House seats, a U.S. Senate seat and, for the first time since Dwight Eisenhower was president, control both the Legislature and governor's office.

DOJ_NMG_0093432

Elsewhere in the West, Democrats picked up a Montana Senate seat, two House seats in Arizona, and re-elected governors in Wyoming, New Mexico and Arizona. Five of the eight mountain West states will have Democratic governors starting in 2007; prior to the 2002 election, they had none.

"We've had a lot of success in the West, and it seems to us here in Colorado that the way to keep it up is to focus on the western U.S.," says Steve Farber, a Denver attorney who co-chairs the city's convention effort.

"Democrats need to look at the Rocky Mountain West as their hope for the future," adds Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo. "We're ready. We have the facilities. We have the most beautiful state in the nation."

A spokesman for New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg did not respond to messages seeking comment. Republicans will hold their 2008 convention in Minneapolis-St. Paul.

Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean is expected to decide between Denver and New York by early December. At a breakfast meeting with reporters in Washington on Thursday, he said both cities are still under consideration.

Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., who is likely to become majority leader in January, has backed Denver's bid.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, a Democrat who just won a second term, said Tuesday's election results "make a strong case for the convention going to Denver."

Referendum Revelations (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

Republicans took a drubbing in Tuesday's elections. But judging by the results of various referendums nationwide, some of the ideas they used to stand for are alive, well and popular among voters.

The most significant moral victory comes in Michigan, where voters approved by a surprisingly lopsided 58-42 margin Proposal 2, which bars discrimination and preferential treatment "in the operation of public employment, public education or public contracting." Michigan voters showed common sense in passing the proposal over the demagogic objections of special interests such as women's groups and minority contractors, who outspent proponents of the measure three to one and ran ads depicting it as a disaster on par with 9/11 and Hurricane Katrina.

In California, four measures that would have raised taxes in an already overtaxed state went down in flames. One of them was a 300% hike in the duty on cigarettes; another a $50 per-parcel tax on landowners. Then there was Proposition 89, which would have hiked corporate taxes by 0.2 percentage points to create campaign funds for political candidates able to raise at least $125,000 in five-dollar increments. For a state in which porn stars have been known to throw their g-strings into the political ring, this nod toward Moonbeam populism probably wasn't a good idea.

For our money, however, California's dumbest proposition was numbered 87. Backed by movie producer Stephen Bing, it would have slapped a sliding-scale tax on California oil producers in order to fund alternative energy sources and, supposedly, reduce dependence on foreign oil. But exactly how increasing the cost of domestic oil was supposed to do that -- especially when the proposition forbade energy companies from passing along the higher prices at the pump -- was a conundrum to which supporters never gave much thought. The proposition went down 45% to 55%.

Also encouraging were the nine states that passed anti-Kelo referendums, which restrict state governments from using their powers of eminent domain to transfer property from one private owner to another. That brings to nearly 40 the number of states that have responded to the Supreme Court's infamous 2005 ruling that allowed the city of New London, Connecticut, to seize 15 homes to do the bidding of corporations and developers. The three states that rejected similar measures on Tuesday -- California, Washington and Idaho -- did so in part because proponents overreached politically by insisting that landowners should be compensated when government regulations diminish their property values. Opponents were able to portray this as a threat to state budgets and fiscal prudence.

Social and cultural issues were also on the ballot. Arizona, where voters otherwise evicted anti-immigration Congressman J.D. Hayworth, approved a measure making English the official language by a three-to-one margin. This suggests to us that what Americans want isn't so much restricted immigration as it is a culture of assimilation. Bans on same-sex marriage -- a pre-emptive reaction in the face of judicial overreach in places like Massachusetts and New Jersey -- were approved by large margins in liberal Wisconsin and conservative South Dakota, among seven states.

DOJ_NMG_0093433

At the same time, South Dakotans rejected a measure that would have banned nearly all abortions, while Missouri voted to endorse stem-cell research by the narrowest of margins, 51% to 49%: Both are useful lessons that Americans remain pragmatic and intelligently ambivalent on these difficult moral issues.

Our one disappointment was voter approval in six states for raising the minimum wage. The minimum wage is not a victimless crime, but it does tend to be an invisible one since it often takes the form of employers simply doing without some of the entry-level positions they might otherwise have filled with the young or unskilled. But with the Bush economy producing jobless figures of 4.4%, we can understand why voters are not on their guard about risks to fuller employment.

What all this tells us is that while voters have delivered a partisan rebuke to a party that likes to describe itself as conservative, they still believe in low taxes, property rights and social conservatism -- so long as it is not extreme. There's a lesson here for the next crop of GOP candidates, assuming they're willing to pay attention.

Michigan Prefers Equality (WSJ)

By Abigail Thernstrom

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

Ward Connerly has done it again: A striking 58% of Michigan voters gave the Michigan Civil Rights Initiative a thumbs up; only three counties voted against it.

The language of the MCRI closely tracks California's 1996 Proposition 209, also led by Mr. Connerly. It amends the Michigan Constitution to "ban public institutions from using affirmative-action programs that give preferential treatment to groups or individuals based on their race, gender, color, ethnicity or national origin for public employment, education or contracting purposes." The political and business establishments, pressure groups like the AARP, labor-union leaders, religious spokesmen, the professoriat, the major Detroit newspapers -- all were opposed to MCRI. But a substantial majority of ordinary voters were thinking for themselves.

Patty Alspach was perhaps a typical supporter. A Democrat, she signed the petition putting the proposition on the ballot. Meanwhile, opponents loudly claimed that the measure was misleading, that voters were being duped, that it should be tossed off the ballot. "I read it," replied Ms. Alpach. "I understood it. I signed it. Now let me vote on it."

While Mr. Connerly is the father of the civil-rights initiatives, in Michigan his role was that of mentor and fund-raiser; Jennifer Gratz, MCRI's executive director, was in charge. She'd been the lead plaintiff in Gratz v. Bollinger, one of the University of Michigan cases decided by the U.S. Supreme Court in June 2003. The Court agreed that race-driven admissions policies were okay as long as they remained a bit subtle -- but no naked point system for the color of an applicant's skin. The drive for the MCRI was launched immediately after the Gratz and Grutter decisions were announced.

The initiative's opponents enjoyed a five-fold funding advantage, which they used to broadcast a series of scary messages. The MCRI would be a tragedy on the scale of 9/11; it would perpetuate a "culture of inequity," and "endanger access to life-saving health-care services that apply only to women" -- the language of the initiative to the contrary notwithstanding. Opponents even found basketball coaches to tout the importance of seeking "diversity." In response to that last stunt, the tiny band of full-time, young MCRI workers (five on the payroll) sent a staffer -- a very short Korean immigrant, carrying a basketball and dressed for the court -- to the coaches' press conference where he stated his eagerness to add "diversity" to the game.

Such episodes reveal the youthful idealism and commitment of Ms. Gratz, 24, and her staff, so reminiscent of the civil-rights movement in its heyday. They were all 20-somethings, ready to sleep under their desks and work nonstop. Despite the provocative ugliness of the MCRI's opposition, they stuck with an unwavering, positive message -- leavened with wit.

The ban on preferences will affect the state and local government, but the University of Michigan will feel its impact most keenly. In the closing pages of "The Shape of the River," William Bowen and Derrick Bok's celebrated book on preferential admissions, the authors warn that, if barred from using racial double-standards, institutions of higher education will find another way to achieve the desired racial mix on campuses. Straight out of the Bowen and Bok playbook, University of Michigan president Mary Sue Coleman issued a statement on Tuesday night (even before the final results were in): "Regardless of what happens with Proposal 2, the University of Michigan will remain fully and completely committed to diversity. I am determined to do whatever it takes to sustain our excellence by recruiting and retaining a diverse community of students, faculty and staff."

DOJ_NMG_0093434

Brave words in the face of utter defeat. To be sure, Supreme Court opinions can often be circumvented behind closed admissions-office doors; that was certainly the story after the 1978 decision in University of California v. Bakke, which (on paper) sanctioned the use of racial identity only as a "plus" factor, one consideration among many in admitting students. But state constitutional amendments are seriously constraining, as the experience in California in the years since the passage of 209 suggests. Racial double-standards in college admissions has been markedly curtailed at the state's flagship schools.

Buried in a lengthy speech to University of Michigan students on Wednesday, Ms. Coleman did say, "of course the University of Michigan will comply with the laws of the state." It was far from her first thought, however, and she has asked the school's attorneys "for their full and undivided support in defending diversity." They'll waste their time. As George Mason University law professor David Bernstein notes, "the chances that the university would ultimately win such litigation approach zero."

Ms. Coleman's other problem is that the much-vaunted "diversity" of the university is something of a sham, as an editorial writer for the very liberal Daily Michigan newspaper has suggested. The campus "is starkly segregated . . . We live in different student neighborhoods. We go to different bars on different nights. We join in different student groups. There are even separate Greek systems." While Ms. Coleman has made the usual noises about building a "community" and "creating a diverse, welcoming campus" -- whom was she kidding? Apparently no one.

Dishonesty has always been the coin of the realm in this country when it comes to race -- from the days of the Declaration of Independence to "separate but equal" and beyond. The use of race as a decisive factor in admissions at selective colleges and universities is no exception.

The modern-day survival of racial preferences depends on sympathetic judges willing to spin dubious arguments and ignore widely available data on the pernicious impact of such preferences. But, this time, the University of Michigan may find itself without judicial recourse. The Supreme Court has never said that universities are constitutionally obligated to institute "diversity" policies. Public universities are funded by taxpayers. And those taxpayers have spoken.

Ms. Thernstrom is a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute and vice-chair of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights.

Trade Deficit Narrowed In September (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt And Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

U.S.'s Imports Fell 2.1% Amid Oil-Price Decline; Gap With China Worsened

Even as the overall U.S. trade deficit narrowed in September, the country's imbalance with China continued to worsen, pointing to possible new tensions in trade policy making now that Democrats have retaken Congress.

With the price of imported oil in sharp decline, the deficit fell 6.8% to $64.3 billion in September, the Commerce Department said yesterday. A broad easing of imports on the back of the first decline in oil prices in five months combined with a continued strong export performance to improve the trade picture.

Yet there were indications that the trade gap remains a problem. September's deficit, though down from August's revised record of $68.96 billion, was still one of the largest ever. And the rapidly ballooning deficit with China showed no sign of easing.

All that could push the newly Democratic Congress to take a toughened approach to trade policy, one that incorporates worker rights and environmental protections, in addition to the business priorities that Republicans have pushed in recent years.

Michigan Rep. Sander Levin, a senior Democrat on the House Ways and Means Committee, said the rapidly growing deficit with China underscores the need for a change of direction on trade policy. "The 'hands-off, anything goes' trade policy employed by the Bush administration has not worked," said Mr. Levin, who backs proposals to incorporate worker rights into Washington's trade discussions with other countries.

The U.S. appetite for foreign-made consumer products from China, including televisions and other electronic equipment, remained strong, pushing imports from China to a record $27.6 billion in September. With U.S. exports to China essentially flat for the month, the U.S.'s total deficit with China hit a record $22.96 billion -- by far the largest of any single country -- in September, up $1 billion from the previous month.

DOJ_NMG_0093435

Earlier this week, China reported that its overall trade surplus hit a monthly high of $23.83 billion in October, thanks to strong export demand from the U.S. and Europe. Discrepancies between Chinese and U.S. trade data are partly because of differences in how the two governments calculate trade, including shipments through Hong Kong.

According to the Commerce Department, the U.S.'s overall imports fell 2.1% to $187.46 billion for September, the first decline since February. Besides lower oil prices, decreased shipments from abroad of industrial supplies and automotive vehicles also contributed to the decline.

Exports rose 0.5% from August to a record $123.16 billion for September, with increases seen for everything from civilian aircraft and agricultural machinery to raw cotton and chemicals.

Drew Matus, a senior economist at Lehman Brothers, said the September trade data suggest "a slight upward revision" -- perhaps less than 0.2 percentage point -- in third-quarter economic growth.

Other economic data out yesterday showed that despite the continued decline in gasoline prices, U.S. consumers' optimism ebbed slightly in November, according to the latest survey from the University of Michigan.

The survey's index of consumer sentiment dropped to 92.3 in the first part of November, down from 93.6 in October but still the second-highest level since July 2005, said economists who had read the report, which is distributed to subscribers. The drop suggested that the positive effect of lower gasoline prices, which bolstered sentiment in October, has begun to fade. The negative tone of political ads leading up to Tuesday's congressional election might also have taken a toll, economists said.

The average retail price of gasoline was about $2.25 a gallon in early November, compared with more than $3 a gallon in early August.

Consumers' assessments of home-buying conditions improved, though they were wary of making purchases amid falling prices. Long-term inflation expectations -- an indicator closely watched by policy makers at the Federal Reserve -- held steady, with consumers expecting inflation to average 3% over the next five years.

Separately, the number of new applicants for unemployment benefits declined, suggesting that U.S. businesses are still hiring at a healthy pace. The Labor Department said initial jobless claims fell by 20,000 to a seasonally adjusted level of 308,000 in the week ended Nov. 4. Last week, the Labor Department reported that the unemployment rate had fallen to a five-year low of 4.4% in October.

Write to Greg Hitt at greg.hitt@wsj.com1 and Mark Whitehouse at mark.whitehouse@wsj.com2

Dow Tumbles 73 Points As Attention Shifts To The Economy, New Congress (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

A day after rising 19.77 points on news that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was out, the Dow Jones Industrial Average pulled back, with investors turning their attention back to the economy.

Amid worries about rising oil futures, flagging consumer sentiment and possible Democratic efforts to restrain drug-company profits, the Dow industrials yesterday fell 73.24 points, or 0.6%, to 12103.30. A day after finishing at a record, the average still is up 12.9% for 2006. Trading activity was heavy.

More broadly, some investors are nervous that stocks may have come too far since midsummer. At its record close Wednesday, the Dow was up 13.4% since July 14.

With the Dow up so much, "we have to be wary of something happening that would cause the market to sell off hard," said Doug Johnston, head of trading at Boston-based brokerage firm Canaccord Adams.

Some big investors appeared to be selling broad baskets of stocks to hedge their market exposure, Mr. Johnston said.

Crude-oil futures, whose declines had helped fuel stock gains, surged back above $61 a barrel amid worries about declining stockpiles and the looming winter heating season. Oil futures rose $1.33, or 2.2%, to $61.16.

That gain overshadowed news that lower oil prices helped to shrink the September trade deficit. Some oil traders believe the price declines were temporary and the commodity is likely to resume its gains.

Investors also were unhappy that the University of Michigan's measure of consumer sentiment came in lower than expected.

DOJ_NMG_0093436

Drug and telecom stocks led the declines, with talk that a Democratic Congress could seek to regulate those sectors more closely and hold down prices.

Large technology stocks bucked the trend, rising after Cisco Systems forecast stronger sales than analysts had expected. Cisco jumped 6% and Dell, Oracle and Yahoo all gained. But their coattails didn't reach the broader tech market, and the Nasdaq Composite Index, filled with tech stocks, fell 0.37%, or 8.93 points, to 2376.01. It remains up 7.7% this year.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.53%, or 7.39 points, to 1378.33, still up 10.4% in 2006. Neither the S&P 500 nor the Nasdaq is near a record.

Gold futures, which often benefit from economic uncertainty, rose $18.60 to $635, the highest finish in two months.

Outside the U.S., stocks declined in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, fell 0.07%, or 0.17 point, to 230.63.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks retreated. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 3.1 billion shares, as 1,359 stocks rose and 1,907 fell.

Bond prices were mixed. The 10-year Treasury note rose 2/32, or 63 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.630%. The 30-year bond was down 2/32 to yield 4.734%.

The dollar was mixed. Late in New York, it traded at 117.94 yen, up from 117.80, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2823 from $1.2760.

Write to E.S. Browning at jim.browning@wsj.com1

Wyoming's Sen. Craig Thomas Has Leukemia (AP-Y)

By Mead Gruver, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

Sen. Craig Thomas, hospitalized since Monday with pneumonia, has been diagnosed with a form of leukemia, his spokesman said Thursday.

The Wyoming Republican, who was easily elected to a third term while in the hospital, issued a statement saying he will undergo treatment and plans to return to Congress in January.

Thomas fell ill in church in Casper on Sunday and was taken by ambulance to Wyoming Medical Center. He and his wife, Susan, flew back to Washington later in the day.

Thomas, 73, canceled campaign events Monday and was admitted to the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md., that evening, his spokesman Cameron Hardy said Thursday.

While hospitalized, doctors noticed a low white blood cell count and a bone marrow biopsy revealed leukemia, cancer of the blood and bone marrow. Thomas was to immediately begin a four- to six-week course of chemotherapy and will remain at the hospital to reduce his risk of infection, his office said in a press release Thursday.

"I am joining all of the thousands and thousands of other cancer survivors in Wyoming," Thomas said. "I certainly didn't expect this diagnosis, but I will be back by the January session ready for full service in the new Congress."

Thomas was diagnosed with acute myeloid leukemia, the most common form of the disease.

Dr. Brian Monahan, director of hematology and medical oncology at the National Naval Medical Center, said in the release that the disease usually can be forced into remission in people in Thomas' "great physical condition."

Thomas was elected to the Senate in 1994 after serving five years in the U.S. House.

Foreign Sales By U.S. Arms Makers Doubled In A Year (NYT)

By Leslie Wayne

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

Sales of military weapons by United States contractors to foreign governments doubled in the last year, as countries like Pakistan, Australia and Greece stepped up purchases of armaments and the United States government loosened policies to allow more American weapons to be sold on the world market.

DOJ_NMG_0093437

A total of $21 billion in arms sales agreements were signed from September 2005 to September 2006, compared with $10.6 billion in the previous year, according to new data compiled by the Pentagon. Foreign military sales agreements have typically ranged from $10 billion to $13 billion a year since 2001.

A number of factors are behind the surge in sales. Since Sept. 11, 2001, the Bush administration has used arms sales as a way to reward allies and cement international relationships. Middle Eastern countries, flush with oil revenues, have become big buyers.

Countries like India, Pakistan and Indonesia that were once barred from buying American weapons have had those bans lifted, and some have placed big orders.

For military contractors, the sales have provided a welcome source of new revenue at a time when the Pentagon has indicated that the era of record military budgets is ending.

Because many of the weapons sold overseas are mature products, the profit margins to American arms makers are high, since the initial development costs have long been recuperated.

And in the case of some planes, like the F-16 Fighting Falcon fighter jet and the C-17 Globemaster cargo plane, foreign military sales are a way to keep open production lines that might close for lack of Pentagon orders.

"There have been a remarkable number of orders placed," said Howard Rubel, an analyst at Jeffries & Company. "It's another arrow in the quiver of military contractors."

One of the biggest orders was placed by Pakistan, which had been barred from buying most American weapons because of its nuclear program. That ban was lifted last year and the country placed a $5 billion order for advanced F-16 jets made by the Lockheed Martin Corporation.

A similar ban on India was also lifted, opening up a potentially lucrative market to American contractors. India is currently looking to buy up to 126 new fighter jets, and American contractors have been flying to India to show off their wares.

Oil profits are also behind some of the orders. Saudi Arabia said in July that it planned to spend $5.8 billion on American weapons to modernize its National Guard and will also put in more than $3 billion in orders for Black Hawk helicopters, Abrams and Bradley armored land vehicles, new radio systems and other weapons.

In the gulf region, Bahrain, Jordan and the United Arab Emirates have filed plans to buy Black Hawk helicopters — for a total of $1 billion. Oman plans to buy a $48 million anti-tank missile system. The Emirates plans to buy rocket artillery equipment and military trucks for $752 million and Bahrain will purchase Javelin missiles for $42 million.

Bahrain alone has accounted for $1 billion in foreign military sales in the five years since 9/11.

"The rise in oil prices has allowed countries like Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates to increase their arms purchases dramatically," said William Hartung, director of the arms trade project at the World Policy Institute, which is part of the New School in New York.

For contractors, Mr. Hartung added, these sales "are a welcome windfall, not just icing on the cake."

These new big gulf region orders, like the Saudi deal, were not included in the $21 billion tally for 2006. They will be carried over into the 2007 tally and are a sign that next year will be as robust as this one.

"We've got a good start on 2007," said Lt. Gen. Jeffrey B. Kohler, director of the Defense Security Cooperation Agency, which manages foreign military sales.

Besides Pakistan and India, since 9/11, bans on arms sales have been lifted on Tajikistan, Serbia and Montenegro, Armenia and Azerbaijan as these countries have been identified by the State Department as critical allies in the war on terror. They have turned into buyers, although on a much smaller scale than the big Pakistani or Saudi orders.

Armenia, Azerbaijan and Tajikistan had no American arms purchases before 9/11. But as a group, they have bought $32 million in weapons under the foreign military sales program, according to statistics from the Center for Defense Information.

Foreign military sales are negotiated directly between the United States and other governments and are overseen by the State Department, the Pentagon and Congress.

Other strategically situated countries have also stepped up their purchases. Nepal, for instance, bought $1.1 million of American weapons in the full decade before 9/11, and $22 million in the five years since.

DOJ_NMG_0093438

Similarly, Yemen, Djibouti and Uzbekistan bought $16.4 million combined in the decade before 9/11, and $73 million of American weapons since.

"Foreign military sales are a good hedge against potential further cuts in Pentagon procurement," said Mark T. Esper, executive vice president for defense and international affairs at the Aerospace Industries Association, a trade group.

In a conference call with analysts, Christopher E. Kubasik, chief financial officer of Lockheed, estimated that foreign sales account for 15 percent — or $5.5 billion — of Lockheed's sales, which were $37 billion in 2005.

"They're valued customers, and we plan to continue to grow in that area," he said.

Foreign sales have importance to military contractors beyond the dollar value of the contract. Once a country buys a weapon system, it will need to continue to buy spare parts or upgrades.

"In the next couple of years," said Cai von Rumohr, an analyst with Cowen & Company, "foreign sales as a percentage of company revenues will be tracking up."

Foreign sales can also keep endangered weapons programs alive.

For instance, when Boeing made some announcements that it might begin to close production of its C-17 cargo line, Canada and Australia quickly stepped in to place orders: Canada's deal is valued at $1.3 billion and Australia's at $2 billion. Orders for the F-16 from Turkey, Greece and Pakistan are pumping $11 billion into that program at a time when the Air Force is phasing out of it.

For that reason, the Aerospace Industries Association has been pressing Congress to relax rules so more foreign deals can be done outside of government scrutiny — an effort that has, so far, been rebuffed in Congress.

Last month, the industry association, along with representatives from the Boeing Company and the Northrop Grumman Corporation, met at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative Washington research group, to outline their plans to pursue this effort.

O'Malley Calls For Slots At Racetracks (WP)

By John Wagner

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley called upon the Maryland General Assembly yesterday to legalize slot machine gambling at horse tracks, saying he was "sick of this issue" but feared that the state's racing industry could collapse if lawmakers did not find common ground early in his term.

The issue of slots dominated the first three legislative sessions of Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s tenure, producing stalemates that contributed to his rocky relations with the Democrat-controlled legislature.

O'Malley (D) said he is eager for compromise between backers of a more expansive slots plan and those who argue that legalizing machines would be only a first step toward dramatic expansion of gambling in Maryland.

"Hopefully, we can find some room for compromise and address people's fears about this being the camel's nose under the tent, and move forward to other more pressing, important issues," O'Malley said during an interview on WTOP (103.5 FM, 820 AM), one in a series of radio and television appearances yesterday in which he was peppered with questions on the topic.

O'Malley, who is Baltimore's mayor, said slot machines at racetracks would help prop up an industry that provides 18,000 jobs in Maryland and would ensure the survival of the Preakness Stakes, a nationally renowned event at Pimlico Race Course in Baltimore that O'Malley called "the equivalent of having the Super Bowl in Maryland every year."

If legislation is not passed within two years, O'Malley said, "I think you'll see racing just give up and go to other states and the Preakness move on."

Lawmakers, who return to Annapolis in January, offered divergent views on whether a slots bill is more likely to pass a Democrat-controlled legislature under a Democratic governor than under Ehrlich, who made the issue a priority.

"If you're against it, you're against it," said House Speaker Pro Tem Adrienne A. Jones (D-Baltimore County). "I would hope we would not jump on this."

Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert), a leading slots proponent, said he was optimistic that lawmakers would pass a tracks-only bill during a "honeymoon" period afforded most new governors.

DOJ_NMG_0093439

"I think it will be dealt with in the first year, and I think it will pass in the first year," he said.

Miller acknowledged that there is a key obstacle in the person of House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel), who considers the idea of placing slot machines at tracks an "unjust enrichment" of their owners. Busch was unavailable yesterday for comment, aides said.

O'Malley stressed yesterday that slots would not be a priority of his administration, saying, "It's nothing that I've ever made a central plank of my campaign."

In the closing months of a race in which O'Malley led in most polls, several gambling interests hedged their bets and gave money to both O'Malley and Ehrlich. The state Democratic Party received a $50,000 contribution from the Maryland Jockey Club, a horsemen's association controlled by Joseph A. De Francis, who has a minority share of the Pimlico and Laurel Park racetracks.

Aides said it is unlikely that O'Malley will introduce a slot machines bill and that his remarks came in anticipation of lawmakers pressing the matter. "I am so sick of this issue," he said on WTOP. "I hope that we're able to put this issue behind us."

But that may be easier said than done. Del. Peter Franchot (D-Montgomery), who was elected as Maryland comptroller Tuesday, said the bill probably would fail again even with O'Malley's backing. Franchot urged the incoming governor not to waste political capital on "a divisive issue."

"I personally think it's a loser of an issue," Franchot said. "Voters threw out the No. 1 cheerleader for slots, Bob Ehrlich."

During his media appearances yesterday, O'Malley also reiterated his support for construction of the intercounty connector, a position he told WTOP he had stated "four hundred billion times before."

And O'Malley continued to press for state School Superintendent Nancy S. Grasmick to step down.

Grasmick, who has sparred with O'Malley over Baltimore schools, reports to the State Board of Education, whose members are appointed by the governor. It probably will be July, however, before O'Malley has a chance to fill vacancies on the board and a year more before he has a majority.

"I think it would be a great time for a fresh start," O'Malley said yesterday on WUSA (Channel 9). "I think in her heart of hearts, she probably knows that, too."

A spokesman for Grasmick said this week that she has no plans to step down.

Baltimore Celebrates Political Last Hurrah? (WT)

By S.A. Miller

The Washington Times, November 11, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Residents gathered in some of the city's notoriously quirky diners and coffee shops yesterday to crow that the elections Tuesday proved they still live in the nexus of Maryland political power.

"It shows again that Baltimoreans are on top," said Bernie Shephard, a youth sports league director having breakfast at Cafe Hun, a kitschy restaurant in the working-class Hampden neighborhood.

Mr. Shephard had good reason to boast: Mayor Martin O'Malley became governor-elect, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin joined fellow Baltimore Democrat Barbara Mikulski in the U.S. Senate and Rep. Nancy Pelosi, a California Democrat raised in the city's Little Italy neighborhood, is expected to be the next House speaker. Mrs. Pelosi learned politics at the knee of her father, Thomas J. D'Alesandro Jr., a Democrat with more than 20 straight terms in politics, in including jobs as Baltimore mayor and U.S. congressman.

"It's great [for] someone from our neighborhood, who played on our steps with all the other little girls, to progress like this," said John Pente, who has lived in the same Baltimore row house for each of his 96 years.

Mr. Shephard also acknowledged the growing political influence of Montgomery County, the state's wealthiest and most populous county, but said the county's connection to the District will always alienate its politicians from the rest of Maryland.

Fran Vota, 82, of Little Italy, agreed.

"They're not going to beat us, no way" Mrs. Vota said while leaving St. Leo's Catholic Church where she was making sandwiches for the homeless.

DOJ_NMG_0093440

Historically the hub of state politics, Baltimore is the home or birthplace of seven of the past 12 Maryland governors and five of the state's past 10 U.S. senators.

But the city's political strength increasingly has been eroded by Montgomery and Prince George's counties, home to more than a third of registered Maryland Democrats, who dominate state politics.

The election Tuesday sent two Democrats from Montgomery County to statewide offices: Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler rose to attorney general and Delegate Peter Franchot became comptroller.

Mr. Franchot replaces Baltimore's most iconic politician, William Donald Schaefer, a former governor and the Baltimore mayor who in the early 1980s led the city to an urban renaissance. He lost in the September primary.

Mr. Gansler and Mr. Franchot are just the second and third Montgomery County officials to win statewide offices. Blair Lee III, a Democrat from Silver Spring, was the first Montgomery County official to win a statewide office when he was elected lieutenant governor in the early 1970s.

They and Lt. Gov.-elect Anthony G. Brown, of Prince George's County, will hold three of the six statewide offices. The other three belong to Mr. O'Malley, Mr. Cardin and Miss Mikulski, all Baltimore Democrats.

Still, some Baltimoreans quietly concede that the sweep Tuesday might be a last stand in the city's political legacy.

"Baltimore is losing its clout," said Mary Ann Campannella, 65, president of the Little Italy Community Organization. "It saddens me because Baltimore was the political power in Maryland."

Mrs. Campannella, who was wearing pajamas and sipping coffee as she held court yesterday morning at a neighborhood diner called Gia's/Iggy's, said Montgomery and Prince George's are home to a younger generation of state leaders and voters there are better educated and more politically sophisticated than those in Baltimore.

"Our school system proves it," she said. "Graduates can't fill out a job application. How are they going to know who to vote for."

She said Mr. O'Malley is a Montgomery County native "on loan" to Baltimore and noted that Mr. Cardin is 64 and Miss Mikulski is 70.

"I'm racking my brain to think of who is the next strong [leader] in the city," Mrs. Campannella said. "I'm coming up blank."

Don Kennedy, manager of Germano's restaurant in Little Italy, sounded the same melancholy note.

"Barbara Mikulski and Ben Cardin have been in the system a long time," said Mr. Kennedy, 51. "I don't see the new crop coming up."

Democrats May Urge More Contact With U.S. Adversaries (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

The Democratic takeover of Congress will raise the profile of lawmakers who have repeatedly urged the Bush administration to talk to key adversaries such as Iran, North Korea and Syria, increasing pressure on the White House to stop placing restrictions or conditions on such discussions.

The incoming chairmen of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the House International Relations Committee -- Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Rep. Tom Lantos of California, respectively -- have long argued that the administration's approach to dealing with adversaries has hamstrung diplomacy. Iran and Syria are problematic neighbors of Iraq, and critics have charged that not talking to Damascus and Tehran has hurt efforts to end the violence in Iraq.

Although outgoing Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.) is also an advocate of greater engagement, the new Democratic leaders say they are more likely to call hearings and demand explanations from administration officials. Lantos, who has often visited such countries as Libya and North Korea, said he is "passionately committed to having a dialogue with people we disagree with."

Since Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice took office nearly two years ago, some restrictions on dealing with Iran and North Korea have been loosened. On North Korea, the administration has rejected calls for high-level bilateral contacts but allows them within six-nation negotiations focusing on North Korea's nuclear programs.

DOJ_NMG_0093441

On Iran, the administration this year offered to join multilateral talks on Iran's nuclear program -- but only if Tehran first suspends uranium enrichment. There has been virtually no dialogue with Syria since its suspected involvement in the 2005 assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri.

"This has spelled the death knell of the neo-conservative approach," Biden said. He added that "Secretary Rice is much more open to approaches different than Cheney and Rumsfeld than people think she is," although State Department officials disputed that.

The Iraq Study Group, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.), is also expected to address the issue of whether dialogue with Iran and Syria would aid the war effort. President Bush and Democratic lawmakers have said they are eagerly awaiting the study group's conclusions.

State Department officials said yesterday they are open to ideas, but that the change in Congress will not directly affect administration policies. Officials said criticism of the administration's approach is often misguided. The administration considers talks with adversaries as a particular "card" to play in diplomacy, but merely talking does not represent a policy, one official said. Dialogue with Syria, for instance, has been limited because the administration did not want it to affect the U.N. investigation into Hariri's killing.

Another Rice aide said he does not think Democrats will press too hard at first because they are still vulnerable to charges of being weak on national security. But he acknowledged Congress would raise tough questions, noting that North Korea's recent decision to return to the six-party talks "relieved some of the pressure on us for that."

The nomination of Robert Gates as defense secretary could also change the dynamics of the administration's internal debates. Outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld is a fierce foe of engaging with enemies, but Gates two years ago co-wrote a Council on Foreign Relations report that called for a "direct dialogue" with Iran.

"The current lack of sustained engagement with Iran harms U.S. interests in a critical region," the report said, arguing the United States should explore "common interests" with Iran as it did with the Soviet Union or China when they were U.S. adversaries. The report suggested that lifting unilateral sanctions and allowing U.S.-Iranian commercial relations to flourish "could be a powerful tool" in dealing with Iran.

Zbigniew Brzezinski, national security adviser to President Jimmy Carter and co-author of the report, said he hopes Gates's presence at Bush administration policy debates will bring a "a degree of rationality, common sense, balance and historical perspective" to the table.

Brzezinski, stressing he was speaking for himself, said the administration's requirement that Iran give up enrichment before talks can start is not a "fair bargain" because Iran has a right to enrich under the nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, and thus would be reluctant to give it up for simply talking. He said lifting trade embargoes or dismantling sanctions would be a greater inducement to start a productive dialogue with Iran on a range of issues.

Asked yesterday about Gates's writings on Iran, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley said: "The president and Bob Gates are pretty, pretty confident themselves that they're on the same page on the basic pillars of the president's foreign policy."

Around The Globe, Relief Over U.S. Vote (WP)

By Molly Moore And Peter Finn, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

Many Welcome Return of Bipartisan Government; Caution Heard in Russia, China

PARIS, Nov. 9 -- For Europe and much of the rest of the world, U.S. voters' repudiation of the Bush administration in midterm elections Tuesday and the dismissal of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on Wednesday confirmed the widespread view that President Bush and his policies have done more to tarnish America's image abroad and strain its global relations than any other U.S. president in recent history.

The Socialist Group in the European Parliament, the legislative body's second-largest voting bloc, called the election results "the beginning of the end of a six-year nightmare for the world."

The seismic political shift in the United States was greeted in many places less with jubilation than with a sense of relief that Americans had at long last come to their senses.

DOJ_NMG_0093442

"It took a while for the Americans to realize who they had elected and the damage he had caused in the world," said Philippe Bas, 56, whose newsstand near a Paris subway stop was stacked with newspapers from across Europe carrying analyses of the election.

That view was echoed in some newspaper editorials and headlines around Europe. In Britain, the headline over the Guardian newspaper's lead editorial read, "Thank you, America."

In many capitals, Rumsfeld's dismissal was as momentous as the prospect of Democratic control of the House and Senate.

"After the Democratic victory, Bush sacrifices Rumsfeld," the French daily newspaper Le Figaro declared in a banner headline Thursday. An editorial in Le Figaro described Rumsfeld as "the symbol of the horrors of the American military intervention in Iraq" and said, "By dismissing the architect of this unpopular conflict, by sanctioning the neocons' idol, George Bush shows that he stopped believing that he could 'maintain the course' in Iraq."

"Rumsfeld never had many friends in Europe," Marcin Zaborowski, who monitors transatlantic relations for the Paris-based European Union Institute for Security Studies, said in an interview. "He exemplified anything that was bad about this administration. He personified the approaches Europeans had the most problems with -- going to war in Iraq on the false premises that it was closely linked to the war on terrorism and directly linked to the events of 9/11."

Political parties, government leaders, pundits and citizens from many countries seized on the return of a bipartisan government in the United States as a harbinger of welcome change in the Bush administration's policy of using the military. But others expressed concerns about the Democratic Party's agenda promoting trade restrictions and human rights.

"I hope the policy will be better balanced regarding the use of armed forces outside the United States," Boris Gryzlov, speaker of Russia's lower house of parliament, told reporters in Moscow. "However, there are fears that the Democrats are more prone to apply double standards in human rights."

"Democrats have traditionally had more complicated relations with Russia," said Tatyana Parkhalina, a senior analyst at the Center for Problems of European Security in Moscow. "And our politicians worry that they will pay more attention to human rights, the democratic development of the country and relations with former Soviet republics. They're not happy about that."

Some Chinese analysts also said the Beijing government is worried about potential changes in the way the United States approaches trade relations, noting that Democrats have traditionally been more attuned than Republicans to labor union complaints about loss of U.S. jobs to low-wage Chinese factories.

Officials and analysts in other nations embraced the prospect of changes in U.S. social policies.

Germany's minister for economic cooperation and development, Heidemarie Wieczorek-Zeul, a Social Democrat, told the Berliner Zeitung newspaper, "There is hope that our concerns in the world -- for peace, development, environmental and climate protection -- will be given more weight on the political agenda in the USA."

On the opposite side of the globe, Mexican officials said they hope Democrats will use their new power to improve Bush's approach to immigration issues, particularly the question of constructing a barrier on the U.S.-Mexico border.

"The electoral strategy that proposed the possibility of building the wall as an element of the electoral battle failed," said RubÃ©n Aguilar, spokesman for Mexican President Vicente Fox.

Some European analysts expressed fear that some pressing issues, including the Iranian and North Korean nuclear programs, could be neglected with a lame-duck leader in the White House.

Britain's Daily Mail newspaper said in an editorial that Bush had received a "richly deserved bloody nose," but the results had "left the free world with a severely compromised leader, stripped of moral authority at home and abroad."

But one of Iran's hard-line newspapers, Kayhan, relished the prospect of a politically diminished White House. "Bush's government will be obliged to take more cautious steps and instead of creating war around the world, it will be obliged to fight politically with Democrats," it said.

Finn reported from Moscow. Correspondents Edward Cody in Beijing, Manuel Roig-Franzia in Mexico City and Kevin Sullivan in London and special correspondents Corinne Gavard in Paris and Shannon Smiley in Berlin contributed to this report.

Bush Discusses Immigration Reform With Mexico's President-elect (MCT)

DOJ_NMG_0093443

By Kevin G. Hall And Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush welcomed Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon to the White House on Thursday and got an earful about immigration restructuring and controversial legislation that Bush signed recently to construct 700 miles of wall along the common border.

"I explained our point of view that it isn't - can't - be a solution to the migration problem," Calderon told Spanish-language reporters in a news conference after meeting Bush. He also said he'd try to keep immigration from drowning out other important issues in the bilateral relationship.

Calderon met Bush immediately after the U.S. president had lunched with presumed House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., to mend relations and discuss areas in which they could find common ground.

In the wake of his party's defeat Wednesday, Bush identified immigration revisions as one of those areas, and he repeated that in a photo session with Calderon, noting that "I assured the president-elect that the words I said in the very Oval Office that we sit about a comprehensive immigration vision are words I still believe strongly."

Although Calderon is a conservative who shares many views with Bush and, like Bush, won an election that many in his country questioned, he's been a vocal critic of the Republican-passed legislation that expands existing border-area walls in California and Arizona. Like many Mexicans, he considers it an affront that's reminiscent of the Berlin Wall, dividing families on opposite sides of a border.

"I hope the new composition of the U.S. Congress allows a solution to the (immigration) issues," Calderon told Mexican reporters, noting that Democrats have promoted immigration restructuring that includes some form of legalization for millions of Mexicans who are living in the United States now without legal documents.

Immigration-overhaul advocates celebrated Tuesday's election results, which included the re-election of Arizona's pro-overhaul Democratic governor, Janet Napolitano, and the defeat of Arizona Republican congressional candidate Randy Graf. The Minutemen, a self-proclaimed border vigilante group, had backed Graf heavily.

Several of the loudest anti-immigration voices were quieted Tuesday at the polls. They included the influential Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Calif., Rep. J.D. Hayworth, R-Ariz., and Rep. Gil Gutknecht, R-Minn., who'd wrongly predicted that immigration issues would loom larger on Election Day than the war in Iraq.

"Immigration did not work as a wedge issue," said Celinda Lake, the president of Lake Research Partners, a Democratic polling firm.

Exit polls showed that Latino voters voted Democratic by a 3-to-1 ratio nationally, said Celinda Lake, the president of Lake Research Partners, a Democratic polling firm. This reversed Republican gains with Latinos cultivated by Bush before the more conservative wing of his party pushed border security issues to the fore.

Calderon's predecessor Vicente Fox hands over the presidential sash Dec. 1. Immigration was Fox's central theme in bilateral relations, and he was deeply disappointed when U.S. immigration restructuring fell by the wayside after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Mexico's president-elect is likely to move immigration off the public radar screen, said Andrew Selee, a Mexico expert at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars.

"He's probably going to try to lower the public emphasis on migration in the relationship and lobby more effectively for passage of some sort of immigration legislation in the United States," Selee said.

Indeed, Calderon said Thursday that he didn't want immigration to overshadow issues such as anti-narcotics cooperation and trade.

He proposed a commission to study a provision of the North American Free Trade Agreement that's causing turmoil in Mexico. Under NAFTA, which took effect in 1994, U.S. exports of corn and beans have been entering Mexico gradually with reduced duties and will be granted duty-free entry in 2008.

As a result, U.S. corn for animal feed and use in food products has supplanted Mexican-grown corn quickly and has worsened the gap between Mexico's rich north and its poor, agricultural south.

DOJ_NMG_0093444

The issue of U.S. corn was so controversial in Mexico that it nearly cost Calderon the election. For many Mexicans, corn is a cultural symbol rooted in Mexico's Aztec and Mayan past, and Calderon said Thursday that he wanted this commission "to find a soft landing for the end of this transition period."

Calderon Reassured On Immigration Bill (WT)

By Stephen Dinan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 10, 2006

President Bush gave Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon an assurance in the Oval Office yesterday that he will push for a broad immigration bill that includes a new guest-worker program and citizenship rights for many illegal aliens.

"I assured the president-elect that the words I said in the very Oval Office that we sit about a comprehensive immigration vision are words I still believe strongly," Mr. Bush told reporters after meeting with Mr. Calderon yesterday afternoon. The remarks came a day after Mr. Bush pledged to push the issue with the help of the new Democrat-led Congress.

Mr. Calderon said Mr. Bush "was very open to all the arguments that I have presented to him" on immigration.

The two men met face to face for the first time, ahead of Mr. Calderon's Dec. 1 inauguration. The meeting comes two weeks after Mr. Bush signed a bill authorizing nearly 700 miles of new fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border.

Although he didn't criticize the fence in his remarks to reporters in the Oval Office, Mr. Calderon said at a later press conference attended by Mexican and Spanish-language press that he told Mr. Bush the fence is a mistake.

"I told him our opinion that [the wall] is a mistaken remedy because it doesn't resolve the problem," the president-elect said, speaking in Spanish. "But he explained that this remedy was in response to the concerns of the United States to have a secure border."

He and other Mexican officials have compared the fence -- which will be built in major smuggling corridors -- to the Berlin Wall. But the legislation enjoys widespread support in the United States, having passed both the House and Senate easily and winning an approval rate of more than 80 percent in some polls.

Mr. Calderon is dealing with political upheaval and violence in the state of Oaxaca in southern Mexico, a cause taken up yesterday by demonstrators who marched on Pennsylvania Avenue outside the White House, as the leaders were meeting.

At his Spanish press conference, Mr. Calderon put some of the burden on the United States, saying that Mexico's southern regions need more investment and that the U.S. needs to do its part to fight crime and drug-trafficking, "particularly in the reduction of the demand for drugs."

Both at his press conference and with the president, Mr. Calderon said the U.S.-Mexico relationship includes more than just immigration and border issues.

"We want to foster our trade relationship, our economic relationship even more," he said. "We both understand that the only solution to many of the problems that we have is to create well-paid jobs in Mexico."

Still, with millions of Mexicans living illegally in the United States, immigration is a dominant issue, touching on both countries' security and economy.

Mexicans living in the United States -- legally and illegally -- will send home $24 billion in remittances this year, making it one of the nation's largest sources of income, along with oil sales.

Mr. Bush and outgoing Mexican President Vicente Fox had pledged in 2001 to try to secure an immigration accord that would legalize Mexican illegal aliens, but those efforts stalled after the September 11 terrorist attacks boosted concerns over immigration and border security.

Congressional Republicans, in particular, have balked, arguing that allowing illegal aliens a path to citizenship amounts to an amnesty for bad behavior, and would encourage more illegal entry.

Iran Warns U.N. Against Sanctions (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093445

LONDON — A defiant Iran, calling the Republican defeat in the U.S. elections a "landmark victory for the Iranian nation," warned Friday that it would reassess its cooperation with international atomic regulators if the United Nations moved forward with comprehensive sanctions on Iran's nuclear program.

The caution came from Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, as he concluded a day of meetings in Moscow aimed at winning Russia's support for weakening or postponing the sanctions, which European and U.S. negotiators hope to bring to the U.N. Security Council as early as the end of the month.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said "the enemy cannot do a damn thing" to divert Tehran's nuclear program — one of many indications Iran might be prepared to endure an initial round of sanctions if diplomacy fails.

"By God's grace, our powerful nation will continue its path," the president said, according to the official Islamic Republic News Agency.

Shortly after Larijani's meetings in Moscow, Russia proposed significantly scaled-down sanctions amendments that would focus strictly on halting Iran's uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities and prevent the development of missiles to deliver nuclear weapons.

The proposal would leave intact Russia's $1-billion civilian nuclear power plant under construction in the Iranian city of Bushehr, a key focus of Larijani's agenda in Moscow, analysts said.

A draft resolution by Germany, Britain and France demands a ban on goods and technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs, and a cutoff of financial support to the programs.

It also calls for a travel ban for any officials or students related to the nuclear and ballistic missile programs and a freeze on foreign assets of people and agencies involved in those programs.

But Russian officials made it clear they believed negotiations were a better way to keep Iran engaged. "Sanctions are not going to force anyone to do anything they don't want to do," said Vitaly Churkin, Russia's ambassador to the U.N.

Larijani said Iran remained ready for dialogue and warned against adopting the European group's sanctions resolution.

"We will review our relations with the IAEA" — the International Atomic Energy Agency — "if the U.N. adopts the Euro-troika resolution without taking into account the amendments made by Russia," he said in remarks carried by the Russian news agency RIA Novosti.

The warning carries an implicit threat to halt U.N. inspections at nuclear sites, though Iran could then lose IAEA technical cooperation on issues such as safety at nuclear facilities.

But Tehran appears to be realizing that some form of sanctions is probably inevitable, and the focus of Iran's diplomacy is to delay or at least minimize any embargo and keep the Bushehr project and its future fuel deliveries intact, analysts said.

"Some people in Tehran are resigned to the prospect of some mild sanctions being instituted in the near future. And they're preparing public opinion for that eventuality," said Kaveh L. Afrasiabi, an Iranian-born analyst who has written extensively on Iran's nuclear program.

The reaction to a "mild" level of initial sanctions would probably be largely "symbolic," he said, such as a curtailment of IAEA inspections. But sanctions would quickly strengthen hard-liners in the government, Afrasiabi said, and successive moves to ratchet up the pressure would undoubtedly bring a correspondingly harsher reaction from Iran.

"At the end of the line is Iran's exit from the [Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty] and complete suspension of any cooperation with the IAEA altogether. So there's no bright light, even just talking about the initial sanctions," Afrasiabi said.

The nuclear agency is set to complete a report next week on Iran's compliance with inspectors who returned Friday from Tehran. Officials close to the agency said it would almost certainly confirm that Iran had started enriching uranium in a second cascade of 164 centrifuges. But with inspectors' limited access, little else is likely to be revealed.

"The IAEA is losing knowledge about what Iran is doing," said David Albright, a former weapons inspector who runs the Institute for Science and International Security. "They can see how much uranium is enriched, [but] they don't know how many centrifuges are breaking … they don't know how many are being built, and Iran doesn't have to answer questions."

Meanwhile, Tuesday's elections in the U.S. and the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld were greeted Friday by Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, as a victory for Iran and a show of "public opposition to the U.S.'s war-mongering policies."

DOJ_NMG_0093446

Though President Bush's nominee to be the next secretary of Defense, Robert M. Gates, is expected to help set a new course on Iraq, he may also push the Bush administration in a new direction on Iran.

Gates has said that relations with Iran should never be normalized unless the regime gives up its nuclear program and its support for terrorism.

But in an influential 2004 report, Gates argued that Iran's pursuit of nuclear weapons was largely driven by its "persistent sense of insecurity" vis-a-vis regional rivals and its "paramount adversary," the U.S. Gates said that the United States' lack of contact with Iran fueled this insecurity and that dialogue "need not await absolute harmony between the two governments."

U.S. Presses Russia To Bridge Gap Over UN Sanctions On Iran (BLOOM)

By Ed Johnson

Bloomberg, November 10, 2006

Nov. 10 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has spoken twice in the past week with her Russian counterpart to bridge differences over how to stop Iran developing nuclear weapons, the State Department said.

The U.S. is pressing for United Nations Security Council sanctions on Iran for failing to halt its uranium enrichment program. Russia, a trade partner of Iran, has proposed changes to a draft UN resolution that seeks to block the country acquiring atomic bomb and missile technology.

``She's doing her part to get this resolution over the goal line," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters in Washington yesterday. Rice spoke by telephone with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov on Nov. 8 and also last week, he said, according to a transcript of the briefing on the department's Web site.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, will visit Moscow today to discuss the issue with Russian officials, the state-run Iranian Students News Agency reported. Larijani plans to meet President Vladimir Putin and National Security Adviser Igor Ivanov to discuss the draft resolution.

Iran, a signatory to the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, says its work is designed to fuel power plants and has repeatedly said it will press ahead with its atomic program even though the UN imposed an Aug. 31 deadline to halt enrichment. President George W. Bush's administration says the program is cover for developing a nuclear weapon.

Russian Amendments

Russia, a veto-wielding Security Council permanent member, has proposed changes to the draft circulated by the U.K., France and Germany. It has deleted a travel ban and asset freeze on officials of Iran's nuclear program and exempted from sanctions the Bushehr nuclear plant that Russia is helping build for the Islamic republic.

``We're starting to chip away at some of the issues," said McCormack, when asked if Rice made any progress in her conversations with Lavrov. ``But, you know, this is multilateral diplomacy, it takes a little bit of time."

China's UN Ambassador Wang Guangya said this week the differences may be unbridgeable. China, like Russia, opposes the U.S.-European approach.

Ambassadors of the Security Council's five permanent members, the U.S., U.K., Russia, China and France, met yesterday in New York together with Germany's ambassador to discuss the resolution, Agence France-Presse reported.

``I do think we made progress," U.S. Ambassador John Bolton told reporters, AFP said, adding they will meet again Nov. 13.

``We are not yet at the point where we can come to agreement on various issues," AFP cited Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin as saying.

Rice Says US Unfazed By Growth Of China's Global Role (AFP-Y)

AFP, November 10, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice played down concerns over the spread of Chinese influence around the globe, saying it was better for China to have friends in the world than enemies.

"I don't see any of this as zero sum," Rice told the Singapore Straits Times newspaper in an interview, a transcript of which was released by the State Department on Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0093447

Rice was responding to a question on China's growing power and relations with nations from Asia to Africa, notably following a summit of 48 African leaders in Beijing last week that highlighted the Asian giant's deepening economic and political ties with the resource-rich continent.

"I'd like to have China have friends in the world, it's better than having China have enemies in the world," said Rice.

"There have been times when we worried about the opposite -- that China would be a destabilizing factor in the world," she said.

"So I would rather see a China that is trying to reach out, that's trying to have friendships around the world."

Rice visited Beijing two weeks ago and praised the Chinese for their leading role in nudging North Korea back to multilateral negotiations aimed at getting Pyongyang to give up its newly proven nuclear arsenal.

"We have excellent relations with China," she said.

But 10 days ahead of an Asian summit at which President George W. Bush will meet his Chinese counterpart Hu Jintao, Rice said Washington still harbored concerns about China's role.

"China has to be responsible in its engagement with the world because it is a big power, it's not just a developing country," she said.

Rice specifically echoed concerns that China's engagement with African countries can be overly focused on gaining resources and markets without adequately addressing issues of governance and human rights.

"It needs to take responsibility in Africa, not just to seek resources but also to contribute to the development of Africa and so that people's lives are better," she said.

She also said there were "some aspects of China's external policies that are not very positive."

She mentioned difficulties on intellectual property rights, "an outsized military buildup of Chinese forces" that is worrying Beijing's neighbors and human rights concerns inside the country.

"China, of course, needs also in terms of its own domestic transition to respond to the natural desires of people for human rights and for religious freedom," she said.

China: Scapegoat Or Sputnik (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

Shanghai

As I was saying, Mr. Rove, Americans aren't as stupid as you think.

Now that we've settled that, and now that we've had an election that clarified which country is most important in shaping U.S. politics in 2006 — Iraq — I've come to visit the country that's most likely to shape U.S. politics in 2008: China.

The civil war in the Republican Party, which you are about to see, will be all about Iraq — whom to blame and how to withdraw before the issue wipes out more Republican candidates in 2008. But the coming civil war among the Democrats will be all about China.

I still believe that when the history of this era is written, the trend that historians will cite as the most significant will not be 9/11 and the U.S. invasions of Afghanistan and Iraq. It will be the rise of China and India. How the world accommodates itself to these rising powers, and how America manages the economic opportunities and challenges they pose, is still the most important global trend to watch.

It really hits you when you see the supersize buildings sprouting in Shanghai, or when you look at the world through non-American eyes. Kishore Mahbubani, the dean of Singapore's Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy, told me the other day that Asia right now "is the most optimistic place in the world." More people have come out of poverty faster there — particularly in India and China — than at any time in the history of the world, and as a result, he notes, more people in Asia than anywhere else in the world today "wake up every morning sure that tomorrow is going to be better than yesterday."

But one person's optimism can be another person's flat wages. And that is why the Democrats and China are almost certain to butt heads. The Bush team's focus on Iraq and terrorism, coupled with the Democrats' lack of control over either house of Congress, has kept China-U.S. relations largely out of the headlines and on a relatively even keel during the Bush II years.

DOJ_NMG_0093448

But two things will change that. One is the Democrats' return to control of both the House and Senate — powered by politicians like Nancy Pelosi, who has long taken a hard line vis-à-vis China on both economics and human rights, and Sherrod Brown, the newly elected senator from Ohio, who comes to D.C. with strong protectionist leanings from a state that has lost thousands of manufacturing jobs to Asia.

The other is the mood reflected in a Nov. 2 analysis in The Financial Times, headlined: "Anxious Middle: Why Ordinary Americans Have Missed Out on the Benefits of Growth."

Technology and globalization are flattening the global economic playing field today, enabling many more developing nations to compete for white-collar and blue-collar jobs once reserved for the developed world. This is one reason why growth in wages for the average U.S. worker has not been keeping pace with our growth in productivity and G.D.P.

"Economists call this phenomenon median wage stagnation," noted The Financial Times. "Median measures give the best picture of what is happening to the middle class because, unlike mean or average wages, median wages are not pulled upwards by rapid gains at the top. As the joke goes: Bill Gates walks into a bar and, on average, everyone there becomes a millionaire. But the median does not change."

Many Americans lately have started to get that joke, and it is one reason that with this new Democrat-led Congress we are likely to see a surge in protectionist legislation, more Wal-Mart bashing, a slowdown in free-trade expansion and increased calls for punitive actions if China doesn't reduce its trade surplus — which surged to a record in October.

China, in other words, is inevitably going to move back to the center of U.S. politics, because it crystallizes the economic challenges faced by U.S. workers in the 21st century. The big question for me is, how will President Bush and the Democratic Congress use China: as a scapegoat or a Sputnik?

Will they use it as an excuse to avoid doing the hard things, because it's all just China's fault, or as an excuse to rally the country — as we did after the Soviets leapt ahead of us in the space race and launched Sputnik — to make the kind of comprehensive changes in health care, portability of pensions, entitlements and lifelong learning to give America's middle class the best tools possible to thrive? A lot of history is going to turn on that answer, because if people don't feel they have the tools or skills to thrive in a world without walls, the pressure to put up walls, especially against China, will steadily mount.

U.S. Will Train Latin American Militaries (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin, Usa Today

USA Today, November 10, 2006

Ban lifted to offset trend toward left

WASHINGTON — Concern about leftist victories in Latin America has prompted President Bush to quietly grant a waiver that allows the United States to resume training militaries from 11 Latin American and Caribbean countries.

The administration hopes the training will forge links with countries in the region and blunt a leftward trend. Daniel Ortega, an adversary of the United States in the region during the 1980s, was elected president in Nicaragua this week. Bolivians chose another leftist, Evo Morales, last year.

A military training ban was originally designed to pressure countries into exempting U.S. soldiers from war crimes trials.

The 2002 U.S. law bars countries from receiving military aid and training if they refuse to promise immunity from prosecution to U.S. servicemembers who might get hauled before the International Criminal Court. The law allows presidential waivers.

The White House lifted the ban on 21 countries, about half in Latin America or the Caribbean, through a presidential memorandum Oct. 2 to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. The training is conducted in the USA.

A ban on giving countries weapons remains. Commercial arms sales are not affected, said Jose Ruiz, a U.S. Southern Command spokesman.

The training ban had resulted in a loss of U.S. influence in the region. The issue gained urgency after a string of leftist candidates came to power in Latin America.

On a trip to the region this year, Rice said that the impact of the ban had been "the same as shooting ourselves in the foot."

DOJ_NMG_0093449

China stepped into the gap. Ruiz said China "has approached every country in our area of responsibility" and has exchanged senior military officials with Ecuador, Bolivia, Chile and Cuba and provided military aid and training to Jamaica and Venezuela.

The ban remains in effect for some countries. Venezuela, whose fiery President Hugo Chávez is a critic of the Bush administration, remains ineligible because it is on a State Department list of countries alleged to have permitted the trafficking of women and children for sexual exploitation and forced labor.

Chávez is up for re-election in December and leads in the polls. Cuba is also off-limits because of a long-standing U.S. embargo against Fidel Castro's regime.

Ruiz said efforts are being made to transfer money this year to begin training foreign officers from eligible countries.

Ortega Redux: A History Smolders On Cold War Embers (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua, Nov. 10 — For most of the world, the cold war ended when the Berlin Wall came down. Not so in the Caribbean basin.

Here the stubbornness of old cold warriors in Washington and the equal tenacity of leftist governments in Cuba and Venezuela have kept a miniature cold war going. Just as it was 20 years ago, Nicaragua now finds itself smack in the middle of the conflict with the election this week of Daniel Ortega, the former Marxist rebel leader, as president.

Mr. Ortega faces a balancing act no politician would envy, both inside the country and on the world stage. On the one hand, to satisfy his supporters, he must fulfill promises to "eradicate poverty," curb "savage capitalism," and remain friendly with his leftist allies, Fidel Castro of Cuba and Hugo Chávez of Venezuela. Venezuela, in particular, could be a source of cheap oil and money for social programs.

On the other hand, he can ill afford to lose more than $50 million a year in United States aid or credit from the International Monetary Fund. Neither can Nicaragua, one of the poorest countries in the hemisphere, jettison the newly approved free trade agreement between Central American countries and the United States. Just to survive economically, this nation of some 5.6 million people needs to continue exporting textiles and fruit to the United States and receiving remittances from Nicaraguans in the north.

"Nicaragua is basically a welfare state that depends on foreign inputs to survive, remittances and foreign aid," said an American diplomat, speaking on condition of anonymity.

What is more, Mr. Ortega won with only 38 percent of the vote, and the National Assembly is divided among four parties. Every move he makes will involve negotiation and compromise with conservative lawmakers, who are desperate not to anger the Bush administration.

"The problems facing him make it almost impossible to have a successful presidency," said Larry Birns, the director of the Council on Hemispheric Affairs in Washington. "He has no arrows in his quiver."

Mr. Ortega's precarious position may explain the careful nuance in his recent speeches. He ran on a rosy and vague promise of "jobs, peace and reconciliation," seldom attacked the United States, avoided Marxist rhetoric and wore his newfound religious convictions on his sleeve. These days he talks more on the stump about God than the proletariat.

For the moment, Mr. Ortega is walking very softly and speaking in dulcet tones. "Today more than ever, the Sandinistas have to be patient," he said to ecstatic Sandinista Party supporters after his victory this week. "We are not going to fall into provocations or insult anyone."

Still, once in a while, the old revolutionary flares in him. He has called President Bush "the Reagan of these times," and asserted that the "Yankee Reagan" wanted "to bring death and destruction to the region." Sometimes, he rails against the havoc the free trade agreement has wrought on small farms.

Since the election, he has taken pains to calm businessmen, assuring foreign investors on Wednesday that he will protect property rights in exchange for help combating poverty. "No one is going to allow the seizure of property big or small," he said. He has also reached out to his political opponents, saying he will keep in place reforms limiting the president's power.

DOJ_NMG_0093450

Yet at his victory speech later the same day, Mr. Ortega made it clear that he would not be Washington's lackey. He thanked his leftist "brothers," Mr. Castro and Mr. Chávez, then took a dig at Washington, saying it was not the Sandinistas who broke off relations after the 1979 revolution. "It was the reverse," he said.

He also said he would push the country, which currently sells more than 60 percent of its exports to the United States, to join the anti-United States trade association Mr. Chávez wants to organize. And he said he would seek trade agreements with Europe and South America. "We have to know how to make our economy grow not depending on only one market," he said.

So far, the Bush administration has taken a wait-and-see attitude in the face of what seems like two different Ortegas. A State Department spokesman, Gonzalo Gallegos, said the United States' cooperation with Mr. Ortega would be "based on their action in support of Nicaragua's democratic future."

Meanwhile, Mr. Castro and Mr. Chávez have used Mr. Ortega's victory to feed their own propaganda machines.

In Havana, Mr. Castro put out a statement saying the victory "fills our people with joy, at the same time filling the terrorist and genocidal government of the United States with opprobrium." In Caracas, Mr. Chávez claimed he and Mr. Ortega would be "uniting as never before" to construct a socialist future.

The outcome of this tug of war hinges on what steps Washington takes, several experts on the region said. The Bush administration has many high-ranking officials who were involved to one degree or another in the covert war against the Sandinistas and Mr. Ortega in the 1980s, among them Robert M. Gates, the man Mr. Bush put forward to be the new secretary of defense.

So even though Nicaragua is hardly a threat to national security, the memories of the 1980s may influence the Bush administration's policies, some experts say. "One of the big questions is, independent of what Ortega does, what approach will the U.S. take?" said Geoff Thale of the Washington Office on Latin America, an independent research group.

People who know Mr. Ortega worry his temper will get the best of him if Washington tries to put pressure on him.

"The worst thing that could happen is if Daniel Ortega extends his hand to Bush and Bush rejects it," said Sergio Ramírez, who was the vice president in the late 1980s under Mr. Ortega. "What will happen is that he's going to say, 'Fine, I will go with Chávez.' "

White House Watches Ortega (WT)

By Carmen Gentile, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 10, 2006

MIAMI — The Bush administration has adopted a wait-and-see approach toward relations with Nicaragua after the return to power of former White House foe Daniel Ortega.

Some U.S. lawmakers expressed fears before Sunday's vote that a return to power by Mr. Ortega would further embolden Latin America's anti-Washington bloc, led by Cuba's Fidel Castro and Venezuela's Hugo Chavez.

But after Mr. Ortega's clear victory in a crowded field, U.S. officials said they would respect the decision of the Nicaraguan people to re-elect the Sandinista leader who led a protracted and bloody war in the 1980s against the U.S.-backed Contra rebels.

"We ... look forward to establishing positive relations with Mr. Ortega and his new government," said Eric Watnik, a State Department spokesman.

In the days after an election in which the leftist Mr. Ortega handily defeated the U.S.-backed and Harvard-educated Eduardo Montealegre, U.S. officials were unusually reticent about the results.

Some said they were disappointed with the results and feared Mr. Ortega would roll back free-market reforms and Nicaragua's approval of the Central American Free Trade Agreement, designed to end tariffs on trade among Central American countries, the United States and the Dominican Republic.

However, the reforms instituted since Mr. Ortega was defeated 16 years ago have done little to better the lives of most Nicaraguans, about half of whom live on no more than $1 a day. The country remains the second poorest in the hemisphere ahead of only Haiti.

DOJ_NMG_0093451

Before the election, Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, California Republican, wrote a letter to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff recommending a termination of the billions of dollars in remittances that flow into Nicaragua from friends and relatives living in the United States.

But administration officials say they are willing to give the benefit of the doubt to the Nicaraguan president-elect. "We will work with [Mr. Ortega] in support of Nicaragua's democratic future," Mr. Watnik said.

Hoping to assuage fears that he might return Nicaragua to the dark days of its Soviet-influenced rule and hyperinflation, Mr. Ortega told business leaders this week that he would respect the reforms implemented by the outgoing Liberal Constitutional Party.

"Sixteen years have passed since the war ended," he said before the election. "I ask God to give us a chance to govern in peace together, without political differences, everyone together so that we can pull Nicaragua out of poverty."

He did say in the campaign that CAFTA was "subject to review" and that poor Nicaraguans had been reduced to "beggars" since it took effect.

Many Nicaragua analysts say Mr. Ortega today is a far cry from the heavy-handed leftist who helped sink Nicaragua into the depths of poverty and despair.

"Ortega is clearly a changed man," said Larry Birns, director of the Council on Hemispheric Affairs in Washington, noting the Nicaraguan leader's willingness to accept economic reforms approved by Washington and the World Bank.

Some U.S. leaders "still have old memories of Ortega and the Sandinistas as villains with ties to Moscow," he said.

World Bank officials have expressed cautious optimism about the new administration. "We don't envisage any dramatic shift in policy," said Joseph Owen, World Bank country director for Nicaragua.

Mr. Owen noted that Nicaragua has received $378 million in "soft" loans for 14 development projects, including infrastructure, education and poverty-reduction programs.

Nicaragua hopes that confidence in its ability to manage loan money eventually will pervade White House attitudes as well.

Ortega, Again (NYT)

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

Nicaragua's top Sandinista is back — and with him international anxiety. Daniel Ortega won the presidency of Nicaragua on Sunday, raising fears that Hugo Chávez and Fidel Castro now have another faithful acolyte.

But while Mr. Ortega's election is bad news, it is not because he is still a Marxist revolutionary. He is an old-style Latin American strongman who, we fear, will further weaken Nicaragua's democratic institutions and retard economic progress. Washington's challenge will be to figure out how to help curb Mr. Ortega's authoritarian impulses without pushing him into Mr. Chávez's arms.

Mr. Ortega, who was voted out of power in 1990, won this time because his opponents could not agree on a single candidate. The 39 percent of the country that voted for him was yearning for any change that could dig the country out of its deep poverty. He still had to use a series of political maneuvers and dirty tricks to ensure his victory.

As leader of the Sandinistas in the late 1990s, he made Nicaragua ungovernable by sending protesters into the streets. In return for peace, Arnoldo Alemán, the president then, allowed Mr. Ortega to pack the Supreme Court and the election commission, and arranged for both Mr. Ortega and himself to be granted lifetime legal immunity. That allowed Mr. Ortega to escape prosecution after his stepdaughter accused him of sexual abuse, beginning when she was 11. (Since stripped of his immunity, Mr. Alemán is serving 20 years for embezzlement.)

Mr. Alemán also agreed to lower the threshold of votes required to win a first-round election — upping the chances of an Ortega victory.

In his last pre-election act of cynicism, Mr. Ortega neutralized the powerful Catholic Church's opposition by backing passage of a bill that criminalizes all abortion. Mr. Ortega was once pro-Marxist, but now he's pro-Ortega. And that's the problem.

The Other Winner In Nicaragua (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'grady

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093452

MANAGUA -- It was just past noon here Sunday when I made my way to a polling station in the barrio of La Chureca, a sprawling garbage dump that also happens be home to some of this city's most destitute denizens. I wanted to see how the voting in the presidential election was going in a neighborhood known as a Sandinista stronghold.

The first glimpse of La Chureca, riding along a bumpy dirt road, is heaps of rubbish as far as the eye can see, fermenting under the hot sun and the watchful eyes of circling vultures. Soon more detail comes into view: Emaciated cattle, with feral dogs under foot, are "grazing" through the mounds of trash. Naked toddlers dart in and out of corrugated-tin shacks. On Sunday afternoon, at a small school on the side of the road, the polls were open and locals were voting just as they were all around the capital. Things were calm.

La Chureca is a symbol of Nicaragua's extreme poverty but as it turns out, it's not solely the property of former Sandinista dictator Daniel Ortega, who won the presidential election with 38% of the vote. On Monday afternoon, when I interviewed right-of-center candidate Eduardo Montealegre of the Liberal Nicaraguan Alliance (ALN) -- who came in second with 29% -- I asked him about the place. He said he also campaigned door to door in the neighborhood and that he found some support there.

Mr. Montealegre seems to have done better than expected in a number of traditionally strong Sandinista regions around the country. He got beat in the rural highlands, where third-place candidate José Rizo of the Constitutional Liberal Party (PLC) acted as the spoiler, draining anti-Sandinista votes away from the ALN. He finished with 26%.

Mr. Ortega's victory has demoralized Nicaraguans who were hoping that the days of thuggish Sandinista government might be behind them. Yet despite the disappointment of an Ortega comeback, there are reasons not to paint the country with the broad brush of defeat in the aftermath of the election. Mr. Montealegre's ALN has accomplished something big for Nicaraguan democracy by unseating the corrupt PLC as the country's main center-right party and establishing itself as a credible force against the Sandinistas.

On the question of whether Sunday's vote was fair, it's safe to say that if there was serious fraud it probably occurred before the polls even opened. Complaints of late poll openings and some early closings undoubtedly have merit. In my own narrow sampling, I noted that Mr. Ortega's control of the Supreme Electoral Council made it easy for Sandinistas to slow down the process and even harass opposition-party poll workers.

Yet the bigger problem may have been the structural damage caused by "the pact," a corrupt 1999 agreement between Mr. Ortega and former PLC President Arnoldo Aleman, who is now serving a 20-year sentence for fraud and money laundering. That deal lowered the threshold for a first-round victory to 35%, and by putting the CSE in the hands of the Sandinistas, allowed the Ortega camp to manipulate voter rolls in its favor.

Even so, Mr. Ortega could not have won without help from Mr. Rizo, who was widely viewed here as Mr. Aleman's puppet. While surveys show that Nicaraguans highly disapprove of PLC corruption, it also seems that rural highlanders reasoned that only the traditional PLC machine could keep Mr. Ortega out of office. Mr. Rizo thus became Nicaragua's Ross Perot. It was in highland regions, like Matagalpa, where the Sandinista victory was sewn up.

With the odds stacked heavily against him, Mr. Montealegre might have been trounced. The fact that he was not says much about the hunger here for something other than a choice between a recycled dictator on the left and a right-wing party headed by a convicted crook. The final tallies are also a commentary on Mr. Montealegre's leadership potential.

Two years ago there was no ALN party. Mr. Montealegre broke with the PLC and fast became the symbol of popular disgust with right-wing corruption. As Eduardo Enriquez, managing editor of Nicaragua's daily newspaper La Prensa wrote in a note to me on Wednesday, "In 18 months the ALN has shown a true capacity to organize that we have not seen in the history of Nicaraguan democracy, including the accomplishment of going from zero to 30% of valid votes. This is no less than a major victory that testifies to the leadership of the candidate and the capacity to organize the ALN team. The result is that Eduardo Montealegre is the new leader of the right and the new leader of the opposition."

Mr. Montealegre, who now goes to the congress as representative, has his work cut out. The ALN will have only about 30 seats in the chamber against 37 for the Sandinistas and 18 for the PLC. The ALN will need a strategy to prohibit the authoritarian Mr. Ortega from teaming up with the PLC and steamrolling democracy à la Venezuela's Hugo Chávez. As Mr. Enriquez points out, the ALN might find a way to co-govern with the Sandinistas, as current president Enrique Bolanos has done. But the situation would be very unstable given Mr. Ortega's appetite for power.

DOJ_NMG_0093453

Mr. Enriquez, who is no apologist for Mr. Aleman, says the ALN could also try to "govern from below" by forming a coalition with the PLC to keep Mr. Ortega in check. Though this too, he says, is problematic. It might require that the ALN give Mr. Aleman a pardon, a distasteful proposition and also a risky one, since up to now the former president has demonstrated a profound lack of principles.

Still, Mr. Montealegre is not without leverage. Many Nicaraguans feel duped by the dirty tricks that the PLC used to undermine the Montealegre campaign and put Mr. Ortega in office. Both the party and Mr. Aleman are discredited. In that sense, Nicaraguans are in a better position today than they have been for many years. There might even be hope for the people of La Chureca.

Security Council Sets Palestinian Vote (AP)

By Justin Bergman, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 11, 2006

The U.N. Security Council will vote Saturday on an Arab-backed draft resolution condemning the Israeli military offensive in Gaza and demanding a withdrawal of Israeli troops from the coastal strip, a European diplomat said.

Members of the Security Council met briefly late Friday afternoon to discuss the draft, which was softened somewhat from a version being circulated earlier this week.

Still, European diplomats said Friday there remained concerns among some of the council members about the language of the draft, making passage uncertain. The diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity because consultations were still taking place.

The U.S. blocked a U.N. Security Council resolution this summer demanding Israel halt its offensive in the Gaza Strip, which it launched in June following the capture of an Israeli soldier by Hamas-linked Palestinian militants. It was the first Security Council veto in nearly two years.

Palestinians have denounced the Security Council's silence on the offensive this week, increasing its calls for action after an Israeli artillery barrage in the northern Gaza Strip town of Beit Hanoun killed 19 people on Wednesday.

The draft resolution, which was introduced by Qatar, calls for Israel to immediately cease its military operations in the Gaza Strip and withdraw its troops. It also calls upon the Palestinian Authority to take "immediate and sustained action" to bring an end to violence, including the firing of rockets on Israeli territory.

The draft requests the U.N. secretary-general establish a "fact-finding mission" to probe Wednesday's attack in Beit Hanoun, and asks the international community to restart the peace process with the "possible establishment of an international mechanism for protection of the civilian populations."

During an open session Thursday on the Gaza situation, U.S. Ambassador John Bolton called for restraint on all sides.

He said Israel must investigate the Beit Hanoun killings and take steps to avoid a repeat of the incident. He also condemned Palestinian militant rocket attacks into Israel, saying Israel has a right to defend itself.

Associated Press Writer Alexandra Olson contributed to this report.

Palestinian PM Offers To Resign For Aid (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 11, 2006

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh said Friday he would be willing to sacrifice his job if the international community would lift economic sanctions that have crippled his Hamas-led government.

Haniyeh's statement was the latest indication that the Islamic Hamas group was nearing a deal to form a national unity government with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' moderate Fatah Party that would be made up of independent experts.

Such a coalition would presumably present a more moderate face to the world and convince the West to restore hundreds of millions of dollars in international funding.

"When the issue of the siege is on one side, and my being prime minister is on the other, let the siege be lifted to end the suffering of the Palestinian people," Haniyeh said, referring to the sanctions that have caused widespread hardship in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

DOJ_NMG_0093454

Haniyeh's comments came a day after Abbas spoke on the phone with his main political rival, Hamas' supreme leader Khaled Mashaal — their first conversation since April. Hamas spokesman Fawzi Barhoum said their discussion indicated the sides were nearing agreement.

The international sanctions, including tax revenues Israel has withheld since Hamas took power in March, has made it largely impossible for Hamas to pay the government's 165,000 employees.

The West, including the United States, has said it will not lift sanctions unless Hamas recognizes Israel, renounces violence and accepts past peace deals, something Hamas has so far refused to do.

The program of the proposed new unity government is vague on the key issue of recognizing Israel, calling for a Palestinian state on only the lands captured by Israel in the 1967 Mideast War. Hamas' charter calls for an Islamic state on those lands as well as Israel.

In addition to the economic sanctions, Palestinians in Gaza have weathered a monthslong Israeli offensive that began after Hamas militants tunneled into Israel and captured a soldier in June.

More than 50 people have been killed in recent days in the Israeli artillery barrage, which aimed at preventing Palestinian militants from firing rockets at Israel. Among them were 19 killed Wednesday in the northern Gaza Strip town of Beit Hanoun when shells landed as residents were sleeping.

The U.N. Security Council will vote Saturday on an Arab-backed draft resolution condemning the Israeli military offensive in Gaza and demanding a withdrawal of Israeli troops from the coastal strip, a European diplomat said.

The draft requests the U.N. secretary-general establish a "fact-finding mission" to probe Wednesday's attack in Beit Hanoun, and asks the international community to restart the peace process with the "possible establishment of an international mechanism for protection of the civilian populations."

The U.S. blocked a U.N. Security Council resolution this summer demanding Israel halt its offensive in the Gaza Strip. It was the first Security Council veto in nearly two years.

Meanwhile, thousands marched through Middle East capitals Friday to protest an Israeli offensive, their calls often spilling into a broader outcry against America's policy in the region and its backing of Israel.

In Jordan, some 1,000 demonstrators filed into the streets after Muslim noon prayers, chanting slogans in support of the Palestinians, but also against the sentencing of Saddam Hussein in neighboring Iraq.

In Sudan, about 2,000 people gathered in front of the United Nations mission building and burnt American and Israeli flags. "Down down USA, we won't be governed by the CIA," chanted the crowd, which was prevented by police from approaching the U.N. building.

Similar protests were held in Egypt, Syria and Lebanon.

In an interview with NBC's "Today" show Friday, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert defended himself against critics who said Israel was using too much force against the Palestinians, saying he thinks "we are very, very restrained in using power."

"When someone criticizes us, I say what would you do when rockets fall on the heads of innocent Israelis?" he said.

Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz ordered the military to "re-evaluate its policy of artillery fire in Gaza," his ministry said in a statement.

Berlin Aims To Revive Mideast 'Quartet' (FT)

By Hugh Williamson

Financial Times, November 11, 2006

Germany will try to advance the Middle East peace process next year by reviving the joint diplomatic efforts in the region by the US, European Union, Russia and the United Nations, Angela Merkel, chancellor, said yesterday.

Speaking at a security conference in Berlin, Ms Merkel said Germany would use its EU presidency from January onwards to breath new life into the Middle East "Quartet" involving these four international interests.

"We see the need to start the quartet again and will discuss this with our partners" she said, adding that Berlin was determined to contribute to helping resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, "even if the negotiations involved prove to be difficult".

DOJ_NMG_0093455

Officials said the chancellor's comments reflected frustration in Germany and the EU that the quartet had been largely inactive in recent months, despite the tensions and violence in the Middle East.

Germany in January assumes both the six-month EU presidency and the year-long presidency of the G8 group of industrial countries and German diplomats admit that Berlin is under pressure to take a heavyweight leadership role in the Middle East and elsewhere in this period.

"We can't just sit back and do nothing" on the Middle East, said one German official, citing as an example the Israeli shelling in northern Gaza on Wednesday that left 18 Palestinian civilians dead.

In addition, Germany has since last month, and for the first time in its postwar history, been involved in a peacekeeping mission in the region, with several ships patrolling the Lebanese coast to prevent arms being smuggled to the Hizbollah movement. "We have a special responsibility to this region," Ms Merkel said, referring to Germany's commitment to ensure the existence of Israel, arising from its Nazi past.

Ms Merkel's announcement followed repeated suggestions by Frank-Walter Steinmeier, foreign minister, that the quartet structure be revived, in particular to draw Washington into broader international initiatives in the Middle East.

In order to reinforce the quartet's role, its mandate could be expanded to include related regional conflicts, such as that between Israel and Lebanon, Mr Steinmeier has argued. In addition, other countries, such as Egypt, could be drawn into the talks to make them more representative.

The quartet's last big policy decision was in January, when, after a meeting in London attended by Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, it called on Hamas to recognise Israel's right to exist, abide by past agreements and renounce violence.

Some diplomats now fear that Europe and the US could be diverging, particularly if the Palestinians succeed in their attempts to form a national unity government. While the EU would like to recognise and work with such a government, Washington is much less enthusiastic.

Additional reporting by Daniel Dombey in Brussels

Palestinians Mourn Civilians Killed By Israel (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

BEIT HANUN, Gaza, Nov. 9 — Palestinians marched in anger and mourning on Thursday for 18 civilians killed by Israeli artillery — baring for cameras the battered faces of two dead children. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel offered to ease tensions by meeting the Palestinian president “anytime, anyplace.”

“I am very uncomfortable with this event,” Mr. Olmert said at a business conference in Tel Aviv. “I’m very distressed.”

Saying that he had personally investigated the artillery strike, which spurred Hamas to warn that it might resume suicide bombings against Israeli civilians, Mr. Olmert called the shelling Wednesday a “mistake” caused by technical failure. And he urged Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian president, to meet with him immediately.

“He will be surprised when he will sit with me of how far we are prepared to go,” he said. “I can offer him a lot.”

He did not explain what he meant. But his words seemed to reflect deep embarrassment at the deaths, mostly of women and children. The strike was condemned around the world, but also by many Israelis who are concerned about the number of civilians killed in Israeli operations to curb rocket fire by Palestinian militants into Israel.

Mr. Olmert’s statement also seemed to reposition the deaths — the largest single loss of life among Palestinians in years — into the realm of politics.

Any discussion between the men would invariably center on the difficult question of prisoners. It is unclear, however, how far Mr. Olmert could move from his past insistence that an Israeli soldier captured by Palestinian militants in June must be released before he would free hundreds of Palestinians from Israeli jails.

Mr. Abbas did not immediately respond to Mr. Olmert’s offer. But he has refused other such open-ended offers, saying that he wanted a concrete deal first on the prisoners and a meeting of “substance.”

On Thursday evening, the Israeli military issued its first detailed explanation of what went wrong with the shelling, saying an aiming radar had malfunctioned, causing the rounds to hit a cluster of civilians’ houses.

DOJ_NMG_0093456

Maj. Avital Leibovich, an army spokeswoman, said that a first volley of 13 shells had been aimed at an orange grove concealing rocket launchers and landed just under a mile away from the houses. A second barrage of 11 rounds, she said, was "aimed 400 meters away from where they hit."

"What we know from aerial photos is that two houses were hit directly," she said. "Our estimate is that 5 or 6 shells of the 11 hit two houses."

She added that, as is standard practice, the system was tested on targets before being used and that it had functioned properly.

Thousands of Palestinians, waving banners and shooting guns, returned to the shrapnel-scarred houses on Thursday with the bodies of the victims, carried on stretchers and wrapped in the yellow flags of the Fatah Party, led for decades by Yasir Arafat and now by Mr. Abbas. Women wailed and screamed for revenge: "Martyrs by the millions!" they chanted. "We are going to Jerusalem!"

Many of the dead were completely covered. But family members exposed the faces of two toddlers, the youngest victims — sisters named Maisa and Maram Athamnah, — as they held their bodies over their heads for the crowd and cameras to see.

"How was this baby guilty?" asked Kamal Hamdan, 43, after one of the bodies was paraded past him.

The bodies were carried to a new cemetery and buried in a single row, the two girls in the same concrete tomb as their mother, Manal, 25. The mood was furious, with many people saying they believed that Palestinians should intensify their attacks on Israel, civilians included.

"We must continue our resistance, even if the price is as big as this," said Ataa Zania, a paramedic who helped evacuate the dead and wounded on Wednesday. "Whoever wants to liberate his country has to pay the price."

As such, there was much approval for statements from Hamas leaders that they might resume suicide bombings inside Israel.

Several political analysts and experts on Hamas said they did not expect the group to resume a large-scale campaign of suicide attacks. Hamas, they contend, undertook a major shift in direction from militant group to political leadership when it won the Palestinian elections in January, and it stands to risk that by resuming a suicide campaign.

The group seems to remain deeply engaged in politics. On Thursday, the Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniya, met again with Mr. Abbas here in Gaza in talks on a government of national unity, in which the Hamas cabinet would step down in favor of professionals and technocrats. The talks, however, are moving slowly, with many complications and little apparent hope of a deal in the next few days.

But several experts said they did not rule out one large attack by Hamas in specific retaliation against the deaths here.

"As in physics, every action has a reaction," said Mustafah Sawwaf, a journalist and political analyst. "Now there is a lot of pressure" from Palestinians not just on Hamas, but other factions, to retaliate.

But Abu Obaida, a Hamas military spokesman, took pains to clarify a statement that the group's military wing issued the day before warning of "hard lessons" in store for the United States, as Israel's ally. He strongly denied that Hamas was calling for violence against Americans or their interests.

The "only theater of operations is Palestine, its only target is the Israeli occupation," he said. "We have no intention of targeting any other nation or extending our theater of operation beyond the current one at this time.

"Of course," he added, "this does not clear the United States of its moral obligation to try and be even-handed and objective instead of its bias toward Israel."

Olmert: Israel Won't Stop Targeting Gaza (AP-Y)

By Sarah El Deeb, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

Israel will keep targeting Palestinian rocket squads in Gaza despite the risk of inadvertently hitting civilians, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Thursday, as tens of thousands of Palestinians buried 18 victims of an errant Israeli artillery strike.

DOJ_NMG_0093457

Women collapsed in grief, gunmen fired in the air and a man hoisted his dead baby aloft during the funeral procession in the northern Gaza border town of Beit Hanoun, where several Israeli shells struck a residential area early Wednesday. All of the dead belonged to a single extended family.

The Israeli military confirmed Thursday evening for the first time that its artillery caused the casulaties, suspending the shelling.

Amid the anguish, moderate Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas picked up the phone and called his main political rival, Hamas' supreme leader Khaled Mashaal — a move that could help prevent the Islamic militant group from renewing attacks on Israel and also pave the way for a moderate Palestinian government.

Abbas and Mashaal, who lives in exile in Damascus, Syria, agreed to meet after agreement has been reached on a new government of experts, to be appointed by Hamas and Abbas' Fatah movement, said a senior Palestinian official who sat in on the conversation. Both sides hope that such a government will be acceptable to the West and end a crippling international aid boycott.

Abbas had refused to talk to Mashaal since April, when the Hamas leader harshly criticized the Palestinian president in a speech. However, with violence threatening to escalate further after the Beit Hanoun strike and militants calling for revenge, he contacted Mashaal to try to lock up a coalition deal. A key sticking point is the choice of a new prime minister who has ties to Hamas, but would also be acceptable to the West.

In Jerusalem, Olmert said that while he regrets the latest deaths, Israel will press ahead with strikes against Palestinian militants firing rockets at Israeli border towns.

"The military will continue as long as there will be Qassam shooting," he said, using the name for Hamas' homemade rockets. "We are not going to stop," indicating Israel would keep up its airstrikes in Gaza aimed at militants even with the artillery falling silent for now.

"We will take precautions in order to avoid unnecessary mistakes," he said. "We will do everything in our power to avoid it. I think it would not be serious to promise that it may not happen. It may happen."

Olmert said the artillery was meant to hit an orange grove from which troops saw rockets fired seconds earlier, but instead hit homes in Beit Hanoun, some 500 meters (yards) away.

The military said the results of its inquiry concluded that "the Palestinian civilian casualties were caused by IDF (Israeli army) artillery." The military statement said the inquiry determined the problem was a "technical failure" in the system that directs the fire. It said the army commander ordered a halt to artillery fire at Gaza until a further check is completed.

The Defense Ministry said in a statement that Defense Minister Amir Peretz ordered the military to "re-evaluate its policy of artillery fire in Gaza, including the safety range."

Beit Hanoun has been the focus of a week-long Israeli offensive meant to halt rocket the attacks. Wednesday's shelling came a day after Israeli ground forces pulled out of Beit Hanoun.

The shells landed as residents were still asleep, and witnesses said many were killed as they fled their homes in panic. The 18 dead was the highest Palestinian civilian toll in a single incident since the current conflict erupted in September 2000. The highest toll of Israeli civilians was 29 killed in a Palestinian suicide bombing at a Passover gathering in March 2002.

In Thursday's funeral, the bodies arrived at the cemetery in a convoy of 18 ambulances which drove from the local hospital through the artillery-scarred cluster of apartment buildings. Cries of "God is greater than Israel and America," punctuated by gunshots, rang out as the bodies were brought out on stretchers.

"I will avenge, I will avenge!" screamed one of the victims' relatives as he fired his weapon, voicing a common sentiment among the mourners.

"The Zionist enemy understands only the language of force and therefore I say, 'an eye for an eye, a nose for a nose,'" chanted Abdel al-Hakim Awad, a Fatah spokesman. "The residents of Sderot, the residents of Ashkelon, even the residents of Tel Aviv, are not going to enjoy security or peace as long as you are suffering, our beloved people in Beit Hanoun."

The freshly dug graves were lined up in a single row, each marked by a concrete block. A Palestinian flag fluttered over each one.

Two Israeli unmanned aircraft buzzed overhead.

DOJ_NMG_0093458

All of the dead belonged to the al-Athamnas, a prominent family in town that includes several doctors and professionals. Family members said they had fled during the recent Israeli offensive, returning home after Tuesday's pullout.

The U.N. Security Council was to meet in special session later Thursday. Palestinians hoped for a condemnation of Israel, on top of the denunciations Israel absorbed from governments worldwide after the attack.

Israeli police, fearing revenge attacks, stepped up their alert level, mobilizing forces across the country.

Anaylsis: Hamas Has Big Stake In Truce (AP-Y)

By Steven Gutkin, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

Hamas' threats to resume attacks inside Israel are playing well on the Palestinian street, but the group has a big stake in keeping its truce with Israel as it struggles to end a Western aid boycott and transform itself into a legitimate political power.

Hamas is already moving ahead with efforts to form a national unity government with the rival Fatah Party despite the killing of 18 Palestinian civilians by an errant Israeli artillery barrage. Such a government, made up of independent experts, would presumably project a more moderate face to the world.

However, killings of Palestinian civilians have often led to spiraling violence in the past. And Palestinians, furious over what they see as Israeli brutality and a lukewarm international response, are in no mood for concessions.

"While our children are drowning in their blood in Gaza, their children in Israel should not be any safer," a Hamas spokesman, Fawzi Barhoum, said Thursday as tens of thousands marched through Gaza's streets in funeral processions.

His comments echoed those of Hamas' exiled leader, Khaled Mashaal, who canceled a cease-fire with Israel and said his militants would answer the Gaza deaths with "deeds, not words."

It's difficult to persuade Hamas to share power in a more moderate government "when people are burying their children, burying their women, seeing this massive destruction," said Palestinian chief negotiator Saeb Erekat.

Still, a telephone conversation between Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Mashaal indicated that Wednesday's bloodshed in Gaza would not derail coalition talks. The two men hadn't spoken for months, and aides to Abbas said their discussion Thursday boded well for progress.

Even Israelis, aware of Hamas' stake in continued calm, didn't seem to be taking Mashaal's threats too seriously. "His language is very often like that. It's nothing new," said Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said the artillery barrage in Beit Hanoun was caused by a "technical failure" and said he was "very distressed" by what happened. He also called for an immediate meeting with Abbas.

Previous episodes illustrated how quickly violence can spin out of control. A June 9 explosion at a Gaza beach that killed eight civilians was followed by the capture of an Israeli soldier by Hamas-linked militants and an Israeli invasion of Gaza. Israel and Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon fought a 34-day war after two Israeli soldiers were seized.

Still, this time there might be enough forces at play to prevent an escalation.

Hamas, which came to power in March after winning legislative elections, was met with a devastating international aid boycott that hindered its ability to pay tens of thousands of public workers whose salaries are the backbone of the Palestinian economy.

Before the deaths in Beit Hanoun, Hamas and Fatah said they were close to forming a national unity government that many Palestinians hoped would be the beginning of the end of the international boycott.

Hamas killed scores of Israelis in suicide bombings before 2005, but has refrained from such attacks for almost two years — even as it kept firing rockets into Israel.

Ahmed Yousef, senior political adviser to Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas, signaled the group would not resume the sort of attacks that would invite harsh Israeli reprisals and impede Hamas's ability to govern.

"There is no decision to resume suicide bombing in Israel, but I don't rule out that other Palestinian parties would resort to such attacks," said Yousef, apparently referring to the militants of Islamic Jihad, which is not participating in the truce.

In Israel, there is growing criticism of the military's use of artillery against Palestinian militants, saying it subjects civilians to undue danger and ultimately harms Israeli interests.

DOJ_NMG_0093459

"Instead of more and more pointless military operations, which will not lead to anything except kindling more hatred, we must try a completely different path," said an editorial in the Haaretz daily.

Israeli politicians and military commanders are under great pressure, however, to stop daily rocket fire from Gaza on southern Israeli towns.

Wednesday's bloodshed was preceded by a weeklong Israeli offensive in Beit Hanoun that killed more than 50 Palestinians. Shortly after Israel pulled out, rocket fire resumed.

Israeli political analyst Yossi Alpher said there's nothing the army can do to halt the rocket fire, which has persisted unabated since Israel withdrew from the Gaza Strip more than a year ago.

"We don't have a solution short of reoccupying every single house and every square meter of land and we're not going to do that," he said.

——

Steven Gutkin is AP's bureau chief in Jerusalem.

The Perils Of Inaction (NYT)

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

There have never been easy answers for how to broker peace between Israel and the Palestinians. But the horrifying price of ignoring the problem was made clear again this week when errant Israeli tank shells crashed into a Gaza neighborhood, killing 18 people, including seven children, as they slept.

There is more than enough blame to go around. Militants in Gaza constantly lob crude rockets across the border. The Hamas movement — voted into power last winter — is refusing to even implicitly recognize Israel, although doing so would mean resumption of international aid and lessening the desperation of its own people. Hamas's military wing has called for attacks on American targets in retaliation for the Gaza deaths.

And even as he expressed his distress for the deaths in Gaza — and called for an immediate meeting with Mahmoud Abbas, the moderate Palestinian president — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Israel would continue striking militants, and could not promise that mistakes "may not happen."

Yesterday, analysts were trying to figure out which was the most immediate danger: a new wave of terrorist attacks against Americans, the start of a full scale Israeli-Palestinian war, or a civil war between Hamas and its rival Fatah if talks on forming a unity government fail.

In such times, President Bush's call for "care and restraint" on all sides seems woefully inadequate. That is also how we would describe Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's sterile tour of the region last month. Since her return, the administration has not taken a single step to revive peace talks.

If there is any way out, Mr. Bush needs to pledge his prestige and the full resources of his remaining presidency to negotiating a Middle East peace. Even before Mr. Olmert visits Washington next week, Mr. Bush should send Ms. Rice back to the region to broker an immediate cease-fire.

She needs to insist that the Israelis restrain their offensives into Palestinian territory and cease all settlement construction. And she needs to make clear to the Palestinians that while words are important, there will be no resumption of aid until their security forces move aggressively to halt rocket and terrorist attacks against Israel.

We had hoped Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice would have figured out the cost of inaction and drift after last summer's disastrous war in Lebanon. Perhaps this week's return look into the abyss will stir them.

Under Heavy Police Guard, Gay Rights Advocates Rally In Jerusalem (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 10 — After Supreme Court rulings, criticism from the Vatican and several nights of rioting by angry opponents, Jerusalem's gay community held a small, orderly rally Friday under a heavy police guard.

The police contingent of 3,000 was nearly as large as the crowd, which cheered speeches and danced to music from a stage draped in rainbow banners at Hebrew University's sports stadium.

DOJ_NMG_0093460

The venue was changed twice as the police sought a secure area, well away from an Orthodox Jewish neighborhood where youths have rioted in opposition to the event. Friday's rally was much more modest than the original plan, which had called for a large march through the city center, and organizers and participants were divided on whether to declare it a full success.

"I'm disappointed because I believe the religious people won this battle, and the people who believe in democracy and human rights lost," Jonathan Oron, 29, a graduate student at Tel Aviv University, said at the rally.

But Avshalom Vilan, a member of Parliament from the left-wing Meretz Party, said, "This is a success, because we stood up for the basic principle of our right to demonstrate."

Many in the crowd said they were not gay, and had come to show support for civil rights in what has become a contentious annual affair in this religious, conservative city.

Jerusalem Open House, a gay and lesbian group, has held a similar event for the past five years, and the buildup this year was again marked by staunch opposition from Jewish, Muslim and Christian leaders, who rarely find points of agreement.

"If it was up to me, I would send the gay community, who insisted on celebrating in Jerusalem, to Sodom and Gomorrah," said Eli Yishai, one of Israel's deputy prime ministers and the leader of Shas, an Orthodox party that belongs to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's governing coalition.

Noting that Christian and Muslim clerics also opposed the event, Mr. Yishai told Israel Radio, "If we cannot be sensitive to Jewish feelings, perhaps we can listen to those of other religions."

In liberal, secular Tel Aviv, gay-themed events take place without a ripple. But in Jerusalem, there is always friction.

Last year, a 10-day international gay festival was planned for Jerusalem in August, and faced strong opposition from religious groups. The event was canceled when the Israeli government scheduled the planned withdrawal of Jewish settlers from the Gaza Strip at the same time, and Israeli security officials expressed concern that they would be stretched too thin.

Instead, a local march was held last year, when an Orthodox man stabbed and wounded three participants.

This year, some Orthodox leaders again expressed strong opposition in advance of the march. On several nights during the past week, young men in the Orthodox neighborhood of Mea Shearim rioted, throwing stones at police officers and burning garbage in the streets.

"I think there has been a general weakening of the rule of law in Israel, and some people feel they can trample on the rights of others," said Noa Sattath, a leader of Jerusalem Open House.

In recent months, members of a parliamentary committee held two lengthy debates on the event. Israel's Supreme Court rejected several petitions seeking to bar it.

The Vatican on Wednesday urged the Israeli government to cancel the rally, saying it would "prove offensive to the great majority of Jews, Muslims and Christians, given the sacred character of the city of Jerusalem."

With the police serving as mediators, the march was first postponed and moved to a part of the city dominated by government buildings, regarded as a secure area.

But after the Israeli military killed 18 Palestinian civilians in a shelling attack in the Gaza Strip on Wednesday, the Israeli security forces went on a heightened state of alert to guard against a Palestinian attack. The police sought an even more secure location for Friday's rally, and moved it to the Hebrew University stadium. They blocked off streets for a half-mile in all directions.

Orthodox leaders agreed not to stage protests on Friday. However, in a one-man demonstration, Rabbi Yehuda Levin, who flew in from Brooklyn, denounced the rally from the front gate of the stadium.

"They are making a statement against God himself," said Rabbi Levin, of the Union of Orthodox Rabbis of the United States and Canada. "They are creating bad feelings. They are not being tolerant of our feelings."

Also, the police said they had detained about 30 gay activists who sought to march from a park in Jerusalem, and held five Orthodox men in the same area who were found with knives.

Israeli Gay Rights Parade Called Off (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093461

JERUSALEM — As the Israeli-Palestinian conflict boiled over this week, it competed for headlines here with a pivotal clash in Israel's culture war between secular and Orthodox Jewish values.

The inflammatory issue: gay rights in the Holy Land.

For days, Israeli television aired images of ultra-Orthodox Jews in black suits and hats, pelting police with stones and setting cars afire in a crusade against a planned gay pride march through Jerusalem.

The battle ended Friday in a setback for Israel's gay community, which bowed to police and rabbinical pressure to take the annual event off the streets and confine it to a stadium. Nearly 4,000 revelers waved rainbow flags and danced to live rock and rap music, but the mood was dampened by a sense of retreat.

"They decided to lock us in a cage," said Ronen Hady-Cohen, a 30-year-old medical student who walked through a protective cordon of 3,000 police officers to get to the rally at Hebrew University's fenced-in sports field. "The ultra-Orthodox interpret this as a victory, and I'm afraid that a lot of Israelis agree."

The flap over the parade reflected a sharp divide in Israeli society.

The country's democracy encompasses an array of secular groups that defend gay interests and have begun a campaign for same-sex marriage. Tel Aviv has a vibrant gay scene. Like nearly every Israeli, gays and lesbians are drafted into the army and given an opportunity to advance up the ranks.

But ultra-Orthodox religious leaders, who consider homosexuality an abomination, wield enormous power. They and their 500,000 followers — about 7% of Israel's population — are especially numerous and influential in Jerusalem, a city sacred not only to Jews but to Christians and Muslims as well.

Ultra-Orthodox clerics lobbied to have the gay parade stopped for the first time since it was first held in 2001 and called for a death curse on the organizers.

They got support from the top Muslim cleric in the Palestinian territories, Jerusalem Grand Mufti Mohammed Hussein, who declared that being gay is a crime. The Vatican and Christian evangelical groups denounced the planned parade as an offense to religious sensibilities.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert weighed in, saying a gay parade would be a "provocative act," even though his lesbian daughter, Dana, of whom he is supportive, planned to take part.

Israel's Supreme Court turned down an appeal to block the march, and the attorney general ordered police officials to meet with organizers to agree on a route. But with ultra-Orthodox groups promising a large counter-demonstration, police feared a repeat of the bloodshed of last year, when three gay marchers were stabbed.

By midweek, Israel's other conflict had complicated the picture: Armed Palestinians were vowing to avenge Wednesday's killing of 18 civilians in Gaza by errant Israeli artillery shells.

Police officials said they could not mobilize the 9,000 officers needed to keep peace between gay marchers and their antagonists and still defend the country from terrorism.

Under a deal worked out by Jerusalem's police chief, the parade was canceled and Orthodox leaders agreed not to hold street demonstrations against the stadium rally.

"Today is a great victory for religious power," said Yehuda Levin, a New York-based ultra-Orthodox rabbi who came here to lobby. "The sodomites are back in the figurative closet. They are not free to provoke."

About 50 gay activists tried to march along the proposed route anyway but were blocked by police, who detained 20. Meanwhile, five young Orthodox men armed with brass knuckles, knives, clubs and a loaded pistol were arrested in a park near the stadium.

In the stadium, police detained a man who rushed the stage shouting antigay slurs.

The crowd at the event included a group of observant Jews from the Reform and Conservative streams of Judaism, who held signs calling for peaceful coexistence.

Hady-Cohen, the medical student, was there representing a small group of gay Orthodox Jews.

"Despite the caustic reactions, the religious community is finally talking about the subject and starting to realize it has homosexual and lesbian members," said Avigail Sperber, a 33-year-old filmmaker who leads an Orthodox Jewish lesbian group called Bat Kol, a term meaning God's female voice.

DOJ_NMG_0093462

In a speech to the crowd, rally organizer Elena Canetti said she had rejected appeals to move the event to a more gay-friendly environment.

"Why not leave Jerusalem to the fanatics? Because I will not give up my right to live openly as a lesbian in my city," she said.

"If we flee to another city, to Tel Aviv, or Amsterdam, or San Francisco, we will find ourselves centimeter by centimeter giving way to bullies and violence."

U.N. Delivers Plan For Court In Hariri Case To Lebanon (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Nov. 10 — The United Nations delivered a draft document to the Lebanese government on Friday outlining the framework of an international tribunal to try suspects in the assassination of the country's former prime minister, Rafik Hariri.

The killing is being investigated by a United Nations commission. The chief prosecutor, Serge Brammertz, told the Security Council in September that he was developing evidence suitable for presentation to a court.

The investigation has already implicated senior Lebanese and Syrian security officials, though Syria has denied any role.

The draft arrived in Beirut at a moment of heightened political tension. The Syrian-supported Hezbollah militia is seeking more power in the government and is not eager to see the tribunal go forward.

Mr. Hariri was killed along with 22 others in a truck bombing in downtown Beirut on Feb. 14, 2005.

He had been known as a fierce opponent of Syrian domination of his country, and his killing provoked civic outrage and mass demonstrations that led Syria to comply with a Security Council resolution calling on it to withdraw its troops from Lebanon after a 29-year presence.

The Brammertz investigation has concluded that the Hariri killing was highly organized and planned by professionals with past experience in such activities.

The special court will have jurisdiction over suspects in the Hariri killing and in 14 other assassinations that the Brammertz commission has been investigating.

The final draft does not include an earlier mention of the possibility of trials on crimes against humanity. But among the crimes the tribunal can judge, the draft lists acts of terrorism, crimes and offenses against life and personal integrity, illicit associations and failure to report crimes or evidence of conspiracy.

The draft was approved this week by the five permanent members of the Security Council after procedural objections from Russia were met over how the judges and prosecutors were to be chosen.

The draft calls for the judges to be appointed by the secretary general in consultation with a selection panel and the Lebanese government, and most of them to be from outside Lebanon. The lead prosecutor will be international and the deputy will be Lebanese.

The final draft stakes out no clear position on whether top leaders will be liable to prosecution by the court or whether they can claim head-of-state immunity.

The court's location has also been left open. United Nations diplomats said they were looking for a site in the immediate region but outside of Lebanon, which does not want the court on its territory.

The personal representative of Secretary General Kofi Annan, Geir Pederson, gave copies on Friday to Fouad Siniora, the Lebanese prime minister, and other officials in Beirut. Mr. Siniora's office said the cabinet would take it up starting Nov. 20, after he returns from a trip abroad.

If Lebanon signs off on the draft, Mr. Annan will send a report to the Security Council with the agreed-upon language. The court does not need a vote or a resolution to come into being, only the consensus of the 15 Council members.

A Royal Emirati Whose Career Fuels Young Women's Dreams (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

Dubai, United Arab Emirates

DOJ_NMG_0093463

FOR Sheika Lubna al-Qassimi, the most memorable moments typically happen in the shopping malls and public gatherings of this rapidly growing nation, not in the halls of power she navigates every day. They come when young Emirati women approach her to take their photograph with her, tell her their dreams or, best of all, ask her for career advice.

During those moments, she says, she realizes how much has changed for women here since she first started out in business, but she also sees how much farther they still have to go.

"I had to prove that stamina and delivering have nothing to do with gender," she told a group of young entrepreneurs recently. "We are the ones who usually discourage ourselves even before anyone else discourages us."

After decades of pushing the barriers in a region where women have traditionally been kept out of the public sphere, Sheika Lubna now towers as one of the country's most influential women. She is the first woman here to be a minister, but no less important, she is the minister of economy and planning, a particularly important position in a nation that is a major oil producer and relies so heavily on foreign investment, and where the economy continues to boom.

On any given day, she may be shuttling between world capitals to sign trade agreements, or between cities in the Emirates to garner support for her policies, or to lend support for a cause. She has pushed for the deregulation of cross-border trade while answering calls for greater oversight over the investment sector and stumping for foreign investment in her country.

But throughout, she has remained conscious of her role in chipping away at the restrictions women face in this region.

"Every day and night, I think about how the girls need to change," Sheika Lubna said emphatically. "Ultimately, I am out there for them."

THE United Arab Emirates have one of the fastest growing economies in the Middle East, and also have one of the most open societies in the Persian Gulf. Women are afforded many freedoms and are encouraged to work and take part in public life. But ultimately this is a traditional society for local women, where marriage and family are still central in a woman's life, where the law favors men in issues of family and where many women opt for reliable government jobs or simply choose to stay at home.

But with the outside world crashing into Emirati homes, and divorce rates on the rise, women must be better prepared to take care of themselves than their mothers' generation, Sheika Lubna and other women here argue.

As a woman who challenged all the societal rules in the 1970s, working her way up the ranks as a computer engineer, then a chief executive and a government minister, she has sought to prove to women here that they, too, must begin assuming a greater role in public life.

Her family is the ruling family of the emirate of Sharjah, the emirate neighboring Dubai; her uncle is the ruler. As royalty, she faced even more traditional demands than most. Moreover, she never really needed to work, and if she chose to, she could have opted for a low-key job in a ceremonial role or as a bureaucrat.

She chose the hard way, however. When other women were staying home in the late 1970s, Sheika Lubna left for California to study computer engineering, becoming one of the first Emirati women to travel abroad for study.

"She has always been a woman in a man's world, and maybe some of these things might not have looked right at the time," said Farouk El-Baz, director of the Center for Remote Sensing at Boston University, who is a confidant of the sheika and a close friend of the family. "She's a person who cannot take 'no' for an answer. She would think about any challenge thoroughly, then begin to tackle it."

When she returned in 1981, she took a job as a programmer for an Indian software firm called Datamation, working as the sole woman on a team of mostly Indian programmers — something virtually unheard of in the day. She parlayed that experience into a job at the Dubai Ports Authority, where she rose to being an information technology manager, developing a documentation system that helped reduce the time needed for paperwork from one hour per ship to 10 minutes.

That led to the creation of an online marketplace for supporting purchase orders for companies in Dubai's free-trade zones, and later led her to start a business-to-business auction site, Tejari, on the eve of the dot-com collapse. That company survived the rout, and today it does business throughout the Middle East.

BUT when she received the telephone call in late 2004 asking her if she was willing to be nominated as a minister, Sheika Lubna was surprisingly ambivalent, she said. She had been planning to enroll in a Ph.D. program at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and the high-stress position would have delayed her studies, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0093464

"When I got the call I thought, 'I don't want to do this. I want to go to M.I.T.,' " she said. "But the call for the country never goes away. It would be the first time a woman took a powerful position in cabinet. I was a change agent, but I would now become a role model."

This spring, when American senators and representatives got up in arms over the planned sale of some operations at major American ports to DP World, Sheika Lubna's former employer, she traveled to Washington without an entourage and became one of the most public faces of the United Arab Emirates.

As she set out to advocate for the Emirates, people at home, especially young women seeking to break out of the traditional mold, saw a different message: it was time to rise to the challenge.

"We were misunderstood because no one knew anything about us," Sheika Lubna said as she recounted the political firestorm that erupted over the ports deal. "But we have a responsibility to explain ourselves and who we want to be."

She won over many Americans with her folksy, girl-next-door charm, seeking to settle stereotypes and misconceptions about the Arab world and usher the United Arab Emirates onto the world stage.

When an American businesswoman asked her if women could work in the Emirates, she answered, matter-of-factly, "I was the C.E.O. of a company," and continued the conversation.

When another asked her if women could drive in her country, she noted that she had spent years commuting between her home in Sharjah and Dubai, but she admitted wryly that she was glad to now have a driver.

"Women always told me, 'you're a sheika; why are you doing all of this?' " she said with a degree of amazement. "But when you break out of the mold, you can break all the taboos. I had nothing to refer to, but I did have a blind belief that this is the right path."

Poland Sets Referendum On Euro, Further Clouding Stance On EU (WSJ)

By Marc Champion

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

WARSAW -- Poland plans to hold a referendum on whether to join the European Union's common currency, the euro, in 2010, adding to concerns over the commitment level of the EU's biggest new member.

Under terms of its EU membership, Poland is obliged to join in using the euro as soon as it meets certain inflation and deficit criteria. If Poles voted that they didn't want to implement the currency, the government would be under pressure to breach its treaty obligations with the EU.

That would follow a precedent set by Sweden, which has voted not to join the euro despite a legal obligation to do so. But Poland's plan is just the latest move by President Lech Kaczynski and his twin brother, Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski, to put Poland at loggerheads with the EU.

Finance Minister Zyta Gilowska told reporters Friday that she expected Poland to meet the euro entry criteria in 2009 and then to hold a referendum a year later. "Only death and taxes are certain," she said, adding that she expected that President Kaczynski, who has been skeptical of the EU, would campaign on the side of implementing the euro and that Poles would agree.

However, the decision to hold a referendum raises a question about Poland's membership intentions. The referendum would be held in the same year as Polish presidential elections, making the euro issue highly political.

Meanwhile, Poland also has said that it will veto negotiations on a new EU-Russia partnership on Monday if the deal doesn't include measures to open access to oil- and gas-pipeline networks, something Russia has said it won't accept. On Wednesday, Polish officials are expected to clash with the European Commission over the country's budget deficit. The commission is expected to declare Poland's deficit above EU limits, demanding action to bring it down. Poland's central-bank chief has called the government's deficit plans "irresponsible."

The International Monetary Fund has also said the budget-deficit projections should be lower, at a time when Poland is growing by more than 5%.

Ms. Gilowska defended the deficit level, saying she found it "difficult to understand" the commission's position. Poland has introduced radical pension overhauls that will push the deficit up to about 4% next year, above the EU's 3% limit. Ms. Gilowska said she expected the actual outcome to be 3.5%, within the cushion the commission has allowed for pension overhaul.

DOJ_NMG_0093465

Cyprus Says Rival's Transit Ban Will Hurt EU Credibility (WT)

By Andrew Borowiec

The Washington Times, November 11, 2006

NICOSIA, Cyprus -- The battle of wills over Turkey's European Union membership application heightened yesterday after the government of Cyprus warned that the bloc's credibility was at stake if it tolerates Ankara's ban on Greek Cypriot air and sea traffic.

Foreign Minister George Lillikas termed Ankara's refusal to open its harbors and airports to Greek Cypriot ships and planes a "provocation," which the EU should not tolerate.

Despite a stinging EU report on Turkey's progress on membership earlier this week, the Turkish government reaffirmed its policy of keeping Greek Cypriot traffic out unless the EU ends what Ankara describes as "the economic blockade" of the Turkish Cypriot northern part of the divided island.

The EU has given Turkey a month to liberalize trade links with all 10 countries that joined in 2004, including Cyprus. The latest report also criticized Turkey's penal code, corruption, human rights record and the interference by the military in politics.

"We want Turkey to become a member of the European family, but we don't want Turkey as it is today," Mr. Lillikas said.

Turkey feels that admitting Greek Cypriot ships and planes would be tantamount to recognition of a government that Turkey rejects as not representing all of Cyprus. The northern part of the island, the self-styled Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus, is recognized only by Turkey.

Olli Rehn, the EU's expansion commissioner, warned that a one-month deadline given Turkey to change its policy "is likely to be the last opportunity to make real, serious progress for some years to come" on the Cyprus question, which emerged as a major obstacle in Turkey's EU hopes.

But to a number of Turkish officials and commentators, the deadline amounted to an ultimatum prior to the EU's planned summit in mid-December.

With Turkish polls showing a considerable drop in support for EU membership, some editorials wondered whether "Turkey should reject Europe before it is rejected by Europe." The government of Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan has played down the degree of tension in the EU talks, but some officials admitted the precarious nature of the bargaining.

According to Egeman Bagis, a senior adviser to the prime minister, "We can be a prosperous, Western-looking democracy without the EU. Norway has done this, so why can't we?"

Mehmet Dulger, chairman of the parliament's Foreign Affairs Committee, said that if the EU talks collapse over Cyprus, "the West would lose a vital bridge with the Islamic world at a time when having this bridge is more important than ever."

There has been a considerable shift in popular attitudes in the EU toward Turkey, a Muslim nation of 70 million.

After the latest EU report, German Chancellor Angela Merkel, a skeptic on Turkish EU membership, said, "Turkey must meet its obligations by the end of the year. Otherwise the EU will have to draw the appropriate conclusions."

U.S. Criticizes U.N. Rights Council (AP)

By Justin Bergman, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 11, 2006

The United States sharply criticized the new U.N. Human Rights Council on Friday, calling it a "disappointment" and saying it has failed to address serious violations in its first few months of operation — particularly in Sudan's Darfur region.

Sudan responded with a harsh condemnation of the U.S. human rights record and said Washington had no right to judge the effectiveness of the U.N. agency.

The barbs came during the Human Rights Council's first annual report to the General Assembly. The U.S. is not a member of the council, which was created earlier this year to replace the highly politicized and much-maligned U.N. Human Rights Commission.

Miriam Hughes, head of the economic and social development section of the U.S. mission to the U.N., criticized the council for a "slow and discouraging start," saying it has "accomplished little that will make a concrete and significant difference in the lives of millions around the world."

DOJ_NMG_0093466

Hughes said the council has failed to reach agreement on how to address "egregious violations of human rights in places such as Sudan," where more than 200,000 people have been killed in fighting between the army and rebels in Darfur since early 2003.

Referring to the two special sessions the council has held to discuss alleged human rights violations by Israel, she said some nations view the council "as just another arena in which to play political games."

"Sadly, so far the Human Rights Council, into which was put so much hope and work, has been a disappointment," Hughes said.

The council, which began its work in June, held two special sessions this summer to discuss the Israeli offensive in the Gaza Strip and the Israel-Hezbollah war in Lebanon. One of the United States' main criticisms of the former Human Rights Commission was that it spent a great deal of time criticizing Israel.

In his speech to the General Assembly, Sudanese diplomat Idrees Mohamed Ali Mohammed Saeed called the U.S. criticisms "amazing and ridiculous."

"Everybody knows the magnitude of the gross violations of human rights in the United States," said Saeed, the second secretary of the Sudanese mission. He cited as examples the treatment of prisoners at the Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, detention center and detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

"We call upon the United States to address the human rights situation at home first and not to use and abuse the forums of human rights to settle political scores and achieve its objectives," he said.

Sudan is also not a member of the council.

Richard Grenell, spokesman for the U.S. mission to the U.N., said later by telephone that the U.S. "didn't feel the need" to respond to Saeed's statement. "The government of Sudan's record speaks for itself," he said.

The United States has been one of the most vocal critics of the violence in Darfur, which has also left 2.5 million people homeless.

U.N. investigators and rights groups have blamed the worst atrocities on the janjaweed, a pro-government militia that is widely accused of killing villagers and destroying their homes. The government denies supporting the janjaweed.

The United States opposed the establishment of the Human Rights Council earlier this year, saying it did not go far enough to prevent rights abusers from winning seats, and decided against being a candidate for the body. Cuba, Saudi Arabia, China and Russia won seats despite their poor human rights records.

The European Union offered a more positive assessment of the council's work Friday. Speaking on behalf of the EU, Finnish Ambassador Kirsti Lintonen told the General Assembly the council had addressed many important issues since its inception, including the violence between Israel and the Palestinians and the worsening crisis in Darfur.

However, she said the EU "regrets" the council did not adopt substantial decisions on the conflicts and discuss them in a more balanced manner.

The council's report, which mainly deals with the forced disappearances of people and indigenous rights, was to be considered by a General Assembly committee.

Russia Reaches Trade Deal With U.S. (WP)

By Peter Finn, Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

MOSCOW, Nov. 10 -- Russia and the United States on Friday announced a landmark trade agreement, substantially advancing Moscow's pursuit of World Trade Organization membership and cementing the position of the former Communist giant in the global economy.

The deal, announced here by the Russian Economic Development and Trade Ministry, was a victory for President Vladimir Putin, who has chafed at Russia's exclusion from the WTO, a global body that shapes the terms of world trade. The Bush administration, which has been locked in sometimes bitter negotiations with Moscow over the accord, characterized it as a milestone in the evolution of Russia from erstwhile Cold War enemy to a growing trading partner.

DOJ_NMG_0093467

"It is a clear indication of Russia's efforts to participate fully in and benefit from the rules-based global trading system," declared U.S. Trade Representative Susan C. Schwab in a written statement.

Russia is the largest economy still outside the WTO. Its inclusion would be a major advance in the development of a global body devoted to seeking reduction of tariffs and promoting trade around the world. Earlier this week, Vietnam, a country still controlled by the Communist Party, gained the right to join the trading body.

The top trade negotiators for Russia and the United States are planning to sign their accord next week in Vietnam's capital, Hanoi -- a city still draped in homage to Ho Chi Minh -- during a meeting of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum. Presidents Bush and Putin are expected to toast the agreement when Bush stops off in Moscow Wednesday on his way to that meeting.

But the deal will not finalize Russia's decade-old quest for WTO membership. The Kremlin still must finish bilateral negotiations with three other countries, Costa Rica, Moldova and Georgia. The latter two have seen their wine and agricultural products banned here. Russian officials said the wine was unsafe, but the Georgians said the embargo was political retaliation for its courting of the West and its desire to join the NATO alliance.

Georgia, in particular, is likely to try to use Russia's desire for WTO membership as leverage in negotiations. Political tensions between Russia and its southern neighbor are high, and Georgia's small economy has been damaged by the bans as well as a transportation blockade. In addition, the state-controlled Russian energy giant Gazprom recently announced that it planned to more than double the price of natural gas for Georgia and cut off supplies if the Georgians don't pay.

Georgia had negotiated a trade deal with Russia in 2004 and is determined to return to the bargaining table. But officials in the capital, Tbilisi, said they would attempt to block Russian membership unless it lifts the various embargoes.

If Russia satisfies Georgia's objections and reaches agreements with Moldova and Costa Rica, it will still confront further multilateral negotiations within the WTO, giving all countries -- including United States -- another chance to extract trade concessions.

In Washington, now entering a new political era with Democrats taking charge of Congress, the Russia deal could present an early test of the new leadership's inclinations on trade. Some Democrats campaigned on opposition to liberalized trade, accusing Republicans of selling out American workers to corporate interests. Congress cannot block the Russian accord, but it must approve legislation granting Russia what is known as permanent normal trading relations before American companies can be certain of benefiting from Russia's WTO accession.

In a written statement, Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), who is expected to chair the Finance Committee, praised the accord as a positive development but signaled skepticism about the details, particularly about Russia's willingness to allow American agricultural products and crack down on the rampant piracy of U.S.-made movies and software.

"Russia must take additional steps to earn a welcome into the WTO," Baucus said. "Russia maintains unacceptable levels of piracy and counterfeiting, and these must be addressed before Congress can endorse Russia's WTO membership."

But in gaining the blessing of the Bush administration, Russia's bid to join the WTO cleared what analysts said was by far the highest hurdle, making Moscow's eventual induction fairly certain.

"This is a big country, and there are big geopolitical interests in getting them in," said Jeffrey J. Schott, a trade expert at the Peterson Institute for International Economics in Washington. "This is really solving some problems that we have had in our bilateral relationship."

The Russian-American trade negotiations have been politically charged while dragging on for years as the two sides tried to resolve differences over the import of American agricultural products, the piracy of U.S. intellectual property, and access to the Russian banking and insurance sectors for American companies.

The exact terms of the agreement were not immediately released by either side. But U.S officials said Moscow had agreed to open the Russian market to American beef, poultry, pork, corn, wheat and fruit while allowing U.S. banks and insurance companies to set up and expand. The American side had to agree to comply with certain Russian food safety standards, a significant sticking point. Russia also agreed to roll back tariffs on U.S.-made machinery.

For now, trade between the two countries remains relatively modest, with the United States last year exporting nearly $4 billion of goods to Russia, according to the Commerce Department, and Russia sending some $19 billion worth of wares to the United States. But the trade accord should lift curbs on U.S. investment in once-sensitive Russian sectors such as telecommunications and banking, said David Tarr, an economist at the World Bank. It should also spur Moscow to open more of its economy to competition, he added. Reformers within the government, now tangling with those armored against change, will have the force of international treaties working for them.

DOJ_NMG_0093468

Russian frustration over the failure to reach agreement sooner had seeped into other areas. Analysts here linked the unresolved talks to the recent decision of Aeroflot, the state airline, not to purchase 22 Boeing airplanes and the exclusion of Western energy companies from the development of a giant natural gas field in the Barents Sea.

Russia Near Deal To Join The W.T.O. (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer, Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

MOSCOW, Nov. 10 — Officials in Washington and Moscow reached an agreement in principle for Russia to join the World Trade Organization, crossing the final big hurdle in the stop-and-go cycle that has marked the process since Moscow began its application shortly after the collapse of the Soviet Union.

The deal is expected to be signed next Saturday, when both President Bush and President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia will be in Hanoi for an Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation meeting, negotiators from both countries said. The White House also announced this week that President Bush planned to stop in Moscow on Nov. 15 on his way to Vietnam.

"We have agreement in principle and are finalizing the details," the United States trade representative, Susan Schwab, said in a statement. "It is a clear indication of Russia's efforts to participate fully in and benefit from the rules-based global trading system."

Mr. Putin has repeatedly said that joining the 149-member W.T.O. was a major foreign policy goal, though Russia's oil-driven economy will get few direct gains from membership in the organization, which sets the ground rules for globalization. But joining would give Russia a voice in world trade talks, with the potential to help set future trade policy.

"Russia today is the only major world economy outside the W.T.O. — the only one," Mr. Putin said at a news conference early in his presidency, in June 2002. "Staying outside this organization, outside this process is dangerous and stupid."

American officials say the countries gradually worked out nagging disputes on issues like agriculture inspections, chicken exports to Russia and intellectual property protection.

The Bush administration has other contentious issues with Russia, particularly its support for Iran and that country's nuclear program. There was no immediate sign of any broader deal involving those issues.

One American official said that Russian negotiators had been a "moving target" back in July, balking on issues that Washington thought had been resolved. But they said Russian officials had become more forthcoming in recent weeks.

"At the bitter end, the issues were quite trivial," said Gary C. Hufbauer, a trade policy expert at the Institute for International Economics in Washington, who has followed the negotiations.

Mr. Hufbauer suggested that Russian leaders might have decided to seal a deal out of worry that this week's elections would mean greater resistance by Democrats to an accord. "I think the Russians read the election returns and realized that if they don't go for it now, they might not get anything," he said.

Russia still must win approval from Moldova and Georgia, countries with deep grievances over a Russian ban on importing wine, ostensibly for health reasons. Those countries could further delay any final deal on W.T.O. membership, which is expected to take place next year. Russian officials have said they want to join in 2007.

Georgia first approved Russia's membership but rescinded it last month, after Russia blockaded its border. Maksim Medvedkov, Russia's chief negotiator, said Friday in remarks carried on state television that he would not negotiate with Moldova and Georgia separately but try to allay their objections during multilateral talks with the W.T.O. in Geneva.

The European Union, China and Japan have already signed off on Russian membership.

American officials said they reached agreement on longstanding disputes about American exports of poultry, beef and pork. Russia is the United States' biggest export market for chicken parts, but American producers have long complained about being hindered by Russian inspection procedures.

DOJ_NMG_0093469

The agreement also calls for Russia to offer greater access for foreign services, from construction to overnight parcel delivery and telecommunications. Russian officials also agreed to allow banks and investment firms in Russia to be owned by foreign companies, meaning that foreign banks would not need to team up with Russian partners.

American trade negotiators accepted an unusual restriction on foreign players in the banking and insurance sectors, according to the trade representative office. It will limit foreign investment to no greater than 50 percent of total investments in these businesses. In Moscow, state television reported Friday that Russia was the only country in the W.T.O. to win this concession.

Russia also promised to step up enforcement of intellectual property rights, which had been carried out in spotty fashion.

Russian trade relations with the United States, while forming only a tiny share of both countries' total foreign trade, have gone through some dismal periods. In 2002, President Bush imposed tariffs on steel, a major Russian export commodity, and Mr. Putin retaliated by banning imports of chicken thighs, known as "Bush Legs" because the product first arrived in Russia as food aid under the president's father in the early 1990s.

In contrast to China, Russia's oil-dependent economy gains little from joining the W.T.O. "China is a consumer goods manufacturer and exporter and there was a huge benefit for China," said Peter Westin, chief economist at the MDM Bank. "There will be nothing like that for Russia."

Instead, Mr. Westin and other economists say, the primary benefit for Russia would come in exposing the domestic banking, telecommunications and other sectors to more direct foreign competition. This should increase productivity.

Ford Motor, which produces about 70,000 cars a year in Russia and exports another 50,000 cars to Russia, said it was delighted by the deal. Over the next seven years, Russian duties on foreign-made cars are set to decline to 15 percent, from 25 percent today.

"What all this adds up to," said Stephen E. Biegun, Ford's vice president for international governmental affairs, "is that we will be able to grow as fast as we possibly can in Russia."

Russia's WTO Bid Comes Closer To Fruition (WSJ)

By Guy Chazan

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

MOSCOW -- Russia and the U.S. say they will sign a landmark deal in the coming days paving the way for Russia to join the World Trade Organization -- a goal that Moscow has doggedly pursued for the past 12 years and that has been one of the key objectives of Vladimir Putin's presidency.

The breakthrough removes a major irritant in relations between Moscow and Washington that have been strained by disagreements over Iran and U.S. accusations that Russia is backsliding on democracy and human rights and using energy to bully its neighbors.

"We have an agreement in principle and are finalizing the details," U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab said. She said the deal "will mark an important step in Russia attaining membership of the WTO."

Russian officials said delegations of both countries were trying to make sure the deal would be ready for signing when Mr. Putin and President Bush meet during the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation Forum summit in Hanoi, Vietnam during the week.

The U.S. is the only one of Russia's major trading partners that hasn't signed a bilateral trade deal with Moscow, provoking much frustration in the Kremlin. Russia had hoped to reach such an agreement in time for July's G-8 summit, which it hosted, and the failure to do so cast a pall over the meeting. Both countries set an informal deadline of the end of October, but a week of negotiations in Washington last month ended without progress.

Central to the deal was the resolution of a longstanding dispute over the safety of U.S. beef and pork exports. Russia insisted on inspecting all U.S. exporters' meat-production facilities before it agreed to lift restrictions on such imports. The results of the inspections, which took several months, were positive, according to a person close to the talks.

Meanwhile, the U.S. appears to have made concessions on access to Russia's financial-services market. It had initially demanded that Moscow allow foreign banks and insurance companies to open branches in Russia. According to U.S. trade officials, the final deal allows only insurance companies to open branches. But Russia agreed to allow the total share of foreign investment in the banking sector to rise to 50% from 25%, according to a person familiar with the talks.

DOJ_NMG_0093470

Russia also agreed to improve protection and enforcement of intellectual-property rights -- a key issue for U.S. copyright groups that have long complained about rampant compact-disc and computer-software piracy in Russia.

WTO membership would mark a milestone for Russia, demonstrating to the world that it adheres to the rules of global trade, has eradicated the last vestiges of socialism and is fully integrated into the world economy.

But the country faces several more months of negotiations before it can join the WTO. Once the bilateral deal with the U.S. is signed, it must enter multilateral talks under WTO auspices in Geneva, which will set the final rules for its entry into the organization. Analysts say the U.S. has kicked some of the more contentious issues in its trade talks, such as protection of intellectual-property rights, to the multilateral forum, and negotiations there could drag on for months.

Russia also has to wrap up bilateral deals with Costa Rica, Georgia and Moldova, and some officials in the latter two countries have threatened to block Russia's WTO accession in retaliation for trade sanctions Moscow has imposed on them.

In practical terms, WTO membership may have little impact for Russian companies, since the country's main exports -- oil and gas -- are rarely subjected to protective tariffs. But it would safeguard some companies, such as steel producers, from arbitrary sanctions while allowing Western companies greater access to the potentially huge Russian market for agricultural goods, aircraft and finance.

Last month, executives from 13 major U.S. corporations, including Chevron Corp., Citigroup Inc. and Ford Motor Co., wrote to Messrs. Bush and Putin urging them to wrap up a WTO agreement, saying it was in the economic interests of both countries to reach a deal.

Andrew Somers, head of the American Chamber of Commerce in Russia, said the deal would give a huge boost to the U.S.-Russian economic relationship. "This will facilitate the conclusion of major industrial transactions between U.S. and Russian companies, including those in strategic sectors," Mr. Somers said.

Obstacles to Russia's WTO bid still remain. The U.S. Congress must decide whether to approve "permanent normal trade relations," or PNTR, with Russia before it can join the WTO. That would entail removing a Cold War-era trade restriction known as the Jackson-Vanik amendment that linked U.S. trade benefits to the emigration policies of communist countries.

Russia And US Reach Deal On WTO (FT)

By Neil Buckley, Alan Beattie, Eoin Callan

Financial Times, November 11, 2006

Russia and the US on Friday agreed in principle on the terms for Russian entry into the World Trade Organisation, giving a significant boost to Moscow's hopes of joining the 149-nation body after 13 years of talks.

The two countries are set to sign the deal in Hanoi on November 18 at the Asia-Pacific Economic Co-operation summit, following final consultations in coming days.

"Delegations from both sides have reached agreement on all the principal conditions of this agreement," the Russian economy ministry said in a statement. Susan Schwab, US Trade Representative, said agreement had been reached "in principle".

Russia, which has enjoyed an oil-fuelled economic recovery in the past eight years, is the last big market outside the aegis of the WTO. The US was the last big nation with which Moscow had still to conclude a bilateral entry deal.

Many US businesses, also enjoying rapid growth in Russia, have lobbied hard for a deal. Mr Putin made WTO membership a political priority early in his presidency.

Andrew Somers, president of the American Chamber of Commerce in Moscow, said the agreement was a "major positive milestone in relations between our two countries".

Analysts had warned any deal could face difficulties winning approval in Congress, particularly after both houses came under Democratic control this week. Congress must repeal the 1974 Jackson-Vanik amendment, which subjects Russia's trading status to annual review, to ensure Russia is granted permanent normal trading relations by the US.

DOJ_NMG_0093471

But a Bush administration official characterised meetings with Democratic leaders on Friday to brief them on the deal as "positive".

Senator Max Baucus, Democratic chair of the Senate Finance Committee, welcomed the accord, saying: “Russia’s WTO membership on commercially meaningful terms is an important goal.”

Russia must still reach a bilateral agreement with Costa Rica and confirm agreements with Moldova and Georgia – which could be complicated by its tense relations with Tbilisi – and complete multilateral talks. That could push the date for Russian entry well into next year.

Talks with the US had stalled over disagreements surrounding the liberalisation of financial services and Russia’s commitment to combat counterfeiting and piracy. The two sides hoped to reach a deal at the Group of Eight summit in July, but disagreed over US demands to export beef and pork to Russia, setting an October target for agreement.

USTR officials cautioned that Russia had not yet cleared all hurdles to WTO entry, and they would continue to press the Russian authorities for stronger commitments during the multilateral stage of the accession process.

The US, with some tacit support from Europe and Japan, has insisted that Russia must not only pass laws respecting intellectual property rights, but also ensure they are enforced.

“Our goal is to work with Russia to get them through the multilateral phase by working on issues such as enforcement,” a USTR spokesman said.

Sherman Katz, senior associate in the Carnegie Foundation think-tank in Washington, said that previous experience with China, criticised for continuing to allow counterfeiting of music and movies since joining the WTO in 2001, had made American companies and negotiators cautious.

“Both China and Russia were centrally-planned economies with no tradition of private ownership of much of anything, let alone an abstract like intellectual property,” he said.

WTO protections on intellectual property could benefit not just the international music and entertainment industry but makers of goods such as prescription medicines and designer clothes – often faked in Russia.

Russia’s economy, too, would receive a significant boost from membership, though analysts say the benefits would be less than those experienced by China, with Russian exports heavily dominated by oil and gas.

Russia Moves Closer To WTO Membership (AP)

By Jeannine Aversa, AP Economics Writer

AP, November 11, 2006

A longtime economic goal of Russia — entry into the World Trade Organization — moved a crucial step forward Friday as U.S. and Russian trade negotiators reached agreement.

It took 12 years of negotiations to get to this point, and details are still being nailed down. Both countries are hopeful that a bilateral pact can be signed next week in Hanoi, where President Bush and Russian President Vladimir Putin will be attending the annual Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation meeting.

About four months ago, U.S. and Russia had appeared on the verge of an agreement, but it failed to materialize — right before the summit of leaders of the world's wealthiest countries in St. Petersburg, Russia. The collapse strained relations between Washington and Moscow.

Russia is the largest economy still outside the 149-nation WTO, which sets the rules for global trade. Putin's government sees membership as a way to show that his country has regained financial muscle since its economic crisis in 1998.

Even if a formal agreement is signed next week, there are other steps that still would have to be taken before Russia could become a member. Clearing those will take time — perhaps a year or two, some experts say. Others think it could be done sooner.

Membership in the WTO would mean Russia would receive the same favorable tariff rates for its products as other members. Other countries also would have to follow WTO rules in trade disputes with Russia. And, Russia — a big exporter of oil and gas — would have to abide by WTO's trade rules.

DOJ_NMG_0093472

In theory, freer trade would give Russian companies more opportunities to sell their goods on world markets, while WTO membership for Russia might make its sizable market of potential customers even more attractive to companies in the U.S. and elsewhere, experts said.

"Businesses would feel more comfortable, more at ease doing business in Russia because there would be rules," said Oscar Gonzalez, economist at John Hancock Financial Services.

Terms of the U.S.-Russia agreement weren't released. But the two sides for years have been working to resolve differences over, among other things, piracy of U.S. goods and intellectual property rights, sales of American agricultural products to the country and U.S. access to the country's banking and insurance sectors.

"We have an agreement in principle and are finalizing the details," said U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab. "It is a clear indication of Russia's efforts to participate fully in and benefit from the rules-based global trading system," she said. Schwab said she and her counterpart, Russian Economics Minister German Gref, hope to sign the pact in Hanoi.

Some analysts have said that a deal on the WTO could persuade Moscow to soften its opposition to punishing Iran for refusing to halt sensitive uranium enrichment. The United States and its European allies want to impose sanctions on Iran, but Russia has resisted.

Bush will meet with Putin next week in Moscow. Russia's WTO bid and Iran's nuclear ambitions probably will be discussed, said the Kremlin's deputy spokesman, Dmitry Peskov.

If Russia does eventually win entry into the WTO it won't necessarily mean an end to trade tensions. China was admitted to the WTO in 2001, and the U.S. trade deficit with Beijing has mushroomed since then. The United States complains that China has been slow to honor its commitments to open its huge economy to more U.S.-made goods and to crack down on piracy. On the other hand, U.S. companies have flocked there to have their goods manufactured at a low cost.

"Russia's entry into the WTO would be one more step in the ongoing globalization of the U.S. economy, but I don't think it will mean as much to the United States as China's entry into the WTO did because Russia doesn't have the same vast cheap pool of labor that China does. I don't think we'll see massive direct investment in Russia," said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com.

Congress would still have to pass legislation removing Russia from the 1974 Jackson-Vanik amendment, which ties Russia's trade status to whether the country is allowing Jews to freely leave the country. Congressional action is some ways off, experts said.

The newly elected Congress, which convenes in January, will be controlled by Democrats, who are less receptive to free-trade agreements than Republicans.

Associated Press writers Henry Meyer and Alex Nicholson contributed to this report from Moscow.

Russia To Sign Agreement With U.S. On Terms For WTO (BLOOM)

By Mark Drajem And Sebastian Alison

Bloomberg, November 11, 2006

Nov. 10 -- Russia and the U.S. will sign terms for the former Soviet state to join the World Trade Organization next week, clearing one of the last hurdles for an agreement that may add $10 billion a year to the Russian economy.

``We have an agreement in principle and are finalizing the details," U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab said in a statement. Schwab and her Russian counterpart, German Gref, plan to sign the agreement when they meet in Asia next week.

Russia, the last major economy not be a member of the WTO, has sought for more than a decade to join the Geneva-based trade body, which sets international trade and investment rules. Membership stands to boost the Russian economy through increased trade and foreign investment.

The two countries resolved long-festering disputes over trade in meat and rules for financial investment, according to details sent out by the U.S. trade office. Lobbyists say they remain at odds over Russia's intellectual property protections, and will negotiate that in the next round of talks between Russia and all 149 WTO members.

DOJ_NMG_0093473

Two other obstacles remain: Russia must overcome Georgia's opposition to its entry to the world trade arbiter, and the U.S. Congress must vote to grant Russia permanent, normal trade relations if the two countries are to enjoy all the benefits of the trade opening.

The U.S. had been the last WTO member to sign off on Russia's entry. Then, last month Georgia said it was withdrawing its support after Russia blockaded its borders.

All Must Agree

Every WTO member must agree before a new country can join the trade organization, so Georgia's opposition will still keep Russia out of the WTO. Even after negotiating the individual agreements, Russia must undertake general talks with the WTO members as a whole.

``Both parties have it as their goal to complete the process of Russia's accession to the WTO and intend to take more energetic efforts to that end," the Russian trade ministry said in a statement on its Web site.

With the Bush administration's approval, the debate will shift to Capitol Hill. U.S. lawmakers must vote on a measure to repeal a Cold War-era law that requires an annual review of Russia's trade status. If the Congress fails to approve that measure, the U.S. would have to petition the WTO to be exempt from the tariff cuts and other measures Russia has pledged.

Lawmakers have raised objections to Russia's WTO bid for a variety of reasons, including the country's weak intellectual property protections, its support of Iran's nuclear program and its pricing of natural gas exports.

Lower Tariff

Business groups expressed support for the agreement today.

Russia ``is simply too big to leave it outside" the WTO, said Frank Vargo, vice president of the National Association of Manufacturers. The agreement, which calls for Russia to lower its industrial tariff to an average of 8 percent, meets the major demands of the manufacturing group, he said.

Large banks, insurance companies and other service companies had been skeptical of the Russian talks, because the Putin administration had insisted on a cap in foreign investment. The announcement today got their support ``on balance," said Michael Ducker, chairman of the Coalition of Service Industries.

``We believe that this agreement in principle is much better than the positions that Russia started with on insurance branching," said David Snyder, vice president of the American Insurance Association. ``Years of difficult negotiations have produced much progress."

Area of Contention

Still, intellectual property rights are likely to remain an area of contention. Schwab had said that before it can join the WTO Russia must shut down allofmp3.com, which the U.S. says illegally sells copyrighted music around the world. That Web site remained in operation today.

Russia is also proceeding with a rewriting of its copyright and patent law, and that has drawn criticism from U.S. manufacturers, drug companies and recording companies. The U.S. trade office said those issues remain unsolved.

The agreement sets the stage for further progress with Russia on intellectual property rights issues through the next phase of international WTO negotiations, the trade office said.

``From here on, Russia's deeds -- rather than its words -- are the only thing that matters," said Mitch Bainwol, chairman of the Recording Industry Association of America.

U.S. Pact Paves Way For Russia In WTO (WT)

By Steve Hirsch

The Washington Times, November 11, 2006

The United States and Russia have reached a deal that would pave the way for Russia to join the World Trade Organization, the two countries announced yesterday.

"We have an agreement in principle and are finalizing the details," U.S. Trade Representative Susan C. Schwab said.

She and Russian Economic Development and Trade Minister German Gref hope to sign the agreement during the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) summit next week in Vietnam.

DOJ_NMG_0093474

Russia, the last major economy not a member of the 149-member WTO, has tried for 10 years to join the Geneva trade organization, which sets international trade and investment rules. As a member, the Russian economy stands to grow by $10 billion annually through increased trade and foreign investment.

U.S. and Russian officials resolved issues over U.S. meat and poultry exports, and Russia agreed to cut tariffs on manufactured goods, the trade representative's office said. The cuts are expected to help U.S. sales of civil aircraft and parts, medical and scientific equipment, agriculture, power generation, construction equipment, information technology, and chemicals.

National Association of Manufacturers Vice President Frank Vargo called the announcement a "historic step."

"Russia is the only large economy not yet in the WTO, and it is simply too big to leave it outside," he said.

Russia agreed to help exports in the service industries, including companies in construction, finance and telecommunications services. Settling a long dispute, Russia said it would allow full foreign ownership of banks once Russia has joined the WTO, and will allow foreign insurance companies to operate through subsidiaries, although it may impose limits if foreign investment becomes too high.

The Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association praised the agreement, saying it would "further integrate Russia into the global economy."

"It will create new opportunities for securities firms and their customers, opening Russian markets to American firms and providing American expertise and capital to Russia's economy," association Co-Chief Executive Marc Lackritz said.

Russia also said it would take steps to better protect intellectual property rights, another major U.S. concern.

The agreement, Mrs. Schwab said, "is a clear indication of Russia's efforts to participate fully in and benefit from the rules-based global trading system."

But Russia still has a long way to go toward WTO membership.

Every member country must agree to Russia's membership, and Russia must reach trade deals with each member. It has yet to sign a trade agreement with Costa Rica, as well as with its former Soviet neighbors Moldova and Georgia, with whom relations are strained.

Georgian officials have signaled that they would seek to block Russia's membership after Russia imposed sweeping sanctions against Tbilisi in response to the arrest of several of its military personnel in a spying row.

Observers have suggested that progress over Russia's bid would be linked to concessions from Moscow over how to respond to Iran's disputed nuclear program.

Russia has resisted a push from Europe and the U.S. for sanctions against its trade partner, Iran. But analysts have said that a deal over the WTO could persuade Moscow to soften its opposition to punishing Tehran for its refusal to halt sensitive uranium enrichment.

In the U.S., Congress must grant Russia permanent normal trade relations status for U.S. companies to take advantage of the benefits of Russian WTO membership.

Lawmakers have raised objections to Russia's WTO bid for a variety of reasons, including the country's weak intellectual property protections, its support of Iran's nuclear program and its pricing of natural-gas exports.

Mr. Vargo noted the intellectual property measures in the agreement, saying, "A lesson we learned from China's WTO accession is that we have to see intellectual property enforcement come up to speed before -- not after -- we sign on the dotted line."

Still, intellectual property rights are likely to remain an area of contention. Mrs. Schwab has said that before it can join the WTO, Russia must shut down the Web site allofmp3.com, which the U.S. says illegally sells copyright music around the world. The Web site remained in operation yesterday.

Russia also is rewriting its copyright and patent law, and that has drawn criticism from U.S. manufacturers, drug companies and recording companies. The U.S. trade office said those issues remain unresolved.

The agreement sets the stage for further progress with Russia on intellectual property rights issues through the next phase of WTO negotiations, the trade office said.

DOJ_NMG_0093475

Envoy: U.S. Eager For India Nuke Deal (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

A top U.S. official said Friday that Washington is eager to finalize a civilian nuclear pact with India, and urged it to work with neighboring Pakistan in the fight against terrorism when they resume peace talks next week.

The agreement to provide India with much-needed nuclear fuel is seen as a cornerstone of the emerging alliance between New Delhi and Washington after nearly a half-century of Cold War estrangement.

It has strong supporters in both U.S. political parties and was overwhelmingly endorsed by the House of Representatives in July.

The Senate, however, must still approve the deal, and Assistant Secretary of State for South Asia Richard Boucher said he was "very hopeful" the matter would be taken up by the outgoing Senate.

"We want to do it as fast as possible because it is important to the U.S.," he told reporters in New Delhi.

"We made a deal. We want to implement it as agreed as soon as we can," he said. "We are determined to do it. Whatever happens, we will make sure, it happens."

The pact is not expected to be affected by the Democrats' midterm election victory in which they took control of Congress. On Thursday, Democratic leaders in the Senate, including Sen. Joseph Biden, the top Democrat on the Senate foreign relations panel, said they were ready to move ahead with the India bill.

The deal reverses decades of U.S. anti-proliferation policy by shipping civilian nuclear technology to India in return for safeguards and inspections at certain nuclear plants. Critics say the deal would ruin global nonproliferation efforts.

Congress must approve the agreement because India has not signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, which current U.S. law requires for such nuclear cooperation.

Even if Congress should complete its work, several other steps remain before the plan can be implemented, including approval of the Indian exemption by the Nuclear Suppliers Group, an assembly of nations that export nuclear material.

Boucher, who is on a swing through South Asia and visited Pakistan before heading to India, also said New Delhi and Islamabad must work together against terrorism as they reopen peace talks that were stalled by July's train bombings in Mumbai, which killed 207 people.

The two-day talks begin Tuesday in New Delhi, and Boucher said "we hope they can make progress on some of the big political issues that stand between India and Pakistan."

"I am confident that both sides are getting together to try to achieve progress on issues, to try to work together against terrorism," he said.

The nuclear rivals have fought three wars since the bloody partition of the subcontinent after independence from Britain in 1947.

They began a peace process in 2004, and have since taken several fitful steps to improve relations.

But the process broke down after the Mumbai bombings, which India says were carried out by Pakistani militant groups with links to that country's intelligence service — an allegation Islamabad denies.

However, Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh agreed to resume talks when they met in Havana, Cuba, on the sidelines of the Nonaligned Movement Summit in September.

Trade Pacific Rim Initiative Gains A U.S. Push (WSJ)

By James Hookway

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

On the surface, the coming summit of Asian-Pacific leaders in Vietnam is all about North Korea and its nuclear weapons. Kim Jong Il won't be there. But President Bush will be in Hanoi, as will the leaders of the other nations involved in trying to find a way to curtail Mr. Kim's nuclear-weapons program: Japan, China, South Korea and Russia.

But while North Korea will be in the spotlight, some substantive negotiating may be taking place on the sidelines to break another international impasse: how to revive global free-trade talks.

DOJ_NMG_0093476

Discussions on how to further free global trade, initiated in Doha, Qatar, in 2001 under the umbrella of the World Trade Organization, collapsed this past summer. The U.S., European Union and various developing countries blame one another for the deadlock, which largely centered on how to eliminate subsidies for agricultural products.

Now, the U.S. is hoping to use the Hanoi gathering of the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation forum on Nov. 17-19 to kick-start discussions on a long-term goal of creating a Pacific-wide free-trade area. Twenty-one nations are to attend the summit. Some, like Japan, have already indicated their cautious approval of the U.S. initiative, which was first proposed a couple of years ago by Chile.

That initial foray foundered. There wasn't enough appetite for a separate free-trade agreement focused on Pacific Rim countries at that time. And the WTO was supposed to be leading the movement toward liberalizing trade.

Since the derailment of the Doha talks, some major trading nations have been seeking an alternative forum to put free trade back on the table. And while major economies such as those of the EU, Brazil and India won't be present at the APEC summit, plenty of other heavy hitters, such as Australia, Japan, China and Russia, will be there. That makes it a useful venue to try to renew momentum for liberalizing trade and call for a resumption of the Doha round. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has already traveled to Vietnam to meet with other Pacific Rim finance ministers and put free trade firmly back in play.

Still, that doesn't mean the U.S. road map for a Pacific Rim bloc will be adopted wholesale in Hanoi. The Asian countries have plans of their own, and they don't necessarily include the U.S.

Earlier this year, Japan proposed a 16-nation free-trade group in East Asia comprising Southeast Asia, China, Japan, South Korea, India, Australia and New Zealand. China, meanwhile, has signaled it hopes to create a free-trade group of its own with the Association of Southeast Asian Nations, led by Indonesia, Malaysia, Singapore, Thailand and the Philippines.

In December, Asian leaders are to meet in the Philippines to try to further their own plans on this front. Trade officials in Asia say they believe the U.S. is afraid of being left behind.

US Looking For Compromise On UN Force For Darfur (AFP-Y)

AFP, November 10, 2006

The United States said it was considering compromises on the make-up of an international peacekeeping force for Darfur after Sudan rejected demands for deployment of UN troops to halt one of Africa's worst humanitarian disasters in decades.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Washington still wanted United Nations "involvement" in the Darfur force, but he did not reiterate past US insistence the peacekeepers be deployed formally under the world body's banner.

"We're taking a look at how we can address the various concerns that have come up from the Sudanese government, as well as others in the region, about the nature of this international force," McCormack said.

The UN Security Council adopted a resolution in August demanding the deployment of some 20,000 UN troops to Darfur to replace an under-funded African Union (AU) force which has failed to halt the violence.

At least 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million others displaced since a rebellion by Darfur's mainly black African population against the Arab-led Khartoum government erupted in early 2003.

Much of the violence has been blamed on a government-funded Arab militia, known as the Janjaweed.

Sudan President Omar al-Beshir has defiantly rejected the UN resolution, fearing the UN deployment could lead to a partition of his country or arrest government officials on charges of crimes against humanity.

Beshir refused to meet last month with US President George W. Bush's personal envoy, Andrew Natsios, out of anger over a decision to extend long-standing US sanctions against Sudan linked to its human rights record and alleged ties to terrorism.

Natsios first signalled a shift in US policy late last month when he said in an interview that the international force for Darfur did not have to be a "blue-helmeted" UN operation as long as it was big enough and robust enough to halt the violence.

"If it does not have a United Nations helmet, but it is very competent and very aggressive, then we have fulfilled our intention," Natsios said, suggesting the force could be made up of Africa and Arab troops backed by UN or NATO logistical support.

McCormack was more insistent on a UN role in the operation.

DOJ_NMG_0093477

"This is not in any way to compromise on the need for this force and the need for an effective international force that would have UN involvement as central to it, as well as AU involvement as central to it," he said Thursday.

Discussions on the potential make-up of the force were continuing at the United Nations and bilaterally with countries in the region, notably Arab states, he said.

Figure Skater Is New Envoy Of Good Will Overseas (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 9 — During the cold war, the State Department called on the Harlem Globetrotters to travel as good-will ambassadors to counter hostile images of America around the world. During the Cuban missile crisis, the New York City Ballet was sent to perform in Moscow, where it was received enthusiastically.

And during these troubled times? America's newest good-will ambassador is Michelle Kwan, the figure skater, who, in the words of her new boss, Karen P. Hughes, the under secretary of state for public diplomacy, "combines the power of sports diplomacy with the personal appeal of a unique American story."

On Thursday, flanked by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Ms. Hughes, Ms. Kwan, 26, addressed reporters, giving the group a taste of what she would be telling the youth of the world.

She said she planned to share with young people, among other ideas, "In the reality of life, it's not always smooth sailing, and sometimes you have to pick yourself up and keep on going."

While many of the public diplomacy efforts by the United States in the past few years have been directed toward the Muslim world, it was unclear on Thursday whether Ms. Kwan would be sent to Iraq or Afghanistan. Ms. Kwan, who is of Chinese descent, said her first trip would likely be early next year, to Beijing.

"I've always wanted to somehow serve our country and to contribute and to make a difference," she said.

Afterward, reporters crowded around her with questions. "You said you'd like to share some of the values America represents with the world. What are those values?" one asked.

Ms. Kwan talked about the importance of setting goals and taking life as it comes. She also mentioned that she wanted to empower women. She said the idea of her becoming the United States public diplomacy envoy — her new title — came up in April when she met Ms. Rice at a dinner in Washington for President Hu Jintao of China. When Ms. Kwan mentioned that she would be attending the University of Denver, Ms. Rice, a Denver alumna and former competitive figure skater herself, "just lit up," Ms. Kwan said.

One reporter asked Ms. Kwan how she planned to deal with the hostility that she might meet as the public face of America. Ms. Kwan quickly showed that she was already familiar with the advice, contained in a memorandum from Ms. Hughes, recently published in The Washington Post, that advised State Department employees to hew to government policy while talking to the news media.

"I'm not here to talk about my political views," Ms. Kwan demurred. "I'm here to promote America. This is a place where anything is possible."

Greenhouse Guessing (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

It seems impossible to have an honest conversation about global warming. I say this after diligently perusing the British government's huge report released last week by Sir Nicholas Stern, former chief economist of the World Bank and now a high-ranking civil servant. The report is a masterpiece of misleading public relations.

It foresees dire consequences if global warming isn't curbed: a worldwide depression (with a drop in output of as much as 20 percent) and flooding of many coastal cities. Meanwhile, the costs of minimizing these awful outcomes are small: only 1 percent of world economic output in 2050.

No one could fail to conclude that we should conquer global warming instantly, if not sooner. Who could disagree? Well, me. Stern's headlined conclusions are intellectual fictions. They're essentially fabrications to justify an aggressive anti-global-warming agenda. The danger of that is we'd end up with the worst of both worlds: a program that harms the economy without doing much to cut greenhouse gases.

DOJ_NMG_0093478

Let me throw some messy realities onto Stern's tidy picture. In the debate over global warming, there's a big gap between public rhetoric (which verges on hysteria) and public behavior (which indicates indifference). People say they're worried but don't act that way. Greenhouse emissions continue to rise despite many earnest pledges to control them. Just last week the United Nations reported that of the 41 countries it monitors (not including most developing nations), 34 had increased greenhouse emissions from 2000 to 2004. These include most of the countries committed to reducing emissions under the Kyoto Protocol.

Why is this? Here are three reasons.

First: With today's technologies, we don't know how to cut greenhouse gases in politically and economically acceptable ways. The world's 1,700 or so coal-fired power plants -- big emitters of carbon dioxide, the main greenhouse gas -- are a cheap source of electricity. The wholesale cost is 4 to 5 cents a kilowatt hour, says the World Resources Institute. By contrast, solar power costs five to six times that. Although wind is roughly competitive, it can be used only in selective spots and supplies less than 1 percent of global electricity. Nuclear energy is cost-competitive but is stymied by other concerns (safety, proliferation hazards, spent fuel).

Second: In rich democracies, policies that might curb greenhouse gases require politicians and the public to act in exceptionally "enlightened" (read: "unrealistic") ways. They have to accept "pain" now for benefits that won't materialize for decades, probably after they're dead. For example, we could adopt a steep gasoline tax and much tougher fuel economy standards for vehicles. In time, that might limit emissions (personally, I favor this on national security grounds). Absent some crisis, politicians usually won't impose -- and the public won't accept -- burdens without corresponding benefits.

Third: Even if rich countries cut emissions, it won't make much difference unless poor countries do likewise -- and so far, they've refused because that might jeopardize their economic growth and poverty-reduction efforts. Poorer countries are the fastest growing source of greenhouse gas emissions, because rapid economic growth requires energy, and present forms of energy produce gases. In 2003 China's carbon dioxide emissions were 78 percent of the U.S. level. Developing countries, in total, accounted for 37 percent of greenhouse gas emissions in 2003. By 2050 their share could be 55 percent, projects the International Energy Agency (IEA).

The notion that there's only a modest tension between suppressing greenhouse gases and sustaining economic growth is highly dubious. Stern arrives at his trivial costs -- that mere 1 percent of world gross domestic product in 2050 -- by essentially assuming them. His estimates presume that, with proper policies, technological improvements will automatically reconcile declining emissions with adequate economic growth. This is a heroic leap. To check warming, Stern wants annual emissions 25 percent below current levels by 2050. The IEA projects that economic growth by 2050 would more than double emissions. At present we can't bridge that gap.

The other great distortion in Stern's report involves global warming's effects. No one knows what these might be, because we don't know how much warming might occur, when, where or how easily people might adapt. Stern's horrific specter distills many of the most terrifying guesses, including some imagined for the 22nd century, and implies that they're imminent. The idea is to scare people while reassuring them that policies to avert calamity, if started now, would be fairly easy and inexpensive.

We need more candor. Unless we develop cost-effective technologies that break the link between carbon dioxide emissions and energy use, we can't do much. Anyone serious about global warming must focus on technological progress -- and not just assume it. Otherwise, our practical choices are all bad: costly mandates and controls that harm the economy, or costly mandates and controls that barely affect greenhouse gases. Or, possibly, both.

Kosovo: Final Report On Future Delayed (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

Martti Ahtisaari, the former Finnish president who leads international talks on the future of Kosovo, said he would hold back his recommendations — with independence or autonomy as options — until after parliamentary elections in Serbia, called earlier in the day for Jan. 21. Although technically a part of Serbia, the mainly Albanian province of Kosovo has been run by the United Nations since 1999, and a final status plan for Kosovo was to have been accomplished by the end of this year. But Western diplomats have been concerned that it might increase support for Serbian ultra-nationalists in the elections. A new Constitution passed last month reasserts the country's sovereignty over Kosovo. Kosovo's ethnic Albanian leaders are also uneasy. On Thursday, Agim Ceku, the Kosovo prime minister, said his government might unilaterally declare independence if negotiations fail to give them statehood.

DOJ_NMG_0093479

Here Comes Kosovo (WP)

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

A decision to make the Serb province independent is near. Will Serbia and Russia obstruct it?

THE SERBIAN parliament formally adopted a new national constitution on Wednesday, following its narrow approval by voters in a referendum last month. The document was a necessary replacement of the previous charter, which was adopted during the rule of nationalist warlord Slobodan Milosevic. But it may have won acceptance only because it included a preamble that would have warmed Mr. Milosevic's heart: a declaration that the province of Kosovo, which Serbia in effect lost seven years ago, is an "integral" and "inalienable" part of the country.

In fact, the United Nations, which has governed Kosovo since NATO freed it from Mr. Milosevic's brutal ethnic cleansing campaign, is due to decide the province's future by year-end -- though a decision may be delayed until after a Serbian election scheduled for late January. Serb leaders know what a U.N. mediator will recommend and what all Western governments will support: independence for the territory, perhaps with transitional conditions. Kosovo is populated overwhelmingly by ethnic Albanians; after the ethnic war Mr. Milosevic initiated, there is no chance the province can be returned to Serbian sovereignty. By incorporating a claim to Kosovo into a new constitution, Serbia's leaders staked out yet another of the reckless nationalist stands that have caused their country so much damage in the past 15 years.

They also set the stage for some difficult and potentially dangerous diplomacy between the Bush administration and Russia over the next two months -- negotiations that could settle or destabilize the Balkans and the equally volatile Caucasus region on Russia's southern border. Russia, Serbia's long-standing ally, is the largest potential obstacle to consensus in the U.N. Security Council on a Kosovo solution. Though he knows that independence for Kosovo is inevitable, Russian President Vladimir Putin is hinting that he may support Serbia's obstructionism. He may hope to extract favors from President Bush in exchange for his eventual cooperation -- such as U.S. acquiescence to Russia's entry into the World Trade Organization.

Or Mr. Putin may try to use Kosovo to trigger a showdown with his Caucasus neighbor, Georgia, which has infuriated him by embracing liberal democracy and seeking integration into Western institutions such as NATO. Mr. Putin has said that Kosovo's independence could be a precedent for Moscow-sponsored breakaway regions in Eurasia, including two rebel provinces of Georgia. If Western governments recognize Kosovo's independence, Mr. Putin could respond by recognizing Abkhazia and South Ossetia. This could easily trigger a war that would draw in Russian troops; meanwhile, Moscow's position could encourage Serbs in Kosovo and Bosnia to set up splinter states.

Moscow is no doubt hoping that as the Bush administration contemplates this scenario, as well as its continuing need for Russian help in stopping Iran's nuclear program, it will be bluffed into postponing any decision on Kosovo or will abandon its support of Georgia's democracy and NATO aspirations. Either would be a serious mistake. Putting off Kosovo's independence would only enrage the province's 2 million Albanians and trigger the Balkan meltdown that the West hopes to avoid. It would also encourage Mr. Putin's growing tendency to use threats -- whether of energy-supply interruptions or violence -- to get his way with the West.

Northern Ireland Deal Advances (NYT)

By Eamon Quinn

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

BELFAST, Northern Ireland, Nov. 10 — Britain and Ireland on Friday seized on guarded words of support from Northern Ireland's feuding Protestant and Roman Catholic political parties, saying that enough progress had been made by the first deadline they had set in a timetable for restoring local rule for the province that they could proceed to try to meet the next one.

DOJ_NMG_0093480

But a dispute about policing is casting doubt on whether the Democratic Unionist Party, led by the Rev. Ian Paisley, the veteran Protestant leader, and the main Roman Catholic party, Sinn Fein, can reach agreement by Nov. 24, when they are to nominate leaders for the power-sharing government.

A government executive branch that included Northern Ireland unionist leaders and Sinn Fein collapsed in 2002.

The unionists seek to maintain the political tie with Britain; Sinn Fein is considered the political wing of the Irish Republican Army, which has sought to separate the province from Britain.

In a joint statement, the British and Irish governments said that they were satisfied that party statements had indicated support for a government. Last month in St. Andrews, Scotland, the governments proposed a sequence of deadlines, starting Friday, for the Democratic Unionists and Sinn Fein to agree to share power in an executive apparatus that would take over most governmental powers starting next March.

As for the critical issue of policing, they proposed that London would cede full powers to the local executive branch in 2008.

In their joint statement on Friday, the British and Irish governments said that the St. Andrews Agreement remained the basis of reaching their goal, and that preparatory legislation would be worked on before Nov. 24. The foundations of an agreement, the governments said, are "support for power-sharing and the political institutions and support for policing and the rule of law."

Police Issue Stalls N. Ireland Deal (LAT)

By Kim Murphy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 10, 2006

Deadline looms on power-sharing plan as differences remain.

LONDON — The first key deadline for implementing a new power-sharing plan in Northern Ireland passed Friday with the parties still at loggerheads, but Britain and Ireland said they were satisfied that the pact "represents the basis for a political settlement" of the long-running conflict.

Both Sinn Fein and the Democratic Unionist Party, or DUP, were to have signaled their acceptance this week of the proposal brokered last month at St. Andrews, Scotland, by the British and Irish prime ministers, under which the two former adversaries would jointly head a new Belfast government.

Instead, both sides only signaled conditional acceptance, apparently stuck on the same issue that has forestalled an agreement from the beginning: the unionist party's insistence that Sinn Fein endorse the local police force — with which its military wing, the Irish Republican Army, was virtually at war for years — before joining the government.

Sinn Fein leaders believe the police force, as it was formerly constituted, was involved in the killings of Roman Catholic residents, either directly or through Protestant paramilitary forces.

The party, which for years has sought union with Ireland, has said it is prepared to accept the police force once it is assured that concrete reforms are in place, a timeframe is established for handing over control of the police to local authorities, and after the party's membership has agreed to take such a step.

The logjam has raised serious questions about whether the two parties will be able to appoint joint heads of government by a Nov. 24 deadline. The British government has said that failure to meet that deadline would result in the shutdown of the National Assembly, now meeting on an ad hoc basis, and in reimposition of British direct rule.

Sources at the DUP, which favors union with Britain, hinted of a strong possibility there would be "slippage" on the deadline.

"Before anything of the nature the government are talking about on Nov. 24 can be done … all those commitments need to be made. We are completely unequivocal on that," said a party source, speaking on condition of anonymity.

But Sinn Fein's chief negotiator, Martin McGuinness, who would be the party's top minister in any new government, said it was crucial that the deadline be met. "I firmly believe that all of the challenges we face can be overcome. On Nov. 24, the Assembly must meet as set out at St. Andrews for the nominations of the first and deputy first minister as joint and co-equal partners in a new power-sharing government," he said in Belfast.

Sinn Fein conditionally accepted the St. Andrews agreement Monday, saying it has the potential to implement the historic "Good Friday" accord reached in 1998 and restore the region's political institutions.

DOJ_NMG_0093481

Speaking Thursday night in New York after the U.S. government lifted a ban on Sinn Fein leaders addressing fundraising events, party leader Gerry Adams affirmed his commitment to moving forward. "The time to end this game is now," he said. But he said he would continue to insist on police reforms and local control.

DUP leader Ian Paisley has refused to meet Adams and says he will not form a government with a party that does not uphold basic principles of law and order.

"The foundation stone of any democratic party is that they support the police, the courts, and the rule of law," he said. "Sinn Fein must stand foursquare behind the police service and the justice system."

kim.murphy@latimes.com

Special correspondent William Graham in Belfast contributed to this report.

U.S. Official Offers A Bleak Assessment Of Somalia (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, Nov. 10 — A senior American military official on Friday painted a dire picture of the escalating tensions in Somalia, but said the United States was at a loss about what to do.

“We do not have a plan to solve the Somalia problem,” acknowledged the official, who spoke to reporters in Nairobi only on condition of anonymity. Somalia, once again, is at a crisis point, with rising prospects of a major war between the weak, so-called transitional government and the increasingly powerful Islamic forces that rule Mogadishu, the capital.

Since 1991, Somalia has been synonymous with anarchy, but the senior military official said the current situation was even more explosive because it threatened to drag in Somalia’s neighbors.

“If there is a war,” the official said, “the fighting ends up protracted and long and spills across the border.”

A long-simmering problem is that all of Somalia’s neighbors — Kenya, Ethiopia and Djibouti — have significant populations of ethnic Somalis. Some of the Islamic clerics in Mogadishu have vowed to invade these countries to establish a “Greater Somalia.”

Another concern is that Ethiopia and Eritrea, bitter enemies that recently fought over a stretch of desert in a war that cost 100,000 lives, are meddling in Somalia, with Eritrea suspected of sending advisers and weapons to Mogadishu to support the Islamists and Ethiopian officials now admitting, after initial denials, that hundreds of Ethiopian military advisers are in Baidoa, the seat of the transitional government. Western experts estimate that the number is actually much higher, maybe as many as 10,000 Ethiopian soldiers, and growing.

Ethiopia is one of the closest allies of the United States in Africa, but the senior military official denied that the American government was using the Ethiopian Army as a proxy force against the Islamists, whom American intelligence agents have accused of cooperating with terrorists from Al Qaeda.

“We don’t want them in there,” the official said, referring to the Ethiopians.

On Friday, [a news organization] reported that a soon-to-be-released United Nations report accused several Arab countries, including Libya and Syria, of also breaking the 14-year-old arms embargo on Somalia and funneling guns and money to the Islamist forces.

“Things have been increasingly volatile in the past two weeks,” the official said, though he did not go as far as saying war was imminent or inevitable. The official and diplomats here in Nairobi have pointed to talks this week between the speaker of the transitional Parliament and top Islamic clerics as a speck of hope.

Sharif Hassan Sheik Aden, the speaker of the transitional Parliament and one of the few politicians from Baidoa respected by the Islamists, spent several days in Mogadishu trying to coax Islamic leaders back to peace negotiations that started in June, though the latest round was broken off because the Islamists refused to negotiate while Ethiopian troops were in the country.

The Islamists, whose support seems to be growing in Mogadishu, were mildly optimistic about Sheik Aden’s visit.

“We expect to reach a solution because it is a known fact that if Somalis talk to one another they can make peace,” Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, leader of Somalia’s Council of Islamic Courts, told The Associated Press this week.

But, Sheik Aweys added, the Ethiopians must first leave.

DOJ_NMG_0093482

The United States has 1,800 troops stationed in Djibouti, at the mouth of the Red Sea. Their mission is to prevent terrorists from turning the Horn of Africa into a sanctuary. But the senior American military official said that if Somalia's peace talks failed and full-scale war engulfed the region, American troops would not get involved.

"We'll be watching this one," he said.

Aid Group Quits Darfur, Citing Disruptions (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

OSLO Nov. 10 -- A Norwegian refugee group said Friday that it was closing its humanitarian operations for nearly 300,000 people in Darfur because it was impossible to work in the troubled region of western Sudan.

The Norwegian Refugee Council cited "frequent disruption" of its work, saying it had been suspended five times for a total of 210 days since it started operations in mid-2004.

"We cannot work when the authorities suspend us continuously and do not respond to our repeated requests for dialogue aimed at addressing and resolving underlying reasons for this action," said Tomas C. Archer, the group's secretary general.

More than 3 1/2 years ago, ethnic African rebels accusing the central government of neglect launched a rebellion. The government is accused of responding by unleashing an Arab militia, called the Janjaweed, which has been linked to atrocities. As many as 450,000 people have died from disease and violence and 2.5 million have been displaced since fighting began.

Aid agencies have repeatedly complained about government interference in their work in Sudan. For months after the conflict broke out, Sudanese officials severely limited international aid organizations' access to Darfur. Humanitarian workers were allowed in only after protracted negotiations and international pressure.

Last year, Sudan briefly detained two officials of Doctors Without Borders, after the Dutch branch of the international medical aid group released a report that quoted hundreds of rape victims in Darfur identifying their attackers as soldiers or government-allied militiamen.

Rebels also have been accused of interfering with aid, in some cases by kidnapping aid workers.

The Norwegian group said it was pulling out 12 international and 170 local staff members running one camp for 128,000 people in southern Darfur and another for 100,000 people.

"We coordinated all aid, the fair distribution of food, medical care. Now there are 300,000 people on their own. That's what concerns us most," a spokeswoman, Astrid Sehl, said by telephone. She said the group also had to shut down an educational program for about 19,000 children and stop distributing food to about 52,000 people outside the camps.

"This decision has been the most difficult I have had to make as secretary general of NRC," Archer said. "We are all aware that the humanitarian needs are greater than ever in south Darfur."

A news release said that the Oslo-based group had been promised an answer from Sudanese authorities on the future of its humanitarian effort in Darfur but that no answer had been given.

The Norwegian Refugee Council is a private, independent foundation without religious or political affiliations. It was founded in 1946 to assist refugees after World War II and now has about 1,300 staff members in 20 countries.

Next In Darfur (WP)

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

LAST WEEK President Bush put a brave face on the killing in Darfur, declaring that the United States was working on a plan to save the victims. The truth is that his administration has offered versions of this claim since 2004, when it first described Darfur's crisis as genocide. Sudan's murderous government, which has provided air cover to the Janjaweed death squads and has magnified civilian suffering by keeping U.N. peacekeepers away, has proved impervious to U.S. pressure. Feeling itself to be an isolated Arab elite in a resentful African country, presiding over a capital city that has absorbed 4 million or more Africans who have fled Sudan's internal wars, the ruling clique in some ways resembles the minority white regime of South Africa circa 1985. Its back is against the wall, and it is prepared to be ruthless -- particularly so long as China, Russia and the Arab states provide diplomatic cover.

Andrew S. Natsios, the president's special envoy to Sudan, visited the country recently and was treated to a characteristic prevarication. He was told that Sudan refused to accept the U.N. Security Council resolution calling for a peacekeeping force in Darfur, even though the professed ground for this refusal -- that U.N. peacekeepers would compromise Sudan's sovereignty -- is belied by the fact that U.N. peacekeepers are already in Sudan to monitor a north-south peace treaty. But Mr. Natsios was encouraged not to lose patience. On the contrary, he was warmly entreated to have hope: Sudan might be open to certain other peacekeeping configurations. The existing African Union force could be supplemented with Arabs, or maybe with Pakistanis, or possibly even with Norwegians. The message to the United States was: Go away and do your diplomatic thing, and if you're lucky we'll talk after that.

DOJ_NMG_0093483

The Bush administration should certainly assemble commitments of peacekeeping troops and call Sudan's bluff. But it should also attempt to revive the failed Darfur peace plan negotiated this year, for without peace even a large peacekeeping mission may be doomed. Reviving the peace process means pressuring both the government and the rebels: The last agreement failed because many of rebels refused to sign on and instead resumed fighting, while the government took that as an excuse to bar U.N. peacekeepers, harass western humanitarian workers and launch a military offensive. To pressure the rebels, the United States needs to work through their backers in Eritrea and Chad. To push the government back to the talks, the United States needs to work with Sudan's diplomatic enablers in Beijing, Moscow and the Arab capitals.

The world's leaders may hope that the problem of Darfur will go away if they close their eyes long enough. But the reverse is likelier. Darfur's violence is spilling into Chad and could precipitate the collapse of that country's government. It is also contributing to the risk of renewed north-south fighting. If there is no solution in Darfur, the world will witness Darfur-like atrocities elsewhere on a scale appalling to imagine.

Nigeria's Savior, And Menace (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

OLUSEGUN OBASANJO has done more for Nigeria than any leader in its modern history. Now that legacy is endangered — by none other than Obasanjo himself. Nigerians and the international community should keep the pressure on Obasanjo to step aside.

Nigeria, Africa's most populous nation and the United States' fifth-biggest source of imported oil, was a basket case until Obasanjo was elected in 1999. Since then, he has reformed the nation's chaotic banking sector, battled its endemic corruption and built a foundation for democracy in a nation that has never seen a peaceful transition from one elected leader to another.

But he also is nearing the end of his second and final term as president, and he has shown a worrying reluctance to step down as planned in April 2007. Five months ago, he tried to rewrite Nigeria's constitution to allow for a third term but was rebuffed by parliament. Other recent actions look suspiciously like the machinations of a budding dictator, and they may not only undo most of the good Obasanjo has accomplished but perhaps plunge his country into civil war.

At the core of the troubles is Nigeria's crusading Economic and Financial Crimes Commission, a 3-year-old agency that already has sent about 2,000 people to prison on corruption charges. (According to the commission's chief, Nuhu Ribadu, an estimated $380 billion has been stolen or wasted in Nigeria since independence in 1960.) Yet as the commission has started taking on the country's 36 state governors, many fear that Obasanjo is using it to target his political opponents and disrupt the April elections.

Even if the financial crimes commission isn't on a political witch hunt, there is no way to avoid the appearance of one so close to an election. Obasanjo should suspend the panel until after April. He also should beef up the elections agency. If he doesn't, and voids the elections to maintain power, a bloody civil war is almost certain to follow.

Which course the Nigerian president takes will affect more than his legacy and his nation. An armed insurgency in the country's south cut oil production by 25% this year, playing a key role in the run-up of crude prices that only recently began to ease. Obasanjo has a chance to become a respected elder statesman who could influence continental politics long after leaving office and bring much-needed international attention and aid to Africa. Or he could be another in a long line of Nigerian despots, cursed by his people and forgotten by history.

Don't Count Out Turkey (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 10, 2006

It's too important to Europe, and vice versa, for talks over its entrance into the EU to founder.

DOJ_NMG_0093484

BULENT ECEVIT, ONE OF the most important leaders in modern Turkish history, died Sunday in Ankara. His dream may be dying a slow death in Brussels.

"There can be no Europe without Turkey, and no Turkey without Europe," Ecevit said in 1999. A four-term prime minister, Ecevit was by the end of his career a supporter of open markets and greater integration with the West.

On Wednesday, the European Commission released a progress report on Ankara's bid to join the European Union. It was highly critical of the pace of Turkey's reforms on issues such as freedom of speech and its failure to recognize Cyprus.

Cyprus is indeed the stumbling block of the day, but there is a more fundamental resistance across much of Western Europe to the idea that Turkey could join the EU. The EU is still digesting 10 new Central and Eastern European members with a lower standard of living, and there are some understandable concerns about absorbing 73 million Turks on the continent's periphery.

But the genius of Europe's enlargement process has been its ability to raise living standards in new member states while being flexible in phasing in full integration so as to not drag down living standards among richer members. Because of the terms of Poland's accession to the EU, for instance, its farmers have not impoverished French farmers. What's more, given demographic trends, Europe would increasingly benefit from Turkey's large labor pool and its vibrant consumer market.

Opposition to Turkey's candidacy in nations such as France is increasingly about cultural identity. This is unfortunate, as it undermines the idea of a largely secular Muslim Turkey serving as a bridge between West and East. Its successful integration with Christian Europe would demonstrate that the religions need not be at odds and that Western-style democracy is not unattainable in the Middle East.

But confronted with European rejection, many sectors of Turkish society seem intent on derailing integration, making the Turkey-isn't-suited claim a self-fulfilling one. Turkey's Article 301, a vague law that makes it a crime to publicly insult the nation, is a nationalist measure aimed at provoking Brussels.

And then there is Cyprus, which joined the EU in 2004 and thus has the ability to block any new members. Turkey invaded Cyprus in 1974, under Ecevit, and part of the island remains under Turkish control while Ankara refuses to recognize the Cypriot government. Talks to resolve the impasse recently collapsed.

At an EU summit in mid-December, commissioners may decide to suspend accession talks with Turkey for a year or more. That would be unfortunate — for both sides of this courtship.

DOJ_NMG_0093485

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Warrantless Wiretaps Unlikely To Be OK'd (AP) 4
Social Security Data A Major Source In Terrorism Probes (WP) .. 4
Former USF Professor Must Testify In Va. Grand Jury Probe (BRAH) 6
In Letter, Radical Cleric Details CIA Abduction, Egyptian Torture (WP) 6
Britain's MI5 Warns Of Rising Terror Threat (WP) 8
Blair Says Homegrown Terrorism Is Generation-Long Struggle (NYT) 8
Judge Lets Guilty Plea Stand In Terrorism Case (WP) 10
Egyptian Says He Was Tortured After Being Kidnapped In Milan (NYT) 10
A Topic In The Air But One That Political Candidates Declined To Touch: Torture Of Prisoners (NYT) 11

Homeland Response:

Democrats Still Face Hurdles In Enacting 9/11 Panel's Ideas (WP) 12
Looking Into Laptops (LAT) 13
Slow Home Grants Stall Progress In New Orleans (NYT) 14

War News:

Pentagon To Reevaluate Strategy And Goals In Iraq (WP) 16
Military Team Undertakes A Broad Review Of The Iraq War And The Campaign Against Terror (NYT) 17
US Army "To Suggest Iraq Changes" (BBC) 18
A Budding, Bipartisan Consensus On Iraq (LAT) 18
A Salute To Duty And Sacrifice (WP) 20
Marines, Bush Dedicate Museum (WT) 21
Selfless Courage: Marine Is Awarded Medal Of Honor (WSJ) 22
Medal Of Honor Granted To Slain Marine (LAT) 23
Marine To Receive Medal Of Honor For Iraq Heroism (CNN) 23
At Dusty Outpost In Iraq, Cake Is Cut For Marines Young And Not So Young (NYT) 24
Blair To Give Iraq Evidence To Baker (FT) 26
U.S. Gov't Office In Iraq Attacked (WT/AP) 26
Hang Hussein Fast, Clerics Say (LAT) 27
Nat'l Guard Units Face 2nd Tours In Iraq (AP) 27
Guard Units Could Do 2nd Tour In Iraq (LAT/AP) 28
Tall Afar's Long Road Back (WP) 29
Decrepit Healthcare Adds To Toll In Iraq (LAT) 30
Rumsfeld May Face Abuse Charges (BBC) 32
Rummy's Got A New Woe - Torture Suit By 9/11 Thug (NYDN) 33
Rumsfeld Rides Off Into The Sunset (FT) 33
Afghanistan Waits For Peace Five Years After Fall Of Taliban (AFP) 34
In Pakistan, Recent Attacks Shred Hopes For Regional Peace Model (WP) 35
Then And Now, Female Soldiers Just Do Their Jobs (NYT) 36

Corporate Scandals:

Fastow Gets His Moment In The Sun (NYT) 37
Corporate Crime In H-P Case, New Sheriff Comes To Town (WSJ) 39
3 Qwest Executives Cash In Options (AP) 39
SEC, Accounting Board Officials To Weigh Sarbanes-Oxley Update (WP) 40
SEC Chairman Backs Creation Of One Regulator For Brokerages (WSJ) 41
Hedge Funds Could Face New Limits (BLOOM) 41
Spitzer's Successor May Not Follow In His Footsteps (WSJ) 42
Korean Prosecutors Hit Snags In Inquiry Of Lone Star Deal (WSJ) 43

Criminal Law:

Supreme Court Will Consider Jud (SLPD) 44
Agent's Article Puts Case At Risk (AP) 44
Mistrial Called In Online Ad Fraud Case (WP) 45
Anti-Foley Blogger Speaks Out (LAT) 46
4 Plead Guilty In Wave Of Eco-sabotage (OREG) 47
4 More Plead Guilty In Ecosabotage Cases; Trial May Be Avoided (SEATIMES) 48
Four More Guilty In String Of Arsons (ERG) 50
Government Claims Victory Over Ecoterrorism Outfit (AP) 50
Paul Pleads Guilty To Eco-arson (MEDMT) 51
Gun Collector Fails Polygraph Over Second Barrel Purchase (SEATIMES) 52
Man Once Held In Wales Killing Fails Polygraph (AP) 53
Former LAPD Spokesman Indicted On Sex Charges (LAT) 54
Suit Links Ovitz To Pellicano Case (LAT) 54
Microsoft Targets Piracy (FT) 55

Civil Law:

U.S. Settles Civil Case Against British Online Gambling Company BetOnSports (FINDLAW/AP) 56

Civil Rights:

Feds Probe Care At Ore. Mental Hospital (AP) ... 57
Human Trafficking Cases Increase In El Paso (EPT) ... 57
2 LAPD Officers Investigated In Beating Case (LAT) ... 58
Beating Of L.A. Suspect Sparks Outcry (WP) ... 59
Police Beating Video From L.A. Demonstrates The Power Of YouTube Again (USAT/AP) ... 60
Landscapers Cause Furor By Shunning Gay Clients (NYT) ... 61
Gain For Same-Sex Marriage In Massachusetts (NYT) ... 62
The Court And Abortion (NYT) ... 63
Choosing Choice (LAT) ... 63
Keeping The Voting Clean (NYT) ... 64

Antitrust:

DOJ Targets 36 Markets In NAR Antitrust Suit (INMAN) ... 65
Motorola To Buy Rival Of BlackBerry (AP) ... 66
Bulldog Edition Clash Of Cultures Exacerbates Woes For Tribune Co. (WSJ) ... 67

Environment:

EPA Wants Man Fined For Silence On Pollution Role (SPT) ... 71
Lawsuit Says Family Damaged Wetlands In Chesapeake (VP) ... 71
Energy Demand Is Expected To Rise In 4th Quarter (WSJ) ... 71
Bill Allowing More Drilling Along Coasts Appears Dead (NYT) ... 72

Immigration:

Democrats To "Revisit" Law Creating Border Fence (WT/UPI) ... 73

Congress-Administration:

Bush, Pelosi Pledge To Work Together (MCT) ... 74
On A Shifting Field, A Sense Of Rising Expectations (NYT) ... 74
Gridlock Need Not Be Inevitable For Bush (AP-Y) ... 76
Bush Meets With Pelosi; Both Vow Cooperation (WP) ... 77
Democratic Victory Raises Spirits Of Those Favoring Citizenship For Illegal Aliens (NYT) ... 78
Harry Reid, An Infighter With A Sharp Jab (NYT) ... 80
Bush, Democrats Pledge To Work Together (AP-Y) ... 81
Bush, Pelosi Look Ahead Over Lunch (WT) ... 82
Bush In Overture To Democrats (FT) ... 83
Bush Asks Congress To Approve Bolton (FT) ... 84
Bolton Unlikely To Win Senate Approval (AP-Y) ... 84
Bolton May Not Return As U.N. Envoy (WP) ... 85
U.N. Envoy Confirmation Unlikely (LAT) ... 86
Bush Renominates Bolton Ahead Of Change In Senate (WT) ... 87
With Power Set To Be Split, Wiretaps Re-emerge As Issue (NYT) ... 88
Bipartisanship On Hold (NYT) ... 89
Democrats Are Set To Subpoena (LAT) ... 90
Democrats Poised To Flex New Muscles (WSJ) ... 91
Democrats Weigh New Power As Leaders (NYT) ... 93
Sweep Gives Dems Power To Put Plans Into Action (USAT) ... 94
Now The Decider Must Listen (WP) ... 95
New Majority Plans Early Security Push (USAT) ... 96
Dingell Wants To Cut U.S. Oil Habit (USAT) ... 97
First, Ethics Reform (WP) ... 98
The Family-Friendly Congress? (NYT) ... 98
Alternative Minimum Tax Targeted (WP) ... 99
Ex-Treasury Head Rubin Urges Democrats To Mull Tax Increase (WSJ) ... 100
The Wages Of Politics (WSJ) ... 101
Time For The $5.15 Minimum Wage To Punch Out? (WSJ) ... 102
Slow Track (WSJ) ... 103
Economic Populism Pays For Democrats (FT) ... 105
Congress Likely To Clash With Bush On Trade (LAT) ... 105
Tipping Point For Trade (WP) ... 106
Labor Movement Dusts Off Agenda As Power Shifts In Congress (NYT) ... 107
Choice For Intelligence Panel Poses Early Test For Pelosi (NYT) 109
Reid, Pelosi Expected To Keep Tight Rein In Both Chambers (WP) ... 110
Pride Of Baltimore (WP) ... 111
The Determined Democrat (FT) ... 113
2 Democrats Vie For House No. 2 (WT) ... 114
Democrats Ready To Flex Congressional Muscle (CHIT) ... 115
Scandals Have Touched Some Key Democrats (WSJ) ... 117
Connecticut's Dodd May Lead Banking Committee (USAT) ... 118
Some Defense Firms More At Ease As McCain Denied Oversight Chair (WSJ) ... 119
Treasury Chief Set To Seek Deals (NYT) ... 120
U.N. Post Will Test Bush On Pledge For Consensus (NYT) ... 122
Mississippians Rise Up Over Rangel's Comment (NYT) ... 123
Pelosi Affirms Support Of Full D.C. Voting Rights (WP) ... 124
Full Vote Eyed For House Delegate Before Session Ends (WT) 124

Other News:

Election Past, How High Can Stocks Go? (WSJ) ... 125
Shares Up, Led By Home Builders (NYT) ... 126
Virginia Sen. Allen Concedes Defeat (AP-Y) ... 127
Democrats Take Control Of Senate As Allen Concedes To Webb In Va. (WP) ... 128
Allen Concedes, Gives Senate To Democrats (WT) ... 129
After 2 Decades In Ascent, A Stunning Breakdown (WP) ... 131
Democrats Gain Senate And New Influence (NYT) ... 132
Allen Concedes Defeat, Sealing Transfer Of Senate (LAT) ... 134
Webb Gives Thanks Early; Allen Aides Still Stunned (WP) ... 135
Another Layer Of Winners And Losers (NYT) ... 136
Burns Concedes Montana Race To Democrat (AP-Y) ... 137
Rural Montana Farmer Is Going To Washington (LAT) ... 138
Lawmakers Who Won't Be Missed (WP) ... 139
Just Call Him Joe Democrat (LAT) ... 140
Democrats Win Bigger Share Of Religious Vote (WP) ... 140
The Architect Speaks (TIME) ... 142
R.I. Senator May Leave Republican Party (AP-Y) ... 142
Republicans Are Ahead In Remaining House Races (WSJ) ... 143
RNC Asks Steele To Replace Mehlman (WT) ... 144
Mehlman To Step Down From RNC Post (AP-Y) ... 145
Republican Party Chairman Will Not Seek Another Term (NYT) 145
Mehlman Won't Seek Another Term As Republican Party Chief (WP) ... 146
Redistricting: Home To Roost (WSJ) ... 147
Evangelical Leader: GOP Abandoned Voters (AP-Y) ... 148
Schwarzenegger Welcomes 'New Blood' In D.C. (LAT) ... 149

DOJ_NMG_0093487

Schwarzenegger Implores GOP To Follow Script Of His Sequel (WP) ... 150
Gingrich Sees Hope For Conservatives (WT) ... 151
Minority Report (WSJ) ... 152
Bridge To Somewhere (WSJ) ... 153
A Putsch At The DNC? (TNR) ... 154
Steele Still A Main Attraction (WT) ... 154
Corporate Donors Increased Their Support For Dems (USAT) 155
Republicans Lose Ground Among Hispanic Voters (USAT) ... 156
For Latino Voters, Best Years Are Ahead (USAT) ... 157
Immigration Losers (WSJ) ... 157
Recount Likely In Harris' House District (AP-Y) ... 158
In Florida, Echoes Of 2000 As Vote Questions Emerge (NYT). 159
Voters Say Yes To Borrowing Billions For New Projects (USAT)160
Iowa Governor Declares For '08 (NYT/AP) ... 161
McCain Plans A Committee To Study '08 (NYT) ... 161
Election Doesn't Shutter Clinton Campaign Offices (NYT) ... 162
The '08 Race For The White House Begins (CQ) ... 163
Denver Wooing Democrats For '08 (USAT) ... 174
Referendum Revelations (WSJ) ... 175
Michigan Prefers Equality (WSJ) ... 176
Trade Deficit Narrowed In September (WSJ) ... 177
Dow Tumbles 73 Points As Attention Shifts To The Economy, New Congress (WSJ) ... 178
Wyoming's Sen. Craig Thomas Has Leukemia (AP-Y) ... 179
Foreign Sales By U.S. Arms Makers Doubled In A Year (NYT) 179
O'Malley Calls For Slots At Racetracks (WP) ... 180
Baltimore Celebrates Political Last Hurrah? (WT) ... 181
Democrats May Urge More Contact With U.S. Adversaries (WP)182
Around The Globe, Relief Over U.S. Vote (WP) ... 183
Bush Discusses Immigration Reform With Mexico's President-elect (MCT) ... 184
Calderon Reassured On Immigration Bill (WT) ... 185
Iran Warns U.N. Against Sanctions (LAT) ... 186
U.S. Presses Russia To Bridge Gap Over UN Sanctions On Iran (BLOOM) ... 187
Rice Says US Unfazed By Growth Of China's Global Role (AFP-Y) ... 188
China: Scapegoat Or Sputnik (NYT) ... 188
U.S. Will Train Latin American Militaries (USAT) ... 189
Ortega Redux: A History Smolders On Cold War Embers (NYT)190
White House Watches Ortega (WT) ... 191
Ortega, Again (NYT) ... 192
The Other Winner In Nicaragua (WSJ) ... 192
Security Council Sets Palestinian Vote (AP) ... 193
Palestinian PM Offers To Resign For Aid (AP) ... 194
Berlin Aims To Revive Mideast 'Quartet' (FT) ... 195
Palestinians Mourn Civilians Killed By Israel (NYT) ... 195
Olmert: Israel Won't Stop Targeting Gaza (AP-Y) ... 196
Anaylsis: Hamas Has Big Stake In Truce (AP-Y) ... 197
The Perils Of Inaction (NYT) ... 198
Under Heavy Police Guard, Gay Rights Advocates Rally In Jerusalem (NYT) ... 199
Israeli Gay Rights Parade Called Off (LAT) ... 200
U.N. Delivers Plan For Court In Hariri Case To Lebanon (NYT)201
A Royal Emirati Whose Career Fuels Young Women's Dreams (NYT) ... 202
Poland Sets Referendum On Euro, Further Clouding Stance On EU (WSJ) ... 203
Cyprus Says Rival's Transit Ban Will Hurt EU Credibility (WT). 204
U.S. Criticizes U.N. Rights Council (AP) ... 204
Russia Reaches Trade Deal With U.S. (WP) ... 205
Russia Near Deal To Join The W.T.O. (NYT) ... 206
Russia's WTO Bid Comes Closer To Fruition (WSJ) ... 207
Russia And US Reach Deal On WTO (FT) ... 208
Russia Moves Closer To WTO Membership (AP) ... 209
Russia To Sign Agreement With U.S. On Terms For WTO (BLOOM) ... 210
U.S. Pact Paves Way For Russia In WTO (WT) ... 211
Envoy: U.S. Eager For India Nuke Deal (AP) ... 212
Trade Pacific Rim Initiative Gains A U.S. Push (WSJ) ... 213
US Looking For Compromise On UN Force For Darfur (AFP-Y)213
Figure Skater Is New Envoy Of Good Will Overseas (NYT) ... 214
Greenhouse Guessing (WP) ... 215
Kosovo: Final Report On Future Delayed (NYT) ... 216
Here Comes Kosovo (WP) ... 216
Northern Ireland Deal Advances (NYT) ... 216
Police Issue Stalls N. Ireland Deal (LAT) ... 217
U.S. Official Offers A Bleak Assessment Of Somalia (NYT) ... 218
Aid Group Quits Darfur, Citing Disruptions (WP/AP) ... 218
Next In Darfur (WP) ... 219
Nigeria's Savior, And Menace (LAT) ... 220
Don't Count Out Turkey (LAT) ... 220

DOJ_NMG_0093488

TERRORISM NEWS:

Warrantless Wiretaps Unlikely To Be OK'd (AP)

By Laurie Kellman, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Legislation aimed at President Bush's once-secret program for wiretapping U.S.-foreign phone calls and computer traffic of suspected terrorists without warrants shows all the signs of not moving ahead, notwithstanding President Bush's request this week that a lame-duck Congress give it to him.

Senate Democrats, emboldened by Election Day wins that put them in control of Congress as of January, say they would rather wait until next year to look at the issue. "I can't say that we won't do it, but there's no guarantee that we're going spend a lot of time on controversial measures," Democratic Whip Richard Durbin of Illinois said Thursday.

In Senate parlance, that means no.

Republicans for months have known that no bill accomplishing Bush's goal could get filibuster-proof support from 60 senators. Sealing off any hope was what Democratic leader Harry Reid put on his lame-duck to-do list. The warrantless domestic surveillance bill was conspicuous in its absence.

As for next year, Bush should not expect Democrats to allow such legislation to pass without language establishing considerable congressional oversight of any expansion of warrantless wiretaps.

"We have been asked to make sweeping and fundamental changes in law for reasons that we do not know and in order to legalize secret, unlawful actions that the administration has refused to fully divulge," said Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the next Judiciary Committee chairman. "If legislation is needed for judicial review, then we should write that legislation together, in a bipartisan and thoughtful way."

The Bush administration has a backup plan. In speeches over the next few weeks, the Justice Department will launch a new campaign for the legislation by casting the choice as one between supporting the program or dropping it altogether -- and appearing soft on al-Qaida.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will make the eavesdropping program the focus of a Nov. 18 speech at the U.S. Air Force Academy. Kenneth L. Wainstein, assistant attorney general for the national security, will make a similar pitch Wednesday to the American Bar Association.

Leahy said that monitoring communications of suspected terrorists is essential but that "it needs to be done lawfully and with adequate checks and balances to prevent abuses of Americans' rights and Americans' privacy."

After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Bush ordered the National Security Agency to monitor communications potentially related to al-Qaida between people in the U.S. and those overseas. He bypassed normal requirements for court approval of such eavesdropping, and the program came under harsh criticism after it was disclosed last December by The New York Times.

Democrats and Republicans on the intelligence and judiciary committees spent much of the year trying to find out details from the administration, to little avail. Much of the information is classified, and the White House has insisted that revealing it would mean compromising the war on terrorism.

The House passed a bill in September to allow warrantless wiretaps under certain restrictions. House and Senate intelligence committees and congressional leaders would have to be notified, the president would have to believe that a terrorist attack is imminent, and certification would have to be renewed every 90 days.

A Republican measure in the Senate favored by the administration would require the Justice Department to report twice a year to the House and Senate intelligence committees the number and kind of any such operations. It would permit the surveillance to continue for up to one year without a warrant.

*

The House bill is H.R. 5825; the Senate bill is S. 3931.

Social Security Data A Major Source In Terrorism Probes (WP)

By Carlos Roig And Christopher Kriva, Special to The Washington Post

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093489

Sohaib Bin Lateef left Pakistan for the United States more than 25 years ago and fulfilled his dreams with a suburban home, a family and a string of gas stations and convenience stores in St. Louis. But along the way, he says, he took some bad advice and obtained a Social Security number under a false name.

Now Bin Lateef, 47, faces deportation and stands to lose everything, even though he insists he has no ties to terrorists. The Justice Department lists his case as terrorism-related.

Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the Social Security Administration's vast databases of personal information have become a resource for federal investigators, who have asked the agency to check tens of thousands of records for number misuse and identity fraud -- potential precursors to terrorist activity. Bin Lateef is one of hundreds of people convicted as a result.

The Social Security Administration is "the Fort Knox of identity information in the United States," said James Huse, the agency's inspector general from 1998 to 2004. "That's a pretty impressive investigative tool that no other agency possesses."

From just after Sept. 11 through 2005, Social Security officials sent prosecutors 456 referrals that were classified as terrorism-related, according to statistics compiled by Syracuse University's Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse. The review shows that 91 percent of those referrals led to prosecutions.

Only the departments of Justice and Homeland Security have referred more terrorism-related cases for prosecution, according to the Syracuse records, which are based on data compiled by the Justice Department's Executive Office for United States Attorneys.

Still, few if any suspects in Social Security cases are ever linked publicly to alleged terrorist activity. Most cases referred to prosecutors in the months after Sept. 11 involved document fraud by Latino immigrants working at airports.

Previous studies by the Syracuse center found that thousands of cases have been referred by all agencies for prosecution under the labels of "international terrorism" or "antiterrorism." However, senior Justice officials instead usually cite the criminal division's much smaller list of terrorism-related cases, which as of June included 441 defendants and 261 convictions. Most on that smaller list were charged with crimes unrelated to terrorism, an earlier Washington Post analysis found.

Prosecutors generally will not discuss individual cases. Law enforcement officials have said that even if they have evidence of terrorist activity, it does not need to be made public if suspects can be arrested or deported on lesser charges, such as document fraud or immigration violations.

"Prosecution of terrorism-related targets on these types of charges is often an effective method -- and sometimes the only available method -- of deterring and disrupting potential terrorist planning and support activities without compromising national security information," Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty wrote in a Justice Department report in June.

The federal law prohibiting misuse of Social Security numbers is "a very easy statute from a prosecution standpoint," said Jonathan Lasher, deputy chief counsel to the Social Security Administration's inspector general. "We don't have to prove a lot in the way of motive or intent. If you represent a number to be yours that isn't yours, you've essentially met the burden."Tapping the Data

After the 2001 attacks, authorities tapped the two main Social Security databases for information on suspected terrorists. "We were given taskings and requests, and we were responding to them as best we could in the wake of this national tragedy," said Richard A. Rohde, the Social Security Administration's assistant inspector general for investigations.

One database lists basic application information from people seeking Social Security numbers. The other contains wage and earnings histories compiled by the agency that are used to determine Social Security benefits.

The Internal Revenue code normally prohibits Social Security from releasing information in the wage and earnings database, even to law enforcement agencies. But IRS and Social Security officials are permitted to waive that rule in "life-threatening situations." A 30-day waiver was granted immediately after the Sept. 11 attacks and was extended four times by the IRS through early 2002, Lasher said.

Huse said he asked Congress several times unsuccessfully for permanent authority to release information in the wage database to federal law enforcement officials investigating potential terrorist activity.

One of the earliest uses of Social Security data in homeland security investigations came before the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City. Ronald Ingleby, resident agent in charge of the Social Security inspector general's office there, worked with the U.S. attorney's office to acquire about 10,000 employee records from the local airport authority and had his staff search Social Security records. As a result, 69 workers were indicted for alleged misuse of Social Security numbers on applications for airport security badges.

The program, which was expanded to many of the nation's airports as well as ports and other facilities, resulted in hundreds of guilty pleas, largely from Latino workers with no discernible links to terrorist groups. The workers had used fake or stolen Social Security numbers to gain employment or acquire access badges.

Federal agents also began turning to Social Security to check dubious records brought to their attention or to run down terrorism leads. In one case, a tip that al-Qaeda might try to poison military rations led to checks on workers at a meals-ready-to-eat factory in Texas. Several were convicted in 2004 of possessing or using false documents, though the case files show no evidence of a poisoning plot.

DOJ_NMG_0093490

Other cases led to charges against members of document-counterfeiting rings in Maryland and New York.Attracting Notice

Bin Lateef believes he originally came to the attention of investigators because he was a Pakistani national with a check-cashing company among his holdings. He said authorities began looking into his business in 2003. He also said that for a number of years he sent as much as $24,000 to $36,000 annually to his family in Pakistan, sometimes using "hawala," the system of informal money transfers in which cash moves between friends and relatives.

His lawyer believes authorities also were concerned about a September 2003 trip Bin Lateef took with his family through Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and Germany.

Commenting on this type of case, Jimmy Gurule, a law professor at the University of Notre Dame who was undersecretary for enforcement at the Treasury Department from 2001 to 2003, said a number of issues would have interested investigators. "The combination of the international travel, the combination of the money being transferred abroad through a hawala-type system or certainly the use of false identification documents are all red flags of possible terrorist activity," he said.

An inquiry turned up Bin Lateef's Social Security fraud. He had entered the United States on a student visa in 1980 to attend Southern Illinois University. A 1985 application to extend his stay was denied, but he said he became a legal permanent resident alien in 1988 under the Reagan administration's immigration reform.

However, to get the green card, Bin Lateef said, he used a false name on the application based on bad advice from acquaintances. A year or two later, he obtained a Social Security number with that false name.

Bin Lateef said that he has never had links to terrorist groups -- only that he went into business, raised a family and bought a home in O'Fallon, Mo., near St. Louis. "This is the only country in the whole entire world that would give me the opportunity to do what I did," he said.

William Wynne, Bin Lateef's lawyer, said, "This guy has a tattoo on his forehead that says 'productive citizen.' "

Bin Lateef pleaded guilty to felony charges of lying to federal authorities and of misusing a Social Security number. Deportation proceedings are ongoing. Prosecutors declined to comment on his case.

Like many other Social Security referrals related to homeland security prosecutions, Bin Lateef's is classified by the Justice Department as anti-terrorism.

In his report, McNulty, the deputy attorney general, signaled that investigators would continue to rely on Social Security and other government statutes not directly related to terrorism.

"There has been some criticism of our use of nonterrorism offenses, such as false statement charges, immigration fraud, and use of fraudulent travel documents, in terrorism cases," McNulty wrote. "Yet the appropriate charging of such offenses is so important to our disruption of terrorist plans that the Department has urged prosecutors to undertake initiatives to increase their use of these statutes."

Roig and Kriva were Medill School of Journalism fellows in the News 21 program of the Carnegie-Knight Initiative on the Future of Journalism Education.

Former USF Professor Must Testify In Va. Grand Jury Probe (BRAH)

The Bradenton Herald, November 11, 2006

TAMPA - Sami Al-Arian must testify before a federal grand jury despite claims that a plea agreement freed him from cooperating with the U.S. government, a federal judge ruled.

U.S. District Judge James S. Moody Jr. ruled Al-Arian must testify in the probe of International Institute of Islamic Thought in Herndon, Va., because Virginia prosecutors have granted him immunity.

In his trial, prosecutors said Al-Arian's World and Islamic Studies Enterprise got money from the Va. Institute. A jury acquitted Al-Arian, a former University of South Florida professor, of eight counts but deadlocked on nine others in December.

In Letter, Radical Cleric Details CIA Abduction, Egyptian Torture (WP)

By Craig Whitlock, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

Friday, November 10, 2006;

MILAN, Nov. 9 -- In an account smuggled out of prison, a radical Muslim cleric has detailed how he was kidnapped by the CIA from this northern Italian city and flown to Cairo, where he was tortured for months with electric shocks and shackled to an iron rack known as "the Bride."

DOJ_NMG_0093491

Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, also known as Abu Omar, wrote an 11-page letter describing his 2003 abduction at the hands of the CIA and Italian secret service agents. He somehow transferred the document out of Egypt -- where he remains in custody -- and into the hands of Italian prosecutors who are investigating his disappearance.

The Milan public prosecutor's office on Thursday confirmed the authenticity of the letter, the existence of which was first reported by the Italian daily newspaper Corriere della Sera.

The document has been submitted as evidence to defense attorneys representing 25 CIA officers, a U.S. Air Force officer and nine Italian agents who have been charged with organizing the kidnapping of Nasr, an Egyptian national, in February 2003.

A copy of the document, handwritten in Arabic, was obtained by The Washington Post. Undated, it reads like a homemade legal affidavit, outlining how Nasr was seized as he was walking to a mosque in Milan, stuffed into a van and rushed to Egypt in a covert operation involving spies from three countries.

"I didn't understand anything about what was going on," Nasr wrote. "They began to punch me in the stomach and all over my body. They wrapped my entire head and face with wide tape, and cut holes over my nose and face so I could breathe."

Upon his arrival in Egypt hours later, he said, he was taken into a room by an Egyptian security official who told him that "two pashas" wanted to speak with him.

"Only one spoke, an Egyptian," he recalled. "And all he said was, 'Do you want to collaborate with us?' " Nasr said the other "pasha" appeared to be an American. His captors offered a deal: They would allow him to return to Italy if he agreed to become an informant. Nasr said he refused. As a result, he said, he was interrogated and physically abused for the next 14 months in two Cairo prisons.

Italian prosecutors charge that the CIA and the Italian military intelligence agency known as Sismi collaborated to kidnap Nasr, who was known for preaching radical sermons in Milan and railing against U.S. policies in Afghanistan and the Middle East. According to prosecutors, the abduction thwarted a separate Italian police investigation into Nasr's activities and jeopardized a surveillance operation concerning other radicals in Milan.

Court papers allege that the kidnapping was orchestrated by the CIA's station chief in Rome and involved at least two dozen CIA operatives, most of whom arrived in Italy months before to lay the groundwork. Italian judges have issued arrest warrants for the CIA officers and have pledged to try them in absentia if necessary.

Although the case has caused a furor in Italy, the U.S. government has neither confirmed nor denied playing a role in Nasr's disappearance. Egyptian officials have also remained silent. A CIA spokesman declined to comment for this story.

Nasr's wife and his lawyer in Cairo have said the cleric is still imprisoned in Egypt, although he has been released under house arrest for brief periods. It is unclear how Italian prosecutors received a copy of his letter. Investigators said handwriting experts have verified that Nasr was the author.

Prosecutors in Milan are also investigating allegations that Italian spies offered to give Nasr $2.5 million if he would sign papers saying he had left Italy voluntarily and was not kidnapped, according to Italian news reports.

The imam of a Milan mosque where Nasr preached on occasion said he also recognized the handwriting as the Egyptian's. "This is his writing, I know it for sure," said the imam, Arman Ahmed al-Hissini, who is known locally as Abu Imad and runs the Viale Jenner mosque, a few blocks from where Nasr was kidnapped.

Abdel Hamid Shaari, president of the Islamic Cultural Center in Milan, said he was worried that the public disclosure of Nasr's letter could jeopardize his life, or at least dash any chances that he might be released. "What are they going to do with him now?" Shaari said. "He's a problem for the Italians, the Egyptians and the Americans."

In his letter, Nasr described how his health had badly deteriorated. He had lost hearing in one ear from repeated beatings, he said, and his formerly pitch-black hair had turned all white. He said he was kept in a cell with no toilet and no lights, where "roaches and rats walked across my body."

He also gave a graphic account of Egyptian interrogation practices, including how he would be strapped to an iron rack nicknamed "the Bride" and zapped with electric stun guns.

On other occasions, he wrote, he was tied to a wet mattress on the floor. While one interrogator sat on a wooden chair perched on the prisoner's shoulders, another interrogator would flip a switch, sending jolts of electricity into the mattress coils.

Post a Comment

Comments: (Limit 5,000 characters)

Comments that include profanity or personal attacks or other inappropriate comments or material will be removed from the site. Additionally, entries that are unsigned or contain "signatures" by someone other than the actual author will be removed. Finally, we will take steps to block users who violate any of our posting standards, terms of use or privacy policies or any other policies governing this site. Please review the full rules governing commentaries and discussions. You are fully responsible for the content that you post.

DOJ_NMG_0093492

Britain's MI5 Warns Of Rising Terror Threat (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 10 -- British spies are watching 1,600 people in 200 cells believed to be plotting terrorist acts in Britain or overseas, according to the head of Britain's domestic spy agency.

"More and more people are moving from passive sympathy towards active terrorism," said Eliza Manningham-Buller, director general of the MI5 intelligence agency. The spy chief, who rarely speaks publicly, delivered her stark assessment Thursday in a speech at the University of London's Queen Mary College. A transcript of her remarks was posted on MI5's Web site Friday.

Manningham-Buller said a growing number of people are plotting to kill others and damage the British economy. The conspirators, she said, are motivated "by a sense of grievance and injustice driven by their interpretation of the history between the West and the Muslim world."

She also described the terrorists' "propaganda machine" as "sophisticated," noting that footage of attacks in Iraq is posted on the Internet within 30 minutes, facilitated by teams that edit the video, translate the audio into many languages and package the material for a global audience. "And, chillingly, we see the results here," she said. "Young teenagers being groomed to be suicide bombers."

Responding to her remarks, Prime Minister Tony Blair said, "It's a very long and deep struggle, but we have to stand up and be counted for what we believe in and take the fight to those people who want to entice young people into something wicked and violent but utterly futile." He said he agreed with Manningham-Buller's assessment that this terrorist threat would last a generation.

The spy chief said her agency was currently aware of about 30 plots, which "often have links back to al-Qaeda in Pakistan." It is through those links, she said, that al-Qaeda gives "guidance and training to its largely British foot soldiers here on an extensive and growing scale."

Earlier this week, a British court sentenced to life in prison an al-Qaeda operative who had made a detailed proposal to financiers in Pakistan, according to prosecutors. The operative, Dhiren Barot, 34, had plotted synchronized bomb attacks on U.S. financial institutions, along with London hotels and other sites in Britain.

U.S. intelligence officials have not publicly estimated the number of terrorist cells they are watching. In September, however, President Bush delivered a speech in which he detailed eight plots that had been thwarted as a result of intelligence gleaned from detainees in the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Manningham-Buller's motivation for publicly airing her assessment was unclear. Some analysts suggested the move could be seen as a plea for more funding or for intelligence tips; others saw the speech as a way to recruit more agents.

Staffing at MI5 has increased 50 percent to 2,800 since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and it will continue to grow, Manningham-Buller said. More than 6 percent of MI5 personnel are ethnic minorities, she added. The agency has actively recruited Muslims and other minorities.

But Manningham-Buller also painted a picture of an overstretched agency that has to make daily decisions about "whom to follow, whose telephone lines need listening to," and what seized evidence needs to be analyzed first.

She emphasized that the first al-Qaeda-related plot against Britain was discovered and disrupted in November 2000, long before the Iraq war started. But she also said that videotaped statements of British suicide bombers made it clear that they are motivated by "perceived worldwide and long-standing injustices against Muslims," including their interpretation of British foreign policy as "anti-Muslim," particularly in Iraq and Afghanistan.

She also warned that many countries are facing a new terrorist threat and specifically mentioned Spain, France, Canada and Germany. While terrorists were currently using homemade improvised explosive devices, she said, "tomorrow's threat may include the use of chemicals, bacteriological agents, radioactive materials and even nuclear technology."

Blair Says Homegrown Terrorism Is Generation-Long Struggle (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 10 — Prime Minister Tony Blair said Friday that the threat from homegrown Islamic terrorism would last “a generation,” reinforcing a highly unusual warning by the head of the MI5 domestic intelligence agency that it was keeping some 1,600 suspects in 200 terrorist cells under surveillance.

DOJ_NMG_0093493

The warning by Dame Eliza Manningham-Buller, head of MI5, in a speech on Thursday was by far the most extensive and somber of recent times and included assertions that about 30 terrorist conspiracies were under investigation and that "tomorrow's threat may include the use of chemicals, bacteriological agents, radioactive materials and even nuclear technology."

She also asserted that operatives for Al Qaeda in Pakistan were helping to guide some of the plots, reflecting British assessments that Qaeda operatives survived campaigns against them to steer conspiracies in Britain from afar.

"We are aware of numerous plots to kill people and to damage our economy," she said. "What do I mean by numerous? Five? Ten? No, Nearer 30 — that we know of. These plots often have links back to Al Qaeda in Pakistan and through those links, Al Qaeda gives guidance and training to its largely British foot soldiers here on an extensive and growing scale."

The British counterterrorism authorities say they cannot move too quickly to break up plots because they need enough evidence to prosecute suspects successfully.

Since the London bombings of July 2005, Britain has sounded frequent terrorist alarms, most notably last August when it issued a major alert alleging that Islamic terrorists planned to blow up trans-Atlantic airliners. And just this week, a judge sentenced a 34-year-old Muslim, Dhiren Barot, to a minimum of 40 years in prison for plotting a series of attacks in the United States and Britain from 2000 to 2004.

The news and warnings have left many Britons with mixed feelings: a sense of foreboding, but also some skepticism about the government's motives in making such announcements since there have been no attacks for more than a year.

Among the more frightening aspects of Dame Eliza's warning was her statement that support for terrorism among British Muslims was broader than previously known, as more young people had become radicalized.

"More and more people are moving from passive sympathy toward active terrorism through being radicalized or indoctrinated by friends, families, in organized training events here and overseas, by images on television, through chat rooms and Web sites on the Internet," she said.

Moreover, Dame Eliza said, since the July 2005 subway and bus attacks, five other "major conspiracies" had been thwarted in Britain, "saving many hundreds, possibly even thousands, of lives." MI5's caseload has increased 80 percent so far this year alone, she said.

Historically, the head of MI5 does not make such public pronouncements. "Emerging from the shadows is not something they like to do," said Neil Ellis, a domestic security expert at Royal United Services Institute, a research group. Indeed, Dame Eliza acknowledged in her speech to academics on Thursday night: "I rarely speak in public. I prefer to avoid the limelight and get on with my job."

But it was a sign of changed times — and, perhaps of MI5's campaign to secure more government money and expand its ranks of agents and recruits — that the text of her speech was posted Friday on the MI5 Web site, prompting some Islamic leaders to say the authorities were demonizing Britain's Muslim minority of 1.6 million.

Massoud Shadjareh, the chairman of the Islamic Human Rights Commission, said, "Although we recognize that there is a real threat, the suggestion that we could even face a nuclear threat will only contribute to paranoia rather than safety and security."

Dame Eliza echoed some longstanding arguments by Mr. Blair, who has resisted critics' accusations that his support of the United States in Iraq and Afghanistan had made Britain a target for terrorist attack. "Let there be no doubt about this," she said, "the international terrorist threat to this country is not new. It began before Iraq, before Afghanistan and before 9/11."

But she went on to say that terrorist recruiters had woven a "powerful narrative" of Muslim oppression. She said the video wills of British suicide bombers made it clear that they were motivated, in part, by their interpretation of British foreign policy, particularly in Iraq and Afghanistan, as anti-Muslim, but also by perceived worldwide and longstanding injustices against Muslims and an "extreme and minority interpretation of Islam promoted by some preachers and people of influence."

She said the terrorist threat was "serious, is growing and will, I believe, be with us for a generation."

"It is a sustained campaign, not a series of isolated incidents," she continued. "It aims to wear down our will to resist."

In a separate news conference on Friday, Mr. Blair said, "I think it's absolutely right that it will last a generation."

"It's a very long and deep struggle," he said, "but we have to stand up and be counted for what we believe in and take the fight to those people who want to entice young people into something wicked and violent but utterly futile."

Dame Eliza has presided over a major, public effort to expand MI5, which deals exclusively with domestic security and espionage. In her speech, she said the MI5 staff now numbers 2,800, "an increase of over 50 percent since 9/11."

In a telephone interview, Mr. Ellis, of the Royal United Services Institute, said there had been a series of public statements by British officials warning of an increasing threat and seeking public support. Just on Wednesday, for instance, the foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, urged British Muslims to "speak up against extremism."

From that point of view, Mr. Ellis said, Dame Eliza may have been trying to promote this "cultural shift in how the security services engage with the public."

DOJ_NMG_0093494

"If society is to engage in this battle of ideas," Mr. Ellis said, "then perhaps we need to know the level, the size and the scale of this threat."

Judge Lets Guilty Plea Stand In Terrorism Case (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

A federal judge has refused to throw out the guilty plea of a convicted al-Qaeda supporter who argued that he was illegally spied on through President Bush's controversial warrantless eavesdropping program.

Iyman Faris, an Ohio truck driver, pleaded guilty in 2003 to plotting to bring down the Brooklyn Bridge and launch a simultaneous attack in Washington. He asked a judge to vacate the plea, arguing in part that the alleged surveillance violated his rights and that the government could not use it to build a case against him.

U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema rejected Faris's motion this week for reasons that are unclear because her ruling remains sealed. It is cited in the docket in U.S. District Court in Alexandria. Another docket entry says Brinkema rejected efforts by Faris's attorneys to obtain documents "relating to or concerning any warrantless electronic surveillance or monitoring" of his conversations by the National Security Agency.

Faris, a Kashmiri-born naturalized U.S. citizen, pleaded guilty to providing material support to al-Qaeda. Federal officials said he was an al-Qaeda scout who had planned with top al-Qaeda operative Khalid Sheik Mohammed to sever the cables of the Brooklyn Bridge and to derail trains in or near Washington.

Faris's attorney, David B. Smith, declined to comment on Brinkema's ruling, as did prosecutors.

Faris is one of a number of terrorism defendants who have filed legal challenges to the NSA program, under which the agency has monitored phone calls and e-mails involving U.S. residents and foreign parties without obtaining warrants from a secret court that handles such matters.

A federal judge in Detroit ruled in August that the program, which is aimed at communications of potential terrorists, is unconstitutional and violates privacy and free speech rights. The government is appealing. Bush has argued that the program is legal and necessary to protect Americans from terrorists.

Faris is unique among defendants who have challenged the surveillance because Bush administration officials have said he was spied on -- and credited the program with helping to uncover his plot.

Egyptian Says He Was Tortured After Being Kidnapped In Milan (NYT)

By Elisabetta Povoledo

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

ROME, Nov. 10 — A militant Egyptian cleric who prosecutors say was kidnapped by the Central Intelligence Agency said in a newly published account that he was tortured with electric shocks while he lay on a wet mattress in a Cairo prison and was repeatedly beaten and forced to eat rotten bread in a pitch-black cell, while rats and cockroaches ran over his body.

The cleric's recounting was contained in an affidavit given to Italian prosecutors investigating his alleged abduction. Excerpts were published in a Milan daily newspaper, Corriere della Sera, on Thursday.

"I am writing my testimony from this, my tomb," writes Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, known as Abu Omar, at the start of an 11-page letter that was excerpted Thursday by the newspaper. His face has been transformed, he claims, "as a result of the torture."

Milanese prosecutors have appended the account to the case they are building against 39 people, including 25 C.I.A. operatives. Prosecutors accuse them of abducting Mr. Nasr and sending him to Egypt for questioning, in the American practice of rendition. Members of the Italian secret services, including Nicolo Pollari, the country's top spy, are also under investigation in the kidnapping, which took place in Milan in February 2003.

Earlier this year, an Italian military police officer confessed to having participated in the kidnapping, which he believed was jointly organized by the American and Italian intelligence services.

In the letter, Mr. Nasr says he was stopped by an American, asked for his documents and then forced into a white van where he was "beaten on my stomach and my entire body" before being bound and gagged and taken to Cairo by plane.

In the Cairo prison, he says, he was subjected to weeks of torture while he was being interrogated. "It lasted seven months," he wrote, but "it felt like seven years." His wife, Nabila, told Milanese prosecutors that Egyptian officials had tried to bribe her husband so he would deny that he had been kidnapped.

Writing from Egypt, she said that her husband had been offered $2 million "to say that he had not been kidnapped and to say that he had come of his own free will" to Egypt, the Milan newspaper reported Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0093495

Milanese prosecutors have asked that the United States extradite the 25 operatives they believe organized and executed the kidnapping.

A Topic In The Air But One That Political Candidates Declined To Touch: Torture Of Prisoners (NYT)

By Peter Steinfels

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

The October issue of Theology Today, a scholarly journal published by the Princeton Theological Seminary, featured a series of articles on torture. "It is a matter of shame," writes one of the contributors, Jeremy Waldron, a professor of law at New York University, that "we have no choice but to conduct a national debate about torture."

That debate, Professor Waldron continues, is not about stopping torture by "corrupt and tyrannical regimes" but about whether the American people and the American nation want "to remain part of the international human rights consensus that torture is utterly beyond the pale."

There were few if any signs of such a debate in the midterm election campaigns. That cannot simply be because of the government's insistence that the United States abhors torture and does not practice it. The government insists on many things — about the war in Iraq and economic prosperity, for example — that its political opponents do not hesitate to challenge and challenge vociferously.

Torture is different. It is such a stain on personal and national character that nothing but appalling photographs could have forced the subject to the fore. When it comes to pressing the question of official complicity, no stack of equivocating documents can have similar force. In a season of shameless attack ads, torture is still too shameful to be debated.

As for religious reaction, Fleming Rutledge, the Episcopal priest and noted preacher, said in this issue of Theology Today, "In my lifetime, I do not remember any major public question being so studiously ignored as this one."

The journal articles stem from an effort to change that. They are based on presentations at the founding conference, in Princeton last January, of the National Religious Campaign Against Torture. Prominent religious leaders, Protestant (both mainline and evangelical), Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, Jewish and Muslim, issued a statement, "Torture Is a Moral Issue," that was a sweet seven sentences in length:

"Torture violates the basic dignity of the human person that all religions, in their highest ideals, hold dear. It degrades everyone involved — policy makers, perpetrators and victims. It contradicts our nation's most cherished values. Any policies that permit torture and inhumane treatment are shocking and morally intolerable.

"Nothing less is at stake in the torture abuse crisis than the soul of our nation. What does it signify if torture is condemned in word but allowed in deed?

"Let America abolish torture now — without exceptions."

It is hard to say how much the Theology Today articles add to that succinct statement. In one, William T. Cavanaugh, who teaches theology at the University of St. Thomas in St. Paul, draws on his previous study of torture by the Pinochet government in Chile. His most provocative observations may be that, however counterintuitive, "those who torture tend to think of their work in extremely high moral terms."

Citing examples from Chile, Professor Cavanaugh notes that "torturers sometimes imagine their acts as a kind of self-sacrifice on their part: 'What terrible things I must do in order to defend my beloved people!' "

What goes for the individual torturer can go for the nation as a whole. "The moral purpose is made more righteous," Professor Cavanaugh writes, "by the extremity of the act of torture itself." By definition, "the threat against the nation must be extremely severe if such an extreme procedure as torture is used."

The argument is strangely circular, but it ends in the conviction, he says, that "only the most morally righteous nation could be trusted with the capacity to use torture for a good purpose."

In another article, a leading evangelical ethicist, David P. Gushee, a professor of moral philosophy at Union University in Jackson, Tenn., worries that the United States is "succumbing to the temptation to waive moral rules that we have every reason to know are applicable to us."

"We know that torture is wrong," Dr. Gushee writes, "but just not now, not in our exceptional case, not in this global war on terror. Yet we are queasy enough, that we do not want to call torture, torture."

Instead, he continues, "we deny that we are torturing, or we deny that our prisoners are really prisoners, or when pushed to the wall, we remind one another of how evil the enemy is and how much worse other countries or ideologies are."

"We give every evidence," he concludes, "of the kind of self-deception so characteristic of the descent into sin."

DOJ_NMG_0093496

Dr. Gushee has not limited his concern to scholarly pages. Last February he wrote an article for the popular evangelical monthly Christianity Today titled "5 Reasons Torture Is Always Wrong."

All these writers must step carefully around the fact that the president and other American authorities have repeatedly denied that the government tolerates torture — even while they reserve its right to use what are delicately referred to in official parlance as "enhanced" or "alternative" interrogation techniques.

Obviously, these theologians have something less than complete confidence in such official protestations, and one can understand why.

In a White House compromise with a small group of adamant Republicans, last month's Military Commissions Act, for example, left standing the United States' commitment to Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions protecting prisoners from violence, cruelty, torture and humiliating and degrading treatment.

But while the legislation spelled out certain "grave breaches" of Common Article 3 that would constitute war crimes, it also underlined the president's power to interpret the nation's obligations, to define what is grave or not and to screen his definitions from court challenges, and maybe even from public knowledge.

Already, the Central Intelligence Agency has warned that detained Qaeda suspects must not be allowed to disclose their treatment to courts — or perhaps even to their own lawyers — lest other terrorists "adapt their training to counter the tactics that C.I.A. can employ in interrogations."

Is there any way around this lack of transparency? Here is one idea, admittedly inspired not by sober theological analysis but by political ads.

Let all interrogations be videotaped (interrogating off camera would itself be a "grave breach"). Three years after any interrogation, the video would be made public. One could assume that by that time terrorists would have learned whatever techniques had then been in use.

The important feature, of course, would be the kind of endorsement now required of campaign advertising — a closing shot of the president on screen. "This interrogation was paid for by the American people," the president would have to say, "and I approve of its methods."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Democrats Still Face Hurdles In Enacting 9/11 Panel's Ideas (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

Democratic leaders preparing to take control of Congress have vowed to push through a host of reforms recommended two years ago by the Sept. 11 commission, such as better port security and improved radio communications for first responders, but many of the most controversial changes are likely to face obstacles even with Capitol Hill in Democratic hands, according to experts and legislative aides.

Presumptive House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has made implementing the commission's recommendations one of the centerpieces of her "first 100 hours" legislative agenda, with particular focus on requiring radiation scans of all cargo that arrives by sea.

Other proposals include more money for rail security and hiring more Border Patrol agents and aviation screeners. Some Democrats also want to declassify intelligence agencies' budgets, improve management of terrorist watch lists, toughen regulation of chemical plants and improve privacy safeguards.

"As part of the first 100 hours, we will try to the best of our ability to address them in a more complete fashion than the piecemeal approach that Congress has taken thus far," said Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), incoming chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, referring to the commission's recommendations. "On some of the more controversial issues of cargo screening and other things, I think we can work out a compromise."

Homeland security experts cautioned that Democratic control of Congress will not guarantee implementation of some of the commission's most controversial suggestions, which have languished because of entrenched political and bureaucratic obstacles.

A prime example is the commission's call to base the federal government's homeland security funding on the actual risk of terrorist attacks or other calamities -- an approach that would generally benefit large metropolitan areas at the expense of smaller cities and rural regions. Although such an approach would favor regions represented by Democrats, lawmakers have preferred to spread dollars to as many jurisdictions as possible.

DOJ_NMG_0093497

"It's easy to say they'll implement the 9/11 recommendations. But some of the recommendations have not been implemented because they've been so hard to swallow," said Michael Greenberger, director of the Center for Health and Homeland Security at the University of Maryland. "It remains to be seen if the Democrats have an answer to that."

Democrats will face the usual divisions between the House and the Senate, as well as tensions between liberals and centrists within their own party. The Senate Homeland Security Committee is likely to be led by Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), who is more moderate than his House colleagues and who just completed, as an independent candidate, a bruising reelection campaign in which many Democrats opposed him after he lost in the primary.

The bipartisan Sept. 11 panel released its report in 2004. It subsequently issued admonishments to the Bush administration and the GOP-controlled Congress for failing to enact many of its major recommendations.

In a December 2005 "final report card," the commission gave the government mediocre to failing grades in numerous areas, including screening airline passengers and improving first responders' communication systems. Many commissioners have also pointed to mixed results in the effort to merge terrorism watch lists maintained by the FBI and other agencies.

Republican Thomas H. Kean, a former New Jersey governor who served as the commission's chairman, said yesterday that some recommendations that have languished -- including reserving portions of the broadcast spectrum for emergency responders and improvements in border security -- would be relatively easy to implement if Democrats are determined.

But he acknowledged that other changes are politically difficult, including the panel's call for restructuring the way Congress oversees and pays for homeland security programs. A Democratic leadership source, speaking on the condition of anonymity because the plans are not final, said Pelosi is likely to reorganize House committees to streamline jurisdiction over security matters.

"There's a whole realm of things that need to be done," Kean said. "The fact that the new speaker wants to make it a priority, I congratulate her."

Democrats have not spelled out how they intend to pay for their initiatives. In 2006, they unsuccessfully proposed $3 billion for rail security and $5 billion for first-responder communications equipment.

No one has figured out how to scan all cargo reliably in real-world settings.

"I should feel relieved, but I don't," said Carie Lemack, co-founder of Families of September 11 and head of a national security consulting firm.

Lemack said some of the commission's recommendations are relatively easy but have lacked the political backing to move forward. She cited naming a senior adviser to the president to oversee the lockdown of nuclear weapon materials worldwide and declassifying intelligence agencies' budgets.

James Jay Carafano, a senior research fellow at the Heritage Foundation, said lawmakers from both parties have signaled that they are unwilling to dispense homeland security funding based on risk, preferring the locality-based, pork-barrel funding that is popular at election time.

"What's left on the table is really, really hard and can't be legislated into existence, or really, really stupid and shouldn't be done anyway," Carafano said.

Some recommendations highlighted by Democrats are already in the works but face technical hurdles. These include efforts to put in place a border entry and exit screening system and to streamline the terrorism watch lists. A battle also looms over whether to pay for or delay Real ID, a multibillion-dollar effort to standardize state driver's licenses.

Other proposals by House Democrats, including hiring 2,000 new Border Patrol agents a year for five years and building a "virtual fence" using sensors and other technology, are already being adopted by the Bush administration.

Looking Into Laptops (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

IT WAS BAD ENOUGH for international travelers earlier this year when security officials barred laptop computers from carry-on luggage. Now that the ban has been lifted, a new worry has replaced it: the prospect of U.S. customs agents snooping through your laptop — and even seizing it.

It doesn't happen often — only about 1% of executives surveyed recently by the Assn. of Corporate Travel Executives said their laptops had been confiscated — but it's enough to set off alarm bells. If your laptop holds critical banking data or operational information, the association warns, you're better off e-mailing a copy to yourself before heading to the airport. And if you have truly sensitive items, you'd better not put them on your laptop in the first place.

Officials at the Department of Homeland Security recite the familiar mantra — legitimate business travelers have nothing to fear. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents, they say, first conduct a routine check of whether a person should be admitted to the country. If that leads them to suspect the traveler is involved in a crime, they'll search any laptop. The only time a computer is seized, the department said in a statement, is "if the laptop contains information with possible ties to terrorism, narcotics smuggling, child pornography or other criminal activity."

DOJ_NMG_0093498

But as the department's records point out, even "legitimate business travelers" may wind up having their laptops rifled if a person fits a suspicious profile (in one case, men between the ages of 30 to 60s traveling alone from Asia), or if an individual is unlucky enough to be chosen for a random inspection. Because the Supreme Court has ruled that agents at international points of entry can perform "routine" searches without a warrant or even reasonable suspicion, some courts have interpreted that to mean all travelers are subject to inspections of their privileged and personal information at any border crossing.

There is a glimmer of hope for travelers eager to keep the authorities' hands off their hard drives. U.S. District Judge Dean D. Pregerson in Los Angeles recently ruled against a laptop search because agents didn't have a reasonable basis to suspect a U.S. traveler of having committed a crime. In Pregerson's view, searching a laptop isn't "routine," and the 4th Amendment's protection against unreasonable searches and seizures applies on the border. The government appealed the ruling to the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals.

Stopping bad guys at the border is important, and it makes sense to inspect incoming items, including laptops, for explosives and other weapons. But the government has been using the terrorist attacks of 9/11 to redefine "reasonable." There's a clear line between checking a laptop for explosives and reading its contents, and agents should have an excellent reason to cross it.

Slow Home Grants Stall Progress In New Orleans (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — The $7.5 billion program to rebuild Louisiana by helping residents repair or replace their flooded homes has gotten off to a slow start, frustrating government officials and outraging many homeowners who say they are still in limbo 14 months after Hurricane Katrina hit.

Though nearly 79,000 families have applied to the program, called the Road Home, only 1,721 have been told how much grant money they will receive. And just 22 have received access to the cash, which was provided by federal taxpayers and is being distributed by the state.

“I don’t know of anyone who has actually received any money,” said Cassandra D. Wall, who is active in a group of homeowners from the eastern part of New Orleans. Ms. Wall said she planned to attend a protest Nov. 17 in Baton Rouge, the state capital, “to go public with the outrage and the outcry.”

Many hopes have been pinned on the Road Home program, which is widely considered the most important factor in rebuilding the ruined neighborhoods of New Orleans and is also meant to start an economic boom in southern Louisiana. Homeowners who rebuild or buy new houses in the state are eligible for grants of up to $150,000 to cover their uninsured losses, although the average award has been about $68,000.

The city’s mayor, C. Ray Nagin, is so dissatisfied with the pace of the program that on Nov. 1 he announced that the city was developing a plan to lend money to people waiting for their Road Home grants.

[Officials announced on Nov. 6 that Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco had ordered the contractor managing the program to calculate 10,000 awards by the end of the month.]

“It’s time to kick into high gear,” said Walter Leger, a lawyer and a member of the Louisiana Recovery Authority, which devised the federally financed Road Home program. “It’s time to forget the reasons and excuses” for the slow pace so far.

In some ways, the program’s low-speed beginning reflects an urgent need to avoid the kind of waste and fraud that plagued federal programs after the hurricane. The government, among other things, is demanding that applicants produce details of insurance policies and payouts, proof of title to a house, and, if possible, official assessments of a home’s prestorm value. Many New Orleans residents lost such paperwork in the flood, or never had it in the first place.

But the larger explanation is that the program is, in effect, a giant experiment.

“There is no precedent,” said Andy Kopplin, executive director of the recovery authority. “Louisiana’s version is the single largest housing assistance program ever done anywhere.”

The only similar program is in Mississippi, which got a full Congressional appropriation for its roughly $3 billion plan months before Louisiana got the full $7.5 billion it asked for. The Mississippi program is smaller and differs in many details; fewer people are eligible, for example, and the grants do not have to be used for housing.

But Mississippi’s program has been plagued by some of the same problems, including a slow start that drew public criticism from, among others, Trent Lott, the state’s junior Republican senator. New data from the program show that it has now paid $320.6 million in 5,201 grants — but officials had originally planned to have given out most of the grants by the end of August, the first anniversary of the storm.

DOJ_NMG_0093499

Some Louisiana officials also point out that the Mississippi program got a public-relations black eye when it turned out that several state lawmakers had won a lucrative legal contract with the program. No accusations of fraud or conflicts of interest have surfaced in Louisiana's program.

That is not much comfort to people like Lisa A. Lincoln, a social worker flooded out of New Orleans who now lives about 130 miles away, near Lafayette. Ms. Lincoln applied for a Road Home grant in August. She was interviewed, her house was inspected and her thumbprint was taken as a fraud-prevention measure.

But she still has not heard if she will get a grant to repair her Creole cottage in the Gentilly neighborhood of New Orleans. The house still needs at least $60,000 worth of work, she said; it took all her insurance money, and help from community groups, to gut it and install some wallboard.

The delay appears to be that the program has to verify that she had insurance, and how much it paid her, she said. "And that could take however long to get," she said. "I'm in limbo."

Dealing with the insurance companies is just one challenge the program has faced, said Michael Byrne, a former New York City firefighter who is now chief program executive for ICF International, the private company the state hired to run the Road Home program.

Complicated federal regulations bar what is called "duplication of benefits," so anyone who received insurance money or housing assistance from a different government agency, like the Federal Emergency Management Agency, has to document it and have it subtracted from the Road Home grant. And there have been computer systems to coordinate, documents to verify, hundreds of people to hire and offices to open across the state and, soon, in Houston.

Even figuring out how much a house was worth before the storm — the cap on the amount of a grant — is difficult, slow and often controversial.

Michael M. Homan, a professor of theology at Xavier University, is among the few who has been told how much he can get to repair his badly damaged house in the Mid-City neighborhood. But Professor Homan thinks the amount he was offered, about $64,000, is too low.

That is because the program assigned a prestorm value to his house of $146,000, less than he paid for it in 2002 and about $40,000 less than the appraisal when he refinanced his mortgage the next year. So he has appealed, and is hoping that his grant will be increased. Because he writes about his experiences on the Internet (at michaelhoman.blogspot.com), his results are being anxiously watched by other applicants.

Professor Homan said he was not dissatisfied with the program, compared with his other experiences after the storm. It has been, he said, "a year of incredible frustration," starting when the levees broke. He had flood insurance, but is suing his insurance company, which denied his claim for wind damage.

It is not just the financial strain. As anyone here will tell you, trying to live in New Orleans is hard. Professor Homan, his wife and two children are living in the second story of their tilted house and in a FEMA trailer parked out front. Around them, some houses look abandoned, and a few have waist-high weeds in their yards.

Because housing in New Orleans has traditionally been relatively inexpensive, limiting grants to the prestorm value of a house may keep many people from rebuilding, said Melanie Ehrlich, a professor at Tulane University who is a founder of Citizens Road Home Action Team, a group that is pushing for changes in the state program.

Dr. Ehrlich, a molecular biologist, cites statistics suggesting that before the storm, about 10 percent of the city's houses were valued at less than $50,000, and about two-thirds were valued at less than $125,000, far less than it would cost to build them from scratch. State officials say that low-income homeowners will be eligible for special loans that will be forgiven if they live in their houses for five years.

Salvatore S. Barone may be a test case, of sorts. Mr. Barone and his sister inherited a house in the eastern part of New Orleans after their mother died in 2000. Mr. Barone said that the house was valued at about $72,000, and that a contractor told him it would cost $52,000 to fix the flood damage.

But his situation, like many here, is complicated. His sister, who lived in the house before the storm, failed to pay the insurance or tax bills, probably because she was suffering from dementia, Mr. Barone said, adding that she was now in a nursing home.

A former driver for United Cabs in New Orleans, Mr. Barone said he was disabled by a stroke a decade ago and lives on $699 a month in federal benefits. He is staying in a trailer in rural Mississippi.

Though he has applied for a Road Home grant, Mr. Barone must first get his name on the title to the house, a common problem in New Orleans, lawyers there say.

Paul Tuttle, the pro bono counsel for Southeast Louisiana Legal Services, said that since the storm, his office had heard from hundreds of people living in family homes that they suddenly have to prove they own.

DOJ_NMG_0093500

And the issue is critical. In Mr. Barone's case, he said, "I'll be living in a cardboard box under the Interstate if I don't get this grant."

WAR NEWS:

Pentagon To Reevaluate Strategy And Goals In Iraq (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

The Pentagon is conducting a major review of the military's Iraq strategy to determine "what's going wrong and should be changed" to attain U.S. objectives in the war-torn country, the nation's top general said yesterday.

The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, initiated the review this fall after starkly deteriorating security in Baghdad led commanders there to rule out any significant cut this year in the level of U.S. troops in Iraq -- now at about 145,000 -- according to senior defense officials and sources.

Pace said he, Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, and Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, who as head of Central Command oversees the U.S. military in the Middle East, are all working on recommendations for how to improve Iraq strategy.

The military's growing view that Iraq is at a crossroads, a belief spurred largely by intensified sectarian fighting and mounting U.S. casualties on the ground, coincides with political pressure in Washington to find alternatives to the current Iraq policy, heightened by this week's election and the Democratic takeover of Congress.

Pace is scheduled to meet early next week with members of the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan commission mandated by Congress to review the Bush administration's Iraq policy and propose changes, a senior defense official said. Pace's review and other military recommendations are expected to be merged with the work of the Iraq Study Group as part of a broad effort by the administration to redefine Iraq policy. "It will become part of something bigger," the source said.

"We need to give ourselves a good, honest scrub about what is working, what is not working, what are the impediments to progress, and what should we change about the way we're doing it," Pace said in an interview yesterday with CBS News.

"We'll make the changes that are needed to get ourselves more focused on the correct objectives," Pace said, adding in a later interview that the U.S. objectives are themselves in question.

In a string of television appearances to mark Veterans Day, Pace declined to provide details of any specific recommendations for major military shifts in Iraq, saying that would be "premature" and could compromise the effort. "We should not be signaling to our enemies what we're going to do next," he told MSNBC.

Pace said he and other military officials "continuously review what's going right, what's going wrong, what needs to change" and give the defense secretary and the president their "best military advice."

Still, sources said that Pace's review marks a more fundamental and open-ended look for possible solutions in Iraq than the military has undertaken to date, growing out of a realization that Iraq could descend into chaos and that the current strategy is inadequate.

"The collapse of the strategy in Baghdad . . . caused a very deep introspection by the military," said a source connected to the Pentagon, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the topic.

Asked by one interviewer whether the United States is winning the war in Iraq, Pace replied: "You have to define 'winning.' I don't mean to be glib about that.

"Winning, to me, is simply having each of the nations that we're trying to help have a secure environment inside of which their government and people can function," he said, in remarks that seemed to depart from the administration's more ambitious stated goal of building a democracy in Iraq.

"You are not going to do away with terrorism," Pace continued. "But you can provide governments in Iraq and Afghanistan and elsewhere with enough security capacity to keep the acts below a level at which their governments can function," he said.

Pace's comments also could foreshadow a reassertion of influence by senior officers in the wake of this week's resignation by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, according to military officers and analysts. Moreover, some military officers have voiced concern in recent days that if they do not assert a greater role in formulating a future course in Iraq, that course will be defined for them by the resurgence of congressional Democrats, many of whom favor a withdrawal of U.S. troops.

"Senior military officers in Rumsfeld's watch felt their counsel was only welcomed when it was congenial to Rumsfeld's view, and they now want the whole story, good and bad, to be reflected in whatever strategy the administration pursues," said Loren B. Thompson, a national security expert at the Lexington Institute, a public policy think tank.

DOJ_NMG_0093501

Pace said yesterday that he was surprised and saddened by Rumsfeld's resignation, calling him "a strong advocate for all of us in the military." But he also praised President Bush's nominee to replace Rumsfeld, former CIA chief Robert M. Gates, as a "very talented, dedicated patriot." Gates "has a reputation as a man who gets things done, a man who is collaborative and solicits subordinates' opinions," Pace said.

"Unless they get a very hard push-back from Mr. Gates during the early days of his tenure, the officers will try to reassert military control over the strategy in Iraq and the investment agenda," Thompson said.

Pace said the military will forge ahead with its work in Iraq, regardless of the change in civilian leadership at the Pentagon. "The change in leadership itself will not have a direct impact on what we do or don't do in Iraq," he said. "We in the military are used to changes of command."

Military Team Undertakes A Broad Review Of The Iraq War And The Campaign Against Terror (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 10 — Senior military leaders have begun a broad review of strategy in Iraq and other crisis areas in the Bush administration's campaign against terrorism, according to Pentagon officials.

In a closely held effort, Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, has assembled a team of some of the military's brightest and most innovative officers and told them to take a fresh look at Iraq and Afghanistan, among other flashpoints.

Pentagon officials said that the team's objective was to outline a range of options that General Pace might draw on in advising President Bush and Robert M. Gates, selected by Mr. Bush to become defense secretary, as the White House adjusts its strategy in Iraq. Ideas that have been discussed include increasing the size of the Iraqi security forces, along with the American effort to train and equip them, and adjusting the size of the American force in Iraq.

But Pentagon officials stressed that the review extended well beyond Iraq, and that some unorthodox ideas on how to fight terrorism were being weighed. The review reflects the recognition that military efforts need to be part of an overall approach that includes all aspects of American power, including diplomatic and economic.

Pentagon officials said the military review, which formally began Sept. 25, is being coordinated with the rest of the government, but that the military team had not met with members of the Iraq Study Group, the commission that is also looking into options for Iraq. The creation of that commission, headed by a former secretary of state, James A. Baker III, and Lee H. Hamilton, a former chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, had raised the possibility that fundamental decisions on how to proceed in Iraq might be determined largely outside of the Pentagon. The commission is being advised by former military officers, but none of its members have served as senior military commanders.

The team involved in the military review includes Col. H. R. McMaster, the Army officer whose 2005 operation in Tal Afar has been cited as a textbook case in how to wage counterinsurgency in Iraq.

Other military officers include Col. Peter R. Mansoor, the director of the United States Army and Marine Corps Counterinsurgency Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., who previously commanded an Army brigade that fought the Mahdi Army militia in 2004 at Karbala.

Col. Thomas C. Greenwood, the director of the Marine Command and Staff College, who oversaw efforts to train Iraqi security forces in Anbar, the restive province in western Iraq, is also on the team. All told, more than a dozen military officers are on the team, which is overseen by Capt. Michael Rogers of the Navy, who serves as a special assistant to General Pace.

Though the review has been under way for six weeks, it has acquired special urgency as a result of the Democratic gains in the election, President Bush's decision to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld as defense secretary and the clamor for some kind of course adjustment in Iraq.

The goal is to finish the review in December, but some of its interim thinking has been made available to the military chiefs, Pentagon officials said.

Initially, the Pentagon tried to keep the existence of the review secret. But in recent days the Bush administration has advertised its willingness to consider fresh approaches in an effort to counter criticism that it was rigidly adhering to a faltering strategy. General Pace referred to the review in general terms in TV appearances today.

"We have to give ourselves a good honest scrub about what is working and what is not working, what are the impediments to progress and what should we change about the way we are doing it to make sure that we get to the objective that we set for ourselves," General Pace said in an interview with CBS. "I am looking at it with the Joint Chiefs. We're making our recommendations. We're having our dialogue."

General Pace said that Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top commander in Iraq, and General John P. Abizaid, the head of the United States Central Command, were part of the effort.

DOJ_NMG_0093502

Mr. Bush is to meet Monday with the commission headed by Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton. Others who will meet with the group are Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; Mr. Rumsfeld; the national intelligence director, John D. Negroponte; Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency; and Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador to Iraq. The study group is expected to issue its recommendations around Dec. 7.

US Army "To Suggest Iraq Changes" (BBC)

BBC.com, November 11, 2006

US military leaders are preparing to recommend changes in strategy on Iraq, America's top military officer says.

Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen Peter Pace said commanders were having their own dialogue and would make the changes that were needed.

President George W Bush is to meet members of a panel drawing up proposals for ending the conflict on Monday.

Iraq was a key factor in the Republican defeat in mid-term polls and US defence chief Donald Rumsfeld's resignation.

Mr Rumsfeld will be replaced by former CIA director Robert Gates, a member of the Iraq Study Group set to report to Mr Bush next week.

The White House says it is open to new thinking on the conflict, and correspondents say it would not be surprising if a real change of policy emerged soon.

Gen Pace told CBS that military leaders were taking a hard look at what they were doing in Iraq.

"We have to give ourselves a good honest scrub about what is working and what is not working... and what should we change about the way we are doing it."

But Gen Pace said Mr Rumsfeld's departure would not have a direct impact.

"We continuously review what's going right, what's going wrong, what needs to change," he added.

His comments came as the White House announced Monday's meeting with the bipartisan task force asked by Congress to examine the effectiveness of policy in Iraq.

The panel, which is led by former US Secretary of State James Baker, reportedly think that "staying the course" is an untenable long-term strategy.

It is said to have been looking at two options, both of which would amount to a reversal of the Bush administration's stance.

One is the phased withdrawal of US troops, and the other is to increase contact with Syria and Iran to help stop the fighting.

Democratic Party leaders visiting the White House in the wake of their poll victory have raised the idea of an Iraq summit.

Nancy Pelosi, the Democrat set to be the next speaker of the House of Representatives, has called for a change of strategy, describing the current policy as a "catastrophic path".

In Iraq, the health minister has said between 100,000 and 150,000 civilians have been killed in the war, far more than other previously accepted figures.

Officials say the total is based on estimates of the number of bodies brought to mortuaries and hospitals.

Casualty figures are a controversial topic, with estimates or counts ranging from 50,000 to 650,000 deaths.

Separately, the US military says three of its personnel have been killed in two separate incidents in Iraq.

At least 23 US troops have been killed in November.

In October, at least 105 soldiers were killed, the fourth highest monthly toll since US forces overthrew Saddam Hussein, and the worst for US casualties in nearly two years.

A Budding, Bipartisan Consensus On Iraq (LAT)

By Paul Richter, Doyle Mcmanus

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — With the Democratic capture of Congress boosting pressure for a bipartisan approach to the Iraq war, a rough consensus is emerging that could lead to a new direction and a gradual U.S. disengagement from the costly conflict.

There are those on both sides of the aisle who favor giving the Iraqis firm deadlines for meeting a list of political goals, with the possibility of redeploying U.S. troops if the goals aren't met — a scenario that could lead to withdrawal.

Democratic and Republican leaders also have begun to agree on ideas such as accelerating a shift of U.S. troops from a combat to an advisory role, decentralizing Iraqi government power and launching diplomatic efforts to win support from Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria.

But formidable obstacles remain. Most notably, there is no clear agreement on the key issue of troop withdrawals. Some Democrats have demanded a fixed timetable for a military exit, but incoming Democratic leaders haven't endorsed the idea.

DOJ_NMG_0093503

Similarly, some Republicans — including Sen. John McCain of Arizona — have proposed an increase in U.S. troop strength, if only a temporary one, to give the Iraqi government one more chance to gain control of security in Baghdad. That idea may have lost crucial support with Tuesday's Democratic electoral success.

All of the options have distinct disadvantages. Even so, administration officials, lawmakers, military commanders and others interviewed for this article said that this growing agreement, combined with the passing of a fractious midterm election season, offered a chance for headway.

Two people familiar with the discussions of the Iraq Study Group — a bipartisan commission, backed by the White House and Congress, that will suggest changes in policy — said that one fundamental point the panel was likely to make is that the U.S. commitment to Iraq cannot be open-ended.

"The administration has been saying: 'We cannot afford to lose,' " said one of them, speaking on condition of anonymity when discussing panel views. "But at some point, the question becomes, 'Can we afford to stay?' "

Bush has said he is willing to adjust U.S. tactics but has emphasized that his goal of an Iraq that can defend, govern and sustain itself is unchanged. But like the president, key administration officials have adopted more conciliatory views after the dramatic Democratic takeover of the House and Senate.

"We have to give ourselves a good, honest scrub about what is working and what is not working, what are the impediments to progress, and what should we change," Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said in a CBS News interview Friday.

Considering new angles

Pace said Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top commander in Iraq, and Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, who oversees U.S. forces in the Middle East, were working on a new review.

Stephen J. Hadley, the White House national security advisor, said this week that Bush thinks "we have an opportunity to define a way ahead" that will draw support from Republicans and Democrats as well as from Iraqis.

The agreements on new approaches among Democrats and Republicans carry more weight because they come at a time when centrists are gaining an important role in shaping U.S. foreign policy. Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld was expected to be replaced soon by former CIA Director Robert M. Gates. Gates is considered a foreign policy "realist" who has been openly critical of aspects of the Iraq policy.

The Iraq Study Group will have the first opportunity for charting a new path. The congressionally organized panel is stocked with foreign policy centrists from both parties. Led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), the panel will meet with Bush next week and hopes to release its recommendations by mid-December.

Although officials of the panel have not begun working to reach a formal consensus, it is widely expected that the group will call for engagement with Iran and Syria, proposals that are fiercely resisted by some Democrats and Republicans alike.

Baker and Hamilton have indicated they favor talking to Iran and Syria, as has Gates, who was a member of the panel before his nomination to the Pentagon post. He was replaced Friday by former secretary of State Lawrence S. Eagleburger, another Republican centrist who privately has been fiercely critical of some Bush policies.

Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R- Ind.), who is chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), another committee member, have indicated they are open to talks with Iran and Syria. Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), who becomes the chairman of the committee when Democrats take over the Senate, also supports the idea of talks.

The proposal for shifting more power out of Baghdad and toward Iraq's Kurdish and Shiite and Sunni Arab regions has been most visibly championed by Biden. But it also has won at least general support from lawmakers of both parties, including Lugar, Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) and Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Texas).

But the idea of breaking the country into three fully independent parts, which Biden has not proposed, has little support because of fears it would lead to "ethnic cleansing" and could draw the neighbors into a protracted regional war.

Spreading power in Iraq

Lawmakers of both parties pressed during the election campaign for an increase in pressure on the Iraqis to reach a power-sharing deal. Yet there is no agreement on how to apply pressure on the factions to make concessions.

Many Democratic lawmakers support a plan by Sens. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), the incoming Senate Armed Services Committee chairman, and Jack Reed (D-R.I.), a committee member, to begin a "phased redeployment" of U.S. troops in order to force Iraqis to reach an agreement. But the Bush administration and its supporters strongly oppose redeployment.

Since winning control of Congress, Democratic leaders have not pushed for immediate troop reductions and have indicated that they would resist efforts by any of their members to end the mission through a funding cutoff.

Some Iraq Study Group members have appeared interested in at least temporarily increasing U.S. troop strength to see if it would suppress sectarian violence, said people close to the panel. Some insiders referred to the option as "one last chance" when it was raised earlier this fall.

DOJ_NMG_0093504

Reed, who has been one of the Democrats' point men on the issue, has signaled that he would not dismiss the idea of a temporary troop increase — as long as the Iraqis were moving toward a political deal.

Still, U.S. military officers are increasingly skeptical that adding more troops to Baghdad would help significantly, because the addition of 4,000 American troops has shown few results. Officers said they believed it would be more useful to add Iraqi military units.

Some U.S. military officers say they sense a growing consensus in Washington for imposing firmer deadlines and reducing U.S. troop presence. Some said they believed that would be the right move.

"The John Kerry position of timetables as a forcing mechanism for the Iraqis to get their act together is not that far off from what other people [involved in the U.S. effort in Iraq] are saying," said one officer, referring to a proposal by the Democratic Massachusetts senator.

'Old bulls' as guides

A Senate Republican aide agreed there were wide agreements emerging on possible policy shifts. Speaking on condition of anonymity when discussing senators' views, the aide said the "old bulls" who dominated the Foreign Relations and Armed Services committees would guide Senate consideration of the alternatives.

Bush has invited suggestions but has not signaled a shift in his Iraq policy. The president "keeps talking about victory," said David Gergen, an aide to Democratic and Republican presidents. "It may be that he plans to define 'victory' down. Or it may be that he hasn't decided to change the policy very much."

One U.S. official said that the administration had entered a more pragmatic phase and would "look again at what's workable." Officials "were going to go this way, no matter who won, once the glare of the political campaign was over," said the official, who declined to be identified because he was not authorized to speak on the policy.

He said the emphasis would be on looking for "some kind of Iraqi entity that holds together, that meets at least the minimum requirements for a state."

But he cautioned that the options under discussion by outsiders had been weighed — and several already tried out — by the administration. For example, officials have sought ways to compromise with insurgents, he said.

Other options that seem appealing "may have too high a price," he added, referring to the idea of negotiating with Syria and Iran. Iran, for example, could demand that the U.S. drop its effort to halt the Iranian nuclear program, he said.

With the Iraq war entering its fifth year in 2007, some of the observers said solutions would be difficult to find and implement, even for the high-powered Iraq Study Group.

"It's not going to be a magic bullet," said an official at the U.S. Institute of Peace, the government-funded think tank that has provided the commission with offices and staff.

A Salute To Duty And Sacrifice (WP)

By Leef Smith

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

Norman Halfpenny heard the first strains of "The Marines' Hymn" and snapped to attention, his 73-year-old body not quite as straight as when he served as a young man in Korea and Vietnam.

He was joined yesterday by thousands like him, hundreds in wheelchairs, their hair grayed by time. Many traveled thousands of miles for this moment, on the 231st anniversary of the Marine Corps, to gather on a grassy promenade near the Quantico Marine Corps Base, to remember and cry and celebrate the opening of the National Museum of the Marine Corps.

"I made sure he got here," said Halfpenny's wife, Paulette, 63, gripping her husband's uniformed knee. The couple donated $4,000 toward the construction of the $90 million facility and traveled from their home in Arizona for the ceremony. They wanted to be among the first to visit the striking museum, designed on a sharp angle reaching skyward to invoke one of history's most famous images -- the flag being raised over Iwo Jima during World War II.

Halfpenny wanted to talk about his years of service, about the combat he saw in Korea at the famed Chosin Reservoir, where Marines valiantly fought the Chinese, but he was halted by his own tears.

"It's the Corps," he said, weeping. "Once a Marine, always a Marine."

Visitors, many in uniform, showed up hours early for the dedication ceremony, waiting eagerly for an address by President Bush, who arrived to thunderous applause. He hailed the museum as the military's most modern, giving visitors an appreciation for what it's like to serve.

"For too long, the only people to have direct experience of the Marine Corps have been the Marines themselves and the enemy who has made the mistake of taking them on," Bush said. "The Marines believe you can't know what you stand for if you don't know where you come from. The history of the Corps is now preserved behind these walls. These walls remind all who visit here that honor, courage and commitment are not just words. They are Corps values for a way of life that puts service before self."

DOJ_NMG_0093505

The museum, which opens to the public Monday, is the creation of the Marine Corps and the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation, which raised $60 million for its construction. The Marine Corps provided another $30 million to fill out the museum's interior, which will include more than 1,000 artifacts, 1,800 photographs and personal letters from the battlefront.

The museum is split into separate galleries that focus on many of the major wars, including one gallery called "Global War on Terrorism," which displays photographs, combat art and maps fresh from battlefields in Iraq and Afghanistan. Other galleries to be installed later include ones on the Colonial period, the Civil War era and World War I.

The museum is filled with iconic artifacts -- a Grumman F9F-2B Panther, its first widely used jet; a Bell UH-1E Huey, the ubiquitous Vietnam War helicopter; the pair of American flags raised at Mount Suribachi on Iwo Jima.

Museum exhibits also include personal artifacts, such as the Medals of Honor awarded Sgt. Maj. Daniel J. Daly, often referred to as "the outstanding Marine of all time," for his heroics during the Boxer Rebellion in 1900 and the first Haitian campaign in 1915. Also on display is the M40A1 sniper rifle used by Lance Cpl. Charles Benjamin "Chuck" Mawhinney in Vietnam, where he killed a confirmed 103 enemy soldiers. And there is the overseas cap worn by legendary Maj. Gen. John A. Lejeune, who fought in World War I.

The museum, in the southeastern end of Prince William County, is expected to boost tourism and economic development in an area that has struggled. It is off Route 1 and will be open daily from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Admission is free. Fees will be charged for two interactive experiences -- a flight simulator and target practice.

Lou Burg, 85, flew in from Los Angeles with his daughter Myra, 47, to witness the moment. He served three years in the Corps and was a 2nd lieutenant at Iwo Jima, the bloodiest battle for the Corps during World War II. It was there that 6,800 U.S. troops, mostly Marines, were killed and nearly 20,000 were wounded during a 36-day assault that began Feb. 19, 1945.

Yesterday, Burg dressed in his red satin survivors jacket, shaking the hands of fellow Marines and soaking in the significance of his contribution. "It's important for me to be here for my children, and it's important for me to be here because of this organization," Burg said. "Mostly it's important for me to be here for my wife."

She died last year, and, to honor her, Burg had purchased a brick that was used to build the pathway outside the museum.

James Lewis, 75, saw action in Korea, fighting at Chosin Reservoir in 1950. Many did not survive the Marines' fighting withdrawal.

Yesterday, Lewis proudly wore a T-shirt that bore the words "The Chosin Few."

"This means everything to me," said Lewis, who watched the ceremony from a wheelchair.

"He's planned this for a year," said his wife, Jean, 63. The couple traveled from Houston to attend.

Before closing the ceremony, Bush told the story of Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham of New York, who would have turned 25 yesterday had he not been killed in combat two years ago. The young soldier threw himself on a grenade to save two fellow Marines.

Yesterday, Bush announced that Dunham would receive the Medal of Honor, the military's highest honor.

"As long as we have Marines like Corporal Dunham, America will never fear for her liberty," said Bush, who wiped a tear shortly after Dunham's parents were honored with a standing ovation. "As long as we have this museum, America will never forget their sacrifice."

Marines, Bush Dedicate Museum (WT)

By Tarron Lively

The Washington Times, November 11, 2006

President Bush yesterday attended the dedication ceremony for the National Museum of the Marine Corps in Quantico, Va., an event nearly 20 years in the making.

Mr. Bush and thousands of current and retired Marines converged on the Marine Corps base to celebrate the opening of museum. The dedication coincided with the 231st anniversary of the Marine Corps.

After a 21-gun salute and a flyover of four F-18 jets, Mr. Bush told the crowd that the museum will honor past and present Marines and preserve the Corps' history for future generations.

"For too long, the only people to have direct experience of the Marine Corps have been the Marines themselves -- and the enemy who's made the mistake of taking them on," Mr. Bush said, drawing cheers and applause.

"In this museum, you'll experience life from a Marine's perspective. You'll feel what it's like to go through boot camp, make an amphibious landing under fire or deploy from a helicopter in Vietnam."

The museum opens to the public Monday and is expected to attract 250,000 to 600,000 visitors annually. Admission is free.

DOJ_NMG_0093506

"The museum will not make you into a Marine -- only a drill instructor can do that," Mr. Bush said. "But by putting you in the boots of a Marine, this museum will leave you with a rich appreciation for the history of the Corps."

The 118,000-square-foot museum is adjacent to the base. The building's skyline is designed to suggest the five Marines and one Navy corpsman raising the flag at Iwo Jima in 1945.

"Marines put a great deal of stock in history," said Gen. Michael W. Hagee, the commandant of the Marine Corps. "We use it for two reasons. One, to inspire us and, two, to educate us. This museum, I believe, will do that not only for the Marines, but for the American public."

The museum is the centerpiece of the Marine Corps Heritage Center on 135 acres, donated by Prince William County, between Interstate 95 and Route 1 opposite the main gate of the Quantico base.

When completed, the complex will include a parade deck, memorial walking trails, a chapel, an Imax theater, a conference center and a hotel.

In the late 1980s, Congress authorized each military service branch to develop its own national historic center.

Construction of the Marine museum began in 2004.

"It is here that the proud history of the United States Marine Corps will be appreciated, reflected upon and enjoyed like never before," said Ron Christmas, a retired lieutenant general and president of the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation, which spearheaded the building of the museum.

During the two-hour ceremony, Mr. Bush announced that Cpl. Jason L. Dunham, of Scio, N.Y., would posthumously receive the Medal of Honor, the United States' highest military decoration.

Cpl. Dunham, who was killed near Karabilah, Iraq, in 2004 while shielding fellow Marines from a hand grenade, would have been 25 years old yesterday.

"You might say he was born to be a Marine," Mr. Bush said to Cpl. Dunham's parents, Dan and Deb Dunham, who were in attendance.

Jim Lehrer of PBS' "The NewsHour," who served three years as an infantry officer in the Corps, said such actions of courage are common for Marines.

"The death rate among Marines in Iraq has been more than double that of the other service," Mr. Lehrer said. "That's a first-to-fight, first-wave pattern that has pretty much held since the Revolutionary War ... whatever needs to be done, particularly if the need is for it to be done well, and be done immediately."

Today the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation will hold a memorial to honor deceased Marines.

Selfless Courage: Marine Is Awarded Medal Of Honor (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

QUANTICO, Va. -- Cpl. Jason Dunham, a charismatic kid from small-town America, received the Medal of Honor for sacrificing himself to protect his fellow Marines from an Iraqi hand grenade.

President George W. Bush announced the award -- the country's highest honor for military valor -- at the opening of the Marine Corps museum here yesterday. It would have been Cpl. Dunham's 25th birthday.

"As far back as boot camp, his superiors spotted the quality that would mark this young American as an outstanding Marine: His willingness to put the needs of others before his own," Mr. Bush said. "As long as we have Marines like Cpl. Dunham, America will never fear for its liberty."

Maj. Trent Gibson, then commander2 of Kilo Co., Third Battalion, Seventh Marines, visits the scene of the grenade attack with reporter Michael Phillips.

On patrol on April 14, 2004, Cpl. Dunham found himself engaged in hand-to-hand combat with an insurgent near the Syrian border. When his attacker dropped a live hand grenade, the Marine made the split-second decision to cover the weapon with his own helmet, shielding two of his men from its full explosive force.

The other Marines staggered away from the blast, injured but alive. Cpl. Dunham suffered deep shrapnel wounds to the brain. He survived eight days in a coma, only to die with his parents at his bedside. He was 22 years old.

"There's not a day that goes by that I don't think about it," said Cpl. William Hampton, one of the Marines fighting beside Cpl. Dunham when the grenade exploded. The explosion left Cpl. Hampton, a 24-year-old from Woodinville, Wash., peppered with shrapnel. "I see my arms, I see my leg. I'm always reminded of it."

Cpl. Dunham grew up in Scio, a one-stoplight town in western New York. His father, Dan Dunham, works in a nearby factory; his mother, Deb Dunham, teaches home economics. Jason was the oldest of four children and a star athlete, with a winning grin and a natural kindness.

DOJ_NMG_0093507

He was an eager volunteer when the Marine recruiter spotted him at the local Kmart before his senior year in high school. Soon his lead-from-the-front approach won him the admiration of those above and below him, and he was given command of a 10-man infantry squad when his unit -- Kilo Co., Third Battalion, Seventh Marine Regiment -- deployed in early 2004 to the hostile desert towns of Husaybah, al Qa'im and Karabilah.

Due to complete his enlistment that July, Cpl. Dunham extended his service by several months to remain in Iraq through the battalion's entire combat tour because, as he told a friend at the time, "I want to make sure everyone makes it home alive."

In the days after he was injured, Cpl. Dunham passed through a series of military hospitals and underwent brain surgery. He never, however, awoke from his coma. His parents met him at the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md., expecting to spend months nursing their son back to health. Instead, doctors told them that the damage was too severe and that the corporal would never again understand the world around him. Following the instructions Cpl. Dunham left in his living will, the Dunhams authorized the doctors to remove him from life support.

"In the end, Cpl. Dunham, you proved that one man can make a difference," his former company commander, Maj. Trent Gibson, said in June at a ceremony renaming Scio's post office after the fallen Marine. "You proved to be utterly selfless, uniquely compassionate, and absolutely committed to your men...You were that which we all strived to be. And you were somehow more pure."

A photo of the shredded remains of the corporal's helmet was among the pieces of evidence the battalion included when it nominated the corporal for the Medal of Honor shortly after he died.

Cpl. Dunham's life and death were chronicled in a page-one story in The Wall Street Journal on May 25, 2004.

The award is often called the Congressional Medal of Honor because Congress authorized it during the Civil War. Including Cpl. Dunham's, 3,462 medals have been awarded, according to the Congressional Medal of Honor Society. Cpl. Dunham's is the second awarded for gallantry in the Iraq war. The first went to Army Sgt. 1st Class Paul R. Smith, who was killed while manning a machine gun against scores of Iraqi soldiers at Baghdad's airport in April 2003.

The president is expected to present the medal itself to Cpl. Dunham's parents at a White House ceremony at a later date.

Medal Of Honor Granted To Slain Marine (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — On what would have been the 25th birthday of Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham, President Bush said Friday that the Marine would be posthumously awarded the Medal of Honor, the nation's highest decoration for valor.

Dunham, from Scio, N.Y., was 22 when he died from his wounds in April 2004, eight days after using his body and helmet to save two fellow Marines from an insurgent's grenade.

Bush recounted Dunham's exploit during a ceremony marking the opening of the National Museum of the Marine Corps at Quantico, Va.

A machine-gunner, Dunham was leading a squad manning a checkpoint in an Iraqi town near the border with Syria. As Dunham searched a vehicle, "an insurgent jumped out and grabbed the corporal by the throat," Bush said. Dunham engaged him in hand-to-hand combat, and shouted to his fellow Marines, "watch his hand."

A grenade rolled out, Bush said, adding, "Cpl. Dunham did not hesitate; he jumped on the grenade to protect his fellow Marines."

Dunham, who was with Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 7th Marine Regiment, based in Twentynine Palms, will be the first Marine to receive the nation's highest medal for bravery for combat since the war in Vietnam.

The award ceremony will be at the White House at a date to be selected by Bush and the Dunham family.

The president presented Dunham's actions as a reflection of the history of the Marine Corps.

"Years from now, when America looks out on a democratic Middle East growing in freedom and prosperity, Americans will speak of the battles like Fallouja with the same awe and reverence we now give to Guadalcanal and Iwo Jima," the president said to an audience of about 10,000, among them Dunham's parents.

The museum, dedicated on the 231st anniversary of the founding of the Marine Corps, is designed to evoke the photograph of the raising of the flag at Mt. Suribachi on Iwo Jima, during World War II, and to portray the Marine experience.

"In this museum, you'll feel what it's like to go through boot camp. No thanks," said Bush, who was a member of the Texas Air National Guard during Vietnam.

Marine To Receive Medal Of Honor For Iraq Heroism (CNN)

CNN.com, November 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093508

(CNN) -- President Bush announced on Friday that the Medal of Honor, the nation's highest military decoration, will be awarded posthumously to Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham.

In April 2004, Dunham was leading a patrol in an Iraqi town near the Syrian border when the patrol stopped a convoy of cars leaving the scene of an attack on a Marine convoy, according to military and media accounts of the action.

An occupant of one of the cars attacked Dunham and the two fought hand to hand. As they fought, Dunham yelled to fellow Marines, "No, no watch his hand." The attacker then dropped a grenade and Dunham hurled himself on top of it, using his helmet to try to blunt the force of the blast.

Still, Dunham was critically wounded in the explosion and died eight days later at Bethesda Naval Hospital in Maryland.

"As long as we have Marines like Corporal Dunham, America will never fear for her liberty," Bush said Friday as he announced that Dunham would receive the award. Bush spoke at the dedication of the National Museum of the Marine Corps in Virginia. (Watch announcement of award at museum -- 1:27)

"His was a selfless act of courage to save his fellow Marines," Sgt. Maj. Daniel A. Huff of the 3rd Battalion, 7th Marine Regiment, was quoted as saying in Marine Corps News that April.

"He knew what he was doing," Lance Cpl. Jason A. Sanders, 21, of McAllester, Oklahoma, who was in Dunham's company, was quoted as saying by Marine Corps News. "He wanted to save Marines' lives from that grenade."

In various media accounts, fellow Marines told how Dunham had extended his enlistment shortly before he died so he could help his comrades.

"We told him he was crazy for coming out here," Lance Cpl. Mark E. Dean, 22, from Owasso, Oklahoma, said in Marine Corps News. "He decided to come out here and fight with us. All he wanted was to make sure his boys made it back home."

"He loved his country, believed in his mission, and wanted to stay with his fellow Marines and see the job through," Vice President Dick Cheney said when speaking of Dunham's heroism at a Disabled American Veterans conference in July 2004.

The Scio, New York, native would have been 25 years old on Friday.

In a letter urging Bush to honor Dunham with the Medal of Honor, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-New York, called the Marine's actions "an act of unbelievable bravery and selflessness."

Dunham's story was told in the book "The Gift of Valor," written by Wall Street Journal reporter Michael Phillips.

Dunham will be the second American to receive the Medal of Honor from service in Iraq.

Army Sgt. 1st Class Paul Ray Smith was the other, honored for action near Baghdad International Airport in April 2003, in which he killed as many as 50 enemy combatants while helping wounded comrades to safety. Smith was the only U.S. soldier killed in the battle.

At Dusty Outpost In Iraq, Cake Is Cut For Marines Young And Not So Young (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

OUTPOST VIKING, Iraq, Nov. 10 — Capt. James W. Mingus faced another platoon of his marines. They stood in their fire-retardant uniforms, wearied and hungry, weapons slung across their chests and backs.

A birthday cake was on the table in front of them. One piece had been cut out with a bayonet.

The captain, 37 and the oldest marine in the rifle company he commands, had just given that piece to the platoon's youngest marine, Lance Cpl. T. J. McDowell, who is 20.

"Two hundred and thirty-one years," the captain said.

"Tradition. This is what makes us different. This is what sets us apart."

The Marine Corps celebrated its 231st birthday on Friday, an event that passes with little notice outside the corps's insular ranks, but is an essential ritual within, especially now, as the policies guiding the war seem certain to change and the reasons that brought the marines here are less clear.

No matter the changes in Washington, here in this forward base in Anbar Province, Company F, Second Battalion, Eighth Marines marked the day with the same insistence on ceremony that surrounds marines from their first seconds before an enraged drill instructor to the folded flag at the grave.

As each platoon came in from their duties on patrol or manning posts at Outpost Viking's walls, a ceremony repeated itself: a reading of a traditional birthday message from 1921, a reading of a message from the current commandant and then the cake, passed symbolically from one generation to the next.

"When were you born, Graham?" a marine called out, just before one platoon's cake-cutting ceremonies began.

Cpl. Jeremy L. Graham, who had hit four bombs in three months while riding in vehicles, and who was blasted once more on a foot patrol, answered without a pause: "1775," he said, using the year that the Marine Corps first took up arms, in a Pennsylvania tavern.

DOJ_NMG_0093509

Every year, and everywhere, it is the same, even now.

The graying marines remind marines who are new to shaving: You are part of an outfit, storied and bloodied, that is older than the nation it serves. You are one of us. Pass it on.

In peacetime it can be poignant, as the ceremony, held in veteran halls and bases, invariably attracts veterans from several generations and wars.

In Outpost Viking, which is little more than a sandbagged fortress ringed by an insurgency that hounds the marines at each turn, Captain Mingus and his noncommissioned officers needed few words. The youngest marines here already know much of what veterans tell; there are 22-year-olds on their third combat tours.

Second Battalion, Eighth Marines has been in Iraq on this rotation for a little more than three months.

Nearly 15 percent of the battalion's marines have been wounded. Five marines and one of their interpreters have been killed and 31 marines have been wounded seriously enough to require evacuation back to the states.

Each week, the number of wounded climbs. On Thursday, an improvised explosive struck a vehicle in the battalion's Weapons Company, sending shrapnel into the right leg of Lance Cpl. William J. Thorpe and shattering Lance Cpl. Daniel B. Nicholson's face.

(The week before, Lance Corporal Nicholson had said a prayer for the recovery of another marine, Lance Cpl. Colin Smith, who had been shot through the head. Now, Lance Corporal Nicholson was in a military hospital in Germany, with the others praying for him.)

Captain Mingus told the marines to observe this day every year, no matter where they were. "If you have two marines in a fighting hole somewhere, find a Twinkie, cut it in half and say, 'Happy birthday, marine,' " he said.

The hearty greetings belied an underlying unease that these men confront each day, and it was noticeable in what was left unsaid. There was little talk on Friday of saving Iraq. And there was a message implicit in the older marine's words.

Gradually, as months and tours have passed here, blending into years inside a country that has slipped out of everyone's control, the list of reasons for fighting has changed. First it shifted from finding weapons of mass destruction to removing a dictator to building a stable, democratic Iraq.

Eventually, when talk of stability in Iraq gave way to questions of whether the spasms of sectarian violence could be properly called a civil war, the marines' reasons for fighting shrank further, down to more basic things.

The captain and the others who spoke steered wide of politics, but that wide steer was noticeable. They spoke instead of fundamental sentiments, those that have always been first and last on a marine's list of reasons to fight.

Five years after the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States, and almost four years after the troops prepared to invade Iraq, many of the marines in the battalion, in their quiet times in the weeks before this day, have said they fight for two things: the corps's tradition and reputation, and for the man on their left and right.

Their Iraq is a land of dangers and deceptions, an endless test and a daily set of deadly traps. Each marine's own future can feel like an abstraction when a patrol is heading out. It is difficult to see the hidden bombs. It is harder still to see the future of Iraq, or how any of this might end.

Friday was the birthday. Each of the marines stepped into the line, just as they always do.

Five times, the cakes were cut with bayonets and pieces handed out. Then the marines filed through a field kitchen and were served lobster, steak, crab legs and shrimp. Even the exhausted smiled, leaning against blast walls designed to keep out the frequent mortar fire.

Many were bedecked with charms, a collection that provided a measure of how deeply into the combat culture these young marines had already passed. The charms were small keepsakes, often not obvious, taken from churches, homes or firefights and designated as talismans of luck.

Lance Cpl. Elijah D. Henry, from North Carolina, came for his cake. He wore a big knife. Its handle was carved from the antlers of the first deer he killed, a six-point whitetail he shot at his uncle's deer camp in southern Georgia.

He is half Irish and half Cherokee. In his pocket was a small leather bag with more charms, 100-year-old tobacco — grown by the oldest living Cherokee, he said — along with a pinch of sage, a ruby, dirt from every country he has ever visited and a shell from the 21-gun salute for his late grandfather, who was a P.O.W. in World War II.

"I guess you heard about my squirrel tails?" he said.

"I get them blessed and hand them out to my friends."

So far, he said, he had handed out five.

Cpl. Daniel M. Greenwald, from Rockland County, N.Y. passed through the line. He had threaded a dog-tag chain through the mangled remains of a Kalashnikov bullet, which on Sept. 2 hit him on the helmet and knocked him flat.

His head was soaked in blood from the impact of the helmet on his forehead, but the Kevlar kept the bullet out. Now he carries the broken bullet wherever he goes, hoping that bullets, like proverbial lightning, will not strike twice.

DOJ_NMG_0093510

The battalion commander arrived and said that the battalion's snipers had just shot three Iraqi men who were burying a bomb beside a bridge near Saqlawiya, a town not far away.

One of the insurgents was killed instantly, he said.

The other two had been wounded, and had stumbled off into the marsh and reeds. Marines were out following their blood trails, a birthday spent on the job.

Blair To Give Iraq Evidence To Baker (FT)

By James Blitz

Financial Times, November 11, 2006

Tony Blair will next week give evidence to the Iraq Study Group led by James Baker, the former US secretary of state, in the first indication Britain is being consulted by Washington over potential change of policy on the war.

As he continues the task of presenting a range of new policy alternatives on Iraq for President George W. Bush, Mr Baker is expected to interview the UK prime minister by means of a video link on Tuesday.

The decision by the Iraq Study Group to interview Mr Blair is an important boost for Downing Street, amid fears that Britain might be excluded from the US reassessment of Iraq policy following the Democrats' victory in the congressional elections.

Downing Street last night gave no details of what Mr Blair would tell Mr Baker and his co-chairman, retired US congressman Lee Hamilton. However, the prime minister is expected to set out his latest thoughts on Iraq on Monday in his annual Mansion House foreign policy speech.

Mr Blair is certain to tell Mr Baker that the US and UK must not "cut and run", remaining in Iraq until Baghdad can manage the security situation on its own. Mr Blair has told allies he is confident that the Baker-Hamilton committee will make no such recommendation.

Margaret Beckett, UK foreign secretary, spelt out the UK's position this week saying there would be no "precipitate" moves to withdraw UK troops. However, the prime minister is likely to be probed on the extent to which he believes Syria and Iran can be involved in attempts to put Iraq on a stable footing.

Mr Blair has recently launched a diplomatic initiative towards Syria, sending his most senior foreign policy adviser to Damascus to meet President Bashar al-Assad.

Mr Blair is looking to see whether Syria can be coaxed into playing a constructive role in attempts to revive the peace process between Israel and the Palestinians.

In recent weeks, Mr Blair has expressed no enthusiasm for engaging Syria and Iran in plans to put the Iraqi government on a firmer footing. He believes that the Iranian regime must be firmly faced down in its bid to acquire nuclear weapons.

However, recent leaks of the Baker-Hamilton committee's findings suggest that the ISG is looking at whether the Syrian and Iranian regimes can be involved in attempts to stabilise the situation in Iraq.

U.S. Gov't Office In Iraq Attacked (WT/AP)

By SAMEER N. YACOUB

The Washington Times/AP, November 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- The U.S. government's office in central Iraq came under mortar fire early Saturday, an attack that touched off a blaze in part of the complex, Iraqi police said. There was no immediate word on damage or casualties.

In the western city of Tal Afar, two suspected insurgents were killed during an overnight search for those behind a suicide bombing Friday that killed six Iraqi soldiers in the western city of Tal Afar.

Hand grenades and 20 AK-47 assault rifles were seized in the raid just east of the city, along with fake ID cars and passports, cell phones, and a pair of pickup trucks, police Brig. Najim Abdullah al-Jubouri said.

Al-Jubouri identified those killed as Zainal Abdul-Ghani Younis al-Haider and Bakir Khuweiret, and said 10 terrorist suspects were arrested.

The mortar attack was at least the second reported in recent weeks against the U.S. office in Hillah, which oversees government and diplomatic interests in the central Euphrates region, about 60 miles south of Baghdad.

Nine of the 10 mortar bombs fired landed inside the complex, police Capt. Muthanna Khalid Ali said.

He said U.S. and Iraqi forces sealed off the area and there was no word on damage or injuries.

U.S. diplomats usually refuse to comment on such reports to avoid releasing sensitive information to insurgents. Calls and e-mail seeking confirmation were not immediately returned by U.S. Embassy spokesmen in Baghdad.

Inaccurate but highly mobile, the mortar is growing increasingly popular among Iraqi fighters because it can be fired from a secure location several miles from a target and then quickly hauled away or hidden. Some insurgent groups mount the weapons on pickup trucks, remaining in constant motion except when firing.

DOJ_NMG_0093511

Tal Afar has suffered scattered insurgent attacks, even after Bush in March declared the city an example of progress made in bringing security to Iraq. Tal Afar lies 90 miles east of the Syrian border, 260 miles northwest of Baghdad.

Also Saturday, a bomber drove a car rigged with explosives into the police station in the northern town of Zaganya, killing the police chief, burning four vehicles, and badly damaging the building, the provincial police information office said.

In nearby Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, a staffer with the local agriculture directorate, Zuhair Hussein Alwan, was shot and killed by unknown assailants

Two bodies that had been bound and shot in the head and chest were pulled from the Tigris River Saturday morning in Suwayrah, 25 miles south of Baghdad. Scores of such bodies are recovered around Iraq each week, most believed to be the victims of sectarian death squads, morgue administrator Maamoun al-Ajili said.

Hang Hussein Fast, Clerics Say (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

BAGHDAD — Addressing worshipers for the first time since the conviction of Saddam Hussein, many of Iraq's Shiite Muslim preachers called Friday for the speedy hanging of the former president.

Hussein, a Sunni Muslim who long repressed Iraq's Shiite majority, should be executed in public between two of the holiest Shiite sites in Iraq, a cleric demanded during his sermon in Karbala. "It's the least that could be done to this tyrant for the atrocious crimes he has committed, in this city in particular," said Sayyed Ahmed Safi, a preacher close to Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, the country's preeminent Shiite cleric.

Hussein was sentenced Sunday to death at the gallows in connection with his role in the killing of 148 Shiites from the village of Dujayl after a 1982 attempt to assassinate him. Dujayl was a stronghold of the devout Shiite activists who now dominate Iraq's political and religious institutions.

U.S. officials had hoped the trial of Hussein, toppled in the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, would help unite Iraq. But many now believe the verdict is heightening ethnic and sectarian tensions. Shiites in eastern Baghdad and other areas where they are concentrated cheered the decision in mass rallies as angry Sunni Arabs marched in large demonstrations north of the capital.

Speaking to worshipers in the Shiite holy city of Najaf, preacher Sadruddin Qubanchi called for Hussein to go to the gallows as soon as possible. Qubanchi likened his execution to "decapitating a snake," saying it would signify "the end of terror."

"The verdict of death is less than what he deserves," said Qubanchi, telling a crowd that Hussein's hanging would signal a new beginning for Iraq by putting an end to hopes of Hussein's supporters that he could ever return to power.

Worshipers chanted, "Execution is the least for Saddam!"

In the capital's eastern Sadr City slum, a Shiite stronghold, Sheik Abdul Zahra Swaidi told a large crowd that Hussein was getting what he deserved.

"Saddam's family and followers stole Iraq's wealth and are paying for killings, displacement, assassinations," Swaidi said. "We ask the government and the court to carry out Saddam's execution — Iraqis demand it."

A legal expert in the Dujayl case said Hussein could be executed inside the notorious Abu Ghraib prison within the next four or five months. Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, a Shiite, has said Hussein could be hanged by the end of the year.

International observers have questioned the fairness of the trial. Some say the U.S.-backed court was illegitimate and the proceedings deeply flawed, and they note that the verdict came two days before America's midterm election.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak warned this week that the execution of Hussein would deepen sectarian and ethnic strife and "explode violence like waterfalls in Iraq."

Leaders of other key American allies, such as Saudi Arabia and Jordan, have not criticized the verdict.

At a mosque in the southern Iraqi city of Kufa, Shiite cleric Juma Khafaji called for the government to speed up Hussein's execution. Khafaji, who is close to the anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr, warned other countries not to interfere to protect Hussein and lashed out at those who stood by "when Hussein was killing the Iraqis."

In Iraq, Sunni Arab politicians have protested the verdict, saying it was the foregone result of a biased court.

Qubanchi in his sermon on Friday said Sunni Arab lawmakers had "made politics more chaotic" and warned Sunni blocs to "forget about Saddam."

In Baghdad, meanwhile, Sunni preacher Hashim Yahya preached reconciliation to a crowd in a mosque but also issued not-so-veiled warnings to Shiite power brokers.

"Iraq has, regrettably, become a field for settling scores," he said. "Those who are powerful now must always remember God's might and power. The oppressed Iraqis will eventually question the officials about their deeds."

Nat'l Guard Units Face 2nd Tours In Iraq (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0093512

By Lolita C. Baldor,
AP, November 11, 2006

The nation's citizen soldiers, already strained by long tours in Iraq and Afghanistan, could be tapped again under new plans being developed by the Pentagon.

National Guard combat brigades that have already served in Iraq may be called for a second tour, likely breaking the 24-month deployment limit initially set by the Pentagon, the Guard's top general said.

While active-duty soldiers and smaller Guard units and members have returned to Iraq for multiple tours, the new plans would, for the first time, send entire Guard combat brigades back to the battlefront. Brigades generally have about 3,500 troops.

The move — which could include brigades from Arkansas, Florida, Indiana and North Carolina — would force the Pentagon to make the first large-scale departure from its previous decision not to deploy reserves for more than a cumulative 24 months in Iraq.

For some units, a second tour would mean they would likely exceed that two-year maximum. The planning was described by Lt. Gen. H. Steven Blum, who commands the Guard, in an Associated Press interview this week.

In a related move, the Pentagon is preparing to release a list of active units — and perhaps reserves as well — scheduled to go to Iraq that would largely maintain the current level of forces there over the next two years, another senior defense official said Thursday. There are about 152,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

That official requested anonymity because the plan has not been made public.

The Pentagon routinely notifies units to prepare for deployment, knowing it is easier to cancel a move overseas than to suddenly make such a large troop movement.

It was not clear whether this week's resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would affect deployment plans. President Bush has selected former CIA chief Robert Gates, who has criticized U.S. policy in Iraq, to replace Rumsfeld, but he has not yet been confirmed by the Senate.

"We are doing contingency planning for one or two (units), and we have contingency plans for more than two if necessary," Blum said Wednesday. The North Carolina brigade, he said, is being considered since it was one of the first to go to Iraq after the war began in 2003.

Blum also said defense officials have been discussing whether they need to adjust their policy that limits the deployment of reserves in the war to 24 months.

"When that policy was originally formulated, I seriously doubt anyone thought we would be where we are today, at the level of commitment that is necessary today," he said.

Just last month, defense officials said the Marines are drawing up similar plans that would for the first time send some reserve combat battalions back to Iraq for a second tour.

Under the authority by which Bush ordered a call-up of the Guard and Reserve after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, troops could be mobilized an unlimited number of times as long as each mobilization is no longer than 24 consecutive months.

Until now, Pentagon officials have interpreted that as 24 cumulative months.

While the ultimate goal for the National Guard is to deploy one year overseas and spend six years at home, Blum said current demands could force soldiers to deploy as often as one year every three or four years.

Blum said he believes that Guard combat brigades are prepared and willing to make a second trip to Iraq if needed.

He said the first units to deploy in the war — such as the 30th Infantry Brigade from North Carolina, the 76th Infantry Brigade from Indiana, the 53rd Infantry Brigade from Florida and the 39th Infantry Brigade from Arkansas — would probably be among those first called for a second tour.

"Logic would lead you to go back to the ones that went first, and start going around again," said Blum. "But that's probably not exactly how we'll do it" because the decision will depend partly on what types of units are needed.

Blum also said the Pentagon will no longer break up the brigades and send them to war in smaller units. He said Guard brigades are more effective working as teams.

___

On the Net:
Defense Department: http://www.defenselink.mil

Guard Units Could Do 2nd Tour In Iraq (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon is developing plans that for the first time would send entire National Guard combat brigades back to Iraq for a second tour, the Guard's top general said in the latest sign of how thinly stretched the military has become.

DOJ_NMG_0093513

Smaller Guard units and individual troops have already returned to Iraq for longer periods, and some active duty units have served multiple tours. Brigades generally have about 3,500 troops.

The move — which could include brigades from North Carolina, Florida, Arkansas and Indiana — would be the Pentagon's first large-scale departure from its previous decision not to deploy reserves for more than a total of 24 months in Iraq.

A second tour would probably put some units over that two-year maximum. The planning was described by Lt. Gen. H. Steven Blum, who commands the Guard, in an Associated Press interview this week.

In a related move, the Pentagon is preparing to release a list of active units — and perhaps reserves as well — scheduled to go to Iraq that would largely maintain the current level of forces there over the next two years, another senior defense official said Thursday. There are about 152,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

That official requested anonymity because the plan has not been made public.

The Pentagon routinely notifies units to prepare for deployment, knowing it is easier to cancel a move overseas than to suddenly make such a large troop movement.

It was not clear whether this week's resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would affect deployment plans. President Bush has selected former CIA chief Robert M. Gates, who has criticized U.S. policy in Iraq, to replace Rumsfeld, but he has not yet been confirmed by the Senate.

Tall Afar's Long Road Back (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

TALL AFAR, Iraq -- A year ago, U.S. officials championed the military's success in pushing insurgents out of this city in Iraq's northwestern desert, reclaiming it for the roughly 250,000 residents and eliminating an insurgent safe haven. President Bush publicly praised the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment's effort.

In the months since, soldiers say, Tall Afar has proved a model for the rest of Iraq, an insurgent stronghold turned relatively peaceful. Attacks dwindled to almost none in August before a spate of violence in September and October tied to the Muslim holy month of Ramadan. The local government is strong. Iraqi security forces are poised to take control from the roughly 1,000 U.S. troops in the region, which is a reduction of 75 percent from the U.S. presence here last spring.

"I think Tall Afar is on its way," said Lt. Col. Malcolm Frost, who commands the 3rd Squadron, 4th Cavalry Regiment, based just southwest of the city and now in charge of the region. "I think it's a beacon of light, not just for security but also in local government infrastructure. I think we're close to the tipping point."

But the road to stability in Tall Afar has been long and bumpy, and it continues to pose daily challenges. The city's transformation underscores how difficult it will be for parts of Iraq -- especially Baghdad -- to mirror its success.

The unemployment rate here is nearly 70 percent. Officials estimate that fewer than half of Tall Afar's residents remained here or returned after the last big U.S.-Iraqi military operation in September 2005. Many of the city's buildings are vacant or were destroyed in the fighting last year. Hundreds of millions of dollars was promised to help rebuild and restore Tall Afar, but the money has just started to trickle in through the Iraqi central government's staggeringly slow bureaucracy. And Iraqi forces have only recently taken the lead in providing security, helped in large part by the population drop and lack of attacks.

Though sectarian violence has been stemmed by cooperation among Sunni and Shiite Muslim sheiks here, insurgents attack Shiite civilians in the southern part of Tall Afar and Iraqi forces in the north. Officials call it a delicate balance.

"Tall Afar was another Fallujah or Ramadi," said Mayor Najim al-Jibouri, referring to cities in western Iraq that have experienced heavy fighting between U.S. forces and insurgents. "But with the help of the people, everyone gained the momentum and claimed Tall Afar from the terrorists and vowed not to go back to the old, bad days. Still, there are a lot of shortcomings that really disappoint us. Things like that prolong the life of the insurgency."

The mayor points mainly to the lack of help from the Iraqi government, which has left parts of the city a shambles. The city's northwest quadrant is like a ghost town, with scores of vacant houses, some reduced to rubble by fighting more than a year ago, almost entirely cordoned off with Iraqi police checkpoints designed to choke the insurgents' ability to move.

Soldiers call the northwest neighborhood the city's "gated community" because Iraqi forces have put such a stranglehold on it. In addition to reducing attacks, the restrictions have kept some people from moving back in, officials said.

Capt. Luke Hale, the U.S. squadron's intelligence officer, said the security situation in Tall Afar is tied closely to the economy. For example, he said, attacks sometimes increase because insurgents are willing to pay a local resident to place a roadside bomb. The focus of violence is in the city's northwest, where troops have found significant weapons caches and safe houses and last week recovered 85 pounds of homemade explosives, sticks of TNT and other materials probably destined for more attacks, Hale said.

DOJ_NMG_0093514

During the past nine months, U.S. soldiers have logged an average of about one attack against them per day in Tall Afar, but nearly 45 percent have involved relatively harmless small-arms fire. Roadside bombs were planted at an average of six per month from February to August, with just two in July and none in August -- vastly fewer than what insurgents unleashed in previous years.

"It was very, very bad before," said Falah Hassan, 23, an Iraqi police sergeant who works with U.S. soldiers. He pointed excitedly to a wall-size map of the city he has lived in since birth. "Everyone was afraid to move around because of the insurgents. Now it's much, much better. Tall Afar is coming back."

However, insurgents have begun sabotaging homes with massive explosives to try to lure, trap and kill Iraqi forces who enter. The soldiers here call them "house-borne improvised explosive devices," and three such homes have been leveled in recent weeks, causing some Iraqi soldiers to hesitate when chasing insurgents into vacant buildings.

Still, the Iraqi forces are out front, while U.S. forces hang back more and more. At an old granary on the edge of town, American soldiers are working directly with their Iraqi counterparts to clean up the city and restore services.

"The Iraqi security forces are definitely on the offense, and the insurgents are definitely on the defense and reeling," said Capt. Mike Lingenfelter, 32, of Panhandle, Tex., whose Comanche Troop lives at the granary and patrols the city. "It's working. They're almost there."

On a recent patrol through several parts of the city, Lt. Joshua Murphy, 24, of Owensboro, Ky., highlighted the strong Iraqi police presence and noted that there had been several days of calm after Ramadan, when nine suicide bombers set off explosives.

"The less of a presence we have here, the better we're doing," Murphy said, glancing out his Humvee's window at an Iraqi checkpoint made of plywood and sandbags. "They're taking over."

At a security meeting last week, two dozen Iraqi police and army leaders met with the mayor and U.S. officials at a castle atop one of Tall Afar's highest points. The chief concern among the Iraqis was the lack of strength demonstrated by the country's criminal justice system. Officials said they had seen insurgents arrested here return to the streets after being released in Baghdad.

"At the end, after we catch the people, we see them on the road again, and it's very disappointing," said Col. Muhammad, who runs the Qadisiyah neighborhood police station. "These groups build again even when they are in the cells."

The Iraqi government's overall lack of ability to respond to the local success in Tall Afar is a significant concern, several officials said.

"We had high hopes the Iraqi government would be able to produce more visible, tangible results quicker," said Brig. Gen. Mick Bednarek, deputy commander for operations with Multinational Division -- North, based in Tikrit. "How long will a civilized people that are very much in need of basic fundamental services wait before they are frustrated and look somewhere else?"

Jibouri, the mayor, said: "You can't separate what happens in Tall Afar and what happens in the rest of Iraq. If Iraq recovers, Tall Afar will recover. If Iraq doesn't succeed, Tall Afar will again fall."

Decrepit Healthcare Adds To Toll In Iraq (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

Thousands of Iraqis are believed to have died from shortages of medicine, vital equipment and qualified doctors, despite an infusion of nearly half a billion dollars from U.S. coffers into the country's healthcare system, Iraqi officials and American observers say.

Raging sectarian violence as well as theft, corruption and mismanagement have drained health resources and made deliveries of supplies difficult. Exacerbating the crisis, hundreds of doctors have been killed, and thousands have fled Iraq. The child mortality rate, a key indicator of a nation's health, has worsened since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, according to Iraqi government figures.

In the most sinister reported development, provincial Sunni Muslim doctors charge that Shiite Muslims who control the Health Ministry deliberately withhold medicines and other vital supplies. Privately, some U.S. officials say that hard-line Shiites use the ministry for political and sectarian ends.

This fall, U.S. troops raided the ministry, arresting employees suspected of kidnapping and killing patients at the Medical City Hospital in Baghdad. Afterward, ministry officials severed ties with the Americans and refused to open an $800,000 clinic built by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers in a deprived Sunni neighborhood in the capital.

The clinic has since been opened, but relations are still strained between U.S. military officials and the ministry, which is staffed by Shiites loyal to anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr.

DOJ_NMG_0093515

Across Iraq, a country whose healthcare was once the envy of the region, many hospitals have neither computers nor meaningful patient files. Functioning X-ray machines and MRI scanners are few and far between.

At one of the busiest hospitals in Baghdad, five people die on average every day because the staff does not have the equipment to treat heart attacks and other commonplace illnesses and injuries, said Husam Abud, a doctor at Yarmouk Hospital. That translates to more than 1,800 preventable deaths in a year in that hospital alone.

"Frankly speaking, if we get cases of cancer, we can't treat them," he said. "They'll probably end their days here. We don't have the adequate medication or the adequate equipment, and specialized doctors are not available."

A pharmacist in the town of Taji, north of Baghdad, described a looming "humanitarian catastrophe" as medicine, blood bags, oxygen, anesthetics, vaccines and IV fluid run out. Taji has a hospital, but the surgical room contains little medicine and fewer instruments. In September, doctors there were forced to turn away a pregnant woman who was experiencing labor complications. She died on her way to another hospital.

Already overburdened by large numbers of civilian victims of the civil war, hospitals also are stretched by Iraqi military and police casualties. Because the security forces have no emergency facilities, soldiers take wounded comrades to hospitals for care, often forcing doctors at gunpoint to treat them first, U.S. military officials say.

Healthcare in Iraq once was first rate. Medicine and hospital care were free, doctors well-educated and respected. But neglect by former President Saddam Hussein and years of United Nations sanctions laid waste to the system.

Since 2003, U.S. agencies have spent at least $493 million of Iraqi reconstruction funds on healthcare, but no new hospitals and only a few clinics have been built. With reconstruction funds running out, officials can point to few success stories beyond a child vaccination campaign. Hospitals looted in the first days after the invasion remain decrepit, without vital equipment and supplies. The hospital rehabilitation program has been plagued by cost overruns and complaints of shoddy but expensive work.

A flagship $50-million children's hospital in the southern city of Basra, a pet project of First Lady Laura Bush, has run far behind schedule and over budget. If it is ever finished, the hospital probably will end up costing at least $40 million more than planned, not including medical equipment, according to a congressional report by the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction.

The largest U.S.-funded construction program in the healthcare sector has fallen far short. A project to build 150 primary healthcare centers in Iraq was initially scaled back to 142 because of cost overruns. But only six clinics are open to the public, five of them in Shiite neighborhoods of Baghdad, according to a information provided by the U.S. Agency for International Development.

In Sunni-dominated Al Anbar province, the poorest, most dangerous part of the country, it has become increasingly difficult to get medical care. Several clinics have shut down in Ramadi, Hit, Haditha and Fallouja as doctors have fled and supplies have dwindled, local officials say.

The nation's health has deteriorated to a level not seen since the 1950s, said Joseph Chamie, former director of the U.N. Population Division and an Iraq specialist.

"They were at the forefront," he said, referring to healthcare just before the 1991 Persian Gulf War. "Now they're looking more and more like a country in sub-Saharan Africa."

At the outset of the 2003 war, the U.S. administration pledged to cut the child mortality rate in half by 2005. But instead it has worsened, from 125 deaths per 1,000 births in 2002 to 130 per 1,000 this year, according to Health Ministry figures. By comparison, the child mortality rate in the United States was 8 per 1,000 births in 2005.

Meanwhile, the Health Ministry's budget has grown substantially — $1.1 billion this year, compared with $22 million in 2002. More than 55% of its funds are spent on medication and medical supplies, and 33% on salaries. Remaining funds are spent on upkeep and auxiliary work, according to ministry figures.

But much of the medicine and medical supplies never benefit the most needy patients.

There is no reliable system for government agencies to track deliveries of medicines and equipment. Large quantities cannot be accounted for, according to a Western official who declined to be identified.

"The system still hemorrhages a massive amount of the goods for health at a time when the people can least afford to be without medicines," Richard Garfield, a Columbia University healthcare expert, told a Senate committee hearing in July. "The value of medicines lost this way far outweighs the amount lost to corruption, either before or after the invasion."

In Hussein's hometown, Tikrit, 57 truckloads of medicine have disappeared within the last two weeks, according to Sgt. 1st Class Jeff Newkirk, a civil affairs officer who operates in the area. Health workers have run out of such everyday items as painkillers, plastic gloves, test tubes and blood bags, said Jasim Mukhlis, a 28-year-old Turkmen who works in the outpatient pharmacy.

DOJ_NMG_0093516

The once well-funded hospital in the city now needs repairs to its roof and water pipes. The only available MRI scanner has been broken for eight months, but the Health Ministry has refused to send engineers, local officials say. As a result, patients sometimes have to travel about 200 miles to the northern city of Mosul for scans, say doctors, who perform only the most urgent operations in the hospital.

Three newly built clinics remain unopened, lacking doctors and supplies. Omar Hadithi, a local doctor, said Shiite officials take care of Shiite regions.

"The officials in the ministry think that our province received special treatment during Saddam's reign, so they are treating it with less care," he said.

Doctors and officials in Baqubah also charge that the Shiite-run ministry discriminates against them.

"We have no medications or blood serum supplies," said Tariq Hiali, a Baqubah health official. "The Ministry of Health is not providing us with medications and medical equipment; they consider [us to be] terrorists."

Qasim Yahya, a Health Ministry spokesman, denied that the ministry discriminates against Sunnis. Supplies are available to all, but must be picked up in Baghdad, he said, adding that the ministry is not responsible for delivery.

Sending Shiite ministry workers to Sunni-dominated areas might indeed be a dicey proposition.

And Sunni health workers say it is too dangerous for them to travel to the capital, especially to the ministry. Health Minister Ali Shammari is a member of Sadr's political movement, and the militiamen nominally loyal to the radical Shiite cleric, the Al Mahdi army, control the Health Ministry complex and the surrounding area.

Ali Mahdawi, a Sunni health official from Baqubah, disappeared inside the ministry complex four months ago as he was on his way to a meeting with the health minister. Mahdawi and his guards have not been heard from since, according to his colleagues and American officials.

"The ambulances we send to Baghdad are being intercepted by the Mahdi army," said Jamal Qadoori, an employee at Baqubah's blood bank. The Shiite militiamen then sell the stolen supplies on the black market, getting as much as $100 for blood bags, he said.

But both Shiite and Sunni health workers are targeted. At least 455 doctors, medical staffers and hospital guards on both sides of the sectarian divide have been killed since 2003, according to Health Ministry figures. In the same period, about 7,000 doctors left the country, according to the Doctors Assn. of Iraq.

In a few provinces, healthcare has not deteriorated since the U.S.-led invasion. The quiet, semiautonomous Kurdish region in the north has benefited from the influx of Arab doctors fleeing the violence in the capital. And in the south, Japanese forces have built or rehabilitated three hospitals and 32 health clinics in the peaceful Shiite-dominated Muthanna province. As a result, child mortality rates have improved there, according to provincial health director Falah Hassan.

But in most of the country, the situation has grown worse. Like violence, theft and corruption have become endemic. People caring for sick or injured family members say health workers are on the take and refuse to treat patients unless they're paid extra.

"They will not take care of the patient unless you pay them money all the time," said Akram Hussein, whose 75-year-old grandmother was taken to the Chawader Hospital in Baghdad's sprawling Shiite neighborhood of Sadr City recently. "We paid money to the cleaners and the nurses."

When his grandmother was in need of an important injection, the doctor also demanded extra: 5,000 dinar, or about $4.

Hussein's family didn't complain to the manager, he said, "fearing they might leave her completely."

After 10 days, she died.

"God decides people's ages," Hussein said. "But I think that the lack of care in this hospital caused the death of my grandmother."

Rumsfeld May Face Abuse Charges (BBC)

BBC.com, November 11, 2006

Donald Rumsfeld, who quit as US defence secretary this week, may face criminal charges in Germany for alleged abuses in Guantanamo Bay and Iraq.

A complaint has been launched by the US-based Centre for Constitutional Rights, representing a Saudi detained in Cuba and 11 Iraqis held in Baghdad.

German law allows the pursuit of cases originating anywhere in the world.

The centre made a similar request in 2004 but German prosecutors dropped that case.

The Centre for Constitutional Rights argues that Mr Rumsfeld was instrumental in abuses committed at Guantanamo Bay and at Abu Ghraib jail in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0093517

The lawyer group alleges that Mr Rumsfeld personally approved torture to be used to extract information from the prisoners.

It is also seeking to prosecute US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and former CIA director George Tenet, among others.

The group's complaint will be filed to German federal prosecutors on Tuesday, a spokesperson for the group said.

The prosecutors will have to again decide whether the complaint should be heard.

Mr Rumsfeld resigned on Wednesday following Republican losses to the Democrats in the US mid-term elections.

The Pentagon has not yet commented on the issue.

The US denies any torture has taken place at Guantanamo Bay and has defended its interrogation techniques.

Abuse of prisoners at Abu Ghraib was brought to world attention after photographs of the incidents were released and published.

Rummy's Got A New Woe - Torture Suit By 9/11 Thug (NYDN)

By James Gordon Meek, Daily News Washington Bureau

New York Daily News, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON - A New York human rights group plans to sue Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld for mistreating a 9/11 plotter and a former American general intends to back up the case, Time magazine reported yesterday.

The Center for Constitutional Rights will file the claim in Germany next week on behalf of Mohammad Al-Qahtani and 11 Iraqis who claim they were tortured in Baghdad's infamous Abu Ghraib prison. German courts claim a "universal jurisdiction" for war crimes.

Qahtani, who was stopped by an alert U.S. Customs officer in Orlando, Fla., before meeting with 9/11 cell leader Mohamed Atta days before the attacks, claims in legal papers he was tortured at the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The CCR alleges that abuse of terrorist suspects at Gitmo and Abu Ghraib were condoned or authorized by Rumsfeld, who was axed by President Bush after this week's election results.

Retired Army Col. Janis Karpinski is the star witness backing the detainees, who also name ex-CIA Director George Tenet, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, ex-Iraq commander Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez and retired Gitmo commander Maj. Gen. Geoffrey Miller.

Before Bush demoted her from brigadier general because of the abuse, Karpinski commanded the Long Island-based 800th Military Police Brigade that ran all of Iraq's prisons, including Abu Ghraib.

"It was clear the knowledge and responsibility [for Abu Ghraib detainee abuses] goes all the way to the top of the chain of command to the Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld," Karpinski said in the legal brief.

Karpinski did not return calls by the Daily News yesterday.

Rumsfeld Rides Off Into The Sunset (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, November 11, 2006

“Stuff happens.”

Donald Rumsfeld, the US defence secretary, this week was put out to pasture following a turbulent six years at the Pentagon.

Mr Rumsfeld will go down in history as one of the most controversial figures of the Bush presidency. Comparisons will inevitably be made with Robert McNamara, the Vietnam-era defence secretary, who was fired after he disagreed with President Lyndon Johnson about US policy in Vietnam.

Mr Rumsfeld did not have a McNamaraesque epiphany about the direction of the war. He was a true believer to his bitter end. But President George W. Bush was forced to jettison him after the US expressed its total dissatisfaction with the war in this week’s mid-term -elections.

Always combative, often charming, sometimes a bully, Mr Rumsfeld introduced a style of Pentagon press conference that both entertained and infuriated.

Trying to pin down the former university wrestling champion was about as easy as finding Osama bin Laden, which, as the defence secretary himself explained, is not easy.

“If you’re chasing the chicken around the chicken yard and you don’t have him yet, and the question is how close are you? The answer is, it’s tough to characterise because there’s lots of zigs and zags.”

DOJ_NMG_0093518

In his own form of Socratic soliloquy, he might have summed up his fate something like this: “Goodness gracious me...Did I see this coming? No. Should I have? Perhaps. Was I wrong? Of course not. You should know that. What does it all mean? It is what it is.”

How surprised Mr Rumsfeld really was at being replaced is one of those known unknowns that first made his name as a poet whose rhetorical musings have been compiled in Pieces of Intelligence: The Existential Poetry of Donald H. Rumsfeld.

“As we know, there are known knowns. There are things we know we know. We also know there are known unknowns. That is to say we know there are some things we do not know. But there are also unknown unknowns, the ones we don’t know we don’t know.”

He once, uncharacteristically, explained his problem: “I’m brusque. I’m impatient. It’s genetic. I can’t help it.”

The former naval pilot had many careers. A Congressman and top official in the administrations of presidents Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford, he later left government to run several companies, before returning in 2001 as the Bush administration’s poet-in-residence.

As far back as the 1960s, he was considered a supreme Washington infighter. One of the compliments Mr Nixon paid to him was that he was a “ruthless little bastard”.

But Mr Rumsfeld appeared to relish the bruising battles he had with other administration officials, and especially with Colin Powell, the former secretary of state. At a White House meeting in 2004, the defence chief stunned the other attendees by reached over and drank Mr Powell’s Diet Coke because he could not find one himself.

After eyebrows were raised, Condoleezza Rice, then national security adviser, interjected: “Now that Don has had his Diet Coke, perhaps we can start.” Mr Powell’s office had no recollection of the event.

But, privately, even some of his foes recognised his sense of humour, which appeared intact the day after he had been fired. Giving the Landon lecture at Kansas State University, Rummy the Gladiator joked: “I hope all of you appreciate how I have managed so skilfully public affairs for this event.”

What Mr Rumsfeld does next is another “known unknown”. Perhaps he will visit old friends, including one who has been waiting patiently in a Mongolian field.

During a visit to Ulan Bator last year, Mr Rumsfeld was given a horse he named Montana. But since he could not bring Montana back to the US, the Mongolian defence minister told him tradition dictated that he would be put out to pasture until his master returned.

For Rumsfeld, his rocky ride has come to an end. But as he himself once quipped: “How does it end? It ends, that’s all”

Afghanistan Waits For Peace Five Years After Fall Of Taliban (AFP)

By Sylvie Briand

AFP, November 11, 2006

Five years after US-led forces drove the Taliban from Kabul, peace remains a distant dream in Afghanistan with militant attacks at an all-time high, a despondent population and widespread corruption.

The violence, in its bloodiest phase since November 2001 with some 1,000 civilians killed this year, results from "the failure of international intervention to stop the cycle of decades of conflict," says the International Crisis Group, a leading think-tank.

"The primary error of the Americans and their allies has been to not grant enough troops and resources, which has allowed the return of the Taliban, and resulted in the disillusionment of the people and the unpopularity of the government," added Ahmed Rashid, a Pakistani expert on Afghanistan.

The NATO-led International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) had only 4,500 members in 2002, all deployed around Kabul. The alliance now commands some 31,000 troops, boosted by 10,000 troops from the US-led coalition that ousted the Taliban five years ago.

By comparison Kosovo, which is around 60 times smaller than Afghanistan, played host to 40,000 NATO soldiers after the 1999 bombing campaign against Serbian forces.

ISAF's chief, British General David Richards, has himself said that current troops numbers are insufficient to counter the violence that has effectively doubled since 2004 and is now marked by a previously alien phenomenon here -- suicide bombings.

The international community's other mistake, according to Rashid, is its failure to press Pakistani authorities to stop allowing their territory to serve as a "refuge for the Taliban".

"The Americans were more worried about Al-Qaeda in Afghanistan than they were about the Taliban. But the lack of pressure by Pakistan means that the Taliban have reorganised with the help of Al-Qaeda," Rashid said.

The United States launched Operation Enduring Freedom in Afghanistan to track down Osama bin Laden after the September 11, 2001 attacks on New York and Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0093519

Faced with US air raids and the oncoming Northern Alliance forces, the Taliban abandoned Kabul on the night of November 12, around a month after the operation started.

But the Al-Qaeda chief remains at large, as does the Taliban's supreme leader, Mullah Mohammad Omar.

Much-needed reconstruction has stopped in several areas because of combat or the withdrawal of Afghan and foreign aid workers, "calling into question some of the modest gains achieved since 2001 such as the return of children to school, especially girls," says US-based Human Rights Watch.

To meet the needs of this destitute country, the NATO forces have embarked on building bridges, schools and clinics but "without a state capable of keeping them up, it is pointless," says Joanna Nathan, a Kabul-based analyst with the International Crisis Group (ICG).

The group has called for reforms in the Afghan government and for a campaign against endemic corruption to stop disillusioned Afghans from swelling the ranks of an insurgency that the ICG says "is going to last for years".

In the eyes of many Afghans the situation is worse than it was five years ago: the cost of living has increased, infrastructure remains deficient and security is still not assured, according to the non-governmental organisation Action Against Hunger.

The insurgents are not the only source of violence, according to experts who also point to local warlords who are often implicated in drug trafficking. Afghanistan is the world's leading producer of opium.

The situation is particularly bad in the south of the country where the Taliban insurgency and the drug trade are both concentrated.

"You would not be able to grow massive poppy fields in regions that were under the control of the central government and foreign forces," Nathan said.

In Pakistan, Recent Attacks Shred Hopes For Regional Peace Model (WP)

By Pamela Constable, Kamran Khan

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

PESHAWAR, Pakistan -- Two months ago, Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, triumphantly announced a peace pact with Islamic extremists in the North Waziristan tribal district near the Afghan border, saying he hoped it would become a model for curbing domestic Islamic militancy and cross-border insurgent attacks in Afghanistan.

Today that model lies in shreds. Northwestern Pakistan's fragile political peace has been shattered by two devastating attacks: a government missile strike that killed 82 people at an Islamic school in the Bajaur tribal district on Oct. 30, and a retaliatory suicide bombing Wednesday that killed 42 army recruits at a training camp in the Malakand tribal district.

The missile strike was based on U.S. intelligence reports that the school was being used as a training site for Islamic insurgents, who have found sanctuary across the semi-autonomous tribal areas where Osama bin Laden and other al-Qaeda figures may also be hiding. Now, officials are predicting a new wave of violence, as anti-government anger spreads and religious extremists call for holy war against the Pakistani military and Western forces fighting in Afghanistan.

"This is a disaster. We all recognize the gravity of the situation," said a senior military official in this northwestern provincial capital, speaking on condition of anonymity. "It's a nightmare to have an army being attacked on its own soil and by its own people." After the two incidents, he added, "the doors to peaceful negotiated settlements are closed. I am afraid we are on a war course in the tribal areas."

Public condemnation of the missile attack has been almost universal in Pakistan. Many people say they believe it was actually carried out by a U.S. Predator drone, which witnesses described as circling overhead before Pakistani helicopter gunships arrived. U.S. and Pakistani officials have denied that.

Local leaders have also vehemently asserted that the school, run by a cleric from a banned extremist group, was used only for religious studies and that many young students were killed in the strike. No physical evidence of a training camp has been publicly produced, journalists have been barred from the site, and most of the victims' bodies were too disfigured to identify.

"This was a crime against humanity. Everyone hates America now, and they hate Musharraf for giving in to American pressure," said Bashir Ahmed, 25, a produce trader in a Peshawar market crowded with crates of bananas and pomegranates. "America is the enemy of all Muslims, but they will never defeat us, because we are all becoming al-Qaeda now, even me."

Pakistani military and intelligence officials said they had little choice but to bomb the site after they received overwhelming proof from U.S. intelligence sources that it was being used as a training center for insurgents. A refusal to act, the Pakistanis said, would have badly damaged their relations with the United States, which counts Pakistan as a key ally in the war against al-Qaeda and fundamentalist Islamic terrorism.

"They loaded us with evidence. The strike was absolutely inevitable," said a senior intelligence official, also speaking on condition of anonymity. Another official called the attack a "major test" of military and intelligence cooperation between the United States and Pakistan. "We thought about other options, but the Americans weren't ready to take any chances," he said. "We were caught between the devil and the deep sea."

DOJ_NMG_0093520

Public outrage has also flared over Wednesday's suicide bombing, in which a man wrapped in a cloak strolled among army recruits exercising on a field and detonated powerful explosives, killing more Pakistani troops than any previous terrorist attack. But many Pakistanis view that bombing as a predictable response to an ill-conceived military action taken under U.S. pressure.

Ansar Abbasi, Islamabad bureau chief for the News International newspaper, called the Bajaur attack "outrageous" and argued in a column that while it might have raised Musharraf's tough-guy image in the West, it served no national interest and could only exacerbate conflict between the army and the civilian populace. "Have we not fallen into a U.S. trap?" he asked.

One political leader in Peshawar said the Bajaur site was definitely a terrorist base but that it was not "politically correct to say so" in the region. Bajaur elders had reached a peace accord similar to the Waziristan pact, he said, but the missile strike came just hours before they were to sign it. "People find this mind-boggling and impossible to understand," he said.

The Musharraf government has long been caught between conflicting domestic and international pressures. Western powers have demanded that it crack down on religious extremists and hunt down al-Qaeda fugitives, widely reported to be hiding in the semi-autonomous tribal belt. But Islamic groups are politically dominant in Pakistan's northwest, and many tribal fighters have fiercely resisted military efforts to dislodge Islamic militants from their midst.

Musharraf's recent attempt at compromise, a series of negotiated settlements with armed Islamic groups and tribal leaders, has been controversial. Critics charge that pacts in North and South Waziristan left both areas under the control of extremists who continue to export violence to Afghanistan. They say the deals were aimed only at extricating army troops from the tribal areas, where they had suffered heavy casualties and public hostility during months of fighting.

At the same time, however, the growing violence has led to urgent calls for mass tribal conflict-resolution meetings, known as jirgas. Afghan President Hamid Karzai recently proposed a series of jirgas in both countries, and the Awami National Party, which represents the ethnic Pashtuns who predominate in Pakistan's northwest, has called for a separate tribal jirga. Party leaders say the only antidote to Islamic radicalization is the ancient tribal code known as Pashtunwali, which prescribes consensual pacts to halt feuds.

"Even though Talibanization is spreading, Pashtunwali is still in people's blood," said Afrasiab Khattak, an Awami party official and human rights activist in Peshawar. "We don't want to settle scores or embarrass the government. Our only agenda is to stop this conflict from getting worse."

The dominant political group in the northwest, a religious party called Jamaat-e-Islami, responded to the Bajaur attack by staging nationwide protests. While Jamaat officially opposes terrorism and has played a responsible leadership role in provincial government for the past several years, it issued calls for jihad after the missile strike, and several key leaders resigned from their government posts or seats in parliament.

In interviews here, several Jamaat leaders echoed the current ambivalence, saying they were horrified by suicide bombings but furious at Western military interference in the region and opposed to the moderate version of Islam promoted by Musharraf.

Abdul Akbar Chitrali, a cleric and Jamaat politician who directs an Islamic academy for boys in Peshawar called the Garden of Knowledge, said he believes in spreading Islam by peaceful means. "But when someone invades you, you have no choice but to resist," he said. "The Americans and NATO have no right to occupy Afghanistan. They are the hooligans causing our problems, not the Taliban or al-Qaeda."

It may never be known whether the tiny Islamic school in Bajaur's Chingai village was a garden of knowledge or a staging ground for terrorists. A group of lawyers from Peshawar who visited the site last week said they saw no evidence of training or weapons.

What they did see was disturbing enough: a tense, angry crowd that surrounded their vehicles, shouting for holy war against the Pakistani and U.S. governments, less than a week after local leaders had been ready to sign a peace pact with the government.

"If it was a military camp, I found no sign of it. But the people were very inflamed," said Barrister Baachaa, one of the lawyers. "Bajauris are known to be quiet and not carrying guns, but the mood is becoming very militant. If Bajaur can fall into Talibanization, so can the other tribal areas, and then I fear it can spread to the settled areas, too," he said. "This has to be contained, but the way they did it in Bajaur has only made it worse."

Khan reported from Karachi.

Then And Now, Female Soldiers Just Do Their Jobs (NYT)

By Maura J. Casey

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093521

One of my most prized possessions is a set of World War II dog tags. They are inscribed with my mother's name and serial number: Jane I. Murray, A-218847.

She enlisted in the Women's Army Corps at 21, determined to get as near to the front as possible. She got no closer to combat than Fort Riley, Kan. Her Army years became her one great adventure before returning to marry and have six children in seven years, a daunting task for which her warrior's ethos probably came in handy.

My mother's service gave her a lifelong belief in women's abilities. She horrified my friends during the Vietnam War when she argued that women should have been included in the draft, since they had an equal obligation to serve. The courage and competence of women currently serving in Iraq and Afghanistan would have come as no surprise to her.

Yet, despite what women in uniform have accomplished, there are critics who want to curtail their military roles. Despite Pentagon policy that keeps women from entering combat units like infantry, armor or field artillery, some conservatives profess horror that women are members of any combat support units in harm's way.

Because of this, Representative Duncan Hunter, the California Republican who is the outgoing chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, tried to amend the 2006 defense authorization bill to restrict the role of women in the Army. It would have barred women from nearly 22,000 jobs. The measure was withdrawn once it became clear it wouldn't pass.

But reality has overrun critics' arguments. Between Iraq and Afghanistan, 68 women have been killed in action, and 436 have been wounded, according to the Pentagon's Web site. In the midst of what is truly a 360-degree front, some still insist that women should not be in the line of fire before the country has an "open debate" on the impact of women on morale, readiness and military cohesion in time of war.

In truth, that debate has never ended, no matter how well women have served, and has largely been a ludicrous waste of time and millions of dollars. In the last 30 years, two federal commissions examined the impact of women in the military for months on end.

The Army alone has conducted at least a dozen major studies on how women should be utilized. The studies found that, properly armed and trained, women enhance unit readiness and cohesion, said Brig. Gen. Pat Foote, who is retired. "Women have been pulled through more knotholes with people questioning their abilities," she said. "Women can do anything they are trained for."

The questions prove equally exasperating to women like Col. Patricia Jernigan, retired, who is a board member for the United States Army Women's Foundation. "An airplane doesn't care who is flying it," she said. "A rifle doesn't care who is firing it. Judge women on performance."

Given the ease of modern communication, from cellphones to e-mail, if women were not measuring up in Iraq, that would have become very clear by now. Last year, the Pentagon quietly approved creation of the Combat Action Badge, awarded to Army combat support soldiers who come under fire and engage the enemy. Sgt. April Pashley, of Egg Harbor Township, N.J., was among the first five recipients.

My mother never fought. But every day for the 30-plus years she lived after the war, she was proud she had enlisted. And despite the passage of time, there remains a fundamental bond between the experience of Army women today and that of my mother, so very long ago: all she wanted was to be a good soldier.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Fastow Gets His Moment In The Sun (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

HOUSTON, Nov. 3 — No one sold tickets, but the Andrew S. Fastow show cost a small fortune.

And while it was light on laughs, it even featured window washers who moved in the background like shadowy ninjas before a nervous audience of big-name Wall Street lawyers representing some of the largest banks in the world.

For eight and a half days, Mr. Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, held some 70 lawyers rapt in a downtown Houston conference room as he delivered the most expansive deposition yet in a spate of lawsuits stemming from Enron's 2001 collapse. His much-anticipated appearance, which ended on Nov. 2, was the first time an Enron insider had sought to help shareholders recover money in the civil litigation.

Lawyers representing Enron investors have already won settlements for $7.3 billion of the $40 billion shareholders claim they lost in Enron's 2001 collapse. On Nov. 1, the latest settlement — an agreement by Arthur Andersen, Enron's former accounting firm, to pay $72.5 million — was disclosed.

DOJ_NMG_0093522

But it is far from clear whether the testimony of Mr. Fastow, a convicted felon who masterminded some of the fraudulent transactions that hid the company's poor financial health, will be enough to push the seven banks that have not settled to the negotiating table.

A number of the banks named in the consolidated Enron shareholders' suit argued that they were now in the catbird seat, and they played down the significance of Mr. Fastow's deposition.

The Royal Bank of Scotland, one of the seven banks yet to settle, said "there was nothing in Fastow's deposition that changes R.B.S.'s view of the case."

Merrill Lynch said the deposition "did not break any material new factual ground." Mark Herr, a Merrill spokesman, said the bank viewed a decision by a federal appeals court on Nov. 1 as more important than what Mr. Fastow had to say.

The appeals court said it would review the basis on which Judge Melinda Harmon of United States District Court allowed the case to proceed as a class action. If the court rules that Judge Harmon erred in certifying the class, the civil suit could be thrown out for the remaining banks.

Judge Harmon dropped Barclays and Deutsche Bank from the shareholder suit this summer, saying their actions amounted to aiding and abetting Enron but not to direct involvement in the fraud.

Plaintiffs' lawyers, though, hailed Mr. Fastow's appearance as a milestone in the sprawling and stunningly expensive Enron civil litigation.

Mr. Fastow calmly outlined the role of the banks in helping Enron meet its earnings targets while hiding its poor cash flow and mounting debt. He named specific bankers without prompting, recounted private conversations with them and corroborated sheaves of the banks' internal documents, according to those who witnessed the deposition.

He testified that he viewed the banks as Enron's "problem solvers." They would "lend their balance sheets," he said, and provide loans disguised as something else to pump up Enron's poor cash flow and reduce the debt on its balance sheet.

"We were changing how Enron appeared to the outside world," Mr. Fastow said in his deposition.

According to J. B. Heaton, a lawyer who represents several investment funds holding Enron debt and seeking relief in a private-action suit, "there were no smoking guns" in Mr. Fastow's testimony.

Mr. Heaton added, though, that "it was the power of corroboration and the consistency under nine days of questioning that was so impressive. That's why it was believable."

The deposition drew lawyers representing 10 major banks and top Enron executives who have not been charged with crimes. It was also streamed live over the Internet so law firms in New York, London and elsewhere could listen in.

With the typical lawyer in the case billing about $450 an hour, the legal fees just to follow the testimony could cost at least $2.1 million, and the overall price tag of the litigation is expected to reach hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. Fastow's switch from defendant to plaintiffs' witness was engineered by Lerach Coughlin, the San Diego-based law firm pursuing shareholders' claims. It released Mr. Fastow from the shareholder case after he agreed to give a sworn declaration and sit for the deposition. The firm is paying legal fees for Mr. Fastow's lawyer, Craig Smyser.

Mr. Fastow acknowledged in his deposition that he hoped his criminal sentence might be lowered if he agreed to help the shareholders recover money in the civil case. Yet Mr. Smyser said Mr. Fastow was motivated more by a need to set the record straight.

"This was part of a personal journey to redeem himself as much as he can," Mr. Smyser said.

Judge Harmon granted Mr. Fastow daily release from a Houston federal detention center after he gave the court a 25-page statement detailing what he viewed as the banks' roles in Enron's fraud. Mr. Fastow offered the statement on the day he was sentenced for fraud; a judge reduced his sentence to 6 years, from the 10 he had expected to receive.

[Mr. Fastow was moved on Nov. 7 to Oakdale, La., where he will serve his time in a minimum-security camp in the same complex as a low-security prison where Bernard J. Ebbers, the former chief executive of WorldCom, is serving his 25-year sentence for fraud.]

Each day United States marshals escorted a shackled Mr. Fastow from the detention center, where he awaited his prison assignment in solitary confinement, to the 21st floor of a downtown Houston office building, where a "deposition center" was set up specifically for the Enron civil cases.

Dressed in olive green garb, he sat in front of a blue screen with his back to the windows and answered questions, with only occasional breaks, from 9 a.m. to nearly 6 p.m. on most days.

Tensions were high that first morning, according to several people who witnessed the deposition. About 30 lawyers packed into the main conference room, sitting on either side of Mr. Fastow. Almost 40 more watched on video feeds in two overflow rooms.

DOJ_NMG_0093523

Suddenly, four shadowy figures with ropes appeared, hanging outside the windows of the main room, which had the blinds drawn. A marshal scrambled to the windows. One lawyer for a major bank said the figures resembled ninjas. It turned out they were window washers.

"A lot of uncomfortable smiles broke out," Mr. Heaton said. During the deposition, Mr. Fastow discussed how he prioritized the banks Enron dealt with. "Tier 1" banks were those willing to lend Enron up to $1 billion. In October 2001, as Enron's financial situation was unraveling, he sought to elevate two banks — Chase and Citibank — into an even higher category if they would agree to help bail out Enron by lending up to $2 billion between them, he said.

Mr. Fastow said he tried to make clear to Citibank, a unit of Citicorp, and Chase, a unit of J. P. Morgan Chase, that "this was extraordinarily important to Enron and that this would, going forward, set them apart from any other bank."

Both banks declined to comment. They have previously settled shareholder claims but still face billions of dollars of liability in private-action suits.

While Mr. Fastow gave testimony useful to the plaintiffs' cases, he also gave some ammunition to defense lawyers by admitting that he consistently lied to the banks about Enron's true financial condition. He never "opened his kimono," he said, for fear that they would effectively shut Enron down if they knew how precarious its position was.

And Mr. Fastow revealed more about Enron's corporate culture. In early 1999, a tour with analysts of Enron's new energy services trading floor was staged to make it look busier than it was, he said. Mr. Fastow wanted to play music from the movie "The Sting" during a dry run, as a joke.

He changed his mind after learning that Kenneth L. Lay, the company's chief executive, would be there. "I didn't think he had the same sense of humor," Mr. Fastow said.

Corporate Crime In H-P Case, New Sheriff Comes To Town (WSJ)

By George Anders

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

The criminal prosecution of former Hewlett-Packard Co. chairman Patricia Dunn -- who is due to be arraigned on Friday -- could get a fresh look from one of California's best-known politicians.

On Nov. 7, California voters picked Democrat Jerry Brown -- the former governor and presidential candidate -- to be the state's next attorney general. Mr. Brown, who is currently mayor of Oakland, will begin his new job Jan. 9.

As attorney general, Mr. Brown will have ultimate authority in deciding how to proceed with People vs. Dunn, a case filed in state court in San Jose last month by William Lockyer, the current AG. The state's case focused on allegedly improper techniques used by H-P and its agents to gather phone records and other personal data for an investigation of boardroom leaks.

Mr. Lockyer took a negative view of H-P's conduct. "One of our state's most venerable corporate institutions lost its way," he said in an Oct. 4 briefing about the state's case. "In this misguided effort, people inside and outside H-P violated privacy rights and broke state law."

Tom Dresslar, a spokesman for the attorney general's office, said he expects the Dunn case will be "a candidate for review" by Mr. Brown, "if only to get him up to speed on the evidence we gathered and why we brought the case."

During his campaign for the AG post, the 68-year-old Mr. Brown focused his attention on other issues, vowing to take steps to protect public safety, abortion rights and California's recently enacted curbs on greenhouse-gas emissions. A spokesman for Mr. Brown declined to comment on how the attorney general-elect might view the Dunn case.

Mr. Dresslar reaffirmed his office's confidence in the merits of the H-P privacy-invasion case. "We had prosecutors with a combined 74 years of experience working on the case," he said. Still, he acknowledged that with Mr. Lockyer's tenure coming to an end, cases in progress could be reassessed. Mr. Lockyer was elected state treasurer on Tuesday; he will switch to his new job in early January.

Ms. Dunn and four other people were criminally charged in the state's case last month. The other defendants, including former H-P ethics director Kevin Hunsaker, have already entered pleas of not guilty. Ms. Dunn is expected to do the same at her arraignment.

3 Qwest Executives Cash In Options (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, November 11, 2006

DENVER, Nov. 10 (AP) — Three executives at Qwest Communications International made more than $43 million by cashing in stock options, according to regulatory filings.

The chief executive, Richard C. Notebaert, made a profit of $18.4 million and the chief financial officer, Oren G. Shaffer, made $18.5 million, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission filing.

DOJ_NMG_0093524

The chief legal officer, Richard N. Baer, made a $6.4 million profit, according to documents filed earlier this week.

A Qwest spokesman, Nicholas Sweers, said that Mr. Notebaert planned to donate his after-tax proceeds to charities. Mr. Sweers did not identify the charities.

Mr. Shaffer and Mr. Baer have not revealed any plans for their proceeds.

The sales were disclosed about a month after Qwest's founder and largest shareholder, Philip F. Anschutz, contracted to sell 80 million shares through 2010.

Mr. Sweers said the executives retained substantial stock options. With Qwest share prices up by more than 80 percent year-over-year, "all shareholders have been rewarded by the company's financial and operational performance," Mr. Sweers said.

Qwest has announced plans to buy back up to $2 billion worth of its stock over two years.

Its shares fell 22 cents, to $8.23.

The company, based in Denver, is the primary phone service provider in 14 Midwestern and Western states.

SEC, Accounting Board Officials To Weigh Sarbanes-Oxley Update (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

Leaders of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the panel that oversees the accounting industry will meet Sunday in an effort to resolve differences over how to overhaul a controversial corporate accountability measure that business groups have targeted as overly expensive.

Tension over a part of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law, which requires companies to review their financial controls and to have auditors pass judgment on them, spilled into public view this week after the release of portions of a letter by SEC Chairman Christopher Cox proposing changes.

The Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, which reviews the work of auditors, met privately for 90 minutes yesterday to consider how to respond to Cox's letter, which urged the board to be flexible and cost-conscious in response to complaints from businesses. Cox and former Federal Reserve Board official Mark W. Olson, who now leads the accounting panel, are to meet this weekend to discuss the issues.

The exact language in Cox's letter has not been made public. Both agencies declined to release it yesterday. But speculation raged after reports suggested that Cox had proposed that small and mid-size companies could avoid reviews of their internal controls altogether or that regulators could render the reviews virtually useless by significantly heightening the standard for what kinds of transactions were important enough for auditors to assess.

Cox, in a telephone interview yesterday, rejected the notion that regulators would gut the internal control standard, which was put in place to help detect fraud and financial errors. Instead, he said, the goal was to retool the provision using "the lessons learned from the past four years," including making sure that "things that don't have to do with financial statements don't have excessive attention" and ensuring that small companies do not bear "disproportionate" cost burdens. Cox declined to be more specific, adding that some of the language mentioned earlier in the week was flatly inaccurate or had already been "overtaken by events."

Several of Cox's ideas spring from a report last year by a committee of small business leaders, which entreated the agency to exempt their companies from internal control reviews. Cox publicly rejected that option. But concern has persisted over the wording of the changes, and what they mean in practice, which can be difficult to grasp for anyone who is not an accountant.

Any formal proposals from the session between Cox and Olson would be unveiled at open meetings next month and subject to public comment, after which they could be modified, regulators from both agencies noted.

After years-long and increasingly intense lobbying, congressional leaders including the presumptive chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, Barney Frank (D-Mass.), and Senate Banking Committee member Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) have called on regulators to ease the burden for industry.

Regulators are racing against the clock. The SEC and the accounting oversight board need a plan in place by March or April at the latest to influence the next round of corporate audits.

The nation's biggest accounting firms have reaped record profits from more-intense audits since Congress passed the law after scandals at Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. four years ago. PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP, Deloitte & Touche LLP, KPMG and Ernst & Young renewed a plea this week to insulate themselves from liability for failed audits. Because the firms insure themselves, they say they are at risk of financial disaster if they are deceived by a team of executives engaged in fraud. It is unclear whether the industry, which was tarnished after failing to detect widespread accounting fraud in recent years, has recovered sufficient clout to move ahead with liability reform.

DOJ_NMG_0093525

The ongoing and increasingly heated debate over the internal controls provision also renewed tensions between the accounting oversight board, whose members and budget are approved by the SEC, and securities regulators. The board, which was created under the Sarbanes-Oxley law, has struggled to maintain its independence after early skirmishes over leadership. In February, the Free Enterprise Fund sued the board, arguing among other things that it lacked authority under the U.S. Constitution. A federal judge in Washington is considering the case and has requested argument from both sides next month.

SEC Chairman Backs Creation Of One Regulator For Brokerages (WSJ)

By Judith Burns, Randall Smith

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

BOCA RATON, Fla. -- The chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission threw his weight behind regulatory relief for Wall Street, endorsing creation of a single regulator to oversee brokerage firms.

Talks to merge the oversight of securities firms by the National Association of Securities Dealers and NYSE Group Inc.'s New York Stock Exchange have heated up, and could result in an accord in the next few months, according to people familiar with the talks.

The new entity, which hasn't been named yet, would combine the two regulators' routine rule-making, inspection and enforcement functions, while leaving in place the ability of the Big Board and other exchanges to police their own trading.

In a speech before a few hundred securities-industry professionals attending a meeting of the Securities and Financial Markets Association here Friday, Christopher Cox repeatedly criticized the current regulatory setup as "antiquated," "redundant," "needless and often harmful."

A new single regulator could be "more nimble and cost effective," he added. And in response to questions he predicted it could be up and running within a year.

Wall Street's main lobbying group, recently renamed SIFMA (after a merger of the stock-market and bond-market trade groups), has been pressing for such relief for several years.

But the effort has gained steam this year amid a broad deregulatory push-back against some rules adopted after the severe stock-market decline of 2000-02 and the collapse of Enron Corp.

Both Wall Street and corporate executives have argued that such rules need to be relaxed so global public companies don't avoid U.S. exchanges. In his speech Mr. Cox said failure to act on the regulatory consolidation could "impair" the strength of U.S. capital markets.

Hedge Funds Could Face New Limits (BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, November 11, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission will propose rules next month raising asset requirements for investing in hedge funds after one fund, Amaranth Advisers, lost $6.5 billion on bad natural gas trades.

The changes will be proposed to the S.E.C.'s five commissioners at a December meeting in Washington, the agency chairman, Christopher Cox, said yesterday. He did not specify how the agency might limit the pool of hedge-fund investors.

“We’re going to make it very clear that hedge funds are risky investments that are not for mom and pop by fencing it off with higher standards to accrediting investors,” Mr. Cox said in an interview.

Hedge funds are open to individuals with at least $1 million in assets or at least $200,000 in income for the last two years, and also institutions like insurance companies, mutual funds and pension funds. Since Amaranth collapsed in September, lawmakers have become increasingly concerned that a hedge fund meltdown could put pension fund investments at risk.

Mr. Cox said at the meeting on Dec. 13, the S.E.C. would also propose a hedge fund anti-fraud rule as well as new guidelines to help companies and auditors interpret the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate governance law in a way that saves time and money.

The chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, has asked Mr. Cox and the Treasury secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. to figure out ways to increase transparency in the $1.3 trillion hedge-fund industry, which is largely unregulated. A federal appeals court in June rejected rules requiring hedge funds to register with the S.E.C. The agency wanted funds to report their size, number of employees and types of clients, and submit to random inspections.

Mr. Cox said that the shift in control of Congress to the Democrats should not impede efforts to revise corporate governance laws.

“This is a hugely bipartisan issue,” Mr. Cox said. “The concerns that we’ve heard expressed on behalf of investors and small companies, and on behalf of the marketplace in general, have come roundly from Democrats and Republicans.”

DOJ_NMG_0093526

Spitzer's Successor May Not Follow In His Footsteps (WSJ)

By Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

Cuomo Targets Medicaid Fraud, Guns, Government Corruption; Grasso Case Will Be Early Test

Soon, there will be a new sheriff in town.

New York state's departing attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, used the once-provincial job to propel himself onto the national stage: Applying little-known state laws, he crusaded against bad behavior in mutual funds, banking and the insurance businesses, forcing billions of dollars in penalties. He also took on business titans such as Dick Grasso, the former head of the New York Stock Exchange, charging that he was overpaid.

His successor, 48-year-old Andrew Cuomo, inherits an office that has been transformed. Now everyone is waiting to see how Mr. Cuomo, who was elected on Tuesday in a landslide, plans to wield his power.

In an interview, Mr. Cuomo, the son of former New York Gov. Mario Cuomo, signaled that he intends to be different from Mr. Spitzer. Unlike the hard-nosed Mr. Spitzer -- who in his office keeps a picture of Teddy Roosevelt, another New York maverick, who famously crusaded a century ago to break up monopoly businesses like Standard Oil -- Mr. Cuomo said he works best "collaboratively." Mr. Cuomo said his top priorities are to clamp down on Medicaid fraud, the sale and use of illegal guns, and government corruption.

"Just the way Eliot exposed corruption on Wall Street, the attorney general has a responsibility to expose corruption in government," Mr. Cuomo said. He plans to go after big business whenever necessary, but said times have changed since the widespread scandals that erupted after the stock-market bubble burst earlier in the decade. Mr. Spitzer, he said, filled a void left by federal regulators who were slow to respond to questionable business practices.

Mr. Spitzer, who was elected New York's governor on Tuesday, will start his new job in January, as does Mr. Cuomo.

Mr. Cuomo's first test will likely be the case Mr. Spitzer brought against Mr. Grasso. In 2004, Mr. Spitzer sued the former Big Board chief over his $187.5 million compensation package, alleging it was excessive under the state's not-for-profit laws. (The NYSE is now part of a public, for-profit entity, NYSE Group Inc.) Mr. Grasso denies the charges and the lawsuit has turned into a major battle in state court.

Several appeals are still pending, but the judge in the case ruled that Mr. Grasso should give back as much as $100 million in compensation.

The case is expected to go to trial during the first half of 2007, and thus will be prosecuted by Mr. Cuomo's office. Mr. Cuomo brings fresh perspective to the case, which has been bitterly fought on both sides. Depending on how the appeals play out, some speculate that Mr. Cuomo could broker a settlement that avoids a trial. However, any perception that he is giving in could be politically problematic, given that the public now has high expectations for what once was considered a second-tier office.

Mr. Cuomo said he is reviewing the Grasso case and declined to comment on his position.

Despite Mr. Cuomo's shift in priorities for the office, he is expected to maintain a high profile. Politically ambitious, he, too, will likely try to use the position as a launching pad to higher office. "I would be very surprised if the basic playbook were thrown out the window, especially since it was so effective," said Thomas Curran, a former Manhattan assistant district attorney who is now a partner at Ganfer & Shore LLP.

Politics are in Mr. Cuomo's DNA. His father, Mario, was New York's governor from 1983 to 1995. Mr. Cuomo was married to Robert Kennedy's daughter, Kerry, before getting divorced in 2003.

A graduate of Albany Law School, Mr. Cuomo worked in his father's administration before a brief stint as a Manhattan assistant district attorney. He later started a nonprofit that built housing for the homeless. After serving as housing secretary in the Clinton administration, he ran unsuccessfully for New York governor in 2002.

Some observers expect Mr. Cuomo could eventually run for the U.S. Senate if Hillary Clinton (who was re-elected Tuesday) decides to run for president. Wendy Katz, a spokeswoman for Mr. Cuomo, said: "Andrew has said he is 100% focused on serving New Yorkers as their next attorney general, and those are his plans."

In addition to fighting Medicaid fraud and government corruption, Mr. Cuomo says he plans to pursue civil-rights cases and push the federal government to do more to strengthen environmental regulations.

He plans to focus on more-traditional consumer issues, the mainstay of the office, which traces its roots back to Dutch colonial days in the 1600s. Several early New York attorneys general parlayed the job to national office, including Aaron Burr, who held the office in the late 1700s before eventually becoming Thomas Jefferson's vice president (and, of course, killing Alexander Hamilton in a duel).

DOJ_NMG_0093527

Mr. Spitzer did his share of consumer cases. But he made his name prosecuting big, national corporations in part by using obscure state laws such as the 1921 Martin Act, which let him subpoena documents and force executives to testify -- powers that most state attorneys general don't have.

"Eliot is a very tough act to follow," said John Moscow, a former Manhattan assistant district attorney, who is now a partner at the law firm Rosner, Moscow & Napierala.

Investigating conflicts of interest on Wall Street was Mr. Spitzer's first big splash. In 2002, he exposed how analysts at major Wall Street firms hyped stocks backed by their firms' investment-banking division. Eventually, 10 top Wall Street firms, without admitting or denying guilt, paid a combined $1.4 billion to settle investigations into conflicts of interest between their investment-banking and analyst-research divisions.

Mr. Spitzer took on the mutual-fund industry, investigating a practice known as "market timing" or "late trading" in which fund companies cut special deals with major investors, allowing them to buy fund shares after the market closed, a practice that raised expenses and lowered returns for other shareholders. Since 2003, 18 firms have reached settlements totaling more than $4 billion in fines, penalties and fee cuts for investors.

Mr. Spitzer then went after major insurance brokers, suing Marsh & McLennan Cos. for alleged bid rigging of contracts. The firm paid $850 million in restitution to its policy holders and Chief Executive Jeffrey Greenberg was forced out of his job. American International Group Inc. agreed to pay $1.6 billion in February to settle improper accounting and bid-rigging charges, which forced the resignation of Mr. Greenberg's father, CEO Maurice "Hank" Greenberg.

Mr. Cuomo shrugged off comparisons between himself and Mr. Spitzer. "You do the best you can to meet the needs of the job at the time," he said.

Write to Paul Davies at paul.davies@wsj.com1

Korean Prosecutors Hit Snags In Inquiry Of Lone Star Deal (WSJ)

By Laura Santini

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

South Korean prosecutors are hitting some stumbling blocks in their investigation of Dallas private-equity firm Lone Star Funds and its 2003 acquisition of Korea Exchange Bank, even as a recent assessment by Korean tax authorities almost wiped out the bank's earnings for the latest quarter.

Tuesday, the Seoul Central District Court rejected prosecutors' second request for arrest warrants for Lone Star Vice Chairman Ellis Short, General Counsel Michael Thomson and country head Paul Yoo, citing lack of evidence regarding warrant petitions for the first two men. Regarding Mr. Yoo, who resides in Korea, the court said he didn't pose a flight risk and wasn't likely to destroy evidence gathered by prosecutors.

Then, Thursday, in an apparent sign of frustration, prosecutors emailed a seven-page document to about 3,000 prominent Koreans, including lawyers, academics and journalists, criticizing the court's rebuff as hampering the investigation.

"We are concerned about the court's decision," a spokesman for the prosecutor's office said. Prosecutors say they are preparing a third petition.

Also Thursday, the prosecutors issued a summons to Messrs. Short and Thomson demanding they appear in Seoul Monday. A lawyer for Lone Star described the summons and the mass email as attempts to justify the third application to the court.

It is unlikely that Messrs. Short and Thomson will travel to Korea on short notice, the lawyer said, adding that Mr. Thomson has met with prosecutors in Seoul several times and as recently as last month.

The Supreme Prosecutor's Office is investigating a number of alleged improprieties concerning the firm's acquisition of Korea Exchange Bank. Lone Star has said the firm and its executives are innocent of the charges. The probe began early this year.

Friday, KEB reported that its third-quarter net profit had dropped 90% from a year earlier, to 51.8 billion won ($55.3 million), because of a provision of 247 billion won made to cover back taxes the government says KEB owes. Revenue declined 7.3% to 1.63 trillion won.

Last month Korea's National Tax Service completed a seven-month audit of KEB for fiscal years 2001 through 2004, assessing back taxes of 311 billion won. At issue are loan-loss provisions that KEB carried forward when it merged the credit-card unit in 2004, lowering its tax bill.

The bank defended its accounting method, saying that it will appeal the tax agency's assessment. "We strongly disagree with the most significant elements of the preliminary assessment and have formally filed for a review and appeal," it said. The National Tax Service declined to comment.

--Lina Yoon and Jeongjin Lim contributed to this article.

DOJ_NMG_0093528

CRIMINAL LAW:

Supreme Court Will Consider Jud (SLPD)

By Adam Sichko, POST-DISPATCH WASHINGTON BUREAU

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — Mario Claiborne faced a likely prison sentence of 37 to 46 months as he stood before a U.S. District Court judge in March 2005.

That was the recommended range for a prison term under federal sentencing guidelines. But Judge Carol E. Jackson chose to knock nearly two years off the prison term for the 21-year-old St. Louisan, who had pleaded guilty to two cocaine-related offenses.

Claiborne's case now sits before the Supreme Court, which will answer a central question: How does a judge adequately justify a sentence that's well outside the prison term recommended by federal guidelines?

The court agreed last week to hear Claiborne's case, along with a similar case from North Carolina. That case raises the question of how much weight should be given to the advisory guidelines and whether a sentence within the suggested range can automatically be presumed "reasonable."

Lower courts have divided over those issues since the court decided last year to make the guidelines advisory, not mandatory. While district courts were no longer bound by those guidelines, they were still required to take them into account.

In the 2005 opinion, issued before Claiborne was sentenced, the 5-4 Supreme Court majority said it hoped the changes would help "avoid excessive sentencing disparities" while maintaining a level of flexibility. But two justices in that majority, swing vote Sandra Day O'Connor and then-Chief Justice William Rehnquist, are no longer on the court.

Now, the court will re-examine that decision for the first time and seek to clarify whether a presumption of "reasonableness" given to sentencing guidelines actually implies that they're more "mandatory" than "advisory."

Claiborne had no criminal record before he was arrested twice in 2003, both times for cocaine-related activity. In May, he sold 0.23 grams of cocaine base to an undercover police officer in St. Louis, according to court documents. Almost six months later, he dropped a bag of 5.03 grams of cocaine base as he tried to run from St. Louis police.

The judge concluded that even the minimum recommended sentence of 37 months was "excessive." She cited Claiborne's lack of a prior criminal record, the "small quantity" of cocaine he had possessed and the court's finding that he'd be unlikely to commit similar crimes in the future.

"I don't want to minimize what you did — you committed two serious felony offenses," the judge told Claiborne, according to court transcripts. Just after that, the judge said: "I come to the conclusion that a 37-month sentence would be tantamount to throwing you away."

The Justice Department appealed. Government attorneys disputed the lower court's conclusion that Claiborne was unlikely to repeat a similar offense again, calling it nothing more than "a speculative hope." They noted that Claiborne had been arrested for another felony less than half a year after his first arrest for a similar offense.

"It strains credulity to suggest that there are many drug dealers who deal in such quantities first-time offenders or not who receive sentences as low as 15 months' imprisonment," government attorneys wrote.

In February 2006, the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in St. Louis agreed that the proposed 15-month prison term was far too short and reflected "substantial leniency."

"The sixty percent reduction granted to Claiborne was an extraordinary variance that is not supported by comparably extraordinary circumstances," the appeals court wrote.

The Supreme Court will likely hear the case in spring 2007.

Agent's Article Puts Case At Risk (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

BURLINGTON, Vt. (AP) -- The man accused of killing a University of Vermont student from Arlington, Va., is asking a judge to dismiss the charges because an FBI agent wrote a newspaper opinion piece about the case that referred to the suspect as "evil," a "sexual predator" and a "two-legged hyena."

In the opinion piece, which appeared Wednesday in the weekly newspaper Seven Days, the agent wrote anonymously and described his personal reaction during the search for the man accused of killing 21-year-old Michelle Gardner-Quinn.

David Sleigh, the attorney for suspect Brian Rooney, filed a motion Wednesday after the article appeared. He said the article made it impossible for Mr. Rooney to get a fair trial.

DOJ_NMG_0093529

"Agents of the state have deliberately disseminated highly inflammatory and prejudicial comments to the press," Mr. Sleigh said in a three-page motion.

Mr. Rooney has pleaded not guilty to a charge of aggravated murder for the Oct. 7 abduction, assault and killing of Miss Gardner-Quinn after the two met by chance in downtown Burlington.

If convicted, Mr. Rooney, 36, of Richmond, Vt., could be sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole.

"I view this release as an unauthorized release," said Burlington Police Chief Thomas Tremblay.

The story was bylined "An Anonymous Cop," but FBI spokesman Paul Holstein said the author was an FBI agent.

"We're not happy with it, and we'll take steps to ensure it doesn't happen again," Mr. Holstein said. "We take it very seriously when we have an unauthorized media contact, and it also is an issue because we have a policy that we do not discuss ongoing investigations or prosecutions."

The article describes the agent's response to the search for Miss Gardner-Quinn and then the efforts to find her killer. Mr. Rooney is not named in the article, but it's clear he is the subject.

Mr. Sleigh contends the article, as well as an appearance of a Burlington police officer on a national cable news program, made it impossible for Mr. Rooney to receive a fair trial.

Seven Days co-publisher and editor Pamela Polston said the paper granted the author's request for anonymity after verifying his identity. She defended the paper's decision to publish the piece.

"We stand behind the freedom of expression of every citizen, including that of law-enforcement officers, and, like all newspapers, offer a forum to our readers for that expression," she said.

Mistrial Called In Online Ad Fraud Case (WP)

By Carrie Johnson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

A federal judge declared a mistrial in the fraud case against former PurchasePro Inc. chief executive Charles E. Johnson Jr. after his attorney successfully petitioned to withdraw nearly three weeks into the case, according to court records.

The prosecution of Johnson, an entrepreneur who came under government scrutiny for engaging in questionable last-minute advertising deals with America Online Inc. during the Internet boom, will be separated from the case against three other defendants in the Alexandria trial. Johnson will be tried separately, U.S. District Judge Walter D. Kelley Jr. ruled Thursday.

The exact reasons for the mistrial remained under court seal, although two sources who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the judge's order said they pertained to allegations of misconduct by Johnson, 45, a tough-talking former college basketball player. Johnson, who is known by his nickname "Junior," did not return calls to his cellphone yesterday.

In opening statements to the jury last month, Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles F. Connolly accused Johnson of directing subordinates to destroy e-mail messages, computers and other evidence and suggested that Johnson, whose father was a policeman and former security company operator, had threatened employees who failed to bend to his will.

Johnson denied the charges against him and argued that he put his wealth and his health on the line in an ill-fated attempt to save PurchasePro, his Las Vegas software company.

Johnson's former lawyer, onetime Washington federal prosecutor Preston Burton, yesterday declined to comment, citing ethical strictures. Burton, of the law firm Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe LLP, appeared in court Thursday morning for sealed proceedings related to the mistrial, according to the court docket.

Mark W. Foster, a legal ethics expert at Zuckerman Spaeder LLP in the District, said allowing a defense lawyer to quit midstream is rare, particularly in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, known as the "rocket docket" for its speed and judicial efficiency.

Under Virginia ethics rules, however, defense lawyers are required to come forward if they become aware that their clients intend to break the law or if they possess information that clients have "perpetrated a fraud" on the court by tampering with evidence or other maneuvers.

It remains to be seen what impact the absence of Johnson, who took an active role in his defense, will have on the case. Johnson's actions in the first few months of 2001, as his company struggled to meet analyst targets and as he faced a personal financial crunch, were a centerpiece of the prosecution.

The unusual move left three defendants, former AOL employees Kent D. Wakeford and John P. Tuli and former PurchasePro executive Christopher J. Benyo. The fraud and conspiracy case against them will resume Thursday, when the judge is expected to inform jurors about the mistrial.

Prosecutors contend that PurchasePro and AOL employees worked in tandem to mislead auditors about the nature of a series of ad deals in early 2001. The agreements helped both companies meet revenue expectations at a time when the technology sector had begun to crater.

DOJ_NMG_0093530

Anti-Foley Blogger Speaks Out (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 10, 2006

The man who first posted the now-resigned congressman's e-mails says he was angry about a culture of corruption.

WASHINGTON — Lane Hudson had no idea he would bring down a congressman when he sat in his living room and turned on his laptop one Sunday morning nearly seven weeks ago.

The former congressional aide, who is gay, had been railing for weeks on his anonymous blog against congressmen who sexually preyed on young people. That day in late September, he decided to post a series of suggestive e-mail exchanges between Rep. Mark Foley and a male former congressional page.

"I thought, 'Here we go. Let's see what happens,' " Hudson, 29, said in a recent interview.

Within days, he had his answer.

Foley, a six-term Florida Republican, resigned in disgrace. And Hudson had launched the biggest Washington sex scandal since Monica S. Lewinsky.

Hudson remained anonymous throughout the fall as the scandal raged and GOP leaders complained of a Democratic conspiracy. Then two weeks ago, he was unmasked by bloggers, who identified him as an organizer for a national gay rights group; Hudson was fired.

'No one did anything'

On the terrace of a hotel in Miami Beach, where he went to escape the political storm, Hudson for the first time talked publicly about his role in the Internet-fueled scandal.

Occasionally defensive and slightly ill at ease, the ambitious South Carolina Democrat fiercely denied a preelection plot. Rather, he said, he was driven by genuine anger at a corrupt environment that protected the powerful on Capitol Hill.

"It's the Washington culture that allowed this to happen," he said. "Now we know the FBI, a host of media organizations, Republican leadership — all were in possession of this same information. And no one did anything about it."

Hudson, who will not say where he got the e-mails, shared them with the Los Angeles Times in July. He posted them anonymously in September, he said, frustrated that the paper was still conducting research and had not published an article.

Hudson's rise to political muckraker and minor Web celebrity did not happen overnight. He has been working phones and knocking on doors for Democratic candidates since his mother took him to volunteer for a relative of his second-grade teacher who was running for the South Carolina Legislature.

"My mother said, Republicans take care of the rich and Democrats take care of everyone else. And we were everyone else," said Hudson, who grew up in the state's cotton country.

Hudson volunteered for candidates through high school and college, including the head of his alma mater. "He was a whirling dervish," recalled Alex Sanders, former president of the College of Charleston, who ran unsuccessfully for the U.S. Senate four years ago.

Hudson moved north in 2001 to join the D.C. staff of Sen. Ernest F. Hollings, South Carolina's last Democratic senator, but he couldn't get to the center of the action in Washington and didn't stay long.

Hudson tried jobs raising money for an Episcopal school in Washington and worked at a bank in Charleston, S.C. In 2004, he went to Wisconsin to work for the unsuccessful presidential campaign of Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.).

"He wants to be involved…. And he really believes in the campaigns he works in," said Liz Patterson, a former South Carolina congresswoman for whom Hudson volunteered in high school. "But the campaigns he has worked on, we haven't won…. I think he's still trying to find his place."

This summer, Hudson moved back to Washington.

Then he acquired the e-mails.

Hudson will say only that the e-mails "weren't hard to come by." Since the scandal broke, it has become clear that numerous media outlets, Republican House leaders, a government reform group and the FBI had them.

Those e-mails — all to a former page from Louisiana — were not sexually explicit. But in one, the congressman asked the boy for a photo and, in another, commented that a different former page was "in really great shape."

Memories triggered

Hudson said he knew immediately that something wasn't right.

Eleven years earlier, as an 18-year-old congressional intern, Hudson had been approached by Foley at a Capitol Hill bar, Hudson said. The congressman asked Hudson for his e-mail address and started sending him invitations to drinks and meals.

"Honestly, I had forgotten about the whole incident," Hudson said. But this summer, a former page mentioned in a casual conversation that Foley "hit on him all the time."

DOJ_NMG_0093531

"It kind of clicked in my head," Hudson said. "I asked another friend who had been a page. I heard the same kind of story, and realized that this guy is just a real creep."

Hudson contacted The Times and, without disclosing his plan to the paper, started an anonymous blog he titled Stop Sex Predators.

"This blog is dedicated to exposing sex predators before they can get to our kids," Hudson announced in his first posting, July 28.

Breathless posts would follow, recapping congressional sex scandals dating to the 1970s and decrying sexual liaisons between interns and older Washington officials.

"The blog was my backup," Hudson said recently. "The blogosphere isn't subject to the same rules as the Washington culture, as the mainstream media."

Just after 11 a.m. Sunday, Sept. 24, Hudson put up the Foley e-mails.

"This is absolutely amazing … ," he wrote that morning. "There must be even more out there. E-mail me … and let me know what we should do!!!!"

By that Wednesday, Wonkette, a popular Washington gossip site, had linked to Hudson's blog. On Thursday, ABC News posted an article on its website.

And Friday, after the network confronted Foley with a series of sexually explicit instant messages between the lawmaker and a different former page, Foley resigned.

"Wow!" Hudson titled a posting that night. In it, he said: "This is a good start…. Maybe we can keep stopping them!!!!!"

Scary response

But the sense of triumph faded as Hudson was deluged with e-mails from journalists and others trying to find out who he was and what he knew.

"Thank you for your interest," he said in a posting a few days after Foley's resignation, "but if you were doing your job to begin with, Mark Foley would have been exposed a long time ago…. I'm nobody that anybody should care about. So, please, go about your day as if I don't exist."

Hudson said he got warnings that he should watch his back. "I kind of got scared," he said.

He scaled back his Internet postings.

And then someone found him out.

Tracking Hudson's Internet profile, a blogger traced him to Human Rights Campaign, a leading national gay political organization.

On Oct. 25, the group fired him. Vice President of Programs David M. Smith praised Hudson's work but said he had violated policy by using a Human Rights Campaign computer to work on his blog.

Hudson flew to New York and then to Miami.

"You know, I had no interest in being public about this," he said last weekend in Miami Beach.

"This was about exposing someone who was a sexual predator. And that's it.

"It's like it's accepted to come to D.C. and have high ideals and believe in something and then have it go away," he continued. "This whole Washington culture allows that to happen. It's not only accepted, it's expected that people become callous and lose their ideals and their focus. And that makes me mad."

Hudson said he was apprehensive about what would happen next.

But he has few regrets. "I did the right thing," he said.

And by election night, he was back in Washington to celebrate the Democratic victories.

noam.levey@latimes.com

4 Plead Guilty In Wave Of Eco-sabotage (OREG)

By Bryan Denson, The Oregonian

The Oregonian, November 11, 2006

Federal court - An Ashland man admits to conspiracy and arson as part of a radical environmental movement

EUGENE -- For 20 years he denied involvement in eco-sabotage while supporting those who took part. He extolled the virtues of firebombs while serving as a volunteer firefighter. But on Thursday, Jonathan Paul stood before a federal judge and declared himself guilty of arson and conspiracy.

The Ashland resident, 40, a leading voice in the nation's radical movement to protect whales, wild horses and wilderness areas, was one of four people to plead guilty to conspiracy for their roles in a five-year campaign of sabotage in Oregon, Washington, California, Wyoming and Colorado.

DOJ_NMG_0093532

The four were snagged by the largest investigation of eco-sabotage in U.S. history, an 18-crime inquiry into arsons and vandalism the government dubbed "Operation Backfire." Federal prosecutors have charged 13 men and women in Oregon with crimes, most committed on behalf of the Animal Liberation Front and Earth Liberation Front. The two organizations are characterized by the FBI as the nation's leading domestic terrorist threats.

Thursday's pleas by Paul, Daniel G. McGowan of New York and Nathan F. Block and Joyanna L. Zacher, both of Olympia, brought the number of convictions in Oregon to 10, with two others convicted outside Oregon for related crimes. Four others remain fugitives.

At a press conference in Portland, U.S. Attorney Karin Immergut and Robert Jordan, the FBI's special agent in charge for Oregon, declared victory.

"These people claimed they did what they did to protect the environment," Jordan said. "Along the way, they destroyed more than $30 million worth of resources. They spent year after year using violence to try to intimidate you and your government into their twisted way of thinking."

The four defendants in Thursday's hearing pleaded guilty in an agreement with prosecutors, who recommended shorter prison sentences than they were facing. McGowan, Block and Zacher faced 20 years to life and Paul faced as long as 30 years, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Peifer.

McGowan, 32, sobbing before U.S. District Judge Ann Aiken as he pleaded guilty to arson, said his actions were not the work of a terrorist, but an idealistic young man who cared deeply about saving forests. Block and Zacher pleaded guilty to multiple counts of arson.

The government recommended a sentence of eight years for McGowan, Block and Zacher, and five years for Paul. They are likely to be sentenced early next spring, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Kirk A. Engdall in Eugene.

Defense lawyers had filed court papers seeking to determine whether the government had used warrantless wiretaps to collect evidence against their clients. But they dropped their request and said that helped them strike their plea deals, a claim dismissed by the government.

"There's absolutely no basis for the claim that the NSA (National Security Agency) was involved in this case in any way," said Peifer.

The Jonathan Christopher Mark Paul who sat in court Thursday looked like a milder, middle-aged version of the brash young man who spoke up for the ALF and ELF in an interview with The Oregonian in late spring of 1999.

He was a seasoned activist then, comfortable answering questions on his lawn near Williams in Southern Oregon. Authorities had charged him with a 1986 Animal Liberation Front raid on a University of Oregon lab, a charge dismissed.

Paul lived in a redwood rental home in Northern California, where he broke bread with some of the stars of the radical environmental movement. He was an animal-rights activist who helped unify the so-called bunny huggers and tree huggers. They became fundamentalists in a belief that humans had no business plundering living things for profit.

Paul morphed into a public voice against logging and whaling, denying in his 1999 interviews with The Oregonian that he had taken part in underground eco-sabotage.

Six years passed before the feds closed in. They indicted Paul and a dozen others for their roles in the Operation Backfire crimes.

The indictment accused Paul and others of performing surveillance on Redmond's Cavel West slaughterhouse in 1997, preparing incendiaries, checking their two-way radios and then planting their firebombs for the conflagration that followed.

The Animal Liberation Front later claimed responsibility for burning down the "Cavel West Horse Murdering Plant," claiming success because the company did not reopen.

In his interview nearly two years later with The Oregonian, Paul mentioned the Cavel West arson as a good example of economic sabotage. "Complete success," he said.

On Thursday, after his court appearance, Paul stood atop the steps of Eugene's new federal courthouse with co-defendant McGowan and a gang of friends and supporters. The men let others speak for them.

One of those was Paul's actress sister, former "Baywatch" TV star Alexandra Paul. She described her brother as a man who infiltrated and exposed the mink industry, liberated suffering lab animals, and who got between whales and the men who hunted them.

Aimee Green of The Oregonian staff contributed to this report. Bryan Denson: 503-294-7614; bryandenson@news.oregonian.com.

4 More Plead Guilty In Ecosabotage Cases; Trial May Be Avoided (SEATIMES)

By Hal Bernton, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, November 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093533

PORTLAND — Four more people Thursday pleaded guilty to arson crimes on behalf of the Earth Liberation Front and Animal Liberation Front, raising the possibility that the Justice Department's largest-ever prosecution of ecosabotage will wrap up without a trial.

Since the first arrests in December, the federal government in Washington and Oregon has obtained 12 guilty pleas from men and women who participated in more than 20 arsons and other acts of sabotage in six states. Four other alleged participants have fled the country, including former Microsoft computer-programmer Joseph Dibee, whom federal officials believe has taken refuge in Syria.

Only one defendant still is preparing for a trial. She is Briana Waters, a California violin teacher accused of acting as a lookout in the 2001 arson that destroyed the University of Washington Urban Horticulture Center.

The most recent pleas unfolded Thursday in U.S. District Court in Eugene. They prompted Robert Jordan, FBI special agent in charge for Oregon, to declare victory in a decadelong effort to track down and prosecute the stealthy arsonists of the ELF and ALF.

Calling themselves "the family," cell members fabricated bombs in clean rooms without leaving behind telltale evidence and used hand signals and code words to maintain secrecy. Between 1996 and 2001, various members of the group launched attacks against federal, university and private property that caused some $30 million worth of damage.

"Instead of using reason and logic, they used fire bombs and destruction. Instead of using peaceful, lawful methods they used fears and threats," Jordan said in Portland.

The guilty pleas reflect the strength of the government's evidence, which was bolstered by extensive informants' testimony. The pleas also reflect the harsh consequences should defendants risk a trial and end up being convicted.

Under mandatory minimum sentences approved by Congress, judges would have been required to send most of the defendants to prison for at least 30 years, and some risked life imprisonment for use of firebombs.

Two of the defendants who pleaded guilty in Eugene court are Washington residents. Joyanna L. Zarcher, 28, and Nathan F. Block, 25, who lived together in Olympia before their arrests earlier this year. The government recommended that each serve eight years in prison.

Jonathan Paul, a high-profile Northwest environmental activist who joined in the 1999 protests against the Makah whaling hunt, also entered a guilty plea Thursday.

Paul joined in the July 21, 1997, arson at the Cavel West Horse Meatpacking Plant in Redmond, Ore. The government recommended that he serve five years in prison.

In a statement Thursday, Paul said that his crime was in response to the slaughter of wild horses — "the personification of the American spirit." As Paul viewed the flames, he realized that "fire was an unacceptable means to an end, no matter how compelling," according to the statement.

Paul now lives in southern Oregon, where he has been a volunteer firefighter.

Daniel McGowan, another defendant, spoke of his crimes as he entered his plea.

"I hope you will see that my actions were not those of a terrorist, but of a concerned young person who was deeply troubled by the destruction of Oregon's beautiful old-growth forests and the dangers of genetically modified trees," McGowan, 32, of New York City, said in a tearful statement in court. "... I realized that burning things down did not fit with my visions or belief about how to create a better world. So I stopped committing these crimes."

McGowan's recommended sentence is eight years.

A sentencing date for the defendants has not been set.

The four plea agreements entered Thursday differed in one substantial way from earlier plea agreements: These defendants acknowledged their crimes. But unlike defendants involved in earlier plea agreements, they did not pledge to provide information to assist in prosecuting other individuals, according to Amanda Lee, a Seattle attorney representing McGowan.

These agreements were reached about two months after defendants, in court motions, demanded to know whether warrantless wiretaps by the National Security Agency were used against them.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Kirk Engdall said surveillance was not a factor. Defense attorney Amanda Lee of Seattle said the timing of the plea agreement led her to believe it was.

Engdall and other state, federal and Eugene city officials say that persistence and interagency cooperation were key to cracking the case. They also enlisted the aid of an early informant, Jake Ferguson, who secretly tape-recorded conversations with others.

Though Ferguson has acknowledged participation in arsons, he has not been charged. On Thursday, U.S. Attorney Karin Immergut said, "We are still considering what charges to bring, and what to do with him."

Material from The Associated Press is included in this report.

DOJ_NMG_0093534

Four More Guilty In String Of Arsons (ERG)

By Bill Bishop And David Steves, The Register-Guard

Eugene Register-Guard, November 10, 2006

The final four defendants awaiting trial for conspiring in arsons and sabotage by radical environmental groups took plea deals Thursday in federal court in Eugene, bringing a declaration of victory among law enforcement agencies that worked a decade to dismantle the secretive cell.

In public statements, two of the defendants expressed their regret for crimes they now consider misguided deeds done out of deep devotion to environmental causes.

The four are among 13 defendants in "Operation Backfire," the name investigators gave to their effort to solve a score of arsons over five years in six states that did an estimated $30 million in damage. Most of the arsons were claimed by the shadowy Environmental Liberation Front and Animal Liberation Front.

With Thursday's court action, all defendants have pleaded guilty except three who remain fugitives and are believed to be out of the country.

Under the plea deals, three of the defendants - Daniel Gerard McGowan, 32; Nathan Fraser Block, 25; and Joyanna Zacher, 28 - may get eight-year prison terms. The fourth, Jonathan Christopher Mark Paul, 40, may get a five-year term. All are free to argue for shorter terms at their sentencing hearings, which have not yet been scheduled.

advertisement

Six co-defendants earlier took plea deals that will bring sentences ranging from just over three years to just under 16 years. They also agreed to cooperate in the investigation.

McGowan admitted taking part in 2001 fires at the Superior Lumber Co. in Glendale and at Jefferson Poplar Farm in Clatskanie. Block and Zacher admitted their roles in 2001 in burning 35 vehicles at the former Joe Romania Chevrolet Truck Center in Eugene and in the fire at Jefferson Poplar Farm.

Paul admitted helping to destroy the Cavel West Horse Meatpacking plant in Redmond in 1997.

Thursday's plea deals, unlike the six earlier ones, do not require the defendants to testify against each other or against other co-conspirators - a condition the four defendants demanded in a joint settlement offer made to the government.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Kirk Engdall said the government accepted the no-testimony proposal in order to settle the case. But the defendants' demand carried a price. The government is recommending the four get proportionately longer sentences than the six co-defendants who agreed to cooperate fully, he said.

While the case is all but over, more arrests are possible, Engdall said.

"We believe we have basically disassembled the Northwest cell of ELF/ALF arsonists," Engdall said. "There may be other arrests."

Within moments of the guilty pleas in Eugene, U.S. Attorney Karin Immergut led seven other local, state and federal law-enforcement officials into a press conference in Portland's federal courthouse.

Immergut praised the hard work and cooperation of the FBI; Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; Eugene Police; Lane County sheriff's office; Bureau of Land Management; U.S. Forest Service; Oregon State Police and the state Department of Justice.

"They were relentless, persistent, thorough and dogged," she said. "They got the job done."

Immergut called the four guilty pleas the conclusion of "the largest case of domestic terrorism in United States history," later amending that to say it was the largest case of eco-terrorism.

Environmental activists have criticized the use of the "terrorism" label against perpetrators of property crimes, saying the label unfairly taints the legal efforts of legitimate activist groups and government dissidents. U.S. District Judge Ann Aiken will decide whether to apply harsher sentences under the federal terrorism statute when the defendants are sentenced.

Robert Jordan, the FBI's special agent in charge in Oregon, said the conspirators deserve the punishment awaiting them.

Government Claims Victory Over Ecoterrorism Outfit (AP)

By Jeff Barnard

AP, November 11, 2006

EUGENE, Ore. -- Five years ago a special ecoterrorism task force was stymied by a string of firebombings that caused some $30 million in damage to western ranger stations, genetic engineering facilities, a truck dealership, a ski resort, wild horse corrals and lumber mills.

On Thursday, federal authorities declared they had destroyed the shadowy Earth Liberation Front and Animal Liberation Front, which claimed responsibility for the largest case of ecoterrorism in U.S. history.

Four more people pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to conspiracy and arson charges stemming from firebombings in Oregon.

That brought to 12 -- 10 in Oregon and two in Washington -- the number of people headed for prison as part of the local, state and federal investigation known as Operation Backfire that was aided by an informant with a wire.

Three suspects remain fugitives. Prescott, Ariz., bookstore owner William C. Rodgers, described as the leader of the Eugene-based cell known as The Family, committed suicide in jail.

"The pleas of these individuals today together with (earlier guilty pleas) have effectively dismantled the Northwest cells of the organizations operating loosely under the mantles of ALF and ELF," U.S. Attorney Karin Immergut said in Portland.

"Today we can declare victory in that fight," added Robert Jordan, FBI special agent in charge for Oregon.

The firebombings attributed to The Family stopped after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and two of the four pleading guilty Thursday said they quit the attacks because they realized that was the wrong way to protect animals and the environment.

"I hope you will see that my actions were not those of a terrorist, but of a concerned young person who was deeply troubled by the destruction of Oregon's beautiful old-growth forests and the dangers of genetically modified trees," Daniel G. McGowan, 32, of New York City said in a tearful statement read in court. "After taking part in these two actions, I realized that burning things down did not fit with my visions or belief about how to create a better world. So I stopped committing these crimes."

After years of finding little more than melted five-gallon buckets and the residue of diesel fuel, investigators got a break in 2002 when one of the people involved in firebombing a logging company and a gravel pit in 2001 told his girlfriend, and she told her father, a state fire marshal.

Three people were convicted, and the alleged leader of that group, Michael "Tre Arrow" Scarpitti, is being held in Victoria, British Columbia, on a shoplifting charge, fighting extradition.

In 2005, the task force known as Operation Backfire adopted a cold case approach and landed an informant, unindicted co-conspirator Jacob Fergusen of Eugene, who wore a hidden recording device as he traveled the country talking with his old friends, who had disbanded.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven Peifer said in Portland that the cell was tough to crack, because the members assembled their bombs in clean rooms, leaving behind no fingerprints or even DNA evidence, seldom talked to each other, and used code words and even hand signals.

The four in court Thursday were Joyanna L. Zarcher, 28, and Nathan F. Block, 25, both of Olympia, Wash.; Jonathan Christopher Mark Paul, 40, of Ashland, and McGowan.

They were headed for trial on charges carrying life sentences when the plea agreement was announced, two months after they demanded to know whether warrantless wiretaps by the National Security Agency were used against them. Their guilty pleas came with recommended sentences of five to eight years in prison.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Kirk Engdall denied NSA surveillance was a factor in the investigation or the plea agreement, but defense attorney Amanda Lee of Seattle said the timing of the plea agreement led her to believe it was.

She said the defendants were happy they would not have to testify against others.

Sentencing is not expected until spring, but prosecutors recommended eight years in prison for Block, Zacher and McGowan, the son of a New York transit policeman who was working for a nonprofit law firm helping abused women when he was arrested in New York.

Because he had taken part in only one firebombing, Paul's recommended sentence was five years.

McGowan pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit arson and topple a high-voltage electric tower in Central Oregon in December 1999, serving as lookout for the 2001 firebombing of the Superior Lumber Co. office in Glendale, and attempted arson and arson at the Jefferson Poplar Farm in Clatskanie in 2001.

Block and Zacher both pleaded guilty to the conspiracy charge, setting fire to SUVs at the Romania Chevrolet Truck Center in Eugene in 2001 and attempted arson and arson at the tree farm. Prosecutors recommended a sentence of eight years for each.

Paul, an independently wealthy animal rights activist and volunteer firefighter, pleaded guilty to conspiracy and the 1997 firebombing of the Cavel West horse slaughterhouse in Redmond.

His sister, actress Alexandra Paul, read a statement outside the courthouse saying Paul had fought against mink farms, laboratory testing of animals, and Indian whale hunting, and he had always taken responsibility for his actions.

"When Mr. Paul saw the flames engulf the Cavel West slaughterhouse in Redmond, Ore., he realized that fire was an unacceptable means to an end, no matter how compelling," she said.

Paul Pleads Guilty To Eco-arson (MEDMT)

DOJ_NMG_0093536

Medford Mail Tribune, November 11, 2006

Greensprings man calls it 'unacceptable means to an end'; 3 others admit guilt

EUGENE — Greensprings resident Jonathan Paul pleaded guilty Thursday to arson and conspiracy to commit arson in a 1997 firebombing of a horse slaughterhouse in Redmond.

Paul, 40, also repudiated violence as a way to protect the environment or animals during a plea hearing with three other defendants in the new U.S. District Court here. All four had been arrested in the federal government's "Operation Backfire" investigation of Animal Liberation Front and Earth Liberation Front activities beginning in fall 1996 and continuing through fall 2001.

A five-year sentence has been recommended for Paul, whom prosecutors say was a member of the ALF at the time the slaughterhouse was destroyed by fire on July 21, 1997. The plant, which suffered more than $1 million in damage, was not rebuilt.

The arson charge carries a potential maximum sentence of up to 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

After the hearing, Paul's sister, actress Alexandra Paul, read a statement for the family.

"When Mr. Paul saw the flames engulf the Cavel West slaughterhouse in Redmond, he realized that fire was an unacceptable means to an end, no matter how compelling," she said. "He immediately abandoned arson as a valid way of making the mistreatment of animals unprofitable."

She also noted that her brother, a volunteer firefighter, had a legacy of personal responsibility that included working to stop cruelty to animals as well as taking action to protect the environment. She would not take questions.

During a break in the hearing, Jonathan Paul declined to talk to the Mail Tribune. "Talk to my lawyer," he said.

Attorney Marc Blackman of Portland was equally closemouthed after the hearing. "I have no idea how it will turn out," he said of Paul's sentencing, which is expected in the spring.

In addition to Paul, the other three defendants in court Thursday included Daniel McGowan, 32, of New York City, and Nathan Block, 25, and Joyanna Zarcher, 28, both of Olympia, Wash.

An eight-year sentence has been recommended for McGowan, who was working for a nonprofit law firm helping abused women when he was arrested in New York. He pleaded guilty to serving as a lookout for the 2001 firebombing of the Superior Lumber Co. office in Glendale; conspiracy to commit arson and topple a high-voltage electrical tower in Central Oregon in late 1999; and attempted arson and arson at the Jefferson Poplar Farm in Clatskanie in 2001.

McGowan, who made a statement before Judge Ann Aiken, said he regretted the actions that brought him to court but said he remained committed to protecting the environment.

Block and Zarcher both pleaded guilty to a conspiracy charge related to setting fire to SUVs at the Romania Chevrolet Truck Center in Eugene in 2001 and attempted arson and arson at the tree farm that year. Like McGowan, they are facing the recommended sentence of eight years.

"The pleas of these individuals today, together with (earlier guilty pleas) have effectively dismantled the Northwest cells of the organizations operating loosely under the mantles of ALF and ELF," declared U.S. Attorney Karin Immergut during a press conference in Portland, according to The Associated Press.

"Today we can declare victory in that fight," said Robert Jordan, FBI special agent in charge for Oregon.

With Thursday's hearing, a dozen alleged ALF or ELF defendants have now pleaded guilty to conspiracy and arson charges in the investigation, which involved cases in Oregon, Washington, California, Wyoming and Colorado.

In Eugene, the small courtroom was packed with supporters of the four defendants.

"We're here to show moral support for Jonathan," said one, who would not give his name. "He did the wrong thing but his heart is in the right place."

Before the plea bargain agreement was announced this week, all four defendants had been scheduled for trials on charges that could have carried life sentences. Two months ago, their defense attorneys had asked the federal government whether warrantless wiretaps by the National Security Agency had been used against the defendants.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Kirk Engdall denied the NSA surveillance was a factor in the investigation or the plea agreement, according to the AP. However, Amanda Lee, an attorney representing McGowan, said Thursday she believed it was a factor, given the timing of the plea agreements. She noted the four defendants did not testify against each other as part of the plea.

Gun Collector Fails Polygraph Over Second Barrel Purchase (SEATIMES)

The Seattle Times, November 11, 2006

A Bellevue gun collector questioned in the 2001 slaying of Seattle federal prosecutor Thomas Wales has failed an FBI polygraph test about whether he owned two gun barrels that were the same type as the one used in the shooting, his lawyer said Thursday.

Albert Kwan agreed to the polygraph test last month after he was indicted and jailed in a different case for illegal possession of a machine gun.

His lawyer, Joseph Conte, of Washington, D.C., revealed the test result at a Thursday court hearing.

At the hearing, U.S. District Judge Thomas Zilly released Kwan from custody on the condition that Kwan post a $250,000 bond. Zilly also ordered Kwan to wear a location monitor, not possess firearms, and surrender his Hong Kong, British and U.S. passports.

Previously, Kwan refused four times to testify before the grand jury investigating the Wales killing, invoking his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

FBI agents do not believe Kwan shot Wales, but want to know if he provided the gun barrel to someone who did.

Slugs and shell casings from the Wales crime scene show that the weapon was an Eastern European handgun called a Makarov that was fitted with a replacement barrel, the FBI said. Wales was shot to death in his Queen Anne home on Oct. 11, 2001.

FBI agents have pressed Kwan about his apparent purchase of two Makarov replacement barrels.

Kwan's lawyers have said he only recalls buying one barrel, which he turned over to the FBI and which has been ruled out in the crime.

But the FBI has receipts showing Kwan bought two in 1996 from the Minnesota company that makes them, according to a recent affidavit by Special Agent Ron Bone, lead investigator in the Wales case.

The lead suspect in the homicide is a commercial airline pilot formerly of Bellevue who now lives in Snohomish. Wales had prosecuted the pilot for fraud, but charges eventually were dropped.

Before the pilot moved from Bellevue, he lived only several miles from Kwan.

After Thursday's hearing, Conte said federal investigators told him that Kwan had failed the polygraph. Conte said he wants an independent polygraph examiner to review the government's test.

"It's our opinion that if you can't help the government, then they say you're not telling the truth," the lawyer said.

Polygraph evidence is generally not admissible in criminal cases because results are not considered reliable enough. Steven Clymer, the special prosecutor assigned to the Wales investigation, declined to comment.

Agents have tried to trace the roughly 3,500 barrels sold in the U.S. by the Minnesota company before Wales was killed. The FBI said 69 such barrels had been shipped to customers within 50 miles of the Queen Anne homicide scene.

Agents have not been able to locate and test about 30 of those barrels, including the one they are pressing Kwan about.

When Kwan was first contacted by the FBI in August 2003, he evaded agents, ignored a subpoena and provided misleading information about his travel and whereabouts, according to agent Bone's affidavit.

Kwan was arrested as a material witness in January 2005 at Seattle-Tacoma International Airport as he prepared to travel to China, Bone wrote.

The gun collector was held for 23 days during which agents searched his Bellevue home. There they found hundreds of legal firearms, including several machine guns. Federal agents seized an M-14 assault rifle they allege was an unlicensed machine gun.

Kwan was indicted in September on the gun charge. A federal magistrate ordered that Kwan be kept in custody as a flight risk and a potential danger to the community.

Kwan's attorneys asserted that authorities brought the charge to try to pressure Kwan into cooperating with the Wales probe.

Man Once Held In Wales Killing Fails Polygraph (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

SEATTLE (AP) -- A Bellevue gun collector failed an FBI polygraph test about whether he owned two gun barrels like those used to kill federal prosecutor Thomas Wales, his lawyer says.

Albert K. Kwan has been a person of interest in the unsolved 2001 slaying because sales records indicate he purchased the two gun barrels from a Minnesota company back in the mid-1990s. While prosecutors apparently do not believe Kwan shot Wales, they are interested in knowing if he provided a gun barrel to the person who did.

Kwan has only provided one Makarov pistol replacement barrel to investigators, maintaining he doesn't remember ever purchasing a second one. He agreed to take a polygraph test last month after he was indicted on an unrelated charge of illegal machine gun possession.

After a U.S. District Court hearing Thursday, Kwan's lawyer, Joseph Conte, told The Seattle time that according to federal investigators, Kwan failed the polygraph. Conte said he wants an independent polygraph examiner to review the government's test.

"It's our opinion that if you can't help the government, then they say you're not telling the truth," the lawyer said.

At the hearing, Judge Thomas Zilly said he would release Kwan from custody on the machine gun charge as long as he posts a $250,000 bond, wears a location monitor, does not possess firearms, and surrenders his Hong Kong, British and U.S. passports.

Previously, Kwan refused four times to testify before the grand jury investigating the killing of Wales, invoking his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

The only publicly identified suspect in the Wales killing is a commercial airline pilot, formerly of Bellevue and now of Snohomish, whom Wales had prosecuted in a fraud case. When Wales was killed, the pilot lived just a few miles from Kwan. Kwan's lawyers have said they do not believe Kwan and the pilot ever met; the pilot's lawyer insists he's innocent.

Former LAPD Spokesman Indicted On Sex Charges (LAT)

From A Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

Former Los Angeles police spokesman Roderick "Rod" Bernsen was indicted Thursday on two felony counts of "abusive sexual contact" stemming from an alleged incident with two 12-year-old boys in a cruise ship sauna.

Bernsen, 58, also a former Fox 11 news reporter, was arrested Oct. 7 after the boys told the FBI that he had tried to talk with them about sex and then touched one boy's penis with his toe and spanked another's bare buttocks, according to an affidavit.

If convicted, he faces up to two years in prison, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney said.

Bernsen's attorney, Alan Rubin, said his client was innocent. "He is a good guy, a decent guy, and he will defend against these charges," he said.

Suit Links Ovitz To Pellicano Case (LAT)

By Andrew Blankstein And Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 10, 2006

The former Hollywood agent's attorney denies ex-reporter's allegation that he took part in a plan to threaten her.

A former Los Angeles Times reporter has alleged in a civil lawsuit that onetime Hollywood power broker Michael Ovitz participated with indicted private investigator Anthony Pellicano and others to intimidate and threaten her.

The former reporter, Anita M. Busch, originally filed a civil suit in 2004 that identified Pellicano, several of his associates and numerous unnamed defendants as responsible for an alleged campaign of "threats, intimidation, harassment and invasion of privacy for the purpose of deterring … and retaliating against [Busch] for investigating and writing articles about the entertainment business."

An amendment to the civil complaint, which was filed Monday in Los Angeles County Superior Court, states that one of those unnamed defendants — identified earlier as "Doe 4" — is Ovitz, a co-founder of one of Hollywood's best known talent agencies, Creative Artists Agency.

Other than naming Ovitz, Busch's filing details no alleged actions by Ovitz.

The suit says only that he was one of dozens of defendants who were involved in "directing, organizing, commanding, employing and/or hiring individuals to engage in the unlawful and tortious conduct."

Busch and her attorney, Ian Herzog, could not be reached for comment.

In a brief statement, Ovitz's attorney, James Ellis, said: "My client had nothing to do with this. It's unfortunate that Ms. Busch has chosen to involve him in this matter."

Ovitz previously has acknowledged that his outside law firm hired Pellicano to assist in the defense of three lawsuits filed in 2002 against Artist Management Group, a second talent agency established by Ovitz. Pellicano was paid $75,000 for that work.

After helping found Creative Artists Agency, Ovitz became president of Walt Disney Co. under then-Chief Executive Michael Eisner. But the two had a falling out, and the former talent agent was fired after 15 months.

In the late 1990s, Ovitz formed Artists Management Group, which aimed to revolutionize Hollywood by representing talent and producing a broad slate of TV and movie projects while distributing content in innovative ways. Ovitz no longer works as a talent agent.

Federal authorities would not comment on the latest development in the civil lawsuit.

One former assistant U.S. attorney who is not involved in the case said the decision by Busch and her attorney to name Ovitz could indicate that they had recently obtained new information as part of their lawsuit, either from federal prosecutors or other potential witnesses.

"Practically speaking, it means they are prepared to take him on and put the financial resources behind a lawsuit against a person with substantial means to defend himself," said the former federal prosecutor, who declined to be identified because of the continuing probe.

Ellis disagreed. "That's pretty rampant speculation, and I fundamentally disagree with its premise," he said. "I'm certainly unaware that my client's status in this case has changed at all over the past few years."

Ovitz's name first surfaced in connection with the Busch case in February, when attorneys for Busch subpoenaed him to provide a sworn deposition in the civil case.

Busch's suit, which was filed nearly two years before the indictment of Pellicano in February, accused the former private eye and others of tracking down and threatening the reporter over unspecified stories about the entertainment business.

It also accused former Los Angeles police Sgt. Mark Arneson of illegally accessing confidential police databases to give Pellicano confidential background information about her. Arneson also has been indicted and, like Pellicano and five others, is awaiting trial next year.

The indictment states that Arneson, at Pellicano's behest, unlawfully ran Busch's name through confidential law enforcement databases in the spring of 2002, when Busch and former New York Times reporter Bernard Weinraub were reporting and writing stories for the New York Times about Ovitz.

The timing also coincided with a hard-hitting Vanity Fair piece about the Hollywood power broker that mentioned Busch, Weinraub and two Creative Artists Agency executives: Bryan Lourd and Kevin Huvane. They were former Ovitz proteges but had a high-profile split with him that was detailed in the magazine.

The federal indictment against Pellicano names the two reporters and the two CAA executives as victims of illegal background checks by the private eye and other defendants.

According to the indictment, Busch had her records illegally accessed on May 16, 2002, less than a month before she found a fish with a rose in its mouth and a note reading "Stop" on the windshield of her car.

Federal prosecutors have accused Pellicano, Arneson and Rayford Earl Turner, a former employee of SBC and Pacific Bell, of repeatedly violating the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act by establishing a criminal "enterprise" that enhanced Pellicano's business.

The indictment describes Pellicano as the conspiracy's organizer and leader, and charges that the trio used wiretaps, protected computers, bribery, identity theft and obstruction to enhance the Hollywood private eye's reputation and ongoing relationship with "lucrative clients, including entertainment celebrities and executives, attorneys and law firms."

The intent of obtaining the potentially scandalous information, authorities say, was so that Pellicano's clients could scare off a lawsuit or gain the upper hand in litigation.

Nearly a dozen people — among them actors Sylvester Stallone and Keith Carradine — allegedly were the targets of wiretaps conducted by Pellicano and the others between August 2000 and November 2002, the federal indictment alleges.

andrew.blankstein@
latimes.com
greg.krikorian@latimes.com

Microsoft Targets Piracy (FT)

By Joe Leahy In Mumbai

Financial Times, November 11, 2006

Microsoft needs to do more to crack the consumer market in developing countries, with piracy and affordability holding back sales in regions ranging from Asia and eastern Europe to Latin America, its chief executive told the FT.

Steve Ballmer said the group had launched initiatives such as XP StarterEdition, a Windows software package with reduced features, and Flexgo, a pay-as-you-go PC, but these had not yet signficantly penetrated the middle-income markets in countries such as India and China.

"On a per-cent basis, it [emerging markets] is the most rapidly growing part of our business but it's still a relatively small percentage. We have two issues: number one is where are the PCs and number two is piracy rates are also high in so-called emerging markets," Mr Ballmer said in an interview in Mumbai.

Microsoft declined to provide a breakdown of its revenue by region or product. But Mr Ballmer, in Mumbai on a three-day visit to India, said emerging markets globally accounted for roughly 20 per cent of its total business, excluding software sales to hardware vendors, Xbox and other revenue streams such as advertising.

Total revenue in the year ended June was $44.282bn. While this was growing rapidly, the company could do better to reach middle-income consumers in developing countries. The company has sold only about 1m copies of Windows XP Starter since it was first piloted in 2004, most of these through government-sponsored programmes.

DOJ_NMG_0093540

"XP Starter takes us a small way down the road, [but] we've got more to do," Mr Ballmer said. "Not just ourselves - when you think of what it takes to deliver the experience, it takes hardware, it takes software, it takes internet connectivity."

He cast doubt on whether a US$100 laptop being developed by the Massachussetts Institute of Technology for low-income children, which uses a wind-up crank arm to generate power rather than a battery, would be any more successful in penetrating low-end markets. There were already computers on the market in India for US$200 with built-in powerpacks. Connecting to the internet was the most expensive part of owning a PC.

"Even in India, you will pay more than US$100 a year to connect yourself to the internet," Mr Ballmer said.

Microsoft was working on new initiatives to "re-engineer" the computing experience, Mr Ballmer said. He declined to elaborate on most of them but said one proposal was a plan to connect mobile phones that had their own micro-processors to keyboards and screens, using them as a computing platform.

Dion Wiggins, analyst with Gartner in Hong Kong, said Microsoft has tended to concentrate its innovation at the top end of the market, leaving behind the mass, lower end consumers.

But Starter Edition, while it still needed some improvements - for instance, it currently does not allow users to upgrade to full Windows - had made great strides. He said he expected Microsoft to begin pushing it much harder a few months after it launched Vista, its new operating system, early next year.

"Windows Starter Edition is now a relatively mature product and ready for bigger things," Mr Wiggins said.

CIVIL LAW:

U.S. Settles Civil Case Against British Online Gambling Company BetOnSports (FINDLAW/AP)

By Christopher Leonard, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 11, 2006

(AP) - ST. LOUIS-U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway reached a settlement with online gambling company BetOnSports PLC that permanently bars the London-based company from accepting any bets from the United States.

The lawsuit has been closely watched by the online gambling industry, which generates about $6 billion (â‚¬4.7 billion) annually in the United States.

The settlement announced Thursday ends a massive civil case Hanaway filed this summer. It does not affect a criminal case still pending against several BetOnSports employees, including Chief Executive David Carruthers, who remains under house arrest in a St. Louis suburb.

Carruthers faces 22 counts of fraud and racketeering charges. His case is scheduled to go to trial early next year. BetOnSports fired him soon after he was arrested in July.

Hanaway spokeswoman Jan Diltz said the U.S. Attorney's Office would not comment on the civil settlement because the criminal case is ongoing.

BetOnSports said in a statement that it did not admit wrongdoing by entering the settlement.

Spokesman Kevin Smith said about 20 percent of the company's revenue came from other countries, most of them in Asia.

"That will be the total focus of the company now," he said.

The settlement requires BetOnSports to open a toll-free telephone service to inform bettors how they can reclaim wagers pending before the suit was filed.

Smith said the hot line should be running within a week. He said he did not know how BetOnSports planned to refund customers.

BetOnSports must also take out an advertisement in a major newspaper telling customers that Internet gambling is illegal in the United States and the company will no longer take their bets. It must post similar messages on its Web sites.

The settlement is not likely to have a huge effect on the Internet gambling industry, said Nelson Rose, a professor at Whittier College of Law and an expert on Internet gambling.

Rose said companies paid more attention to the recent passage of the Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act, which President George W. Bush signed into law Oct. 13. The act cracks down on banks that transfer bets placed on the Internet.

Rose said passage of the act forced Internet gambling companies to decide whether they want to risk doing business in the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0093541

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Feds Probe Care At Ore. Mental Hospital (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

PORTLAND, Ore. -- Federal investigators are looking into patient care at the hospital made famous in the movie "One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest," where there have been reports of abuse, short staffing and overcrowding.

The Oregon State Hospital is one of the oldest and most dilapidated state mental institutions in the nation. The movie was filmed there in 1975.

Justice Department officials are expected to visit the hospital next week. The department alerted Gov. Ted Kulongoski in June that it would investigate whether patients' constitutional rights were violated.

The facility is at the center of discussions about reforming mental health care in Oregon. Reports of abuse and other problems led lawmakers to reassess the hospital's future.

Lawmakers have proposed replacing it with two separate hospitals and two residential facilities at an estimated cost of at least $324 million.

It's unclear how long the investigation could take. Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said she could not discuss the timeline or details of the investigation.

Human Trafficking Cases Increase In El Paso (EPT)

By Louie Gilot

El Paso (TX) Times, November 11, 2006

A billboard encourages reporting suspected human trafficking. (Yasmin A. Aboytes / El Paso Times)Photographs of men, women and children filled the screen. But they didn't tell the whole story.

A shy Chinese boy is pictured. He was forced to work in restaurants in El Paso and North Carolina.

A young woman poses on a stationary bike. She was lured into the sex trade from her native Uzbekistan.

Two middle-aged couples smile at the camera. The pair on the left were deaf and mute victims of human traffickers. On the right were the traffickers.

"You have to look beneath the surface. You'll not know it when you see it," Brandy Gardes, an assistant U.S. attorney in El Paso, told hundreds of law enforcement officers and social workers at a conference last month in El Paso.

Officials have called human trafficking one of the toughest crimes to tackle.

It is hard to identify and hard to prove. Victims are often too scared to speak out. And the public and juries have a hard time believing slavery still goes on in the United States.

The U.S. Department of State estimated that 18,000 to 20,000 people are trafficked into the

Advertisement

United States each year and held by force or coercion for sexual slavery and forced labor. Between 2001 and 2005, the Justice Department prosecuted fewer than 150 alleged traffickers.

There are no figures for El Paso, but it was chosen by the Justice Department as the site of one of 18 new human-trafficking task forces in the nation as part of a far-reaching effort to bring the problem out of the shadows.

A community's response

Task-force coordinator Paul Piñon is training police officers to recognize the signs.

He said El Pasoans can also play a crucial role in spotting traffickers' safe houses and trafficking victims. "We feel that the majority of situations will come to light through the involvement of the community."

Neighbors may notice that a large number of people live in a house but never congregate outside except to be picked up for work.

Often, El Paso is a pit stop for traffickers on their way to California and elsewhere.

But some cases with elements of human trafficking began here.

Gardes prosecuted two such cases -- the 1998 exploitation of Mexican deaf and mute men and women by two El Paso sisters, and the 2001 sexual exploitation of women from Uzbekistan by a UTEP research assistant. The culprits were convicted, but not for human smuggling, and were sentenced to prison time.

Trafficking victims are not necessarily foreigners, but the great majority are.

One case going to trial Monday can also be classified as human trafficking, Gardes said. It is the prosecution of the owners of a far East El Paso quarry, where Mexican undocumented immigrants worked and lived in substandard conditions. The owners were charged with harboring undocumented immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0093542

Gardes said prosecutors usually apply human-trafficking charges in cases where the use of force can be proved because those cases are stronger in court. However, most human traffickers use coercion or fraud to keep their victims enslaved.

Not 'vanilla smuggling'

Often, what starts as "plain old, vanilla human smuggling," as Gardes put it, turns into trafficking when the migrant can't pay.

Gardes showed the photograph of a field worker standing on top of a large farm truck -- a scene common across the Southwest. His name is Ricardo, she said. He was smuggled across the border in Arizona and abandoned in the desert for eight days with only three days' worth of food and water. He was found by another smuggler who offered to guide him, for a fee. When Ricardo couldn't pay, the smuggler sold him to a Florida labor contractor for $1,100.

This became Ricardo's debt. He worked in a field for $80 a week to repay it. At the same time, his trafficker overcharged him for rent and other necessities. Gardes said he was never meant to be able to repay the debt.

One day, another trafficking victim escaped, was recaptured and was beaten in front of Ricardo and the others. "At this point, Ricardo realized this was really slavery," Gardes said.

Ricardo eventually escaped and testified against his traffickers. He still receives death threats.

In a recent case in El Paso, police rescued a 15-year-old Salvadoran girl at the Downtown Greyhound bus station after her smuggler asked her family in California for ransom.

In Juárez, officials at Casa del Migrante shelter, which helps migrants after they have been deported back to Mexico or after they fail to cross, said they have housed a few women who said their smugglers tried to sell them.

Brainwashed

Collaboration between police and private aid organizations is crucial to tackle human trafficking, officials said.

A new El Paso case in which a 14-year-old Guatemalan boy allegedly held in Fabens was presented as a model of cooperation to the White House's faith-based initiative task force, social workers involved said. The boy allegedly worked at a Fabens store, slept in a camper shell in a backyard and washed his clothes with a garden hose. Law enforcement officials would not say more because the investigation continues.

When the boy was placed in custody at the migrant children detention center in Canutillo, he was suicidal and refused to speak to FBI agents for two days.

Elvia Garcia, a supervisor at the Diocesan Migrant and Refugee Services, was called to help.

After several hours of small talk, the boy finally opened up.

"It takes a whole community to take care of a victim of trafficking," Garcia said.

Many victims come from Third World countries where police corruption is rampant, and they learn not to trust law enforcement officers. They are also brainwashed by traffickers who tell them the police would not believe their outcry and would put them in jail or deport them.

In reality, victims of trafficking have legal recourse.

In 2000, the Congress passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, which broadened the federal status and gave victims the T Visa to allow a three-year stay in the United States. During that time, victims can apply for a green card.

Charles Song, the director of legal services for the Coalition to Abolish Slavery and Trafficking in Los Angeles, said that less than 1 percent of trafficking victims he has helped chose to go back to their countries. That's because traffickers often have associates abroad who threaten the victims and their families.

Florencia Molina, 34, of Mexico, was a trafficking victim in Los Angeles in 2002, sewing dresses for 17 hours a day, every day for months. At night, she was locked inside the clandestine workshop. Her trafficker held her papers, and Molina did not speak English. She summoned the courage to flee and ended up testifying for the FBI.

Molina spoke at the El Paso conference. She said that her trafficker, an important woman in her native Mexican village, was sentenced to six months of house arrest. Then she went to Mexico, looking for Molina.

Molina obtained a T Visa and is living in hiding in the Los Angeles area. She now works as a security guard and dreams of becoming a sheriff's deputy, she said.

"I feel protected in the United States," she said.

Louie Gilot may be reached at lgilot@elpasotimes.com; 546-6131.

2 LAPD Officers Investigated In Beating Case (LAT)

By Richard Winton, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 10, 2006

Two Los Angeles police officers were under investigation today for allegedly beating a man during a videotaped arrest in Hollywood that LAPD Chief William J. Bratton called "disturbing."

DOJ_NMG_0093543

The video of the Aug. 11 incident, posted on the YouTube website, shows one of the officers holding down William Cardenas, 24, as the other officer places his knee on the man's throat and punches him in the face six times.

Cardenas, who is lying on his back, is heard yelling, "I can't breathe!"

He was arrested on suspicion of using violence or threats to prevent an officer from performing his duty and was charged with two counts of resisting arrest, said LAPD Lt. Paul Vernon.

Cardenas remains in custody.

The tape was photographed by an unnamed neighbor who gave it to B. Kwaku Duren, a lawyer who represents Cardenas.

Bratton cautioned that the videotape only reflected a part of the struggle with Officers Alexander Schlegel and Patrick Farrell, who is seen punching Cardenas.

"There is no denying that the video is disturbing," Bratton said. "But as to whether the actions of the officers were appropriate in light of what they were experiencing, and the totality of the circumstances, is what the investigation will determine."

Bratton said that Cardenas was not seriously hurt. "The guy got punched but that is not life-threatening."

The chief also pointed out that the incident showed that a federal oversight program of the department -- imposed under a consent decree -- was working. Even before the video became public, an investigation of the incident was underway based on the officers' report and interviews with witnesses, he said.

"All the steps of consent decree have been complied with," Bratton said. "That is the good side. There is no taking away the beating itself."

The incident began when the officers spotted Cardenas, a Gordon Street gang member wanted on a felony warrant for stolen goods, and he fled, police said. During the subsequent arrest, a struggle ensued and the officers reported that they used force to subdue the suspect.

After the arrest, witnesses told investigators that they saw the officers punch Cardenas in the upper torso, Bratton said.

During a preliminary hearing on Aug. 29, Cardenas' attorneys produced the beating video that was subsequently turned over to prosecutors and police, the chief said. The officers have since been assigned to desk duties while the investigation continues.

The district attorney's office is also reviewing Cardenas' case, said Jane Robison, a spokeswoman for the office.

"Policing is often not pretty," Bratton said. "Looking at a slice of [the video] makes it look less pretty, but my obligations is to wait until all the facts are in."

richard.winton@latimes.com

Beating Of L.A. Suspect Sparks Outcry (WP)

By Sonya Geis And Hamil R. Harris, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

Police and FBI Investigate Case After Tape Was Shown on YouTube

LOS ANGELES, Nov. 10 -- A video of Los Angeles police officers punching a suspect in the face set off a wave of outrage that crashed onto the doorstep of police headquarters Friday after the tape was posted on YouTube.

It was an uncomfortable echo of earlier Los Angeles Police Department scandals, including the videotaped Rodney King beating. The department, which operates under a federal consent decree, has instituted many reforms but has periodically suffered through police brutality embarrassments.

The lawyer for the suspect shown in the video said his client's experience shows little has changed. "The Los Angeles Police Department needs to make those reforms real, because they have not been made real," B. Kwaku Duren said at a news conference in front of police headquarters Friday. "That video speaks for itself."

The video of an August arrest came to light this week after portions of it appeared on the videosharing Web site YouTube and several thousand people watched it.

Shot by a bystander, it shows two police officers attempting to arrest William Cardenas, 24. As one officer sits on his thighs and holds his arm, the other places his knee across Cardenas's chest and throat and quickly punches him five times in the head. Cardenas can be heard crying, "Let go of me! I can't breathe! I can't breathe!"

Cardenas had a split lip, black eyes and a bloody face afterward, Duren said.

Police described Cardenas as a known gang member, which his lawyer disputed. Cardenas had run from officers who wanted to arrest him on a warrant for receiving a stolen gun, Duren said. Previously, Cardenas had been arrested for attempted murder but was never charged.

After reviewing evidence from prosecutors and seeing the video at a preliminary hearing, a judge found enough evidence to try Cardenas for resisting arrest.

The LAPD began investigating the incident on the day of the arrest, in compliance with a consent decree requirement to investigate all allegations of police abuse, police officials said. The FBI launched a separate investigation Thursday.

Both officers in the video, Alexander Schlegel and Patrick Farrell, were reassigned to desk jobs. Schlegel had two previous abuse complaints against him, officials confirmed. He was exonerated in one instance, and in the other the district attorney did not find grounds to file charges.

"Police work is not always pretty," Chief William J. Bratton said. "But in my 36 years in law enforcement, I've learned not to make a judgment until I have all the facts."

According to preliminary hearing transcripts, Cardenas and two friends were drinking beer on a street corner when police recognized him and called for him to put his hands up. Cardenas ran.

When police caught him, Schlegel pushed him in the back, he fell, "and his face bounced off the sidewalk."

Cardenas tried to hit the officer, Schlegel testified. Then Farrell hit him twice, and Schlegel used pepper spray on him, Schlegel said. The officers reported the use of force that day, police officials said.

From her second-floor apartment, Melissa Aguayo, 17, watched it happen. "He kept saying, 'You're choking me, you're choking me,' " she said Friday. "They kept saying, 'You are resisting arrest,' and they kept hitting him."

Connie Rice, a civil rights lawyer who has watched the Los Angles Police Department for 20 years, said the incident is not atypical and reflects a "use of force culture" at the department that is "calibrated higher and more aggressively than other police departments."

Nonetheless, "This is not your grandfather's LAPD," she said. Rice credited Bratton with valuing community policing and with presiding over a changing culture, in which fewer officers see aggressive policing as acceptable.

Under Los Angeles's well-liked police chief, crime in the city has fallen 40 percent in four years.

"Twenty years ago, 99 percent of LAPD officers would have seen that video and would have said, 'What's the problem?' " Rice said. "In 2006, at least a third to half would say, 'We've got a problem.' That's a difference."

Police Beating Video From L.A. Demonstrates The Power Of YouTube Again (USAT/AP)

USA Today, November 11, 2006

LOS ANGELES (AP) — An FBI investigation prompted by video footage of a man being punched repeatedly in the face by police has demonstrated anew the power of the Internet sensation of the year, YouTube.com.

In addition to being a monumental time-waster around the office, YouTube could also become a tool for keeping police honest, some say.

VIDEO: Arrest investigated

This week, a clip on the post-it-yourself video website triggered a police-brutality investigation by the FBI. The footage shows the Aug. 11 arrest of alleged gang member William Cardenas, 24. Two Los Angeles officers can be seen holding him down on a Hollywood street; one punches him several times in the face before they are able to handcuff him.

The Los Angeles Police Department is also investigating the officers' conduct.

Police Chief William Bratton said he found the video to be "disturbing," but stressed that the 20-second clip amounts to only a fraction of what transpired.

The Los Angeles Times reported Friday that a Superior Court commissioner viewed the video nearly two months ago, heard the officers' testimony, and concluded that their conduct was "more than reasonable" because Cardenas was resisting.

Cop Watch LA, a police watchdog group, posted the video on YouTube, said organizer Joaquin Cienfuegos. Cienfuegos said the video was shot by a neighbor of Cardenas with a cellphone camera. The neighbor gave it to Cardenas' family, who then gave it to Cop Watch, according to Cienfuegos.

In recent months, videos posted on YouTube have rocked political campaigns, brought fame — or infamy — to previously unknown talents and cast unwanted attention on the gaffes of the famous. YouTube and similar video sites are also increasingly becoming repositories for videos that purport to detail wrongdoing by police.

Such amateur clips help cast a spotlight on police wrongdoing that could otherwise go unreported, said Ramona Ripston, executive director of the ACLU of Southern California.

"Unless we throw light onto activities of government, all activities, you never find out what happened," Ripston said. "This video is an example."

Police said Cardenas had been wanted on charges of receiving stolen property. In an arrest report obtained by the Associated Press, the officers said they tried to arrest Cardenas after spotting him on the sidewalk, but Cardenas ran.

The officers caught up to him, tripped him and swarmed over him to apply handcuffs, the report said. In their report, they admitted hitting him repeatedly in the face, saying that he was resisting and that they feared he might grab one of their guns.

DOJ_NMG_0093545

Cardenas suffered cuts and bruises on his arms, leg and face, and received stitches on an eyelid. His attorney, B. Kwaku Duren, accused the officers using excessive force.

Police spokesman Lt. Paul Vernon said Friday that such videos often do not show the whole story.

"The officers' actions in these situations are based on the totality of what is going on in the officers' mind," Vernon said. "You don't know in the total context of this what occurred."

As of Friday, the clip had received more than 155,000 views on YouTube. It was posted on Oct. 18.

A search on YouTube for the terms "police brutality" found more than 500 videos, including ones that claim to show police violence in the U.S. and as far away as Egypt and Hungary. A search of Google's video site also yielded hundreds of videos.

In response to the surge in amateur videos, some law enforcement agencies have installed cameras in squad cars to protect officers against false allegations.

Police defense attorney John Barnett said the public shouldn't draw conclusions when watching the clip of Cardenas' arrest. Barnett represented one of the officers in the 1991 Rodney King beating and an Inglewood police officer, Jeremy Morse, who was videotaped roughing up a 16-year-old boy.

Two juries deadlocked in Morse's case, and four officers were acquitted in the King trial, touching off riots in Los Angeles.

"It's very difficult to find jurors who haven't already come to a conclusion," Barnett said. "The public has the perception of what the facts are, but you have to figure out a way to get them back to square one."

Legal observers said the public has become somewhat desensitized to questionable police tactics caught on tape because such videos have become more prevalent since the King beating. In many cases, officers have been exonerated.

"The first reaction by people is one of outrage," said Eugene O'Donnell, a professor of police studies at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York City. "But the more you see police officers using force on tape, the more you get used to it."

Landscapers Cause Furor By Shunning Gay Clients (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

HOUSTON, Nov. 10 — Last month, a local landscaping firm prompted a furor here by telling a gay couple in an e-mail message, “We choose not to work for homosexuals.”

The message quickly made its way around the Internet, and the company, Garden Guy Inc., was bombarded with threats and hate mail. But since then, the company’s owners say they have gained far more business than they have lost.

In an interview Friday, Sabrina Farber, 34, co-owner of the company with her husband, Todd, 37, said the company had picked up $40,000 in new business in the past two weeks, while losing only two clients worth about $500 each a year.

“I’m not saying that to gloat,” said Mrs. Farber, who described the frenzy as ugly and emotionally draining. But she said they would not do it differently and deserved credit for not masking their refusal with excuses.

“Why can’t people handle it when you say the truth?” she said.

One of the two gay clients, Gary Lackey, said, “We’re hoping things would die down” and declined to comment further in a telephone interview. The other member of the couple, Michael Lord, did not return a call.

The law appears to be on the Farbers’ side, said Lisa Graybill, legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Texas.

“The federal law of public accommodations says if you hang out a shingle or open your door you don’t get to say, ‘Only to whites,’ ” Ms. Graybill said. But sexual orientation is not protected. And while some localities, like Seattle, have adopted ordinances extending antidiscrimination protection to gay men and lesbians, she said, Houston has not.

The uproar began after Mr. Lord contacted Garden Guy, whose Web site contains this slogan: “Treating you with respect and honesty are the cornerstones of our reputation.”

It also carries citations from the New Testament — Mrs. Farber volunteered that her husband was Jewish and now practices Christianity — and a message against same-sex marriage that the gay couple evidently overlooked: “The God-ordained institution of marriage is under attack in courts across the nation and your help is needed.”

Mrs. Farber and Mr. Lord talked business on the phone, but after Mr. Lord’s references to his “partner,” Mrs. Farber e-mailed Mr. Lord to cancel their appointment.

“I am appreciative of your time on the phone today and glad you contacted us,” she wrote. “I need to tell you that we cannot meet with you because we choose not to work for homosexuals.”

In the ensuing uproar, the family had to change its private phone numbers, Mrs. Farber said, and turned over to the police copies of threatening messages like “I will sodomize their children.”

Mrs. Farber said her husband, who holds a degree in horticulture from Texas A&M University, had done landscaping for gay clients before but had become increasingly “grieved” over visiting their homes to discuss design and plantings.

DOJ_NMG_0093546

Dumbfounded by the e-mail message, Mr. Lord and Mr. Lackey forwarded it to friends, and it circulated widely on gay Web sites. A copy reached The Houston Chronicle, where a columnist, Rick Casey, broke the story on Oct. 20, suggesting that the Farbers "should refuse to do business with all sinners."

With the affair spreading to the radio airwaves, Houstonians have piled on.

"It seems to me the Farbers must be a little naïve," a letter writer, Joseph Carroll, wrote The Chronicle. "Don't they realize they are probably doing business with homosexuals every day? They should check out their pharmacist, hair dresser, bank teller, the nurse at their doctor's office, the waiter at their favorite restaurant and the church secretary."

The Association of Professional Landscape Designers condemned the action of the Farbers, whose membership has lapsed, and instituted a requirement for members to abide by an antidiscrimination clause.

In addition to the criticism of the Farbers, there was also widespread support. Mrs. Farber cited one e-mail message from "Eric in St. Louis," who wrote: "Life to the Farbers who have planted themselves like solid oak trees against these strong winds of perversion."

Mrs. Farber said she and her husband never claimed to be perfect.

"We're sinners, Todd and I," Mrs. Farber said. But she added: "My husband made a personal choice, according to something he felt in his heart. It was never a judgmental choice or a hating choice or even a choice that said, 'Well, we're better than them.' "

Gain For Same-Sex Marriage In Massachusetts (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

BOSTON, Nov. 9 — Lawmakers in Massachusetts, the only state where same-sex marriage is legal, dealt what appeared to be a fatal blow Thursday to a proposed constitutional amendment to ban it.

In a flurry of strategic maneuvering, supporters of same-sex marriage managed to persuade enough legislators to vote to recess a constitutional convention until the afternoon of Jan. 2, the last day of the legislative session.

On that day, lawmakers and advocates on both sides said, it appeared likely that the legislature would adjourn without voting on the measure, killing it.

"For all intents and purposes, the debate has ended," said Representative Byron Rushing, a Boston Democrat and the assistant majority leader. "What members are expecting is that the majority of constituents are going to say, 'Thank you, we're glad it's over, we think it has been discussed enough.' "

The measure had been expected by both sides to gain easily the 50 votes required from the 200 legislators as the first step toward making same-sex marriages illegal.

Kris Mineau, president of the Massachusetts Family Institute, which sponsored the amendment, called the recess vote a "travesty," and, waving a copy of the State Constitution, said the legislators had "just said that it's irrelevant."

As for whether the fight was over, Mr. Mineau said, "We're assessing the situation."

Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican who opposes same-sex marriage, said the vote was a "triumph of arrogance over democracy." He said that he would "explore any alternatives" to try to force a vote, but that "my options are limited."

Eric Fehrnstrom, a spokesman for Mr. Romney, said: "The fact that they put this off until the end of the year makes it easier for them to adjourn. If they were giving consideration, I think they would have recessed until tomorrow or maybe Monday or Tuesday next week."

The action on Thursday came two days after Massachusetts voters elected Deval L. Patrick, a same-sex marriage supporter, as the state's first Democratic governor in 16 years. Democrats were also elected to all of the statewide offices, leaving the state's Republican Party in shambles.

But the fact that the amendment had enough supporters to pass the first 50-vote round indicated that the issue of same-sex marriage remains divisive three years after the state's highest court ruled that such marriages were constitutional in Massachusetts. More than 8,000 same-sex couples have since married.

To bring the amendment before the legislature, the Massachusetts Family Institute had gathered 170,000 petition signatures. If the amendment were to get 50 votes, it would then require the votes of 50 legislators in another constitutional convention in the 2007-8 legislative session. Then it would be voted on in a referendum in November 2008.

Polls have generally found that just more than half of the citizens surveyed supported same-sex marriage, but about the same number wanted the constitutional amendment to come before voters.

The vote to recess followed a day of intense politicking and strategizing by supporters of same-sex marriage. Many legislators, even supporters of such marriages, had said they planned to vote for the amendment for fear that if they did not they would appear to be shirking their responsibility.

DOJ_NMG_0093547

Gay rights advocates persuaded the legislators to first take up another amendment to ban same-sex marriage, one introduced nearly two years ago by a conservative lawmaker, but which was now considered by Mr. Mineau and other same-sex marriage opponents to be unable to pass constitutional muster because it would nullify the same-sex marriages that had already taken place.

Because that amendment had been initiated by a legislator and not a citizens' group, it would have needed 101 votes to pass. On Thursday it was defeated unanimously.

Arline Isaacson, co-chairwoman of the Massachusetts Gay and Lesbian Political Caucus, said the plan was to give the legislators political cover with their constituents, because they "can all point to the fact that they fully debated same-sex marriage and took a vote on it."

Same-sex marriage advocates also persuaded lawmakers to vote for a recess and not an adjournment because if they adjourned, Governor Romney could call them back into session.

Representative Michael A. Costello, a Democrat from Newburyport and a strong opponent of the amendment, said: "The way I looked at it was that we would kill it with a handgun or a hand grenade. It's never been proper to put civil rights on the ballot. So we killed it through procedure, rather than on substance."

The debate in the House was full of impassioned speeches.

"I'm 3,000 feet to the right of Attila the Hun, they tell me," Representative Marie J. Parente, a Democrat from Milford who had lost her re-election bid on Tuesday, told her colleagues. "But you're not. You're the other side. The gracious people, the liberal people, the socially conscious people."

For the 170,000 people who signed the petition and want a referendum, "does your graciousness end?" she asked. "Give the people the right to be heard."

Senator Jarrett T. Barrios, who is gay and married, told the chamber, "It's time for a little straight talk."

Pointing to his wedding band, he said: "You don't have to live next to us. You don't have to like us. We are only asking you to end the debate," so that "we will at least have the right to enjoy the same rights that the rest of you have enjoyed from time immemorial."

The Court And Abortion (NYT)

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

The Supreme Court unnecessarily returned to the politically charged area of abortion this week, hearing arguments in a case testing some of the core principles of Roe v. Wade and the court's own credibility as an institution removed from politics.

At issue, once again, is a deceptively broad ban on so-called partial-birth abortions. The court struck down a similar measure just six years ago, but since then two new justices have arrived. In the interest of women's privacy and health — and in defense of the court's own reputation — the justices should strike down this far-reaching assault on reproductive freedom.

In 2000, the court struck down a nearly identical Nebraska law for essentially two reasons. It found that the law's imprecise language applied not just to a single late-term abortion method — as the ban's supporters claimed — but would criminalize other common abortion procedures that are constitutionally protected. The court also ruled that the law was unconstitutional because it provided no exception to protect a woman's health.

In a cynical move in 2003, Congress passed a law remarkably similar to the one the court had just struck down — with a definition of the procedures it was outlawing about as sweeping as Nebraska's. Defying the Supreme Court, moreover, Congress refused to include an exception for protecting the health of the woman. Instead, it simply made the medically inaccurate assertion that the ill-defined procedure it outlawed was never necessary to preserve a woman's health. Every lower federal court that has considered the Congressional ban has held it to be unconstitutional.

If Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who cast the deciding vote in 2000, had not retired, it is highly unlikely the court would have agreed to entertain this rerun. But without her, it is not clear that there are still five votes to defeat this assault on Roe , or to uphold the bedrock requirement that abortion restrictions have an exception for protecting a woman's health.

It seems unlikely that Chief Justice John Roberts or Justice Samuel Alito will provide the fifth vote. That means that Justice Anthony Kennedy, the current swing justice, is likely to decide this case. In 2000, Justice Kennedy joined those who would have upheld the Nebraska law. But at oral argument his questions suggested that he may take issue with Congress's assertion that the ban would not put women's health at risk — an encouraging sign.

Even justices who oppose abortion rights need to be concerned about that. They also need to worry about how the court will look if the recent change in its membership produces a starkly different result on an issue so vital to women's privacy and health.

Choosing Choice (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0093548

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

THE BALLOTS CAST across the nation spoke so unambiguously about abortion that even the most intransigent anti-abortionists should be able to construe the message: Voters do not want Big Brother opening the doors of private homes — or the doctor's office — and coercing people's most personal medical decisions.

Anti-abortionists have been craving a test case to put before the U.S. Supreme Court, in hopes of overturning Roe vs. Wade — and thought they had it when the South Dakota Legislature passed a ban on abortion. Instead of challenging the law in court, though, pro-choice forces cleverly put the matter to a popular referendum. Even in that socially conservative, anti-abortion state, a decisive majority Tuesday preserved a woman's right to choose. To some extent, they were bothered by the ban's extraordinary lack of compassion, refusing to exempt even the victims of rape and incest. But a frequently voiced complaint about the ban was that government simply shouldn't interfere with private lives.

That's a closely held American value and one that Republicans should embrace again lest they want to see this midterm election be a harbinger of a long-range trend.

Both California and Oregon voted down attempts to require parental notification before a minor can obtain an abortion. In several other states, anti-abortion congressional candidates were defeated, and Kansas' Phill Kline, the state attorney general who notoriously overreached the powers of his office in his single-minded attack on family planning and abortion clinics, was turned out of office.

In California, Proposition 85 was the second attempt within a year to impose parental notification on girls, most of whom already talk to their parents before opting for an abortion. Both efforts failed at the polls.

Heedless of this abundantly clear message, anti-abortion forces are redoubling their efforts. Their latest idea: requiring pregnant women to view a 3-D ultrasound of their fetuses, thus forcing patients to undergo a certain medical procedure before seeking the treatment of their choice. For what other medical situation would this kind of government interference be tolerated?

The voters have spoken resoundingly on abortion and the right to privacy. Those who want to turn government into Big Brother need to heed the message and give it up.

Keeping The Voting Clean (NYT)

By Richard L. Hasen

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

AS election mishaps hindered voting on Tuesday from Cleveland to Denver, some people were already calling for giving up on the new electronic voting machines, which were themselves put in place to prevent another hanging-chad fiasco like that in Florida in 2000.

The calls will only get louder as the public learns more about Florida's 13th Congressional District — coincidentally, Katherine Harris's old district — where voting machines apparently lost or failed to record up to 18,000 votes in a race where the Democratic and Republican candidates are just a few hundred votes apart. If everyone just voted by mail or with pencil and paper, the argument goes, our voting problems would be solved.

But this reaction to the bugs and glitches shows that Americans have not learned the right lesson from 2000: the problem is not with the technology of running our elections but rather with the people running them.

The United States should join the rest of the world's advanced democracies and put nonpartisan professionals in charge. We need officials whose ultimate allegiance is to the fairness, integrity and professionalism of the election process, not to helping one party or the other gain political advantage. We don't need disputes like the current one in Florida being resolved by party hacks.

Critics of electronic voting raise two main issues: machines are susceptible to fraud (or hacking) and they are difficult to use.

Fraud problems would not go away if we switched to vote by mail, as Oregon has. Such voting — let's call it mandatory absentee balloting — takes the voter out of the polling booth and puts him at home or elsewhere, someplace where votes could be sold to the highest bidder. Most of the documented cases of voting fraud in the United States in recent years involve absentee ballots. At the beginning of the last century, voter turnout declined as states adopted secret, in-person balloting, most likely because corrupt politicians stopped buying votes since they couldn't verify that people were really voting for their candidate.

True, squeaky-clean Oregon has been able to use the vote-by-mail system. But it is not clear that clean elections could be held in places with more rancorous partisan disputes over election rules and vote counting. And mail-in ballots don't eliminate the problem anyway: losers still have an incentive to claim fraud and try to get a close election result overturned. Public opinion on the integrity of the election process is volatile, and surveys show losers have less confidence in the fairness of the process than winners do.

DOJ_NMG_0093549

Voting with pencil and paper creates its own problems. With long ballots like California's it would take many days to calculate results, and the potential for election administrator error or fraud — if votes were really to be counted by hand, as opposed to optically scanned — would be enormous.

Nor would a switch to vote by mail or pencil and paper necessarily solve anything. Across the country last Tuesday we saw all kinds of mundane problems: not enough ballots, polls opening late, disputes about which voter identification rules applied. Problems arose with absentee ballots, too. Some were mailed to the wrong address, or with incorrect postage, or with inaccurate or incomplete information. Then there's the question of accurately counting only the validly cast absentee ballots.

The point is not that electronic voting is the best system; maybe it should be scrapped. The real solution is to create a cadre of dedicated, professional nonpartisan administrators with enough money to run a scrupulously fair and voter-friendly system of election administration to resolve such questions.

To improve the chances that states will choose an independent and competent chief elections officer, states should enact laws making that officer a long-term gubernatorial appointee who takes office only upon confirmation by a 75 percent vote of the legislature — a supermajority requirement that would ensure that a candidate has true bipartisan support. Nonpartisanship in election administration is no dream. It is how Canada and Australia run their national elections.

We've moved in exactly the wrong direction. Election administration reform has become more, not less, politicized since Bush v. Gore. Since 2004, voter identification laws have been supported only by Republican legislatures and opposed by Democrats. The debate over election integrity versus election access makes administration just another locus for partisan debate. This should and can end with nonpartisan professional administration.

Even with divided government coming again to Washington, there is an opportunity to take steps that would keep each party from gaining partisan advantage, and that can end our biannual anxiety over whether we are headed for another election meltdown.

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Targets 36 Markets In NAR Antitrust Suit (INMAN)

By Glenn Roberts Jr., Inman News

Inman News, November 11, 2006

Realtor association seeks rule change for separate contested listings policy

NEW ORLEANS -- The Justice Department, as a part of its antitrust lawsuit against the 1.3-million-member National Association of Realtors trade group, has identified 36 market areas in which association policy for the online display and sharing of property information has allegedly caused anticompetitive effects, said Laurie Janik, general counsel for the group.

Filed last year, the lawsuit charges that the Realtor group's policies are illegal because they could potentially be used to squelch real estate competition, while the Realtor group has maintained that its policies provide for ample online information about properties.

"They've identified 36 markets to us where they intend to prove anticompetitive effects," Janik said Friday during a meeting for multiple listing service executives at a Realtor conference in New Orleans."We'll be waiting to see just what types of proof they plan to advance from those marketplaces."

Lawyers for the association, meanwhile, are conducting interviews with MLS officials in those markets to gather information for its defense.

Issues of data protection and control are at the core of the legal scuffle, as some brokers have pushed the association to better serve their interests by helping to safeguard control over property information that they say is a vital part of their business.

A major contention in the Justice Department lawsuit is on a policy provision that allows brokers who are members of Realtor-affiliated MLSs to block their listings from display on other MLS participants' Web sites, Janik said. "We believe it's a very justifiable position, but the government seems to think that once a broker has decided to participate in the MLS then you also must allow your listings to be displayed on a competitors' ... Web site."

Also, Justice Department officials object to a Realtor policy which requires that Realtor MLS participants must "actually be engaged in listing or selling the type of property that's listed in the MLS," while the former policy simply required that an MLS participant possess a broker's license.

"The reason for the rule change is largely driven by the Internet," she said. "We all know there are plenty of people out there with brokers' licenses -- so you get the license, you get the valuable data feed, you get to display it on your Web site and make all sorts of money even though you never list or sell a property. We don't think those people belong in the MLS and so that's what I think will be the second biggest issue in the lawsuit."

DOJ_NMG_0093550

The association is also grappling with other legal issues, Janik noted, including eight Federal Trade Commission investigations and seven Justice Department investigations that have focused on a specific classification of property listings. The federal agencies are targeting MLS rules restricting the display of exclusive agency listings on some public property-search Web sites -- exclusive agency listings provide that sellers do not have to pay a commission to a real estate broker if they locate a buyer without the assistance of the broker.

The MLSs' restrictions did not affect exclusive right to sell listings, a more common form of listing in which the broker is guaranteed compensation whether or not the seller independently locates a buyer.

A group of Realtor-affiliated MLSs have eliminated the policies after the federal agencies began investigating their policies, while some of the investigations are still outstanding and the FTC has announced legal action against two MLSs in Michigan.

In July, the National Association of Realtors hosted a "fly-in" event in Chicago and invited all of the lawyers for MLSs involved in the investigations, Janik said. The participants of that meeting signed a joint defense agreement and a confidentiality agreement, she said.

After that meeting, Janik and an antitrust lawyer representing NAR met with FTC and Justice Department staff to discuss the issues surrounding exclusive agency listings.

"We wanted to make sure they understood that MLSs had a legitimate concern and a legitimate reason not to be advertising exclusive agency listings on the Internet ... and that those MLSs that excluded these listings from (distribution to some public Web sites) were doing it because it is not consistent with the purpose of the MLSs to be helping home sellers sell their homes themselves and cut brokers out of commissions."

In some cases, Janik said, sellers in exclusive agency listings contracts have displayed for-sale-by-owner signs on their properties.

In response, Janik said that the association is considering a proposal to change listings policy so that brokers -- rather than MLSs -- could make independent choices about whether or not to exclude exclusive agency listings from their Web sites.

"Brokers are always entitled to make independent business decisions. There's no collusion, there's nothing illegal about that," she said. "The MLS as a group of competitors ... would not be making a joint decision; there would be no agreement among competitors." And that represents an important legal distinction, she said.

The association has shared its proposed changes to listings policy with the Justice Department and FTC, and Janik said she expects the association would be safe in adopting this policy change, though she added that the agencies have not provided written approval of the proposal.

The proposed changes would also provide that MLSs can choose to exclude exclusive agency or exclusive right to sell listings from being sent to public Web sites when the street address of the property is being shown on the Internet and when a for-sale-by-owner sign or other sign on the property indicates that the seller is soliciting direct contact from buyers.

This is intended to prevent situations in which sellers receive the benefit of MLS visibility but could potentially block MLS subscribers from participating in the real estate transaction, she said. This proposed change may be a tough sell to the federal agencies, she added.

"There is some disagreement with us and the FTC over that portion and no one is obviously promising this a clean bill of health," Janik said. "And there are some risks of adopting this policy. The risk of doing nothing I think is far greater," she said. "I think narrowing the policy -- narrowing it or getting rid of it entirely ... are probably the only two viable choices we get," she said.

If the proposal is adopted by the association's leadership, it will be an optional policy "for those who love to take risks," she said.

MLSs that do not have the staff to actively visit MLS-listed properties to ensure that there are no for-sale-by-owner signs could rely on "the age-old MLS rules enforcement practice of 'tattle-taling,'" she said. "And it seems to work pretty well."

While the rule would prevent sellers from displaying a for-sale-by-owner sign on their properties when listing a home with an MLS, sellers could still use other non-MLS venues to market their homes, such bulletin boards, Web sites such as craigslist.org, and fliers at the local church, "because it has nothing to do with the resources of the MLS," Janik said. "The only way the MLS connection can be made is with the address and the for-sale sign. It's a very narrow exception."

Also during her legal update, Janik said, "There is a movement among some states to put some definitions in the state law as to what constitutes an exclusive right to sell listing," citing an example of one state that may be considering language stating that "any property that is marketed for sale by owner is not an exclusive right to sell listing."

Motorola To Buy Rival Of BlackBerry (AP)

By The Associated Press
AP, November 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093551

CHICAGO, Nov. 10 (AP) — The cellphone maker Motorola said Friday that it would buy Good Technology, a rival of BlackBerry, in a deal that should improve the prospects for its new Q hand-held device.

The financial terms were not disclosed.

The deal underscores efforts by Motorola, a leading maker of handsets, to sell more mobile devices that offer access to e-mail and other business-oriented services. In September, it agreed to spend $3.9 billion to buy Symbol Technologies, a maker of portable bar code scanners and customized hand-held computers.

Motorola said Good Technology, a privately held firm based in Santa Clara, Calif., that provides computing software and services for the Treo and other smartphones, will join its mobile devices unit. That unit has flourished in the last couple of years thanks to the success of the Razr phones.

Ron Garriques, president of the mobile devices division, said Good Technology's services, products and customers all complement its business.

"This acquisition will continue to strengthen Motorola as a leading provider of mobility devices and solutions both for enterprise customers and consumers," he said.

Hoping to come up with another Razr-like blockbuster in the fast-growing smartphone category, Motorola introduced a Qwerty hand-held device, called the Q, this year to compete against the BlackBerry and the Treo, which also runs on Good Technology software.

Albert Lin, an analyst for American Technology Research, said Good Technology was probably the best available acquisition for Motorola in the category short of buying Research in Motion., the Canadian maker of the BlackBerry.

"The Q has been somewhat disappointing and they're looking for ways to reinvigorate that product line," he said. Good Technology, founded in 2000, originally offered its own handheld device but now focuses on software and services.

Shares in Motorola rose 18 cents, to $21.38 on the New York Stock Exchange, down 5.4 percent this year.

Bulldog Edition Clash Of Cultures Exacerbates Woes For Tribune Co. (WSJ)

By Sarah Ellison

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

L.A. and Chicago Newspapers Are Riven by a Big Debate Over Process and Purpose 'It's a Tragic, Bad Marriage'

LOS ANGELES -- Earlier this summer, Dennis FitzSimons, chief executive of Tribune Co., traveled here to meet a group of Los Angeles Times editors and reporters. Mr. FitzSimons was running late and, according to two people in attendance, the assembled group joked about saving all the hard questions for the top executive of their parent company.

When Mr. FitzSimons finally arrived, a reporter asked: "Why do you hate the L.A. Times?"

When Chicago-based Tribune Co. acquired Times Mirror six years ago, it was more than an $8 billion fusion of two media companies. The merger also threw together two competing and incompatible cultures, each rooted in the traditions of their respective flagship newspapers, the Chicago Tribune and the Los Angeles Times.

Some Tribune executives think the Times is arrogant, spoiled and overstaffed, a paper with global ambitions that has ignored local readers. Some Times people consider the Chicago Tribune an inferior, provincial product. Times denizens, proud of their city's position as the nation's second largest, see the paper's owners as bean counters in business suits. Tribune thinks its Californian charges are too slick and prefer to take pride in the company's Chicago roots.

Unlike many battles between journalists and corporate bosses, which focus largely on spending, this one is also driven by fundamental differences between the philosophies of the two newspapers.

"It's a tragic, bad marriage," L.A. Times editor Dean Baquet has told colleagues. Mr. Baquet's own tenure was cut short amid the infighting and his last day is today.

Across the country, once-profitable newspapers are being ravaged by the Internet in a historic industry shift. The traditionally high margins of newspaper publishers have been squeezed as both readers and advertisers abandon the medium. Investor confidence has plummeted over the industry's uncertain growth prospects.

Even in 2000, some executives saw trouble looming. The solution dreamed up by Tribune and Times Mirror was to merge their operations in a way that allowed them to sell combined packages of newspaper and local TV advertising in the same big, urban markets. The strategy was a dud. In September, Tribune said it was exploring various strategic options, which may include a sale of the entire company or some of its divisions.

The deteriorating financial environment exposed tensions at Tribune that had been simmering for years. As the company tried to consolidate, a common industry response, it ran into problems merging two disparate cultures amid serious economic travails. Some of the battles, such as whether to focus on local news at the expense of national or international coverage, reflect a broader soul-searching under way across the industry.

DOJ_NMG_0093552

Matters came to a head this week when Tribune forced out Mr. Baquet as Times editor. Mr. Baquet had taken up the cudgel against Tribune's attempt to cut costs that culminated in a feisty speech at an editors' conference in New Orleans two weeks ago. Tribune executives took his comments personally, say people familiar with their thinking. Back in Los Angeles, staffers wore Dean Baquet T-shirts and have adorned their cubicles with his picture.

Many inside the company sensed the growing collision of cultures during the summer meeting with Mr. FitzSimons. Simon Li, the paper's foreign editor at the time, asked whether Tribune wanted the Times to concentrate on local stories, according to people who were there. The Times has long prided itself on its international presence, which editors felt the Tribune didn't appreciate.

Scott Smith, Tribune's president of publishing, said the need for local coverage was increasing. According to Henry Weinstein, the paper's legal-affairs reporter, who was at the meeting, Mr. Smith added that readers get their foreign and national news from a lot of places, such as Google or Yahoo Web sites.

Some in the room were stunned. Google and Yahoo do virtually no newsgathering of their own. Their sites publish stories from other news sources, including the L.A. Times. "It was mind-boggling that they thought there was some elf who plunked those stories there," says Mr. Weinstein. Mr. Smith recalls the conversation differently. He says he cited news sources such as broadcast TV, cable and online, and also talked of the company's commitment to national and international coverage.

In the same meeting, according to attendants, Mr. FitzSimons told the group that he didn't hate the Times and that the paper's success was important to Tribune. A reporter countered that when the L.A. Times won five Pulitzer Prizes in 2004, the chief executive hadn't come to the celebration. Mr. FitzSimons said he hadn't been invited.

Asked to comment for this article, Mr. Smith said in a written statement: "Each of our newspapers is committed to serving their communities exceptionally well through the very best locally focused journalism plus great coverage of national, international news and features." He added: "This broader coverage is enhanced through collaboration where each newspaper has access to the best stories created by talented journalists throughout the company."

Times Mirror and Tribune were both founded by conservative civic boosters. Tribune was started in 1847 and came into its own under Colonel Robert R. McCormick, who railed against Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal. The Tribune carried an American flag on its front-page banner, which also proclaimed it "World's Greatest Newspaper." It still occupies what was one of Chicago's earliest skyscrapers, heavy with fine stonework and quotations about press freedom on the walls.

Gen. Harrison Gray Otis founded Times Mirror in 1884. Under his family's ownership, the Los Angeles Times supported the expansion of the city's water supply, an event fictionalized in the movie "Chinatown." In the center of its lobby is a giant globe.

The two papers started to part ways when a fourth generation took over the L.A. Times. Under Otis Chandler, who was publisher from 1960 to 1980, the paper beefed up staffing levels and overseas reporting. He wanted to emulate East Coast institutions such as the New York Times and Washington Post. Photocopies of Mr. Chandler's image now festoon the Times newsroom.

The sprawling Los Angeles area is a patchwork of sometimes-disconnected communities, making local coverage a tricky proposition. The Times publishes ambitious, lengthy front-page features. But some locals complain that events halfway across the world are more thoroughly covered than news in their own backyard. The Times doesn't dominate its market the way many Eastern newspapers do. An exploding Latino population exacerbated that problem. So did the Internet.

"I didn't want to come back to work for a really good local newspaper and I still don't," says Douglas Frantz, who was coaxed from the New York Times to become a managing editor under Mr. Baquet.

Chicago, by contrast, is a venerable prairie city of neighborhoods and strong civic identity. In 1988, the Tribune won a Pulitzer for coverage of corruption at Chicago's City Council. Two of the honored reporters were Mr. Baquet and the Tribune's current editor Ann Marie Lipinski. She cites a feature that tracked a Chicago fugitive living in Mexico as an example of how the paper marries local and international coverage.

The paper has a folksy feel. One column, called "What's Your Problem?", allows readers to write in with everyday complaints. A few weeks ago, the paper held a lunch to celebrate the column's one-year anniversary. "It was a virtual lovefest with readers," says Ms. Lipinski.

In 2000, when Tribune first announced the merger with Times Mirror, it seemed like a savior. The L.A. Times had barely emerged from a major scandal. Departing from basic journalistic ethics, the paper published a special edition of its Sunday magazine focused on the new Staples Center while agreeing to share the resulting profits with the arena owners.

The conflict hurt the paper's credibility and led to the departure of a series of top executives and editors. It also helped convince the controlling Chandler family to give up their publishing empire. Times Mirror was notoriously poorly managed, and Tribune, known for its disciplined management, had been eyeing the property for years.

Tribune, which also owned the Orlando, Fla., Sentinel and two smaller papers, initially invested in the Times. It put Baltimore Sun editor John Carroll in charge and paid for a new California production facility.

DOJ_NMG_0093553

But the deal was struck at the height of the dotcom boom. Its rationale quickly faltered as newspapers became a less appealing venue for national advertising. Readers and advertisers instead flocked to cable television and the Internet.

In response, in 2002, Tribune began cutting costs heavily. Some of the most high-profile cuts came at the Baltimore Sun and Long Island, N.Y.'s Newsday, both Times Mirror properties, where there was an exodus of top editors. The Los Angeles Times proved the most difficult terrain. Tribune executives and Times editors were almost immediately at loggerheads.

The Tribune company wanted to encourage centralization and cooperation between its papers, allowing it to eliminate overlapping positions. Under the Chandlers, Times Mirror operated as a confederation of separate newspapers.

"They came into this deal with an idea of making a lot on national advertising and finding a lot of synergies, and none of that worked," says Mr. Carroll. "So they went on a cost-cutting binge."

On paper, Tribune saw obvious opportunities to eliminate redundancies. The Washington bureaus could theoretically be combined into one operation. Executives asked why the company needed to publish four different reviews of the same book.

Jack Fuller, a Pulitzer Prize winner at the Chicago Tribune and Tribune's publishing president, wanted to proceed carefully. Even though the L.A. Times was generally seen as overstaffed -- at the time it had 1,160 editorial staffers compared with the Tribune's roughly 680 -- Mr. Fuller didn't want to preside over the paper's decline, according to people familiar with his thinking. He was also conflicted, these people say: He wanted to hold up journalistic standards, but his job was also to make money.

"Broadly, his position, which none of us disputed, was that we didn't buy the L.A. Times, this great newspaper, to screw it up," says Howard Tyner, who succeeded Mr. Fuller as editor of the Chicago Tribune and has since retired. "And to go in with an ax was a good way to screw it up."

Mr. Carroll's approach to the 2002 budget pressures was to cut staffing at local editions in areas such as Orange County and the San Fernando Valley to preserve jobs in Washington and overseas. "We can either be five pretty good papers or one great one," he told staffers after he took the job, according to several Times staffers.

Some at Tribune say that likely contributed to declining circulation in Southern California, according to people familiar with their thinking. Mr. Carroll blames other problems for the declines, such as tighter controls on circulation following a scandal at the company's Newsday, and cutbacks in the paper's promotional budget.

Mr. Tyner says the Times Mirror papers resisted cooperating because they resented the loss of control. "I think it comes down to the fact that some of the big Times Mirror editors felt that working together was more of a threat to their style of journalism than a way to save it," says Mr. Tyner.

Tribune Co.'s Washington bureaus became a symbol -- some said an obsession -- of how the company wanted its newspapers to cooperate. At the time of the merger, Tribune's papers were already housed in the same building. After months of planning, Tribune moved five bureaus belonging to its Times Mirror papers to the same location, including the L.A. Times. Now, all of Tribune's nine Washington bureaus are "co-located" in the same building, with a common reception area and a centralized open meeting place where daily meetings to coordinate coverage take place around a U-shaped conference table.

When the idea of joining Washington bureaus first was raised, many Times Mirror editors objected strenuously. They argued that their stories needed to be tailored to individual markets and they couldn't share reporters with a paper from Chicago or Virginia.

Tribune is famous for benchmarking studies that compare its papers to one another. The company uses various measures, such as editorial costs as a percentage of revenue, number of staffers, average pay, newsprint and nonpayroll expenses.

In 2003, to push back on the question of the Washington bureau, Gerould Kern, Tribune's vice president of editorial, took a number of stories over a period of several months and compared them. "There was a high degree of overlapping coverage of routine events," Mr. Kern recalls. "There weren't a lot of stories that were related to their markets."

At that time, Mr. Kern says Tribune's D.C. bureaus were sharing as little as 8% of their content. Today, 35% to 40% of the content from D.C. is shared between papers, he says. The Los Angeles Times takes stories "less so than others," he says, but they do use some from the Chicago Tribune and other papers, while still debating about how to credit them.

The changes have allowed Tribune to cut the size of its D.C. newspaper and TV operations from 130 reporters in 2003 to 107 today.

Mr. Kern's studies also revealed another source of tension. In comparison after comparison, the Chicago Tribune was putting out its paper with fewer employees. L.A. Times executives countered that their product was of a higher quality.

In the summer of 2005, Mr. Carroll retired, citing the budget cuts as a primary reason. He was succeeded by Mr. Baquet. The paper's publisher, John Puerner, had left earlier that year for similar reasons.

In the last weeks of Mr. Carroll's tenure, Tribune surveyed the staffs of all its 11 papers. At the L.A. Times, the results showed that staff members supported Messrs. Carroll and Baquet and yet were "devastating in their attitude towards Tribune," Mr. Baquet says. When he first took over as editor, "I wanted to ease that."

DOJ_NMG_0093554

Mr. Baquet went to Tribune-wide editors' meetings held roughly twice a year. Mr. Carroll didn't engage in such events. "John may as well have taken his shoes off to clip his nails at those meetings," says one top Tribune company editor, an assessment Mr. Carroll doesn't dispute. At one such meeting earlier this year, Mr. FitzSimons, Tribune's CEO, pulled Mr. Baquet aside and said how much he appreciated his participation in the discussion, according to people familiar with the matter.

In fall 2005, shortly after Mr. Baquet took the job as editor, Mr. Kern, Tribune's editorial vice president, said all of the company's newspapers needed to cut 25% from their foreign budgets, according to people familiar with the matter. Mr. Baquet told colleagues he planned to take a lead role in the project to maintain as much control as possible.

As part of that year's cuts, the Times shut down one of its three printing plants and cut about 300 jobs, or between 8% and 10% of its work force. Roughly 90 of those were newsroom jobs.

As cost pressures increased, the two papers continued to spar, even about seemingly insignificant details. Last year, the Los Angeles Times won two Pulitzers -- one for a series on racial injustice and another on Russia's struggle with terrorism. The Chicago Tribune won one, for an account of a deadly 10-second tornado in Utica, Ill. When Tribune Co. sent out a congratulatory note to employees, the Chicago Tribune was listed before the Los Angeles Times. Staffers at the L.A. Times felt that Tribune had again shown preference for its hometown paper.

Earlier this year, the L.A. Times sent a reporter to cover a murder in Wisconsin, something that irked some Tribune executives, according to people familiar with their thinking. They thought such a story should have been left to the Chicago Tribune.

In May, Jeff Johnson, then publisher of the L.A. Times, went to Chicago to discuss budgets for 2007. He was told to cut another $45 million, roughly the same amount he had cut the year before, according to people familiar with the exchange. That was roughly twice what the Chicago Tribune was asked to cut from its budget, according to people familiar with both paper's finances.

Mr. Johnson, having suffered through one round of cost cutting, balked. After he returned to Los Angeles, Mr. Johnson, along with Mr. Baquet, was quoted in an L.A. Times story opposing the proposed budget cuts. Mr. Johnson's words carried a special edge because he had worked on the Tribune side of the house before moving to Los Angeles.

L.A. Times columnist Steve Lopez supported Mr. Johnson's apostasy. In an interview with the New York Times, he said the publisher had taken "a stiff drink of the Dean Baquet Kool-Aid."

Many predicted Mr. Johnson would be fired. Los Angeles civic leaders sent a letter to Mr. FitzSimons complaining about budget cuts. Wealthy Angelenos, including entertainment mogul David Geffen and real-estate tycoon Eli Broad, have expressed interest in buying the paper.

In early October, David Hiller, then publisher of the Chicago Tribune, flew to Los Angeles with Mr. Smith and several other Tribune executives. Tribune had decided that Mr. Hiller was going to take over at the L.A. Times and that Mr. Johnson was out.

People at the paper say an L.A. Times reporter received a tip that the men were in town. The reporter had also heard that Mr. Hiller's reservation was for a longer stay than that of the other executives, these people say. He passed the news onto a few editors, who surmised it meant that Mr. Johnson was out.

That Wednesday and Thursday, as the rumor spread, a steady stream of senior editors went into Mr. Baquet's office and urged him to stay, regardless of what happened to Mr. Johnson. Mr. Baquet didn't make any promises, according to several of the people who talked to him, but said he would put the paper first in any decision he made about his future.

Tribune planned to announce the change of publisher on Thursday. At breakfast that day, Mr. Hiller met Mr. Baquet at the Omni hotel in downtown Los Angeles, a few blocks from the Times's headquarters. When the waiter came by to pour Mr. Hiller's coffee, Mr. Baquet says he raised his hand to block the move, adding: "He'll have Kool-Aid." Mr. Hiller laughed, Mr. Baquet recalls.

Mr. Hiller said he was coming to the job with no preconceived notions, both men say. He asked Mr. Baquet to stay on at the paper and try to reach an accommodation. Mr. Baquet says he agreed.

In his first day on the job, Mr. Hiller went to the paper's news meeting. He was asked about the differences between the Tribune and the Times. Some L.A. Times staffers wanted him to acknowledge that theirs was a better paper, according to people who were there. Mr. Hiller ducked the question. He talked about how the two cities were different and how the papers were similar.

Earlier this week, Mr. Hiller put out a memo to the Times staff, saying that the paper needed to "focus relentlessly on growing local audience," unlike, he said, the New York Times, a paper that has been steadily increasing national coverage. He concluded: "We cannot allow ourselves to feel victimized by change or be in denial of what needs to be done to move us ahead." Many saw the news as a sign of more cuts to come.

DOJ_NMG_0093555

On Tuesday, Mr. Baquet announced he was leaving. His replacement, James O'Shea, a longtime editor at the Chicago Tribune, takes over from Mr. Baquet as editor of the L.A. Times on Monday. In an interview last week before his appointment was made public, he said reporters should be worrying more about readership than about cost cutting.

"The whole damn industry is focused on the wrong thing," he said. "We're all worried about how many people we have, and what we should really be worried about is declining readership."

At Mr. O'Shea's going-away party earlier this week, he got an ovation from the Chicago Tribune newsroom, say people who were there. They also gave him a gift: a plastic shield and body armor.

Write to Sarah Ellison at sarah.ellison@wsj.com1

ENVIRONMENT:

EPA Wants Man Fined For Silence On Pollution Role (SPT)

By Carrie Weimar

St Petersburg (FL) Times, November 11, 2006

TAMPA - A Dover business owner is facing fines of $32,500 a day for failing to comply with requests from the Environmental Protection Agency.

In a criminal complaint, the federal agency accuses Hugh Johnson, owner of Johnson's Oil Service, of ignoring requests for information regarding his alleged involvement in the pollution of what became a Superfund site in Polk County.

The site, 5015 State Road 60 in Mulberry, is the former home of Sadler Drum, which specialized in the washing and reconditioning of chemical drums. The owner abandoned the site in 1997, leaving hundreds of empty containers.

The EPA investigated the site and discovered the presence of dozens of dangerous chemicals. The cleanup cost more than $900,000 and 65 potentially responsible parties were identified, including Johnson, according to court documents.

Johnson did not return messages left at Johnson Oil Service on Friday.

The EPA sent a registered letter to Johnson in June 2003, requesting more information. Johnson signed for the letter but did not respond, the court documents said.

Letters also were sent in July and August 2004. Again, Johnson signed for them but did not respond, the documents said.

In June 2006, the Justice Department intervened, sending notice to Johnson he must respond or face judicial enforcement. Johnson did not respond.

The EPA is asking a judge to fine Johnson up to $27,500 a day for each day of noncompliance between June 2003 and March 2004. The amount increases to $32,500 a day after March 2004.

No trial date has yet been set.

Carrie Weimar can be reached at 813 226-3416 or cweimar@sptimes.com

Lawsuit Says Family Damaged Wetlands In Chesapeake (VP)

By Scott Harper

Virginian-Pilot, November 11, 2006

NORFOLK - The Justice Department has filed a federal lawsuit seeking fines and restoration of nontidal wetlands in southern Chesapeake that the government says were damaged in 1999.

But the property owners, the Bosher family, said this week that they did nothing wrong and that they were cleaning out existing ditches on their farmland at the time.

Family members say they have since spent thousands of dollars trying to clarify the issue with federal regulators, to no avail.

"It's been the most expensive, prolonged and painful experience," said Kitty Bosher, president and secretary of Sea Bay Development Corp. and Green Sea Farms LLC.

The two entities, both family-run, are listed as the owners of the site in question, known as the Bosher tract. At 1,560 acres, the tract is one of the largest undeveloped properties left in southern Chesapeake.

The case is another in a series of federal actions in recent years intended to protect nontidal wetlands - low-lying fields and forests found throughout Hampton Roads that filter pollutants, control flooding and provide wildlife habitat.

Such land features often are hard to differentiate from slightly squishy, unregulated properties, however, and do not resemble cattail-lined marshes and swamps, which are considered tidal wetlands.

Energy Demand Is Expected To Rise In 4th Quarter (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0093556

By Spencer Swartz

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

LONDON -- The International Energy Agency said global energy demand will jump in the fourth quarter because of U.S. consumption, while demand for oil produced by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries will rise to its highest level in four years.

The energy watchdog Friday said global oil demand will rise 2.6% from the year-earlier period, when demand was crimped by mild weather and the impact of Hurricane Katrina in the U.S., the world's biggest energy market.

In its widely watched monthly oil-market report for November, the IEA said global demand for OPEC oil is expected to rise 1.6 million barrels a day in the fourth quarter from the third quarter because of weaker output from non-OPEC countries.

The IEA trimmed its outlook for growth in 2006 global oil demand to 1.1% from 1.2% in its October report. Demand growth for 2007 was unchanged at 1.7%, the agency said. The IEA revised its fourth-quarter forecast for non-OPEC supply to 51.7 million barrels a day, a decrease of 200,000 barrels a day, and pegged 2006 growth at 700,000 barrels a day, saying weaker supplies in the North Sea, Russia, China, Brazil and Angola will counter "upward adjustments for North America, Australia, Azerbaijan and non-OPEC biofuels."

The Paris-based IEA's outlook points to tighter market conditions and higher energy prices just as OPEC oil-production cuts take effect. OPEC's output cuts, aimed unofficially at supporting oil prices back to the $60-a-barrel level, were sharply criticized by some oil analysts because of the onset of winter in the Northern Hemisphere and uncertainty about the strength of the global economy.

"To make an output cut in the fourth quarter is clearly going to tighten the market, the extent of which depends on how much output is actually cut and that's an uncertain situation," said Lawrence Eagles, editor of the IEA's monthly oil report.

Overall, the IEA expects OPEC's Doha deal to bolster falling oil prices by cutting 1.2 million barrels a day of actual output that will yield a physical reduction of 600,000 barrels a day to 900,000 barrels a day. "Depending upon compliance by non-Gulf members, some 600,000 to 900,000 barrels a day might be removed from the market as a result of the Doha decision," the report said.

Bill Allowing More Drilling Along Coasts Appears Dead (NYT)

By Clifford Krauss

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

HOUSTON, Nov. 9 — Just a few months ago House Republicans and representatives of the energy industry were poised to rewrite a quarter-century of national energy policy and open the seas off the Atlantic and Pacific coasts to oil and gas drilling, which environmentalists had fervently resisted.

But Tuesday's Democratic victory in midterm elections has changed the legislative landscape, obliterating the chances that anything close to the aggressive drilling bill passed by the House of Representatives will be enacted for years to come.

Now, with the Democrats' mid-term election victory, the proponents of drilling off the nation's beaches are reluctantly jockeying to settle for a small patch of new offshore exploration allowed in a competing and more modest Senate drilling bill. "I don't want to end up having no progress," said Representative John E. Peterson, a Pennsylvania Republican who is a leading proponent for expanded offshore drilling. "Something is better than nothing."

He added, "With Nancy Pelosi as speaker it will be difficult to talk about producing in the outer continental shelf."

Dave Parker, president of the American Gas Association, which represents utilities, said: "It's a matter of being pragmatic. The Republicans who had thought they would retain control basically now have one option, which is to accept the Senate-passed version."

The Senate bill opens to bidding 8.3 million acres of federal waters in the Gulf of Mexico. The waters, south of the Florida Panhandle and 235 miles west of Tampa, are thought to hold 5.8 trillion cubic feet of natural gas and 1.3 billion barrels of crude oil.

Exxon Mobil, Shell, BP, ConocoPhillips and many independents are expected to make bids in the area, known as Lease Area 181, which is attractive because it is relatively shallow and close to pipelines and other infrastructure built previously.

Many lawmakers and energy industry officials had expressed little enthusiasm for the Senate bill before the election. They said it was too limited because it would produce, at most, only the equivalent of two months of domestic demand for oil, along with enough gas to cool and heat six million homes for 15 years.

Unlike the House version, the Senate bill would prohibit drilling over a far greater area, in particular a section 125 miles off most of Florida's west coast.

DOJ_NMG_0093557

The House bill, passed in June, would virtually eliminate a federal moratorium on drilling on most of the outer continental shelf off the Atlantic and Pacific coasts that has been in place since 1982. In the summer, energy industry leaders were in strong support of the House bill.

Industry officials said drilling off the two coasts would add enormous amounts of oil and gas to the national inventory over many years, though the exact amounts are not known.

Brian J. Kennedy, deputy chief of staff for the House Committee on Resources, conceded that there was now no chance of expanding offshore drilling at anything close to what the House had hoped for, but he expressed hope that a law could be enacted in the lame-duck session.

Speaking of Representative Richard W. Pombo of California, chairman of the Resources Committee and chief backer of the House bill, Mr. Kennedy added, “The chairman wants a bill and he’ll do everything he can to make sure we get a bill.” Mr. Pombo lost his re-election bid.

Mr. Kennedy said Senate and House leaders had already agreed to some compromises, a provision to recover up to $13 billion in lost revenue from energy companies and a set-aside of some future energy production revenue for rural schools.

Some Senate Republicans would like to amend the Senate bill to give Virginia an option to opt out of the moratorium, according to Congressional sources. But it remains doubtful Senate Democratic leaders would go along with such a version.

Before the midterm election was tallied, lobbyists for energy and manufacturing companies switched tack and began pressing Congressional leaders and the White House to enact the Senate bill passed in August and discard most if not all of the far more ambitious House bill.

Industry officials said the lobbying campaign began weeks ago when it became clear that Democrats had a good chance of taking the House. “I would hope that the House could appreciate what is possible and try to help move forward for the American people,” John Hofmeister, president of Shell Oil, said in an interview. “Let’s get a bill cleared that the president can sign.”

IMMIGRATION:

Democrats To "Revisit" Law Creating Border Fence (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, November 11, 2006

Democrats will look again at the legislation mandating 698 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border and might seek to scrap the plan altogether when they take control of Congress next year.

Rep. Bennie Thompson, Mississippi Democrat, told reporters this week that he expected to "revisit" the issue when he becomes chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee in the 110th Congress.

Mr. Thompson said the Department of Homeland Security's (DHS) new border enforcement program, known as the Secure Border Initiative or SBI Net -- which includes monitors, cameras and other integrated surveillance systems -- is a viable alternative to fencing.

"We might do away with it, or look at [integrating it into] SBI Net," he said. "A virtual fence rather than a real one."

President Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff have voiced similar concerns about building the fence.

DHS spokesman Russ Knocke told United Press International that in remote border areas, "virtual fencing ... is more advantageous," whereas "traditional fencing has a core role in our border security strategy ... especially in urban areas."

"We're optimistic that working with Congress we'll get the flexibility to integrate traditional fencing into a seamless, high-tech border security system," Mr. Knocke said.

Mr. Thompson also pledged more aggressive oversight of the department, saying that improving its responsiveness to congressional requests for information and reports would be at the "top of my agenda."

He said his committee would seek to boost funding for rail and mass transit; strengthen security regulations for chemical plants and container cargo; and implement what he said were a number of recommendations from the September 11 commission that have yet to be addressed.

Mr. Thompson pledged to pass an authorization bill for the department. The committee has approved an authorization bill the past three years, but the legislation hasn't passed the full Senate, which some attribute to turf conflicts with other committees.

Mr. Thompson acknowledged that "there will still be some split jurisdiction," but maintained that Democrats would be in a better position to work out turf issues. "We can make it work," he said.

He pledged to demand answers from Mr. Chertoff on what he said was an unacceptable level of vacancies in the department's senior ranks.

DOJ_NMG_0093558

"The secretary needs to come clean with the committee and tell us why he can't fill these positions," Mr. Thompson said, adding that Mr. Chertoff would need to come up with ideas to address the situation, "or we will have to provide some ideas for him."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush, Pelosi Pledge To Work Together (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - After demonizing each other on the campaign trail, President Bush and House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi met over plates of pasta at the White House on Thursday and agreed to seek common ground on Iraq and other national problems.

The bipartisan pledges of cooperation generated considerable skepticism in Washington, a city accustomed to partisan warfare. But Bush has reached effectively across party lines before, both as governor of Texas and early in his presidency.

"We won't agree on every issue," Bush told reporters after the peacemaking lunch. "But we do agree that we love America equally, that we're concerned about the future of this country and that we will do our very best to address big problems."

Pelosi, a California liberal who's in line to become speaker of the House of Representatives, said she would use her leadership role to represent "all of the House, not just the Democrats."

Bush also reached out to Senate Democrats, who took control of their chamber Thursday when Sen. George Allen, R-Va., conceded defeat to Democrat James Webb. Bush placed a congratulatory phone call to Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and invited him to the White House on Friday.

Some Democrats who have worked with Bush in the past said Tuesday's elections brought out a side of him that's been missing in recent years.

Former Texas state Rep. Paul Sadler, a Democrat who considers Bush a friend, said he was puzzled by the style the president adopted when he moved to Washington in 2000. "It's almost like he was hijacked," Sadler said.

In Texas, Bush worked closely with Sadler and other Democrats on a host of issues, including an unsuccessful effort to overhaul the state's tax system. The late Lt. Gov. Bob Bullock, the state's leading Democrat at the time, became so fond of Bush that he supported his re-election as governor.

As a presidential candidate, Bush pledged to bring that spirit to Washington, saying he wanted to be "a uniter, not a divider." He started out that way, at least on some issues. During his first year in office, Bush joined forces with Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., to pass his No Child Left Behind education law.

"The folks at the Crawford Coffee Shop would be somewhat shocked when I told them I actually like the fellow. He is a fabulous United States senator," Bush said when he signed the legislation in January 2002 with Kennedy at his side. "When he's against you, it's tough. When he's with you, it is a great experience."

The fracture in bipartisan cooperation widened during the 2002 election, when Bush cast Democrats as soft on terrorism. It became a chasm with the bitterness over the Iraq war.

Former Texas State Rep. Mark Stiles, another Democrat who worked with Bush, blamed party politics for Bush's transition from uniter to divider. Stiles, who quit politics and is now a political independent, said he has been surprised by the harshness of Bush's campaign attacks.

"That's not the George Bush that I know. He can work with anybody," Stiles said. "When you get up there, things change. Maybe the system's changed him."

Both Sadler and Stiles speculated that political adviser Karl Rove pushed the president to become more partisan. Rove, who's known for hardball politics, is one of the few presidential advisers who came with Bush from Texas and remains on the job. He's considered Bush's closest adviser, eclipsed only by the president's wife.

To be sure, Democrats also have played a big role in escalating partisan warfare. But on Thursday, both Bush and Pelosi tried to distance themselves from their previous attacks on each other.

"The elections are now behind us," Bush said. "But the challenges still remain."

On A Shifting Field, A Sense Of Rising Expectations (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093559

WASHINGTON, Nov. 9 — It was no doubt inadvertent, but it was hard not to find some symbolism in the moment Thursday in the Oval Office when President Bush seemed to forget that Vice President Dick Cheney was in the room.

Representatives Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader who is soon to become the first female speaker of the House, and Steny H. Hoyer, the Democratic whip, had come to the White House for lunch. As the two Democrats, Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney sat in front of a fireplace, the president spoke about the importance of working together to get things done.

"Both of us recognize — all three of us," Mr. Bush said, apparently referring to himself, Ms. Pelosi and Mr. Hoyer, "recognize that when you win, you have a responsibility to do the best you can for the country."

The omission of Mr. Cheney, the embodiment of the administration's approach to national security, raised an intriguing question. As Mr. Bush grapples with the loss of his Republican majority in Congress, how far will he go to reinvent himself, and who — or what philosophies — is he willing to jettison along the way?

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has already been pushed out the door, and there were questions on Thursday about the future of Karl Rove, the political strategist whose divide-and-conquer tactics failed on Tuesday for the first time. Asked what role Mr. Rove would play now, Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, offered little insight.

"That's a good process question," Mr. Snow said, "for which I don't have an answer."

It has been six years since Mr. Bush was elected on a record of working with moderate Democrats in Texas and a promise of being "a uniter, not a divider." In that time, his efforts at unity have been intended mostly to hold together and motivate his conservative base: social conservatives who oppose same-sex marriage, fiscal conservatives who demand spending restraint, neo-conservatives whose muscular foreign policy vision provided the foundation for the democracy agenda and the Iraq war.

Now that Republicans have taken what he calls "a thumping" — losing control of both the House and Senate in a virtual political earthquake — Mr. Bush is striking a conciliatory note. Last week, Democrats were weak on defense and wrong on taxes. By Thursday, Mr. Bush had this to say about them:

"We won't agree on every issue, but we do agree that we love America equally, that we're concerned about the future of this country and that we will do our very best to address big problems."

It might seem like the new George W. Bush — or maybe the old one, returning to his Texas governor roots. But, Republicans say, it is really just the same President Bush — the first M.B.A. president, pragmatic enough to recognize, as he himself might say, that he must adjust his tactics to changing conditions on the ground.

"You're seeing the George Bush who has always been adept at playing the hand he is dealt," said Charlie Black, a Republican strategist with close ties to the White House.

Vin Weber, a Republican former congressman and lobbyist, put it this way: "I've never thought that George Bush was a rigid ideologue; I've never thought that he was a hardened partisan. He is a businessman first, and in business you don't spend a lot of time crying about changed circumstances. You figure out quickly how to adapt, and that's what he's doing."

But Mr. Bush demonstrated Thursday that he is not going overboard to adapt.

With his cabinet arrayed behind him, he greeted reporters in the Rose Garden to say that, before Republicans ceded control of Congress at the end of the year, he wanted them to pass legislation codifying his authority to run a once-secret domestic wiretapping program — anathema to many Democrats. Mr. Bush is also pressing the lame-duck Senate to confirm John R. Bolton, whom he installed as ambassador to the United Nations during a recess, circumventing Democrats who oppose Mr. Bolton.

Mr. Snow, the press secretary, was told that did not exactly sound like an olive branch, and he replied, "Let me put it this way, olive branches work in two directions."

Neo-conservatives, though chastened by Tuesday's results, said they did not expect radical change, despite Mr. Bush's announcement that he would nominate Robert M. Gates, a former C.I.A. director, to succeed Mr. Rumsfeld.

"I don't think Gates means the president is looking for a way out of Iraq," said William Kristol, the editor of The Weekly Standard, a conservative magazine. "Gates means he knew he had to make a change and get a fresh face in to build public support. So long as Bush is president, he's not going to want to withdraw from Iraq, and he's not going to want to go back to a pre-9/11 foreign policy, and that's really the core of it."

Democrats, not surprisingly, were a tad suspicious. Tom Daschle, who served as Democratic leader of the Senate during the brief period when Democrats were in the majority under Mr. Bush, said he saw little evidence that the White House could depart from its "arrogance and extraordinary single-mindedness."

Mr. Daschle invoked Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California, who famously repaired his relationship with Democrats. "But I don't think he's motivated in the same way," Mr. Daschle said of Mr. Bush. "Arnold Schwarzenegger wanted to get re-elected. There's no real motivation for Bush."

But there is motivation for Democrats — and Mr. Bush intends to exploit that if he can.

DOJ_NMG_0093560

“Their whole theme has been the do-nothing Congress,” Mr. Black, the Republican strategist, said. “Now, if they get in there and make themselves vulnerable to that charge, it hurts them in ’08. He knows that they have an incentive to get things done, and he’s going to take advantage of that.”

If it works — and that is a big if — some Republicans say it could be an opportunity for Mr. Bush to refurbish his presidency. It is an old saw of politics that you never win by losing, but Tuesday’s drubbing leaves Mr. Bush a liberated man, free to cooperate with Democrats without worrying about his base or the next election.

“It could be the saving grace of his administration,” said Kenneth M. Duberstein, chief of staff to President Ronald Reagan, “because it gives him an opportunity to demonstrate real presidential leadership that is inclusive, right of center but not far right of center, which is where the American people are.”

Gridlock Need Not Be Inevitable For Bush (AP-Y)

By Laurie Kellman, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

Now that voters have rejected one-party rule in Washington, can a president of one party and a Congress led by the other play nicely enough to accomplish anything in the next two years?

It's been done in the past.

Still, President Bush and lawmakers on both sides of the aisle will have to put aside at least some of their pre-election rancor and suppress any desire to get even.

For his part, Bush tried to move past the bitter tone of the campaign within hours of its end by granting a top demand of the Democrats: the ouster of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. And he invited newly empowered Democratic leaders to lunch at the White House — serving Speaker-in-waiting Nancy Pelosi her favorite food, chocolate.

For her part, Pelosi stopped calling Bush incompetent and dangerous. Instead, she made a point of deeming the lunch lovely and speaking of "some areas" where bipartisanship was possible.

Yet to be seen is whether the conciliatory gestures and promises to work together can endure long enough for Congress and the president to produce laws addressing big problems and restore trust in the government.

Role models exist. So does the motivation to follow their lead as the two years before the 2008 elections tick away. Providing the opportunity: a slate of stalled legislation on immigration, Iraq and terrorism that voters named as important in exit polls this week.

Bush and Congress might follow the lead of President Eisenhower and the new Democratic majority of 1954, which established the Interstate highway system less than two years later.

They can look to President Nixon, who signed into law major environmental initiatives — the Clean Air Act and the Environmental Protection Agency — negotiated with Democratic majorities on Capitol Hill.

Ronald Reagan and the Democratic House and Senate passed legislation sustaining Social Security for another three decades. A key deficit reduction program and the Americans With Disabilities Act became law when Democrats ran the Congress and Bush's father was president.

And in the 1990s, President Clinton and a new Republican majority overhauled the nation's welfare laws, an achievement each side hailed as one of its best.

Many experts say that Democrats and Republicans are too polarized for that to happen now, despite the initial overtures of good will.

"White House officials do not expect that a Democratic-controlled Congress would work with them in any sincere or meaningful way," said George C. Edwards III, a political science professor at Texas A&M University. "True or not, this perception could become a self-fulfilling prophecy."

Democrats admit to struggling with the temptation to get even for six years of being shut out of final negotiations with the White House and majority Republicans on major issues like homeland security, tax cuts and the Medicare prescription drug program.

But both Bush and the Democrats have reasons to mend fences. In the twilight of a wartime presidency, Bush could polish his legacy by reviving his uniter-not-a-divider campaign promise of 2000.

Lawmakers in both parties, some of them beginning what amounts to a two-year job interview for the presidency, also have an incentive to move away from confrontation politics. If they need a reminder, they might look at the 61 percent disapproval rating Congress received in the exit polls this week.

As for Bush, he's got a long way to build on the 43 percent approval rating those same polls gave him.

"There's no way in the world that Democrats can achieve anything if we try to get even," cautioned Rep. Charlie Rangel of New York, the likely next chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0093561

Opportunities for forging compromises addressing serious problems include:

· Overhauling immigration policy to bestow legal status on some of the 11 million illegal immigrants in the country.

· Agreeing on a course for the war in Iraq, the top issue voters identified in pre-election polls.

· Fixing the alternative minimum tax, a measure that was intended to close tax loopholes for millionaires but that now, through inflation, threatens to impose higher taxes on millions of middle-income families.

_Addressing looming insolvencies in the Social Security and Medicare programs as post-World War II baby boomers retire.

_Improving health programs for the nation's 24 million veterans and the tens of thousands more who will pile into the system as a result of Iraq and Afghan wars.

Bush Meets With Pelosi; Both Vow Cooperation (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Jonathan Weisman, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

President Bush, confronted face to face with the reality of divided government, broke bread with the two top House Democrats at the White House and vowed not to allow partisan divisions to hobble the remaining two years of his presidency.

After meeting separately with his Cabinet and the outgoing GOP congressional leadership, Bush laid out an agenda for the lame-duck congressional session that begins next week, including a nuclear technology deal with India, a free-trade agreement with Vietnam and his plan to permit wiretapping of terrorism suspects without a court warrant.

But prospects for controversial items such as wiretapping legislation seemed remote yesterday, as the concession of Sen. George Allen (R) in Virginia made it official that the Democrats will control that chamber as well as the House come January.

Meeting with reporters in her office after meeting with Bush at the White House, the House speaker-to-be, Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), said Democrats could reach accord with Bush on the legislation but will insist on some kind of judicial review of each wiretap the Justice Department seeks.

Pelosi and Bush offered smiles and pledges of cooperation as they faced reporters in the Oval Office after a lunch of pasta salad in the president's private dining room. "We won't agree on every issue," Bush said. "But we do agree that we love America equally, that we are concerned about the future of the country and that we will do our very best to address big problems."

"We both extended the hand of friendship," said Pelosi, who will be the first female speaker of the House in history when the new Congress convenes.

The meeting was the first substantive discussion between Bush and Democrats since the election Tuesday returned the opposition party to power on Capitol Hill. In recent years, Bush has governed without the support of congressional Democrats on most issues, and the new political reality will require him to work much more closely with Pelosi and the soon-to-be Senate majority leader, Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). Bush is to meet today with Reid and Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), the next Democratic whip.

Despite deep philosophical differences and sharp election-year rhetoric from both sides, the White House and congressional Democrats may share some interest in finding common ground on such issues as overhauling the immigration system, education and energy, according to lawmakers and administration officials. Democratic leaders seem anxious to show they can deliver as a governing party after years in opposition, while Bush is aware that his final two years will be bereft of any significant initiative unless he can work with the party he demonized on the campaign trail.

Despite conciliatory rhetoric, there were flashes yesterday of the potential obstacles ahead. The White House once again asked the Senate to approve the nomination of controversial U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton, who holds the post after a recess appointment, but Democrats -- and a key Republican -- quickly moved to block the action. In her interview with reporters, Pelosi said Democrats will act immediately to reinstate lapsed budget rules, which mandate that any new tax cuts or spending increases be paid for with equal spending cuts or tax hikes. That would all but shut the door on Bush's main economic priority, making his first-term tax cuts permanent.

The new House and Senate leadership will also quickly challenge Bush on stem cell research, Pelosi said. Democrats expect to pass legislation early next year that would be almost identical to the only bill he has vetoed, a measure to expand federal funding of stem cells beyond the few lines already in existence. The addition of 29 Democratic seats in the House and six in the Senate is probably not enough to override a veto, Pelosi conceded, but Democrats hope to "build public support for a signature."

But Pelosi and the House's No. 2 Democrat, Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (Md.), who also attended the White House lunch, indicated they came away from their meeting with a sense that they could work with Bush. In an apparent effort to demonstrate goodwill, Pelosi added that Democrats will take up the "innovation agenda" laid out by Bush nearly a year ago in his State of the Union address, and pass his proposals to increase funding for basic scientific research and alternative energy programs.

DOJ_NMG_0093562

Hoyer said in an interview that he believed the two sides could also reach agreement on a comprehensive immigration bill that includes both tough enforcement measures and some kind of guest-worker program. Such legislation has been blocked by House GOP leadership, and Hoyer pointed out, "The Senate Democrats and the Senate Republicans and the House Democrats are more in agreement than the president and House Republicans."

Hoyer, who faces a challenge for the job of majority leader from Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), described the lunch session as a cordial meeting in which a variety of topics -- fiscal policy, Social Security, Medicare and Iraq, among others -- were discussed in general terms. He said Vice President Cheney also attended but said little beyond pleasantries.

"There was no point in time where we said, 'We'll support this, and the president would support that.' That was not the point of the meeting," Hoyer said. He said Pelosi "clearly made the point that the American people believe that we are doing in Iraq is not working, and we need to address it. . . . The president said, 'I hope we can discuss that.' "

Pelosi has indicated that the first order of business when the new House convenes will be a package of bills touted during the campaign that include raising the minimum wage, cutting student loan rates and allowing the federal government to negotiate lower drug prices with pharmaceutical companies -- which Congress barred when it approved a new Medicare drug plan for seniors.

On some issues, Democrats are plainly hoping to put Bush on the defensive with legislation they believe is popular with the American people -- confronting Bush with a choice of whether to go along or fight on unfavorable terrain.

"They are not going to invite each other to their respective Christmas dinners, but I think there's an agenda that Pelosi has put on the table that the president could embrace," said John Podesta, the president of the Center for American Progress and a former Clinton White House chief of staff. "It's kind of galling to him to do it, but the public would reward him. Having to explain to the American people why you wouldn't want the authority to negotiate with drug companies about prices would be hard to do."

Edward Kutler, a Washington lobbyist and former aide to onetime GOP Speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.), said the Democrats seem to be dangling "veto bait" before the president that could "poison the well" before too long. "There's possibility for bipartisan compromise," he said, "but there's a limited window and there's a limited universe of issues."

"A lot of Republicans are going to say, the Democrats won -- let's let the Democrats produce legislation and see what can be done," he added.

Once the honeymoon ends, said John J. Pitney Jr., a congressional expert at Claremont McKenna College, "not a lot" will get done. "The relationship is going to be a mix between cooperation and confrontation, but given the chemistry, confrontation is going to be much more prevalent," he said.

Bush could work w ith a Democratic legislature when he was a governor. But, referring to the late conservative Democratic legislative leader in Texas, Pitney asked: "Does Nancy Pelosi look like Bob Bullock? Congressional Democrats are quite different from their counterparts in Austin."

White House counselor Dan Bartlett said of the Pelosi-Bush-Hoyer session: "It genuinely was a positive meeting. The attitude of the Democratic leaders was one of cooperation."

Referring to energy, immigration and education, Bartlett added: "There are issues when you peel back the rhetoric where you find greater consensus."

Democratic Victory Raises Spirits Of Those Favoring Citizenship For Illegal Aliens (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

PHOENIX, Nov. 9 — Supporters of granting citizenship to some or all illegal immigrants say the Democratic takeover of Congress has galvanized their cause and could lead to sweeping changes in immigration law.

Democrats will take over leadership of committees in the House and the Senate that could guide new immigration legislation, while President Bush and the presumptive House speaker, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, have cast changes to immigration laws as an opportunity to demonstrate bipartisan bonhomie.

“We have never had the table set for the possibility of action as we do now,” Andrea LaRue, a Democratic political consultant, said in a conference call with reporters.

Some immigration experts, however, predict a more arduous debate. Although conservative Republicans have led the opposition to accommodating some illegal immigrants, a handful of the newly elected Democrats, including Claire A. McCaskill of Missouri and Jim Webb of Virginia in the Senate, campaigned promising a tough approach to illegal immigration.

Some Democratic incumbents who won re-election did the same.

“It is still a long way from a deal,” said Roberto Suro of the Pew Hispanic Center, a Washington research group. “The question is, can somebody illuminate a middle ground where people who come at this issue from all different directions can reach a settlement.”

DOJ_NMG_0093563

Supporters of more relaxed policies on illegal immigration count among the casualties of the Democratic victory at least 11 House members who had opposed giving illegal immigrants an opportunity to gain legal residency and, ultimately, citizenship.

Representative J. D. Hayworth published a book on immigration titled "Whatever It Takes" and campaigned heavily on a platform of sealing the border and ejecting illegal immigrants.

Although Mr. Hayworth, a six-term Republican from the suburbs of Phoenix, has not conceded defeat, unofficial tallies indicate that he has lost his seat by four percentage points to a Democrat, Harry Mitchell.

Mr. Mitchell, who is a former mayor of Tempe, had said that a path to citizenship made sense in some cases.

Also in Arizona, a self-described Minuteman border vigilante, Randy Graf, a Republican seeking an open seat near the border, was soundly defeated by Gabrielle Giffords, a Democrat willing to consider citizenship for some illegal immigrants.

The Republican-controlled Congress failed to pass a broad immigration bill this session, stuck over whether to provide steps toward citizenship for illegal immigrants, although a measure calling for 700 miles of fencing on the 2,000-mile border was approved, with the backing of several Democrats, and signed by Mr. Bush.

Many political analysts, however, called the fence an election-eve effort to placate conservatives that stood little chance of being completely built.

Still, the Federation for American Immigration Reform, a Washington group favoring tighter limits on immigration, said six state ballot initiatives making life harder on illegal immigrants were approved by voters on Tuesday, four of them in Arizona, where immigration is intensely discussed, and two in Colorado.

The Arizona measures include blocking illegal immigrants from collecting punitive damages in civil lawsuits, being released on bail for serious felonies and taking state-subsidized adult education and child care programs.

In Colorado, the measures require the state attorney general to sue the federal government for failing to enforce immigration laws and deny tax credits to employers who knowingly hire illegal workers.

Bruce Merrill, an Arizona State University pollster, said the measures were popular because voters believed the federal government was not taking action.

"My feeling is that the frustration with nothing being done was so strong that if there had been 10 initiatives dealing with cracking down on illegal immigration, all 10 of them would have passed," Mr. Merrill said.

"In other words," he said, "what the initiatives were proposing substantively may not have been as important as giving people something, anything, they could vote for to feel something was being done."

Advocates of a get-tough approach said that despite their losses they had gained in the battle of ideas.

"When the incumbent Democrat runs a race on securing the border and cutting taxes, our ideas are doing just fine, let's remember that," said Len Munsil, the Republican candidate for governor who was soundly defeated by the incumbent, Janet Napolitano, a Democrat.

The governor had declared an emergency on the border last year and called for National Guard troops to go there.

Senator Jon Kyl, a two-term Republican who supports a temporary guest worker program but not provisions that would lead to citizenship for illegal workers already here, won re-election by a healthy margin.

The final days of the race, however, focused less on immigration than on the backgrounds of the contenders.

Still, immigration advocates said the Democratic gains had brought new energy to a cause that seemed to flag after a round of demonstrations in the spring were followed by disappointing results in legislation and voter registration drives that fell short of goals.

The election "shows what we have been saying all along, that the anti-immigrant, enforcement-only rhetoric to motivate conservative voters was not reflecting where the majority of Americans are on this issue," said Angela Sembrano, director of the Central American Resource Center in Los Angeles, one of the groups that helped organize large pro-immigrant marches in the spring.

Ms. Sembrano and other protest leaders said that, in the afterglow of election night, they would refrain from detailing what they will ask of Democrats until they meet with the new leadership in the coming weeks. But Chung-Wha Hong, executive director the New York Immigration Coalition, said the goal would still be "legalization for as many people as possible."

People on all sides of the immigration debate had watched Arizona closely because illegal immigration has surged dramatically here in the past decade while its politics drifted toward the center from the right.

Earl de Berge, a veteran pollster here, said Republicans who made a hard-line approach the centerpiece of their campaigns misjudged a moderating shift.

"The fact is immigration was not, never has been, and is not the No. 1 issue in this state," Mr. De Berge said. "The big issues were the same as the ones nationally, the war, the economy and Bush and so on."

"The mistake Graf and Hayworth made," he said, "is that they simply were outmaneuvered by their own insistence on beating on that one issue."

DOJ_NMG_0093564

"This," he added, "is a moderate state, not a conservative Republican state."

Harry Reid, An Infighter With A Sharp Jab (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 9 — Harry Reid began Election Day with 50 situps and 80 push-ups (very red state of him) and 40 minutes of yoga (very blue state of him).

He spent most of the momentous day in his Senate office, waiting. Just after 2 p.m., he finally heard some actual news: Britney Spears was filing for divorce.

"Britney Spears," Mr. Reid said, shaking his head. "She loses a little weight, and now she's getting all cocky about things." He added, "Britney has gotten her mojo back."

Few would peg Mr. Reid, 66, as someone with anything to say about Britney Spears or, for that matter, someone who would ever use the word "mojo." But he is a tricky figure to pigeonhole or predict, a Democrat who is a Mormon opposed to abortion and who looks more like a civics teacher than someone set to become the most powerful person in the Senate.

He makes an unlikely front man, a role that was displayed Thursday amid chants of "Harry, Harry" at a Capitol Hill rally shortly after Senator George Allen's concession in Virginia ensured that Democrats would have a majority in the Senate. Mr. Reid is low-key, deferential and somewhat sheepish, qualities that make it easy to misread or underestimate him.

"People can say he is a nice guy, but that just totally misses it," said Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York. "He's got a spine of steel, and he will go toe-to-toe with anyone."

Harry Mason Reid is the product of the tiny desert town of Searchlight, Nev., whose father, a hard-rock miner, battled alcoholism and depression before killing himself at 58. The future senator hitchhiked 40 miles to attend high school in Henderson, where he became an amateur boxer.

He came to Washington to attend law school, working nights as a Capitol police officer. He was elected to the Nevada State Assembly at 28, served as lieutenant governor and later led the state's Gaming Commission, a job that pitted him against organized crime figures. (Mr. Reid's wife, Landra, once found a bomb under the hood of the family car.) He was elected to Congress in 1982, and moved to the Senate four years later.

Mr. Reid has brought his pugilistic sensibility to his career, often taking jabs at those he deems unworthy. In Mr. Reid's two-year run as minority leader, he called Alan Greenspan, the former Federal Reserve chairman, "a political hack"; Justice Clarence Thomas "an embarrassment"; and President Bush a "loser" and a "liar." Within that litany, Mr. Reid says he regrets only calling Mr. Bush a loser.

All of which has made Mr. Reid a reliable bogeyman among Republicans on the stump. But he has also enjoyed the loyalty and, for the most part, the unity of a potentially fractious Democratic caucus that includes several would-be presidential candidates.

That devotion was displayed and returned on election night, as Mr. Reid placed phone calls to successful Democratic Senate candidates from his suite at the Hyatt Regency Hotel.

"Bob, you did it, my man," Mr. Reid said to Senator Robert Menendez, who was re-elected in New Jersey.

"Hillary, you're the best to work with," Mr. Reid told Mrs. Clinton. "Love you," he signed off. (Mrs. Clinton offers that she ended the call by saying, "Love you, too, Harry.")

Mr. Reid also professed his love to Senator Kent Conrad, who was re-elected in North Dakota. ("Love you, man.")

Later, when Claire C. McCaskill, another Democrat, was declared the winner in Missouri, Mr. Reid kissed the television.

He and Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New Yorker who leads the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, kept whacking each other like kids. "Remember, Chuck, when they said Sherrod was too liberal?" Mr. Reid said of Sherrod Brown, the newly elected senator from Ohio.

Mr. Schumer said nothing, but gave Mr. Reid something between a pat on the head and a noogie.

By Thursday, the elation of early Wednesday had given way to exhaustion and talk of working with Republicans. "It is time for bipartisanship," Mr. Reid said at the rally, a few seconds after he was introduced for the first time as the majority leader of the Senate. (It is not official until January.)

He took the stage to the blare of Sheryl Crow's "A Change Would Do You Good," but it looked as if a good night's sleep would do him better. His makeup could not hide the bags and crags on his un-Botoxed face.

People who know Mr. Reid say he is much more suited to work with Republicans than his partisan reputation would suggest.

DOJ_NMG_0093565

"His personality will be more conducive to being a majority leader than minority leader," said Sig Rogich, a Republican consultant from Nevada and a close friend of Mr. Reid. "He has always been more of a consensus-building type than the over-the-top partisan that his current role has demanded."

Some of those considered the most effective recent majority leaders have been strategists and rule-book students, like George J. Mitchell, Democrat of Maine, or Bob Dole, Republican of Kansas. Mr. Reid's supporters say he fits in that tradition. "I doubt that anyone knows any more rules of the Senate than Harry," said Frank J. Fahrenkopf Jr., the former chairman of the Republican National Committee and a longtime friend of Mr. Reid.

Mr. Reid is often credited with outmaneuvering his predecessor, Senator Bill Frist, Republican of Tennessee, who had relatively little legislative experience when he became majority leader in 2003. Mr. Reid once shut down the Senate, invoking a little-used procedure to force closed-door discussion about the intelligence the Bush administration used to justify war in Iraq, and he succeeded in holding his caucus together to defeat efforts by Republicans to prohibit filibusters over judicial appointments, retaining a long-held Senate precedent. Mr. Reid voted against Mr. Bush's nominations of John G. Roberts Jr. and Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Supreme Court; opposed Republican efforts to abolish the estate tax; and supported giving the president authorization to invade Iraq, though he now advocates a phased withdrawal of American troops.

Mr. Reid will not venture a guess about what kind of majority leader he will be. "I'm going to throw bombs sometimes — I'm going to be conciliatory other times," he said in his office late Thursday. "If it comes to me that Alan Greenspan is a political hack, I'm just going to say that. I'm just going to be who I am. "

Mr. Reid added that he would "try not to be obnoxious," but also allowed that "the Senate is not a place for hugs and kisses." He said he realized that as a legislator, he could not get anything done without compromising with the president, whom he was scheduled to meet with Friday morning. He said he could not remember the last time he was invited to the White House.

"I have hope it will change," Mr. Reid said of his largely nonexistent working relationship with Mr. Bush and other administration officials. "Whether it will or not, I can't say."

Mr. Reid is nothing if not battle-worn and realistic, friends say. He describes himself as "a pessimist about everything in life," which is generally not something politicians admit.

"I never thought we could do it," he said of winning the Senate. "I knew it was possible in my head, but I never let my heart believe it."

Bush, Democrats Pledge To Work Together (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

President Bush opened the Oval Office Friday for a second day in a row to Democrats who will rule Capitol Hill next year, and both sides promised cooperation. But Democrats' heads were shaking over Bush demands for the current lame-duck GOP Congress to enact measures they oppose.

"It's a little bit of a mixed message, sure," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid, who is set to be majority leader when his party assumes power in January. "Folks are scratching their heads a little bit."

Bush invited Reid and the Senate's No. 2 Democrat, Dick Durbin, to his office for a nearly hourlong meeting aimed at charting a way forward in a government to be divided between a Republican White House and a Democratic Congress.

Bush had had lunch a day earlier with House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, expected be the next speaker of the House.

"My attitude about this is that there is a great opportunity for us to show the country that Republicans and Democrats are equally as patriotic and equally concerned about the future, and that we can work together," said Bush, appearing in a good-natured mood when he, Reid and Durbin appeared before reporters in the Oval Office afterward.

Reid and Durbin agreed. "The only way to move forward is with bipartisanship and openness, and to get some results," Reid said. "And we've made a commitment, the four of us here today, that's what we're going to do."

Vice President Dick Cheney, who completed the foursome, did not speak in public.

Bush found common ground in the Western roots he shares with Reid, who is from Nevada. "We tend to speak the same language, pretty plainspoken people, which should bode well for our relationship," the president said.

But one of the president's first public acts after his party's losses in Tuesday's elections — voting that was widely seen as a rebuke of his leadership and policies — was to press for an aggressive agenda while Congress remains in GOP hands for the next two months.

On his list are at least two items deeply controversial to Democrats: legalizing his warrantless eavesdropping program, stalled in the Senate because of a Democratic filibuster threat, and confirming John Bolton to be U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, which Democrats have said is unlikely to happen.

DOJ_NMG_0093566

Durbin had said on Thursday, "For a Republican Congress to have gone forward for two years and produced so little, and then for the president to come up with a huge agenda for the next two weeks, you have to ask him, 'Why didn't you use some of the time you spent arguing on some less important issues before?'"

White House press secretary Tony Snow said both the eavesdropping and Bolton-nomination issues were crucial, and that Democrats should see their merits.

"Bipartisanship works both ways," he said. "I don't think you should look at these as necessarily provocative."

Bolton has held the post on a temporary basis for more than a year, and Bush cannot make a second recess appointment of him. Without confirmation, Bolton would have to leave the job in January. Snow said the White House doesn't consider his nomination dead, despite statements from the Hill that make it seem that way.

Snow left open the possibility that Bolton could play the same role at the U.N., just with a different title.

"I'm not aware of that, but I am not going to rule anything in or out," he said.

Both Pelosi and Reid complimented Bush after the meetings. Pelosi said "I think we can find a way to have agreement on" the eavesdropping bill while making clear that would involve changes, such as adding some form of judicial review.

Manley said it was important that Bush was reaching out, noting Reid and the president probably had not met since the summer. But he also said many Democrats on Capitol Hill are skeptical after six years of being largely ignored.

For their part, Democrats are not shrinking from an agenda that Bush clearly does not like, including funding for embryonic stem cell research, government negotiation of drug prices and reinstating budget rules that would make extending the president's tax cuts difficult.

Bush, Pelosi Look Ahead Over Lunch (WT)

By Joseph Curl, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 10, 2006

President Bush and Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the likely speaker of the House, yesterday buried the hatchet -- gently -- as the two sat down for an Oval Office lunch after a vitriolic campaign that put Democrats in control of Congress for the first time in 12 years.

"Both of us recognize ... that when you win, you have a responsibility to do the best you can for the country," the president said. "The elections are now behind us, and the congresswoman's party won. ... Therefore, we're going to work together to address those challenges in a constructive way. We won't agree on every issue, but ... we will do our very best to address big problems."

On a day when Republicans conceded the last two contested Senate seats and made official the Democratic sweep of Congress, Mrs. Pelosi agreed that the leaders at the two ends of Pennsylvania Avenue wouldn't agree always -- or even often -- but offered her own olive branch after the bruising campaign.

"I look forward to working in a confidence-building way with the president, recognizing that we have our differences and we will debate them, and that is what our founders intended. But we will do so in a way that gets results for the American people," she said. "We've made history. Now we have to make progress. And I look forward to working with the president to do just that."

Yesterday, Republican Sens. George Allen of Virginia and Conrad Burns of Montana formally acknowledged defeat in their re-election bids, giving the Democrats 49 seats in the chamber. Along with two Democrat-leaning independents, that will make Democratic Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada the next majority leader.

"It's time for results," Mr. Reid said at a raucous celebratory rally yesterday afternoon outside the Capitol.

But the campaign left a bitter trail between Mr. Bush and Mrs. Pelosi. She called him "incompetent," "oblivious, in denial, dangerous" and "shallow," and often implied that he was stupid, a man with "no judgment, no experience and no knowledge."

He mocked her as a liar who talked tax cuts but must be a "secret admirer" and warned that if she took the helm, "terrorists win and America loses."

When asked about yesterday's lunch menu, presidential counselor Dan Bartlett joked that "for the president, it's probably a little bit of crow."

Since the president suffered what he called a "thumping" in Tuesday's elections, he has already acquiesced twice to the San Francisco liberal's demands. On Wednesday, he accepted Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld's resignation, and yesterday, he offered an olive branch by saying he is "open to any idea or suggestion" on how to prosecute the war against terror and "and ensuring that Iraq's democratic government succeeds."

The new conciliatory stance is a far cry from what the president said repeatedly on the campaign trail.

"This debate on Iraq -- if you listen carefully for a Democrat plan for success, they don't have one," he said at one rally. "However they put it, the Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses. ... The Democrat goal is to get out of Iraq. The Republican goal is to win in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0093567

But Mr. Bush, humbled by losing Republican control of both the House and the Senate, struck a new tone of bipartisanship yesterday after a morning meeting with his Cabinet. "It is our responsibility to put the elections behind us and work together on the great issues facing America. ... The American people expect us to rise above partisan differences, and my administration will do its part."

In the end, Mr. Bush, who has spent much of his time in office irking Democrats by going it alone, vowed with Mrs. Pelosi at his side that their luncheon was "the beginning of a series of meetings we'll have over the next couple of years, all aimed at solving problems and leading the country."

The president's priorities include the passage of spending bills funding government's continued operation "with strong fiscal discipline and without diminishing our capacity to fight the war on terror"; legislation retroactively authorizing his warrantless domestic surveillance of terror suspects; energy legislation; and congressional approval for a landmark civilian nuclear cooperation agreement with India and for normalizing trade relations with Vietnam.

The president hopes to be able to convince Democrats that those issues "rise above partisan difference." But Democrats have opposed many of his proposals in the past, and because they hold gavels in both chambers of Congress, they will be in the position to scrub his legislation.

With Democrats holding only the thinnest edge in the Senate, that chamber's Republicans can use all manner of procedural rules to have a major say in what happens.

"With 49 Republican senators, we still have the ability to shape and, when necessary, to block legislation," Sen. John Cornyn of Texas said on Fox.

For her part, Mrs. Pelosi has vowed not to seek Mr. Bush's impeachment or to tie up the House with punitive investigations of the executive branch, and yesterday repeated that pledge.

"Democrats are not about getting even. Democrats are about helping the American people to get ahead," she said.

At the Capitol Hill rally, Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York, who led Senate Democrats' re-election team, sounded a similar note.

"Our joy today will vanish if we can't produce for the American people," he said.

Still, Democrats fired plenty of warning shots on a variety of issues yesterday, including judicial nominations and the terrorist-surveillance bill.

"My message to the president would be: Send us moderate judicial candidates," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the Democratic whip. "Don't send us extreme candidates, because I think the president will run into trouble if he does."

The two sides also remain divided over Iraq.

" 'Full speed ahead'? I don't think so," Mrs. Pelosi said on CNN, mocking Vice President Dick Cheney's assertion that the administration would continue its war strategy without change.

But Mr. Bush dug in his heels as well, saying that he will not consider pulling U.S. troops from Iraq before victory is achieved.

"If the goal is success, then we can work together. If the goal is get out now regardless, then that's going to be hard to work together," he said.

The president did acknowledge that although both sides can move away from their rhetoric, neither party will compromise their core values.

Mrs. Pelosi is "not going to abandon her principles and I'm not going to abandon mine," he said.

Bush In Overture To Democrats (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo, Edward Luce And Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington

Financial Times, November 10, 2006

President George W. Bush on Thursday said he would welcome new policy ideas on Iraq as he adopted a conciliatory tone following the capture of both houses of Congress by the Democrats.

Mr Bush's overture came as the Democrats sealed their election victory by securing the Virginia Senate seat they needed to clinch the narrowest of majorities in the upper house.

George Allen, the Republican senator and one-time presidential hopeful, conceded defeat to Jim Webb, his Democrat challenger, on Thursday evening.

The win gave the Democrats far greater control over foreign policy than their control of the House of Representatives alone would have offered.

Flanked by his cabinet in the White House Rose Garden, Mr Bush, who was already in danger of becoming a lame duck president after the Democrats took the House, urged both US parties to set aside differences on Iraq and domestic policy. He said: "I'm open to any idea or suggestion that will help us achieve our goals of defeating the terrorists and ensuring that Iraq's democratic government succeeds."

DOJ_NMG_0093568

The Democrats remain divided on Iraq with some, such as John Kerry, the losing 2004 presidential candidate, arguing for a timetable for withdrawal and others, such as Hillary Clinton, resisting explicit deadlines.

Steve Clemons, of the liberal New America Foundation, said: "If the Dems had just controlled the House, they could have got away with posturing and public hearings. With the Senate, people are looking to the Democrats to govern. It changes the strategy completely."

Mr Bush will next week meet members of the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan commission led by James Baker, the former secretary of state, which is expected to recommend new policy options for Iraq.

The president also urged lawmakers to finish working on spending bills, energy legislation and other measures, such as the Terrorist Surveillance Act, before the next session of Congress begins in January.

The Democrats' victory in the Senate paves the way for a more aggressive legislative agenda in Congress, which will be spearheaded by the new chairmen of the congressional committees. Two fierce critics of administration policy in Iraq – Carl Levin and Joseph Biden – are to take over as chairmen of the Senate armed services and foreign relations committees, respectively.

Jeff Bingaman, incoming chairman of the energy committee, will probably put climate change at the centre of his agenda.

Opposition to Mr Bush's social security proposals will be strengthened with the expected appointment of Max Baucus as chair of the finance committee.

Bush Asks Congress To Approve Bolton (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, November 10, 2006

President George W. Bush has asked Congress to approve John Bolton, his controversial ambassador to the United Nations, for a second term, in the face of opposition from key Democrats.

The move comes in spite of conciliatory rhetoric from Mr Bush on Thursday that he wants to work with Democrats after they routed the Republicans in the congressional mid-term elections.

Mr Bolton, who once remarked that "If the UN secretary building in New York lost 10 stories, it wouldn't make a bit of difference", received a recess appointment last year after the Senate foreign relations committee opposed his nomination. Recess appointments do not require Senate approval.

Democrats, and one Republican, on the committee opposed sending Mr Bolton, who has a poor reputation internationally, to the UN following multiple allegations that he twisted intelligence and bullied colleagues who failed to endorse his hardline views.

Tony Snow, White House press secretary, on Thursday said Mr Bush discussed his desire to keep Mr Bolton at the UN at a breakfast meeting on Thursday with Republican congressional leaders.

"This is something that we think is important, that he stay there," said Mr Snow.

But White House hopes of keeping Mr Bolton in New York were immediately dashed when Lincoln Chafee, a Rhode Island Republican member of the foreign relations committee who just lost his seat in Tuesday's elections, said he would oppose Mr Bolton.

Joseph Biden, the Delaware Democrat who will become chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee in January, on Thursday said there was no point for the committee to even discuss the appointment.

"I see no point in considering Mr Bolton's nomination again in the foreign relations committee because regardless of what happens there, he is unlikely to be considered by the full Senate," said Mr Biden.

The push to give Mr Bolton another term comes as the Security Council must deal with a number of crucial issues, including on Iran, North Korea, Sudan and Lebanon. Mr Bolton has also been the US point man on UN reform.

Sean McCormack, the State department spokesman, said Mr Bolton deserved an "up-or-down vote", meaning the Senate foreign relations committee should approve his nomination so it can be brought to the Senate floor for a final vote.

"He has been extraordinarily effective up there at the UN. And now is not the time to have a gap in your UN ambassador."

Mr Bush could give Mr Bolton a second "recess appointment" but Senate rules would then require that he does not receive a salary. Asked whether that was a possibility, Mr McCormack replied: "I don't know how enthusiastic he would be about working without pay. I haven't asked him that question. That's kind of a personal question."

Additional reporting by Mark Turner at the United Nations

Bolton Unlikely To Win Senate Approval (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0093569

By Anne Plummer Flaherty, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

John Bolton's prospects for staying on as U.N. ambassador essentially died Thursday as Democrats and a pivotal Republican said they would continue to oppose his nomination.

It was another blow to President Bush, two days after Democrats triumphed in elections that will give them control of Congress next year. On Wednesday, Bush had announced that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, a polarizing figure and face of the Iraq war, would step down.

On Thursday, the White House resubmitted Bolton's nomination to the Senate, where the appointment has languished for more than a year. Bush appointed him to the job temporarily in August 2005 while Congress was in recess, an appointment that will expire when the Congress adjourns, no later than January.

Sen. Lincoln Chafee, R-R.I., who was defeated by Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse on Tuesday, told reporters in Rhode Island that he would continue opposing Bolton. That would likely deny Republicans the votes needed to move Bolton's nomination from the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to the full Senate.

"The American people have spoken out against the president's agenda on a number of fronts, and presumably one of those is on foreign policy," Chafee said. "And at this late stage in my term, I'm not going to endorse something the American people have spoke out against."

Democrats indicated that even should the Senate try debating Bolton's nomination when lawmakers reconvene next week — still under Republican control — they would stretch out debate on Bolton with the aim of killing it. Republicans lack the 60 votes needed to force a vote on the nomination.

"I see no point in considering Mr. Bolton's nomination again in the Foreign Relations Committee because, regardless of what happens there, he is unlikely to be considered by the full Senate," said Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware, top Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee.

Bolton's 2005 recess appointment came after Democrats blocked repeated attempts by GOP leaders to grant him Senate confirmation. Democrats said Bolton was a bully who lacked the diplomatic skills necessary to broker international deals.

In 2005, Chafee wavered on his support for Bolton, citing concerns at one point about Bolton's tie to a government investigation into faulty prewar intelligence on Iraq. In September, Chafee — who was in a tight re-election race — said he would oppose Bolton's nomination until the administration answered questions about its policy in the Middle East, which in effect delayed any vote until after the elections.

Bush asked congressional Republicans Thursday morning at the White House to confirm Bolton during their "lame duck" session beginning next week, said White House spokesman Tony Snow.

Asked if Bush thinks Bolton will be confirmed, Snow said, "We'll find out."

___

Associated Press writer Michelle R. Smith in Rhode Island contributed to this report.

Bolton May Not Return As U.N. Envoy (WP)

By Dafna Linzer, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

Key lawmakers said yesterday they would block the nomination of John R. Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations, all but killing chances for him to remain in the post past December.

For nearly 20 months, President Bush has tried, unsuccessfully, to get Bolton confirmed in a job he has held since August 2005. Bolton then received a recess appointment after not getting enough support in the Senate.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.), the ranking Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee and its presumed chairman when the Democrats take control of the Senate in January, said yesterday that Bolton's nomination is "going nowhere."

"I see no point in considering Mr. Bolton's nomination again in the Foreign Relations Committee because, regardless of what happens there, he is unlikely to be considered by the full Senate," Biden said in a statement.

The White House had hoped Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.), a moderate Republican who earlier raised questions about Bolton and the administration's policies in the Middle East, would support Bolton after the election. But Chafee lost his seat Tuesday.

"On Tuesday, the American people sent a clear message of dissatisfaction with the foreign policy approach of the Bush administration," Chafee said in a statement. "To confirm Mr. Bolton to the position of U.N. ambassador would fly in the face of the clear consensus of the country that a new direction is called for." Chafee said Bolton lacks the "collaborative approach" needed to make the United States "the strongest country in a peaceful world."

Without Chafee's support, Republicans on the committee do not have enough votes to recommend Bolton's confirmation.

DOJ_NMG_0093570

Bolton's nomination, in early spring of 2005, fell apart within weeks. The Senate committee hearings were dominated by heated testimony from former colleagues and several intelligence officials; they described Bolton as a bully who pressured analysts, cherry-picked intelligence and hid information from the secretary of state. The committee did not support the nomination but agreed to send it to the full Senate for consideration.

Several Republicans then joined with Democrats to block a vote on the nomination until the White House turned over documents relating to Bolton's tenure as undersecretary of state for arms control during Bush's first term. The White House refused, insisting that Bolton deserved a vote by the full Senate.

Bolton's recess appointment is set to expire at the end of December, when the current Congress goes out of session. With only a few months remaining, the White House tried again to get Bolton confirmed during the summer. The American Israel Public Affairs Committee came to the administration's aid, lobbying heavily for Bolton's nomination. It persuaded several Democrats to support Bolton but the nomination was snagged by Chafee.

White House spokesman Tony Snow would not predict yesterday whether Bolton would get confirmed or say what the White House's contingency plans are if the nomination falls through again. "This is something that we think is important, that he stay there," Snow told reporters.

National security adviser Stephen J. Hadley urged senators to judge Bolton solely on his performance at the United Nations over the past year. "I would hope that people would step back, take a look at John's record up there, and reach the judgment that the president has reached -- that he does a terrific job for the American people."

In a statement yesterday, Bush named five congressional priorities he hopes will be tackled before the end of the year. Bolton was not on the list.

Yesterday, a White House official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the administration had explored options for keeping Bolton at the United Nations. A second recess appointment is not possible, but officials considered making Bolton an "acting ambassador." But the official, who would discuss internal deliberations only on the condition of anonymity, said none of the options is appealing, especially given the strong opposition shown by the Democrats, who are poised to take over Congress.

If there is no confirmation, "we assume he'll probably resign," the official said. Several administration officials speculated that Zalmay Khalilzad, the ambassador to Iraq, could be a candidate to replace Bolton.

U.N. Envoy Confirmation Unlikely (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, November 10, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — John R. Bolton's prospects for remaining the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations dwindled Thursday as Democrats and a key Republican senator rejected efforts to have the still-Republican- controlled Senate confirm his nomination.

The White House continued to explore ways to keep Bolton at the U.N. without going through a confirmation process.

Outgoing Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), who holds the swing vote that would determine whether the evenly split foreign relations committee reconsiders Bolton, said he would not support the nomination, which the White House resubmitted Thursday.

"To confirm Mr. Bolton to the position of U.N. ambassador would fly in the face of the clear consensus of the country that a new direction is called for," he told a news conference in Rhode Island. Chafee lost his reelection bid Tuesday.

"I have long believed that the go-it-alone philosophy that has driven this administration's approach to international relations has damaged our leadership position in the world," Chafee said.

When senators blocked Bolton's nomination last year, Bush put him in the position using a special recess appointment that expires upon Congress' adjournment this year.

In September, Bolton's nomination came up again. Chafee, who had expressed reservations about Bolton's style of diplomacy and his effectiveness, came under intense pressure from Democrats and Republicans.

Chafee requested then that the hearing on Bolton be delayed until after the election, citing unresolved questions about the administration's Middle East policy.

Chafee said Thursday: "Mr. Bolton does not demonstrate the kind of collaborative approach that I believe will be called for if we are to restore the United States' position as the strongest country in a peaceful world."

Chafee's comments echoed those of Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), who is expected to be chairman of the foreign relations committee when the Democrats take control of the Senate in January.

Biden said Thursday that Bolton would not get a Senate hearing until the White House provided relevant National Security Agency documents that the committee requested last year.

"I see no point in considering Mr. Bolton's nomination," Biden said.

DOJ_NMG_0093571

That leaves the White House to decide how hard it wants to push Bolton for the post in the face of a decisive defeat in Tuesday's election, and how he could stay in the job without going through confirmation hearings.

He could technically receive a second recess appointment, but under U.S. law, could not be paid for his work under those circumstances.

Other possibilities include creating a position that would allow him to continue his work at the U.N., such as ambassador-at-large for U.N. issues, or special advisor to the president for the United Nations, said one U.S. diplomat.

White House lawyers have also proposed appointing Bolton as deputy ambassador, which does not require a Senate confirmation, and allowing him to perform as the acting ambassador.

Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), said Bush was making a political error by "trying to jam this nomination through" in defiance of the demand for change expressed by voters this week. "Sadly, Mr. Bolton doesn't represent change but a failed status quo."

Names being floated as possible contenders to replace Bolton include former Sen. George Mitchell (D-Maine); Zalmay Khalilzad, now U.S. ambassador to Iraq; and Paula Dobriansky, undersecretary of State for democracy and global affairs. Chafee's name has also been mentioned.

On Thursday, White House spokesman Tony Snow said the administration considered it important for Bolton to stay at the U.N.

And the White House national security advisor, Stephen Hadley said the administration hoped "people will step back and look" at Bolton's record at the U.N. over the last year.

"John has done a terrific job," Hadley told reporters at a news briefing. "He has gotten out of the United Nations some very important resolutions on some of the most important issues for our national security."

Hadley pointed specifically to resolutions on North Korea, "which many people thought we could not get."

"He has been a champion of reform, and he has been a clear advocate of American values," Hadley said.

At the United Nations, reviews of Bolton's performance have been mixed, but most diplomats agree that he hasn't turned out to be the destructive force that they feared he would be.

Though he threatened to withhold U.S. contributions to the U.N. until institutional changes were made, last-minute compromises by the State Department minimized the diplomatic damage.

His prediction that the new Human Rights Council would be worse than the dysfunctional body it replaced turned out to be true, though some diplomats say that U.S. failure to support the body made his prophecy a self-fulfilling one.

In the Security Council, Bolton has forged agreements with colleagues on several difficult issues, including two unanimous sanctions resolutions on North Korea. He also counts as victories putting Myanmar, formerly Burma, on the Security Council agenda, and blocking Venezuela from a seat on the Security Council, where it would have had a high-profile anti-U.S. platform.

"He is like Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," said Edward C. Luck, director of Columbia University's Center on International Organization. "He has done remarkably well on big issues in the council, but he treats the rest of the institution with disdain."

Luck continued: "If he wants to achieve reform, which was supposed to be his strength, his performance is highly disappointing. But if he wants to show that the U.N. is unreformable, he is doing a good job of it."

In New York on Thursday, Bolton received the news about Chafee's rejection as he was about to meet with key ambassadors on a sanctions resolution for Iran. He declined to comment.

But Bolton has been giving hints that his days may be numbered. This week, when a loyal staffer returned from a vacation with a new beard and told Bolton he wasn't going to shave until the ambassador was confirmed, Bolton quipped, "You may be waiting awhile."

Bush Renominates Bolton Ahead Of Change In Senate (WT)

By Stephen Dinan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 10, 2006

President Bush yesterday renominated John R. Bolton in a power play designed to force the U.N. ambassador through the Senate before Republicans lose control at the end of this year.

The nomination comes as Mr. Bush has spent the past two days talking about striking a bipartisan chord on domestic policies and suggests that, even with Democrats in control of the Capitol, the president will assert his constitutional role in foreign policy.

White House officials said Mr. Bolton, who is currently serving as a temporary recess appointment, deserves Senate approval.

"I would hope that people would step back, take a look at John's record up there, and reach the judgment that the president's reached, that he does a terrific job," said National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley.

DOJ_NMG_0093572

Democrats last year blocked Mr. Bolton's nomination with a filibuster, forcing Mr. Bush to use his recess-appointment power. That appointment expires as the new Congress takes over under Democratic control next year.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., who is in line to become chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said Mr. Bolton still can't win confirmation and that it's a waste of time for the committee to take up his nomination.

The Delaware Democrat said his party blocked Mr. Bolton last year because the administration wouldn't let them see intelligence documents the Democrats believe would prove Mr. Bolton led a retribution effort against a State Department employee.

"Unless the administration provides the Senate with the documents it is entitled to see, Mr. Bolton should not get a vote," Mr. Biden said.

Republicans have to overcome more than just Democrat objections. Sen. Lincoln Chafee, Rhode Island Republican, who lost his bid for re-election, had opposed Mr. Bolton. As a member of the committee, he could keep the nomination bottled up and never let it get to the floor.

Asked whether the White House would pressure Mr. Chafee to change his mind, Mr. Hadley suggested a slightly softer strategy.

"You say pressure, I would say explain and persuade," he said.

He said Mr. Bolton has been instrumental in winning U.N. resolutions on North Korea's nuclear program and missile tests and that it would be a mistake to replace him.

One Senate aide familiar with Republican leaders' thinking said if they can get over Republican objections and are left solely with Democrats' opposition, they will probably try to force Democrats into a filibuster.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said it's too early to talk about whether the White House might give Mr. Bolton another recess appointment, should his nomination fail again.

In two different votes last year, Mr. Bolton fell four votes and six votes shy of the 60-vote threshold needed to overcome a filibuster in the Senate.

With Power Set To Be Split, Wiretaps Re-emerge As Issue (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 9 — The Bush administration escalated its defense of the National Security Agency's domestic wiretapping program on Thursday, even as Democrats in Congress vowed to investigate the program aggressively once they assume power.

In Washington, President Bush urged that during the lame-duck session that starts next week, Congress pass a bill effectively authorizing the program. And in San Francisco, the Justice Department told a federal court that public scrutiny of the operation risked "exceptionally grave harm to national security."

But Democrats sounded impatient to begin getting more answers after what they characterized as 11 months of stonewalling by the administration since the program was publicly disclosed last December.

"This administration first hid its domestic spying program from Congress and Americans for years, and when it was discovered, has ducked and weaved on its legal justifications," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, who is to become chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee when Democrats take control.

"We all believe that monitoring the communications of suspected terrorists is essential," Mr. Leahy said. "But especially when the monitoring involves Americans, it needs to be done lawfully and with adequate checks and balances to prevent abuses of Americans' rights and Americans' privacy."

The shift in power on Capitol Hill sets up the likelihood of a showdown between the White House and Congress over the direction of not only the N.S.A. program but also a range of other aggressive counterterrorism operations that the administration has undertaken since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

This September, the House approved legislation that would effectively authorize the government to continue the program, in which the agency, without warrants, carries out surveillance on communications into and out of the United States that are suspected of involving terrorism. But Senate legislation on the issue, backed by the White House, stalled last month.

Republicans have held out hope of getting such legislation approved by the full Congress during the lame-duck session, and Mr. Bush pushed anew on that front Thursday, calling passage an "important priority in the war on terror."

Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who currently leads the Judiciary Committee and is the main advocate of wiretapping legislation there, acknowledged the difficulty of getting his bill through the Senate now.

"There's been a seismic change in the Senate landscape," Mr. Specter said in a telephone interview, "so I'm not sure exactly how all that is going to work out."

Emboldened by their electoral victory, Democrats said they believed it would be all but impossible for the Republicans to pass wiretapping legislation before the current Congress adjourns, or to win approval of separate legislation immunizing telephone companies from liability over their cooperation in wiretapping operations.

"There's no chance of that happening," predicted a senior Democratic aide for the House Judiciary Committee, who spoke only on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the issue.

"This is a program a lot of people here thought was excessive," the aide said of the N.S.A. operation. "There's a history of concern here."

Indeed, rather than move to authorize the program, Democrats said they would push in January to investigate how the program had been run and would seek legislation to restrict or ban outright the use of wiretaps without warrants.

Representative John Conyers Jr., the Michigan Democrat who is all but assured of taking over the House Judiciary Committee, has been one of the fiercest critics of the program and some other counterterrorism operations, saying he considers them abusive and potentially illegal infringements on civil liberties.

Groups that are suing the government and the telecommunications companies over the wiretapping program said Thursday that they hoped more aggressive oversight would help their cause.

"If Congress has some hearings and digs into this, we may know a lot more," said Cindy Cohn, legal director of the Electronic Frontier Foundation, which is suing AT&T.

The Justice Department urged a federal district judge in San Francisco on Thursday to delay considering any further issues in that suit until an appeals court considers an earlier ruling of his against the government.

The government is invoking a "state secret" privilege in opposing such lawsuits, and it argued Thursday that further proceedings delving into intelligence operations "could lead to serious consequences" by compromising national security.

The judge, Vaughn R. Walker, has already rejected that argument once, ruling in July that the case involving AT&T could proceed without a "reasonable danger" that it would harm national security. It is this ruling that the government is appealing.

Bipartisanship On Hold (NYT)

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

President Bush was back on TV yesterday, without the scowl he'd been sporting the day after the election but with the surviving members of his Cabinet. He talked about how much he was looking forward to lunching with Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid and working on "the great issues facing America." Mr. Bush said his team would "respect the results" of the election.

Just maybe not right away.

Without missing a beat, Mr. Bush made it clear that, for now, his idea of how to "put the elections behind us" is to use the Republicans' last two months in control of Congress to try to push through one of the worst ideas his administration and its Republican allies on Capitol Hill have come up with: a bill that would legalize his illegal wiretapping program and gut the law that limits a president's ability to abuse his power in this way.

Mr. Bush listed his priorities for the forthcoming lame duck session of Congress. It was an odd list that included only two really urgent items — the bills that keep federal money flowing and the nomination of Robert Gates as the next secretary of defense. The rest was a grab bag that included one worthy but hardly urgent idea (getting Vietnam into the World Trade Organization) and a series of ideas ranging from bad to truly awful that Mr. Bush has been unable to get through Congress and hopes to ram through in the Republicans' last weeks.

For example, he wants the Senate to ratify his recess appointment of John Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations. That vote, which is likely to be strongly debated, can easily wait for the new Congress, and should. Mr. Bush also pressed for quick passage of "the bipartisan energy legislation," which had Congressional officials scratching their heads in puzzlement about which bill he might mean. And he wants immediate approval of his administration's deal to sell civilian nuclear technology to India despite that nation's refusal to sign or abide by the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

That was a bad idea from the start. But the wiretapping bill is simply outrageous, and it has no business being discussed in this lame duck session.

The bill Mr. Bush wants was drafted by Vice President Dick Cheney's lawyers and by Senator Arlen Specter, the outgoing Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee. Mr. Specter presented it as a compromise that would regulate the president's ability to spy on Americans' phone calls and e-mail without a court order. It really was a cave-in to Mr. Bush's effort to expand his power beyond limits that have existed for nearly 30 years.

Mr. Bush has acknowledged that he authorized the National Security Agency to conduct certain kinds of domestic wiretapping without obtaining the warrant required by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. He has claimed that the law hindered the hunt for terrorists, but has not offered a scrap of evidence for that claim. He has also never described the program's overall scope, and almost none of the lawmakers who will vote on this bill if Mr. Bush has his way have any idea what it entails.

DOJ_NMG_0093574

Senator Dianne Feinstein, the California Democrat who is one of the few members who does know, has said there is nothing in the program that could not be done legally. She has proposed a more modest bill that would give the government more flexibility to eavesdrop first and get permission later. But Mr. Bush is not interested. He wants the bill that would gut the law, absolve him of illegal behavior and turn over the task of determining the constitutionality of his program to a court that is not equipped to make that judgment.

Since the White House has continued the wiretapping without legislative approval, there is no conceivable reason why Mr. Bush should see this as an emergency. His real motive could be to create a bargaining chip that would allow him to get a narrower bill giving the telephone companies immunity for helping the administration conduct the unlawful eavesdropping. That's an absurdly bad idea.

There are plenty of responsible lawmakers in both parties who are sympathetic to the idea that the executive branch needed more flexibility to pursue terrorists after 9/11. It has been obvious all along that if the president feels current law is too restrictive, he should explain its shortcomings to members of Congress and ask them to amend it. The Republican majority was never going to insist on that, but the new Democratic leadership might.

The White House refuses to explain itself because this has never been about catching terrorists. It is about overturning the crucial limits placed on executive authority after Watergate and Vietnam. Mr. Cheney and a few other hard-liners have been trying to turn back the clock and have succeeded in some truly scary ways, including the military commissions act they pushed through Congress before the elections. It is vital that they not be allowed to do any more harm.

Democrats Are Set To Subpoena (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt And Richard Simon, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 10, 2006

The new majority is expected to hold hearings on military spending and the Iraq war -- just for starters.

WASHINGTON — Rep. Ike Skelton knows what he will do in one of his first acts as chairman of the Armed Services Committee in the Democratic-led House: resurrect the subcommittee on oversight and investigations.

The panel was disbanded by the Republicans after they won control of Congress in 1994. Now, Skelton (D-Mo.) intends to use it as a forum to probe Pentagon spending and the Bush administration's conduct of the Iraq war.

It has been 12 years since Democrats were in control of both the House and Senate. But they are looking to make up for lost time, and in some cases, make the Bush administration and its business allies sweat.

With control of every committee in Congress starting in January, the new majority will inherit broad powers to subpoena and investigate. And that is expected to translate into wide-ranging and contentious hearings.

The agenda is likely to be dominated by the Iraq war, but could include probes into the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance, environmental policies and new prescription-drug program for seniors. Industries, such as oil companies, could also come under closer scrutiny.

"The American people sent a clear message that they do not want a rubber-stamp Congress that simply signs off the president's agenda," said Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), who is in line to become chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. "Instead, they have voted for a new direction for America and a real check and balance against government overreaching."

Conyers and other Democrats say that sort of scrutiny has been noticeably absent over the last six years. Democrats accuse Republicans of being complicit as Bush has led the nation into an unwinnable war and adopted economic polices that favor the affluent and big business.

Under Republican control, Congress did subpoena baseball players to discuss steroid use and summon oil industry executives to justify record profits at a time of high gasoline prices.

"What we have to be wary of, and the American public will be wary of, is a subpoena bazaar here on Capitol Hill, and government by investigation by Democrats," said Kevin Madden, a spokesman for House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

But even some scholars say recent GOP oversight has been lax. "This could be remembered as a historically unique period in which an administration got immunity from Congress to engage in errors with impunity," said Charles Tiefer, a University of Baltimore law professor and a former House counsel.

Democrats face a delicate balancing test, mindful of a public backlash if they focus more on investigating than legislating.

Their leader, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), has already ruled some investigations out of bounds. Conyers has wanted Congress to determine whether there are grounds to impeach Bush. But Pelosi has said that will not happen.

While there is pent-up demand among Democrats in Congress and their constituencies to oversee the Bush administration, their new caucus will also include a number of moderates and conservatives, which may force the leadership to tone down its act.

DOJ_NMG_0093575

"The Democrats are going to be cross-pressured. They could hold impeachment hearings. They could make people in the Bush administration look absolutely terrible. It wouldn't be hard," said Joel Aberbach, a UCLA political science professor. "But there may be a little restraint because of their political needs in terms of consolidating themselves and looking to the 2008 election."

Democrats are expected to bore into the Iraq war, including review of no-bid contracts for reconstruction, intelligence failures and decisions to ignore the advice of military commanders about troop levels.

"Rather than focus on the failings of the war, though, these events will be staged in order to highlight the administration's incompetence and inflexibility," said William Howell, an associate professor at the Harris School of Public Policy at the University of Chicago.

Rep. Bart Stupak (D-Mich.), the ranking member of the House Energy and Commerce subcommittee on oversight and investigations, said, if he becomes chairman, he would look into "security at our nuclear labs, oversight of the Food and Drug Administration, and energy policy."

Now that they have the power of the subpoena, Democrats expect to be able to get the administration's attention. A number of senior Democrats have complained that the administration has ignored their inquiries.

Rep. James L. Oberstar, the top Democrat on the House Transportation Committee, this year was in the middle of grilling Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff on the administration's response to Hurricane Katrina when the Republican chairing the hearing cut him off. He had used his allotted five minutes.

Now that Oberstar, of Minnesota, is in line to become the committee chairman, among his first acts is expected to be scrapping the five-minute rule established by the GOP majority.

"I would guess that we're going to have some fairly long hearings," said Jim Berard, an Oberstar spokesman.

The new Congress will also be marked by the ascendancy of some old watchdogs.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) is set to head the House Government Reform Committee. Waxman used another committee to push for landmark laws reducing pesticides in food and regulating nursing homes in the 1980s and 1990s. He also famously put tobacco company executives on the spot at a high-profile hearing in which they testified under oath that they did not believe that nicotine was addictive.

Since Bush took office, Waxman has written letters to the White House seeking information on a wide range of subjects — often getting no response. Now, with the power to issue subpoenas, he is likely to get answers.

Waxman wants to investigate waste, fraud, profiteering and "whether government is doing the job it's supposed to do."

"When Clinton was president, there was not an accusation too small for them not to launch investigations and issue subpoenas," Waxman said of congressional Republicans. "When Bush became president, there wasn't a scandal big enough for them to ignore. I think they've given us a good model on how not to behave."

The most senior member of the House, Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), is also scheduled to play a crucial role in the new Congress, again becoming chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

He already has a number of subjects he wants to look into, including the Medicare prescription drug benefit and an overhaul of energy policy, two of the GOP's proudest achievements.

"We're not after anybody," Dingell said, but he said if anyone from the administration has "useful things to tell us," they will be "invited to come forward."

rick.schmitt@latimes.com
richard.simon@latimes.com

Democrats Poised To Flex New Muscles (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen, Jay Solomon And Robert Block
The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006
Lawmakers Vow to Probe Bush's Prewar Case, Katrina Contracts, Corporate America

WASHINGTON -- The Democrats' sweep of the House and the Senate gives the party powerful tools for probing certain controversies of the Bush administration's years in office, from its use of faulty prewar intelligence on Iraq to its effort to rebuild New Orleans.

With President Bush retaining his veto pen, the Democratic majorities may have a difficult time passing laws, especially in areas like health care and Social Security. But some Democrats in both the House and the Senate already are signaling a willingness to conduct tough oversight of the Bush administration's policies and to reopen lingering controversies -- particularly over pre-Iraq intelligence -- the Republican-led Congress largely ignored.

In the Senate, the likely new Intelligence Committee chairman, Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, says he will complete an investigation into the White House's case for invading Iraq that Republicans were accused of stalling. Michigan Sen. Carl Levin is in line to take over the most powerful congressional oversight body, the Senate's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, which routinely sends staffers to Iraq and other overseas countries. Mr. Levin, a critic of the Iraq war, has previously promised to conduct tougher oversight of the administration's use of no-bid contracting in Iraq, where the $21.8 billion U.S.-led rebuilding effort is winding down without having restored prewar levels of water or electricity. (See related article.1)

DOJ_NMG_0093576

In the House, Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, expected to take over the House Committee on Homeland Security, is promising to haul Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff before the panel to face questions on issues ranging from the no-bid contracts awarded after Hurricane Katrina to the number of vacancies in the department's senior management.

"The secretary only came before our committee two times this entire year, and that is not enough," Mr. Thompson said. "He cannot be a stranger before the Homeland Security Committee. He is going to have to be fully engaged, and I am going to demand that of him."

ELECTION FALLOUT

· What a Democratic House Means for Industry Interests2

· Election Q&A: What Happens Next?3

· Exit poll analysis: Five states4; national data5

· Vote-tallies, map6

· Chief Concerns: Committees in Senate7, House8

· For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20069.

Mr. Thompson is likely to be one of the largest burrs in the side of the Bush administration, as is California Rep. Henry Waxman, who will run the House Government Reform Committee. Mr. Waxman, an unrelenting critic of the White House, said he will boost oversight of the Bush administration and broad swaths of corporate America, with a particular focus on prescription-drug prices, oil-company profits and Halliburton Co.'s contracting work in Iraq.

The Democrats' choices about how to use their expanded oversight powers, which enable them to subpoena information, call hearings and compel witnesses to appear, will shape the next two years in Washington.

But Democrats will face internal divisions as they decide where to focus their investigative muscle. Liberal Democrats such as the membership of the activist organization MoveOn.org want the party to investigate the administration's case for the Iraq war and instances of possible corporate misconduct. By contrast, centrist and conservative Democrats like New York Sen. Hillary Clinton and many of the newly elected lawmakers from Southern and Western states argue the party should avoid taking too harsh a stance against big business or the Bush administration.

Democrats already are signaling they will proceed cautiously on Iraq. A spokeswoman says Mr. Rockefeller "will press to complete the remaining sections of the committee's Iraq review," but noted the lawmaker also was aware the panel "has other pressing issues that must be a priority going forward."

The reports concern one of the most controversial aspects of the Bush administration's years in power, its prewar case that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction and an active nuclear-weapons program.

When no weapons were found, the outgoing chairman of the Senate intelligence panel, Kansas Republican Pat Roberts, agreed in 2004 to conduct a five-part study of prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Two parts of the study were made public in September, including one that criticized Bush administration efforts to link Saddam Hussein to al Qaeda. But the most politically sensitive sections of the reports, say officials involved in them, have yet to be completed.

One will contrast prewar statements made by Mr. Bush and other senior administration officials about Iraq's military and terrorist capabilities with the underlying intelligence available at the time. Another looks into the work of Douglas Feith's office; at the time, Mr. Feith was a senior political appointee to the Pentagon, and his office promoted intelligence linking Iraq to al Qaeda.

Mr. Rockefeller's decision about how fast to proceed with the Iraq investigations will be watched by his fellow Democrats, many of whom believe the Bush administration willfully misled Congress and the American people in the run-up to the war. Mr. Rockefeller also will face intraparty pressure to conduct inquires into the Central Intelligence Agency's secret-prison programs for al Qaeda suspects and the White House's efforts to monitor telephone calls without seeking warrants. An aide to Mr. Rockefeller said those "are two areas that are ripe for aggressive oversight."

In the House, Democrats like Mr. Thompson will oversee domestic security for the first time since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and the creation of the Department of Homeland Security. Party officials said the Democrats are going to set the agenda on issues ranging from immigration enforcement to improved support for local responders. But their intentions to close the gaps in the nation's defenses are almost certain to go hand in hand with their desire to use their new power to bash the administration's security failures.

Mr. Thompson's legislative staff already is crafting bills designed to boost the counterterrorism skills of the nation's police departments through the creation of training centers and grants allowing the departments to send liaison officers to work overseas. Democrats have also vowed to move legislation for greater rail and mass-transit security, as well as allocate additional money to inspect cargo carried on commercial airliners.

DOJ_NMG_0093577

The ambitions, however, go far beyond bolstering hometown police and helping secure railways. House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi said she plans to pass all 41 of the 9/11 Commission's recommendations within 100 legislative hours of the Democratic takeover of the House. While Republicans' failures to embrace all the report's proposals have provided the Democrats with political fodder, the party doesn't have a bill drawn up to carry out Ms. Pelosi's plan or estimates of the costs.

Mr. Thompson said he will work with Mr. Chertoff and the Republicans on his panel to find solutions to pressing homeland-security issues, but makes clear he is prepared to go it alone if consensus proves elusive.

"If the secretary has some ideas, then he needs to lay them out," he said. "If not, I am convinced that our committee will step forward and provide some ideas for him."

Write to Yochi J. Dreazen at yochi.dreazen@wsj.com10, Jay Solomon at jay.solomon@wsj.com11 and Robert Block at bobby.block@wsj.com12

Democrats Weigh New Power As Leaders (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 9 — When Democrats take control of the Senate in January, they will immediately assume far more power to influence President Bush's agenda, particularly his choice of executive and judicial nominations that must pass through the chamber.

By virtue of their de facto 51-to-49 majority, Democrats will now control the committees and the floor schedule — a factor Mr. Bush will have to weigh in his selection of high-level candidates. (The Senate split 49 to 49, but tipping the scales toward the Democrats are Senator-elect Bernard Sanders of Vermont, an independent who caucuses with Democrats, and Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, a Democrat who ran as an independent after losing in the primary.)

"It means send us more moderate people or don't waste your time," said Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the second-in-command and a member of the Judiciary Committee, which considers judicial nominees.

Republicans acknowledge that the shift will be a significant factor in high-profile nominations, such as any to fill Supreme Court vacancies, in the remainder of the president's term. But they also say that the Senate tradition of respecting the rights of the minority gives them the same opportunities to influence the agenda that Democrats used during their years out of power.

"It is clearly going to be harder to get his people through, not easier," said Senator John Cornyn, a Texas Republican and White House ally who also sits on the Judiciary Committee. "But the Senate is different from the House, and 49 Republican senators can certainly shape a piece of legislation that goes through, or if they feel it is bad enough, they have the power to kill it."

The new majority leader, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, promised Thursday to have a more collegial relationship with the minority Republicans than he said was shown to the Democrats over the past four years of partisanship and procedural gamesmanship.

"They've set a bad example in not working with us," Mr. Reid told cheering supporters who gathered across from the Capitol to celebrate the Democrat victory. "We're not following that example."

In contrast to the House, the Senate has experienced more regular shifts in party control over the years — Democrats were last in the majority in 2002 — and many current members are accustomed to suddenly going from committee chairman to ranking minority member. In fact, many of the Democrats in line to take over important committees have wielded the gavel before, sometimes alongside the Republican who will be leaving the chairmanship.

For instance, Senator Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat and a leading party voice on military issues, has led the Armed Services Committee and has a good working relationship with senior Republicans on the panel. He will now play a major role in determining the approach on Iraq.

But there are pronounced ideological differences between the incoming leaders and those they will be replacing, as well as other lingering issues. On the Intelligence Committee, Senator John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, the top Democrat, has feuded with Senator Pat Roberts of Kansas, the Republican chairman, over Mr. Roberts' reluctance to challenge the administration's handling of intelligence preceding the Iraq war.

In what could be the biggest policy divide on the panels, Senator Barbara Boxer, the liberal California Democrat and environmental advocate, is in line to take control of the Environment and Public Works Committee from Senator James M. Inhofe of Oklahoma, who has disputed that humans are causing global warming.

"He thinks global warming is a hoax and I think it is the challenge of our generation," said Ms. Boxer, who said she has a cordial working relationship with Mr. Inhofe. "We have to move on it."

DOJ_NMG_0093578

In other notable changes, Senator Robert C. Byrd, 88, the West Virginia Democrat elected to his ninth term, is expected to resume his role as chairman of the Appropriations Committee. Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, also re-elected, will be back at the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware will be at the helm of the Foreign Relations Committee.

With new power, Senate Republicans said Democrats will now have to do more than criticize. "Now that Democrats will have control of Congress for the next two years, they have a new responsibility for one of the most important issues of our time," said Amy Call, a spokeswoman for Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader who is retiring at the end of the year. "Quite simply, how shall we win the war on terror?"

While there will no doubt be clashes with Mr. Bush, there are also some issues where he could find the new Senate easier to work with than the old one. Democrats have been much more supportive than Republicans of Mr. Bush's broad approach on immigration and that issue could get new traction.

Democrats have been cheered by Mr. Bush's new bipartisan tone in recent days and say they are willing to reciprocate. But some also noted that the president laid out a very ambitious agenda for the post-election session scheduled to begin Monday under Republican control, including seeking approval of the nomination of John R. Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations. Mr. Bolton is serving as ambassador under an interim appointment after his nomination stalled in the Senate.

"The president has indicated that he understands the significance of Tuesday's election and the need to work in a bipartisan fashion to move our nation forward," said Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut and a Bolton critic.

"But," he added, "trying to jam this nomination through during a lame-duck session may indicate that the president didn't fully hear the voice of the American public — and that is troubling."

Democrats have complained for years that Republicans have run roughshod over the minority party in both the House and Senate, and they promise to restore more traditional processes, including having open negotiations between the House and Senate over major legislation.

With the pickup of six Senate seats that even he did not anticipate, Mr. Reid is more than secure in his post as party leader, with Mr. Durbin as the assistant leader. The party is exploring ways to recognize the leadership role of Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York. Mr. Schumer, the architect of the Democrats' triumph as head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, has been invited to lead that group for the 2008 elections if he chooses.

In the House, Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who led the successful campaign effort there, announced Thursday that he would seek to lead the Democratic conference — the fourth-ranking leadership slot. The decision could earn Mr. Emanuel, 47, further goodwill by averting a potentially divisive contest for the majority whip position with Representative James E. Clyburn of South Carolina.

"I seek this post, and not any other, because I believe what we need now is a unified Democratic caucus, focused squarely on the business of moving this country forward," Mr. Emanuel said in a statement.

Sweep Gives Dems Power To Put Plans Into Action (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence, Usa Today

USA Today, November 10, 2006

Allen concedes to Webb, won't seek recount

WASHINGTON — The resolution of the Virginia Senate race Thursday completed a Democratic sweep of Congress, setting the stage for a rush of ideas, investigations and confirmation skirmishes from a party largely left out of national decision-making for the past four years.

The Democratic Senate takeover became official when Republican Sen. George Allen conceded to Democrat Jim Webb in Virginia. Earlier Thursday, Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., conceded defeat to Democrat Jon Tester, who had already been declared the winner. House Democrats sealed their majority Wednesday.

The loss of both chambers will hamper President Bush's ability to advance proposals on Capitol Hill or kill what he doesn't like. "Bush won't have anyone to sweep the Democrats' ideas under the carpet," says Bruce Reed, a former White House aide who is president of the Democratic Leadership Council (DLC). "If Democrats on the Hill don't want to deal with Bush's agenda, they don't have to."

The new Senate will have 49 Democrats, two independents who vote with them, and 49 Republicans.

Allen was about 9,000 votes behind Webb as a statewide canvass continued, close enough to request a taxpayer-financed recount. Allen said that could drag on until Christmas and he had decided against it.

"I do not wish to cause more rancor by protracted litigation, which would, in my judgment, not alter the results," Allen said in a bittersweet speech to supporters in Alexandria, Va.

DOJ_NMG_0093579

Webb, a onetime Republican who served as Ronald Reagan's Navy secretary and supported Allen in 2000, told cheering Democrats down the road in Arlington that Allen had called to congratulate him. “We will begin the process of putting this country back on the track where it needs to be,” Webb said of new Democratic majorities.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., surrounded by his jubilant leadership team on Capitol Hill, said Democrats will prove they can work with Republicans. “They've set a very bad example in not working with us,” he said. “We're not following that example. We're reaching out to them.”

Bush, after meeting Thursday with House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, in line to be speaker, said the election was over and her party had won. “We won't agree on every issue, but we do agree that we love America equally, that we're concerned about the future of this country, and that we will do our very best to address big problems,” he said.

Some Republicans facing voters in two years may work with Democrats even if Bush doesn't, says Julian Zelizer, a political scientist at Boston University. “There is a lot of frustration and fear about 2008,” he says. “People don't care about Bush anymore,” he adds, they just want a big domestic policy achievement and “a way out of this war.”

Norman Ornstein, co-author of The Broken Branch, a book about Congress, predicts “double-barreled investigations” of Iraq war contracts and the conduct of the war, with House and Senate Democrats “calling in generals left and right” to testify. “That's a nasty thing for a president to have to deal with,” he says.

Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Ind., a 2008 presidential prospect, says there is “pent-up demand” for oversight of the Bush administration, but Democrats should not pursue investigations that seem like “partisan payback.” He says the standard should be whether people at home would say “if I were there, I'd be asking those questions, too.”

Scrutiny of clear problem areas such as the conduct of the Iraq war or the response to Hurricane Katrina is fair game, he told reporters and editors from USA TODAY and Gannett News Service.

The Senate's constitutional responsibility to advise and consent on presidential nominations presents more opportunity for conflict. Ornstein says he expects Democrats to do “just what Republicans did in (Bill) Clinton's final two years” when it comes to judicial nominations: “sit on them and let very few of them out” of committee for votes on the floor.

The DLC's Reed says Bush will have to consult with Democrats on nominees, including Supreme Court justices, if he wants them to succeed: “If Bush chooses to send up extremely conservative nominees, they're not likely to go anywhere.”

Reed was domestic policy adviser to President Clinton when Republicans captured Congress in 1994. He says it will take time for Bush and his aides to adjust to losing Congress. “They're in shock,” he says, speaking from personal experience. “They're going to flop around for a while trying to figure out what to do. They're going to have to grieve.”

Now The Decider Must Listen (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

Short of actual insurrection, I don't think the country could have spoken more clearly than it did Tuesday. But there's one question still to be answered, and in honor of Donald Rumsfeld, who now can devote full time and attention to stretching the boundaries of modern philosophy, let's call it a "known unknown": Did George W. Bush really hear what the nation told him about Iraq?

I think he did, but I'm pessimistic that he'll listen.

Since the election, the president has been saying all the right things about bipartisanship, about how eager he is to work with the new Democratic leadership on Capitol Hill. But what choice does he have after an electoral "thumpin' " of such historic proportions?

Power rules in Washington the way money rules in New York or celebrity in Los Angeles, and the White House has measurably less power today than it had a week ago. If Bush doesn't find a way to work with the opposition, he might as well spend the rest of his term at the ranch out in Crawford, riding his mountain bike and clearing all that pesky brush.

Never mind that after each of his slim victories, Bush claimed the kind of mandate that can be conferred only by a landslide. Never mind that he made no effort to govern from the center, with bipartisan support. He acted as if Democrats didn't exist, except as foils for his overheated rhetoric. Now they are indispensable to the remainder of his presidency and to the legacy he ultimately leaves behind.

There are indeed issues on which Bush and the Democrats will find the "common ground" that everyone claims to be seeking. The president's plan on immigration was blocked by Republicans, and now that the Great Wall of Arizona has been approved, maybe Washington will be able to come up with a reasonable, workable solution to the problem of undocumented migrants.

In exit polls, voters said they were deeply concerned about "corruption" in Washington -- a perfect issue to tackle in the new bipartisan spirit. Both parties will agree to ignore the basic problem, which is the corrosive effect that money has on our whole political system. The president and Congress will bravely declare their opposition to influence-peddling and various other sins. Then they will join in crafting "reform" legislation that might have some effect on the margins and that definitely will create more paperwork for lawyers -- but that leaves the current system pretty much in place.

DOJ_NMG_0093580

Hey, Republican lobbyists have been gorging themselves at the public trough for a decade. Wouldn't be fair to deny Democratic lobbyists their turn, would it?

Iraq is another story. The election was also a referendum on George W. Bush's war, and clearly he understands that. He had been working on Rumsfeld's ouster for some time, but announcing it the day after the thumpin' seemed to be a concession.

What I haven't heard from Bush is any willingness to change his basic policy in Iraq. In his news conference Wednesday, he essentially retracted the aspersions he had cast on the Democratic Party's patriotism. But his message was that he's happy to work with the Democrats -- as long as they agree to his basic war policy, which is to keep American troops in Iraq "until the job is done."

I haven't heard an admission from Bush that the conflict has fundamentally changed, that American soldiers are now dying not to overthrow a tyrant (done that) or, primarily, even to fight an insurgency (still doing that), but to tamp down a sectarian civil war. I haven't heard an admission from Bush that the war was poorly planned, that the occupation has been poorly handled or that our supposed Iraqi allies have their own interests that don't necessarily coincide with ours.

I haven't seen any indication that Bush is ready to ask himself the questions that millions of Americans posed on Tuesday: What are we accomplishing in Iraq? What kind of country, realistically, will we leave behind? Will leaving Iraq, in, say, five years make us any safer than leaving Iraq now? Will our extended presence even make life better for Iraqis?

Democrats were restrained during the campaign, which was smart. But now it's time for them to ask those hard questions -- and use their new power to compel answers. Even if they have to be unfashionably partisan about it.

eugenerobinson@washpost.com

New Majority Plans Early Security Push (USAT)

By Thomas Frank And Mimi Hall, Usa Today

USA Today, November 10, 2006

Aviation officials say that may mean policies that could cripple industry

WASHINGTON — Democrats say they will use their majority in Congress to strengthen domestic security by putting millions of dollars into technology at airports and ports and increasing government oversight.

But they also may push policies that aviation officials say could cripple the industry, such as requiring screening of all cargo before it's put on passenger planes.

House Democrats made domestic security a centerpiece of their campaign this year and vowed to fulfill all the 9/11 Commission's recommendations. “Real security” is the first of six policies Democrats will push when they take control of Congress in January, according to a manifesto they recently published to highlight differences with Republicans.

Democrats won control of the House and Senate in Tuesday's elections.

That could mean more money for the Transportation Security Administration to buy machines that better detect weapons on passengers and in carry-on bags, and to hire additional screeners.

“I expect a much more supportive attitude on better funding TSA to get them the equipment they need and maybe more personnel,” said Rep. Peter DeFazio, D-Ore., a senior member of the TSA oversight committee.

Government reports blame screener staffing shortages for longer security lines and outmoded machines for bombs and guns slipping past screeners in tests by undercover investigators. The number of screeners dropped from 45,000 to 43,000 in the last year. Funding for new bomb detectors fell from $180 million two years ago to $141 million this year.

Rep. Dan Lungren, R-Calif., chairman of the TSA oversight committee, said Democrats may struggle to find extra money for TSA. “I hope that we're going to try to work for better government, but that means doing it in the context of what's affordable,” Lungren said.

DeFazio suggested a possible increase in security fees that are added to every airplane ticket — an idea the administration has proposed in the past two years but which Congress killed amid airline protest.

Other areas that Democrats will push:

·More grants for local emergency responders and better organization of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. This is a priority for the likely new chairman of the subcommittee that sets Homeland Security Department spending, Rep. David Price of North Carolina, a state vulnerable to hurricanes.

“After 9/11, many local first responders got additional responsibilities, but the federal government has done an inadequate job in supporting them,” said Price spokesman Paul Cox.

·Stronger port security through more grants and possibly requiring more screening of cargo containers being unloaded.

DOJ_NMG_0093581

"Most major seaports are in Democratic strongholds," said retired Coast Guard officer Stephen Flynn of the Council on Foreign Relations think tank. "This is a visible issue for them as they look to be seen as energetic on security."

·Forcing chemical plants to check employee backgrounds and use safer materials that would make them less of a terrorist target. Democrats have sought such measures through bills that have failed in the past three years.

They will still face opposition from the chemical industry and Republicans who oppose mandates on businesses.

·More intensive scrutiny of Homeland Security and TSA leaders. "There'll definitely be a lot of investigation into what TSA has done to date in terms of new technologies and screening air cargo," said Peter Kant, a lobbyist for Rapiscan Systems, which sells TSA screening equipment.

·Setting a deadline for full screening of the 3 million tons of cargo loaded onto passenger planes each year. The TSA has proposed steps to screen more cargo. "A key difference is setting a firm deadline," said Tom Blank, TSA's former acting deputy administrator.

Jon Kent, a lobbyist for air-cargo groups, said requiring all air cargo to go through bomb detectors before being put on passenger planes "would be a disaster for air commerce" because screening would take so long.

Kent wonders if Democrats will be as adamant as they were when they were out of power. "It's far easier to take an absolute position," Kent said, "when you don't have to worry about the consequences."

Dingell Wants To Cut U.S. Oil Habit (USAT)

By James R. Healey, Usa Today

USA Today, November 10, 2006

Democrat set to rule again over energy

Conventional wisdom says that Democrats, who will control both houses of Congress next year, will somehow cut America's dependence on oil, especially imported, and trim the average American's fuel bill.

That could be hard.

"A lot of things have been said in the campaigns, but when you finally have to sit down and govern, you see things differently," says John Felmy, economist and spokesman for the American Petroleum Institute, Big Oil's trade association.

In the catbird seat — perhaps the hot seat — is Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., who again becomes chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, a post he held before the Republicans took control of Congress. The committee's wide-ranging mandate includes authority over consumer affairs and energy policy.

Dingell says he wants to cut the U.S. oil habit, promising the committee's help in "making the United States energy-independent."

At the same time, though, he must represent the interests of the Michigan-based auto industry. Energy-conservation initiatives can cost automakers hundreds of millions of dollars for research and development of fuel-efficiency hardware and software for which new car buyers won't pay extra.

"John Dingell has traditionally done a great job representing his constituents in Michigan. People in the House and the Senate look to him for guidance on" auto-related issues, says Marchant Wentworth, legislative representative on energy issues for the Union of Concerned Scientists.

UCS believes automakers could make vehicles much more fuel efficient using off-the-shelf components and systems that would add little or nothing to the cost and price.

Dingell is not eager to force automakers to improve fuel economy by boosting what's known as CAFE, for corporate average fuel economy. In an interview, he said, "The committee only has so much time," and noted that the CAFE standards recently were boosted. Fuel economy standards, he said, "can be addressed very well, automobile or light trucks, within the framework of existing law," which "gives an awful lot of freedom to the administration" to adjust the standards to keep up with improving technology.

"If you're talking about straight CAFE, you can't regard the arrival of John Dingell in that position as good news," said Therese Langer, transportation program director for the American Council for an Energy-Efficient Economy.

However, she noted, Dingell "gave a speech to the industry in Detroit a couple of years ago, saying, 'I've been sticking up for you, and now we want you to get more efficient.' "

She said energy and alternative fuel issues will become more visible in a Democrat-controlled Congress, but, "It's hard to say if something new and significant will pass. I don't regard it as a big change; there are a lot of the same players. But these things will get a lot more air time."

Energy, in fact, might not be Dingell's and the committee's priority.

"We'll try to see which issues are ready, and go into them as fast as the business of the committee permits," he said. "We'll kill the closest snake first."

DOJ_NMG_0093582

Dingell is passionate about overhauling health care by getting cheaper generic dugs to market faster; giving the government the authority to negotiate Medicare drug prices with pharmaceutical companies; stopping what he says are "almost certain overpayments" to health insurance companies; and regulating dietary supplements, which, he says, "are killing people." He wouldn't name the supplements he considers dangerous.

Cheaper health care would be a boon to the Detroit auto industry, which has more retirees to support and an older workforce than the U.S.-based foreign automakers.

Likely to get attention:

·Alternative fuels. Look for moves to extend tax benefits to wind and solar power and for producing so-called biomass fuels, such as ethanol, typically made from corn, and new tax breaks for non-petroleum fuels.

Both parties already agree, more or less, on such benefits, so extending and boosting them "will be the quickest thing Congress can do" to act on the energy-independence promise, notes UCS' Wentworth.

And it'll be good politics, considering that corn for ethanol mainly is grown in the Midwest. "All paths lead through Iowa for the presidency," noted Tom Kloza, veteran analyst at consultant Oil Price Information Service. Iowa's early political caucuses often make or break presidential hopefuls.

·Big Oil subsidies. "We'll take a look," Dingell said. Wentworth said that halting some subsidies — begun when oil prices were low but suspect now that prices and profits are high — would provide the money Democrats want to invest in alternative-fuel technology.

·Conservation. "If you went through the (1973-74) Arab oil embargo, as I did, we found that … failing to be prepared and have good conservation practices was hideously costly," Dingell said.

Before then, Japanese cars were a curiosity. When Americans discovered the Japanese machines got double or triple the mileage of big American cars, a rush to buy Japanese began. Detroit is still reeling from that shift.

First, Ethics Reform (WP)

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

The 'culture of corruption' helped Democrats win. Now they need to fix the mess.

ONE OF THE loudest messages from Tuesday's elections was disgust with the way Washington does business. In exit polls, 42 percent of voters said corruption and scandals in government were extremely important in their decisions -- a greater share than for the war in Iraq, terrorism or the economy. House Democrats have vowed to quickly adopt new ethics rules; their package is good but could be improved. Senate Democrats, who, after yesterday's gracious concession by Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), will control the chamber, say they too have heard the voters' demand for change.

The House Democrats' package, which incoming speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) promised to enact during the Democrats' first day in control, would prohibit lawmakers and their staff from accepting meals, gifts and trips paid for by lobbyists or organizations that employ lobbyists. To end a Jack Abramoff practice -- the use of nonprofit groups to disguise trips paid for by lobbyists or other interested parties -- the Democrats' measure would require advance approval for other travel. Lawmakers would be barred from riding corporate jets for official travel but could still do so on campaign and political trips, a loophole that ought to be plugged. Lawmakers and staffers would have to wait two years, not one as currently, to lobby their former colleagues.

The weakest link in the House package concerns enforcement. A new Office of Public Integrity would review lobbyists' filings, but lawmakers would remain under the jurisdiction of the House ethics committee, whose sorry performance this year argues for a system less susceptible to partisan stalemate. Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) and Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.) have proposed an independent investigator who would provide greater scrutiny and accountability while leaving ultimate authority to elected officials. The new House leaders should incorporate that plan into their package.

Changing Senate rules is more complicated because doing so requires a two-thirds vote, but the office of the incoming majority leader, Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), said yesterday that he is also committed to swift action. Only the House Democrats promised before the election to make ethics a priority, but if the election results helped refocus Senate Democrats on ethics issues, that's all to the good. One major shortcoming in the proposal endorsed by Senate Democrats this year involved the use of corporate aircraft. Simply requiring that lawmakers disclose their acceptance of such cut-rate flights isn't adequate; if they fly on corporate jets, they ought to be required to pay market rates.

Then, after changing ethics rules, the new Congress needs to pass the lobbying reform legislation that its predecessor neglected to its peril.

The Family-Friendly Congress? (NYT)

By Judith Warner

DOJ_NMG_0093583

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

Washington

WHILE the excitement over Nancy Pelosi, most likely to be our first female speaker of the House, is still fresh, and while those of us who care about these things are still bubbling over the election of the highest number of women to Congress in history, I'd like to issue a challenge: Ladies, step up to the plate on behalf of the rest of America's women — and their families.

This shouldn't be a radical idea. Ms. Pelosi has, after all, spent months now reminding us that she is not merely a capable leader, not just a whiz-bang political fund-raiser, but, first and foremost, "a mother and a grandmother."

That's lovely for her; but if Ms. Pelosi's experience of motherhood is to have any meaning for the rest of us, or any relevance to her life as a politician, we've got to see some follow-through. Because if, as Ms. Pelosi has repeatedly said, she'll be taking up the speaker's gavel "on behalf of America's children," there's a lot of work to do. For children can't thrive if their families are stressed and, at every point on the socioeconomic spectrum now, it seems that American families are cracking at the seams.

The Center for WorkLife Law at the University of California Hastings College of the Law released a study last month noting that "workplace inflexibility, the lack of family supports and workplace bias" are forcing American mothers out of the work force — whether they can really afford to "opt out" or not.

This comes on the heels of news articles showing how working-class moms are putting their youngsters in all-night child care, and how couples are increasingly enduring split-shift work schedules — putting their health and marriages at risk — to avoid the costs and anxieties of day care. All this paints a picture of family life in America that is very grim for all but the very privileged.

For years now, there have been murmurings — and more — from various corners of Congress in favor of change. Representative Lynn Woolsey's Balancing Act bill, which calls for a wide array of measures to reduce the stresses on working families, has been languishing for years. Senators Christopher Dodd and Ted Kennedy have gestured toward legislation on paid family leave and guaranteed sick leave. There was even a much-overlooked bill introduced in the Senate by Hillary Clinton this summer (and in the House by Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut) to provide low-income parents with subsidies to stay at home and care for their infants themselves.

It's time to light a fire under these kinds of initiatives. Ms. Pelosi's current promises — to raise the minimum wage, cut the interest rates on student loans and make some college tuition tax deductible — are a laudable start, but American families, whose needs have been increasingly neglected since the early 1980s, need so much more: quality after-school programs; national standards for child care; voucher programs and tax subsidies to help pay for that care; universal, voluntary public preschool; paid family leave; and incentives for businesses to make part-time and flex-time work financially viable.

In short, we need to make the kind of glorious life that's enjoyed by upper-middle-class mothers and grandmothers like Ms. Pelosi and her colleagues possible for everyone else.

This isn't a radical leftist agenda. In fact, there's no better antidote to the selfish individualism and empty materialism that Americans of all political stripes say is corrupting our country than policies that allow families to spend more, and better, time together.

In recent years, pro-family Democrats were out in the legislative wilderness. Now, there's simply no excuse for inaction. It's time to shoot for the moon. Risk a presidential veto. And let the proponents of "family values" show their true colors.

Alternative Minimum Tax Targeted (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

Democratic leaders this week vowed to make the alternative minimum tax a centerpiece of next year's budget debate, saying the levy threatens to unfairly increase tax bills for millions of middle-class families by the end of the decade.

The complex and expensive tax was designed to prevent the super-rich from using deductions, credits and other shelters to avoid paying the Internal Revenue Service. But because of rising incomes, the tax is expected to expand to more than 30 million taxpayers in 2010 from 3.8 million mostly well-off households in 2006.

Fixing the AMT has long been a top priority for Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), who is in line to head the Senate Finance Committee. Last year, Baucus co-authored a bill to repeal the tax with Senate Finance Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa).

Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), the presumptive chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, this week put fixing the AMT at the top of his agenda, calling it far more urgent than dealing with President Bush's request to extend the 2001 and 2003 tax cuts, which are scheduled to expire in 2010.

And yesterday, House Democratic Whip Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), who is campaigning to keep his leadership post, said Democrats will make "fixing the AMT . . . a priority of tax policy next year."

DOJ_NMG_0093584

The focus on the AMT is hardly surprising, given that victims of the tax have been concentrated in high-cost urban areas such as Washington, New York and San Francisco -- places that tend to vote Democratic. Rangel, Hoyer and Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the presumptive House speaker, all represent states hit hard by the AMT, which is sometimes called the "blue-state tax." To map states with the highest concentrations of AMT taxpayers is to draw bull's-eyes over California and the Northeastern seaboard.

Locally, an estimated 240,000 families and individuals in the District, Maryland and Virginia will have to pay the AMT at tax time in April, according to projections by the nonprofit Citizens for Tax Justice. That is an increase of nearly 100,000 local families since 2003.

These taxpayers would owe the IRS $6,813 in additional taxes on average, according to an analysis by the Tax Policy Center, a joint project of the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution.

"Seventy percent of my friends are on the AMT. We're the demographic," said the center's co-director, Leonard Burman, a senior fellow at the Urban Institute who lives in Arlington and, like many interviewed for this story, has been hit by the AMT. "If you have children, if you pay high state and local income taxes, you're going to be subject to the AMT. That's the professional class in the Washington and New York suburbs, and Los Angeles and San Francisco. You can see it in the data."

In simple terms, the AMT is sort of a flat tax with two brackets, 26 and 28 percent, and fewer deductions. Credits for dependents, medical expenses, and state and local taxes are all disallowed. Instead, taxpayers get a single big deduction, called the AMT exemption, which is set this year at $62,550 for married couples and $42,500 for singles. Taxpayers must compute their taxes both ways and pay whichever is higher.

The impact is harshest on taxpayers with annual incomes of $100,000 to $500,000. The truly rich typically are not affected because their regular tax rates already are higher than under the AMT.

This year, the AMT is expected to ensnare 3.8 million taxpayers. Next year, the AMT exemption is scheduled to drop precipitously, causing that number to balloon to 23 million households, according to the congressional Joint Committee on Taxation.

By 2010, "the AMT will become the de facto tax system for filers in the $200,000 to $500,000 income range, 94 percent of whom will face the tax," according to a report by the Tax Policy Center. About half of tax filers making $75,000 to $100,000 will have to pay the tax, including 89 percent of married couples in that income bracket who have at least two children.

In the past, Congress has patched the AMT one year at a time, primarily by increasing the exemption amount. Next year, to hold the number of affected taxpayers steady at about 4 million, the patch would cost about $50 billion, according to the Joint Committee on Taxation.

Getting rid of the tax altogether would be even more expensive: more than $1 trillion over the next decade, by various estimates. Budget experts doubt that Democrats can do it without reneging on their promise to reduce the budget deficit or winning an agreement from Republicans to raise taxes elsewhere.

In recent weeks, experts from both parties have called the nation's fiscal situation dire and called for a bipartisan summit to address a variety of ticking time bombs set to explode soon after the 2008 presidential election, including the AMT, Social Security, Medicaid and Medicare.

"You cannot solve this nation's fiscal problems without increased revenue," Robert E. Rubin, the Clinton administration Treasury secretary, told the Economic Club of Washington this week.

Political analysts see little chance for that kind of cooperation until after 2008. Bush is heavily committed to maintaining his tax cuts, arguing that they have spurred the nation's economy. And analysts say Bush is unlikely to participate in a summit that could produce the kind of tax increase that helped drive his father, President George H.W. Bush, out of office.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said this week that fixing the AMT is "absolutely a priority" for the president. But for now, Fratto said, "The Democrats have an opportunity to put their ideas on the table."

Rangel, it seems, is ready to rumble. When asked about whether he favored making the Bush tax cuts permanent during his first news conference after the Democrats claimed control of the House, Rangel demurred and raised the issue of the AMT.

Rangel's aides, meanwhile, have been marshaling evidence that Bush tax cuts have exacerbated the effects of the AMT by reducing regular taxes for many families but not their AMT rates, forcing them to pay the higher amounts. And families thrown into the AMT don't benefit from many of the deductions, rate cuts and credits that comprise the Bush tax cuts, said John Buckley, the Democrats' chief tax counsel on the Ways and Means Committee.

"The real story on the AMT is how it takes back the Bush tax cuts," Buckley said. "For people who are married with children or live in states with income taxes, the tax cuts are temporary unless you fix the AMT."

Ex-Treasury Head Rubin Urges Democrats To Mull Tax Increase (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

DOJ_NMG_0093585

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin has some advice for the Democrats who will soon control Congress: Raise taxes.

Mr. Rubin, who helped engineer a budget surplus while serving under President Clinton, is advising Democrats that there's no way to deal with the "deep threat" posed by the nation's fiscal problems without a combination of spending control and higher taxes.

"We are at a critical juncture," Mr. Rubin told the Economic Club of Washington Thursday night. "You cannot solve the nation's fiscal problems without increased revenues."

But raising taxes is a message many Democratic lawmakers are unlikely to utter aloud -- at least for now. President Bush and other Republicans consistently warned during the midterm campaign that, if elected, Democrats would increase taxes and hurt the economy. President Bush has insisted that his 2001 and 2003 tax cuts have helped the economy and lowered the unemployment rate and that any tax increase or failure to make those cuts permanent would weaken the economy.

Since winning control, the Democratic leadership has insisted there are no plans for a wholesale rollback of President Bush's tax cuts. But they do acknowledge they're thinking about ways to raise revenue, including potentially rescinding some of the tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans, according to a spokeswoman for California Rep. Nancy Pelosi, who is in line to become the next House speaker.

Many political observers say Democrats may ultimately have no choice but to raise taxes if they follow through with their plans to implement "pay as you go" budgeting, which requires that any tax cut be offset by spending cuts or new revenue. Among the Democrats' priorities is to ease the burden of the alternative minimum tax, which could cost the government $1 trillion over 10 years.

Ms. Pelosi, along with New York Rep. Charles Rangel, who is expected to become chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, insist they are also looking at other approaches besides raising taxes, such as trying to close the estimated $350 billion "tax gap" -- the money the government says it's owed from individuals and businesses but can't collect. A senior aide to Mr. Rangel said Democrats may look to boost funding to the Internal Revenue Service to help close some of that gap.

In his speech, Mr. Rubin said the combination of the nation's budget deficit, the growing costs of programs like Medicare and Social Security and a heavy reliance on foreign borrowing pose "a deep threat to our economy and the global economy" and said politicians will need to employ "some combination of revenues and spending discipline."

But he said Democrats should rest easy about what impact any tax increase would have. "I think if you were to increase taxes right now you would have probably about zero negative effect on the economy," he said.

The Wages Of Politics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

A hike in the national minimum wage seems all but certain to become one of the first fruits of the Democrats' victories this week. Nancy Pelosi, the presumptive Speaker of the House, has pledged to raise the minimum by over $2, to $7.25 from $5.15. And President Bush has already signaled he'd go along. At the state level, six states not only approved minimum wage hikes in referendums this week but indexed the minimum to inflation going forward. We hope Mr. Bush fights off any attempt at federal indexation and insists on a provision to protect small business.

Raising the minimum wage has been a hardy perennial of the left for decades now. What is striking is the degree to which is has come to be seen as an economic free lunch. Even some reputedly unbiased economists have started to tout the view that raising the minimum wage has no discernible effect on job creation.

But if this were true, they'd be calling for a $10, $20 or even $50-an-hour minimum wage. They're not, and neither is Nancy Pelosi. That's because the law of demand is one of the most dependable precepts of economics. It says that when the price of something goes up, demand for it goes down. An employee's wages are the price the employer pays for his services, so raising their wages means forcing employers to pay more for workers. The price goes up and there is downward pressure on demand for workers. Other things being equal, jobs are lost.

For a long time, this was so obvious that no serious person doubted it. But a couple of studies in the 1990s purported to find no evidence of job loss associated with minimum-wage hikes, and it's been off to the races ever since. Classical economics teaches that for a given job, there is a market-clearing price -- the price at which both someone is willing to do it and someone else is willing to pay them to do it. If you raise the legal minimum above that price, you may get more people willing to perform the job, but you'll probably also get less people (employers) willing to pay the new, higher price to get the job done.

To picture how this works, think about the grocery bagger in the supermarket, a classic low-wage service job. Supermarkets hire grocery baggers for the minimum wage, or close to it, because it's a perk that makes their customers' experience a bit nicer and helps move the lines along, possibly requiring fewer cashiers, who cost more to hire than grocery baggers.

DOJ_NMG_0093586

Now, if you pass a law saying everyone, including grocery baggers, has to be paid $10 an hour, what happens? The supermarket probably hires fewer baggers, or has them work fewer hours. Perhaps they decide they only need baggers between 4 p.m. and 7 p.m. If you put the minimum wage up to $20 an hour, shoppers bag their own groceries. This is so clear that it's taken some time for the defenders of an ever-rising minimum wage to come up with an adequate theory to obscure it.

Most jobs do not involve bagging groceries. But most jobs don't pay the minimum wage. The Bureau of Labor Statistics puts the number of minimum-wage earners at 2% of the work force. The majority of these are under 25 years old and single. Minimum-wage jobs also tend to have higher turnover.

The theory propounded by the advocates of a higher minimum wage is this: The market for minimum-wage jobs is neither efficient nor fair. Workers don't have adequate information about the alternatives available to them, and employers don't know enough about what the true market-clearing price is. So employers impose an artificially low wage rate on the disadvantaged, who as a result don't work as hard and tend to quit more often than they would if they were paid "fairly." Raising the minimum wage increases productivity and decreases turnover (because workers are more satisfied), which lowers the real cost of the job as well as the frictional costs of constantly seeking and training new workers (costs the employer was unwittingly paying because he didn't know the "correct" price to pay his workers). Everyone is better off; no one suffers.

The problems that afflict this idyll are no different from every attempt to replace market-determined prices with planned ones. Even if it is true that some workers are underpaid, and it probably is (we've never met another journalist who thought ink-stained wretches, as a class, were overpaid), there's still the problem of determining what the right wage is. Why would anyone suppose that Nancy Pelosi knows that better than the supermarket manager?

As for the employer who supposedly harms himself and his business by driving off underpaid workers, who is to say he doesn't know what he is doing? Perhaps years of experience have taught him that grocery baggers leave after six months no matter what you pay them (within reason). In any case, we doubt that Ms. Pelosi loses a lot of sleep over the capitalists' misunderstanding of their own labor pool.

It is implicit in the logic behind raising the minimum wage that if we squeeze employers just a little, they won't even notice. Another argument, this one made explicitly, is that jobs are destroyed, but the wage gains more than make up for the reduced number of jobs. But this is only true if it's not your job that is destroyed. If you are a young black male, you are slightly more likely than the general population to be paid minimum wage, but you are almost 10 times as likely not to have a job at all. And if you're unemployed, raising the minimum wage not only doesn't help you find a job; it probably hurts. Welcome to Speaker Pelosi's idea of progress.

Time For The $5.15 Minimum Wage To Punch Out? (WSJ)

By Sarah Nassauer

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

Here's a look at some of the issues:

How many would be affected by the change? Because many states have minimum-wages that surpass the federal law, the Economic Policy Institute, Washington, D.C., estimates that only about 15 million people would be affected by a federal minimum-wage increase to $7.25. That number could decrease slightly after the six states that voted to implement a wage increase on Tuesday put their laws into action. The EPI includes some "spillover" in this figure -- that is, people who made more then $7.25 before the change but will likely get an increase in pay to stay in the same relative position on their company's pay scale.

Would some lose their jobs as a result? This is a hotly debated question. Traditionally, labor unions have pushed for wage increases, saying unemployment isn't a factor, while the restaurant, retail, and small-business industries have said raising the minimum wage will create job loses. Young and unskilled workers are the groups usually singled out as most at risk.

A watershed study by economists David Card and Alan B. Krueger in 1994 said that minimum-wage increases in New Jersey didn't result in job losses in the fast-food industry. But that stance has been challenged by other economists. A 2003 survey by Dan Fuller and Doris Geide-Stevenson said that 46% of academic economists in the U.S. agreed with the statement, "a minimum-wage increases unemployment among young and unskilled workers," while 28% partly agreed, and 27% disagreed. A similar study from 1978, published in the American Economic Review, said 90% of economists surveyed agreed or partly agreed with the statement.

Regardless of what economists say, public opinion has always been strongly in favor of lifting the federal minimum wage.

Do some earn less than the federal minimum wage? The U.S. Department of Labor estimates that about 1.4 million people earn below minimum wage and that 72% of those people work in the leisure and hospitality industry. This figure can be misleading because the Labor Department data are based on answers given by workers. Many people round down their salary to $5 an hour when they respond to the survey. The Labor Department says 300,000 people said they earned exactly $5 an hour on the 2005 survey.

DOJ_NMG_0093587

Also, many people who work in food preparation -- waiters, for example -- take home paychecks of less than $5.15 an hour because of a federal "tip-credit" law, which allows employers to pay workers less per-hour if they meet minimum-wage standards based on tips.

All six states that put a minimum-wage referendum on ballots Nov. 7 passed an increase.

In the wake of the Great Depression, Congress set the first minimum wage in October 1938 at 25 cents an hour under the Fair Labor Standards Act. The act also established maximum working hours and banned most child labor.

Gallup Polls taken to gauge public opinion on minimum-wage increases since 1937 show that public opinion has never been against raising the minimum wage. The level of support varied from about 55% in 1945 to 83% in 2006.

Minimum-wage workers tend to be young. About half of workers earning $5.15 or less in 2005 were under 25 years old, and about one-fourth of workers earning at or below the minimum wage were 16 to 19. Among employed teenagers, about 9% earned $5.15 or less.

The industry with the highest proportion of workers with reported hourly wages at or below $5.15 in 2005 was leisure and hospitality, at about 14%. About three-fifths of all workers paid at or below the federal minimum wage were in this industry, primarily in food services.

As of Dec. 2, the U.S. will have gone nine years, four months and one day without increasing the federal minimum wage, the longest stretch in the nation's history. The longest stretch to date is from 1981 to 1990, when the federal minimum wage was raised to $3.80.

Slow Track (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt, Neil King , Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Democrats' sweep of Congress is set to deliver a blow to President Bush's free-trade ambitions and could hamper impending trade deals both big and small.

Democrats' stances against free trade helped build the party's success at the polls and could tip the balance on trade matters. The new dynamic could put a definitive end to the already troubled effort to reach a global agreement to reduce tariffs and open markets, known as the Doha round. It also could put in jeopardy smaller deals such as those the U.S. has crafted with Peru and Colombia, intended to boost two-way trade by lowering tariffs and increasing intellectual-property protections.

Two dozen tightly contested races turned partly on Democrats' protectionist platforms, according to Public Citizen, a liberal advocacy group. All told, 16 incoming "trade skeptics" are set to replace "trade friendly" Republicans in the House, according to a study by the Swiss Institute for International Economics at the University of St. Gallen. Five new Senate Democrats are viewed as more critical on trade than were their opponents.

"The House and Senate are going to exert themselves on trade much more aggressively," vows Ohio Democrat Sherrod Brown, whose successful campaign against free-trade Republican Sen. Mike DeWine was built on opposition to the Bush trade agenda. In one television advertisement he stood before an abandoned local factory, contending Mr. DeWine had supported trade agreements that cost the state jobs. "Congress has given too much of its authority to the president," he says. "We've just ceded our power."

A lame-duck session of the current Congress is set to vote as early as next week on whether to lift Cold War-era economic restrictions on Vietnam, which has just joined the World Trade Organization, and grant it the same benefits as other U.S. trading partners. That vote is expected to pass easily, despite some opposition in the textile industry.

After that, Democrats are gearing up for a major pushback against the Bush administration on other trade fronts, most notably on a vote next year on whether to renew the president's authority to negotiate trade deals with other countries, without amendment from Congress. That authority expires in the summer.

The U.S. in the past 20 years has championed global and regional trade deals that have significantly lowered tariffs and have helped spur a boom in global trade. Advocates assert that the U.S. would benefit from more liberalization, both to bring in lower-cost imports and to increase exports. Opponents argue lowering trade barriers has hollowed out the U.S. manufacturing base and done lasting harm to many pockets of the economy.

Special presidential trade-negotiating authority, often called "fast track," is critical to getting deals done. Other countries are reluctant to negotiate with the U.S. if there is a chance the deals could changed by Congress instead of just approved or rejected. Democratic critics have long complained that the Republican Congress gave too much negotiating latitude to Mr. Bush and want to rein the president in.

DOJ_NMG_0093588

Trade experts say Democrats may try to exact concessions from President Bush that would render a deal on fast-track nearly impossible. For instance, some Democrats have suggested significantly increasing the $1 billion the government gives yearly to workers displaced by foreign competition. Others are proposing compromises such as limiting fast-track authority only to the Doha talks.

Some business officials expressed cautious optimism that trade liberalization won't grind to a halt in the next Congress. "The trade agenda may change, may be done in a different way, but it isn't going to end altogether," says Bill Miller, a congressional liaison for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. He and others said past Republican dismissiveness of Democratic concerns on recent trade legislation -- such as labor rights and environmental protection in recent trade bills -- may have stirred some of the deepest opposition. A more cooperative environment could make a difference, they said.

Charlene Barshefsky, President Clinton's trade representative, agrees, predicting Democrats could show real cooperation to try to secure the Doha round. "I see tougher sailing ahead, but not necessarily history-altering events," she said.

The first test may be the U.S.'s proposed trade pact with Peru, which the Bush administration had hoped would be voted on this fall, before the new Congress is sworn in. Many Democrats oppose the deal, including Rep. Charles Rangel, a New York Democrat who is poised to take over the House Ways and Means Committee. Mr. Rangel wants labor protections to be included. Though no final decisions have been made, Republican leaders are wary of bringing the deal forward for a vote, especially after the signal sent by Tuesday's vote.

Even in states that historically have rejected anti-free-trade campaigns, such as Iowa, Kansas and Missouri, candidates who ran heavily on such a platform won. While the dominant themes of the campaign were Iraq, terror and scandal, there were plenty of signs that economic insecurity was coloring voters' decisions.

In exit polls, half of voters said they felt the "state of the national economy" was "not so good," or "poor." Economic concerns were particularly big in the industrial Midwest, where free-trade critics won some of their biggest gains and voters in some states put economic concerns first.

Mr. Rangel said he wants to renew the president's fast-track authority but that the president would need to consider Democratic priorities in return. Extending the authority depends on whether Mr. Bush "wants both parties to participate in discussions," Mr. Rangel said in an interview before the election.

After the new Congress is seated in January, Democrats are all but certain to seek modifications to a trade deal with Columbia. As with the Peru deal, they are likely to push for stronger language on worker protections. Both pacts would give them their first real opportunity to wrangle more concessions in an area over which their party and Republicans have been fighting for years.

Another big issue is agriculture: Congress next year must either renew or rewrite the current farm bill, a huge mass of legislation that covers all U.S. farm policy, including subsidies. The biggest sticking point within the Doha round is the big subsidies the Europeans, Japanese and U.S. give to support farmers. Developing countries argue these payments distort the export market.

To reinvigorate the Doha talks, Democrats would have to be willing to enact steep farm-subsidy cuts, a move many analysts doubt they will take.

Democrats also could push tough measures of their own. They have floated various bills to squeeze imports from China or to try to manage the country's trade imbalance. Others seek to impose various restrictions or punishments for intellectual-property violations or its failure to allow its currency, the yuan, to strengthen further. Those have been shelved until now, partly because of a lack of support from the Republican leadership and the White House.

Congressional Democrats have long been moving away from free-trade support. In the 1990s, dozens of House Democrats regularly supported free-trade initiatives like the North American Free Trade Agreement backed by then-President Clinton, which won 102 Democratic votes. But only 15 Democrats backed the Central American Free Trade Agreement negotiated by the Bush administration in 2005.

The incoming batch of trade skeptics that unseated incumbent Republicans largely represents a new breed. Many are conservative on issues such as gun ownership and abortion and on economic issues like taxes, but veer populist on trade issues.

In the union-heavy areas north and east of Pittsburgh, Democrat Jason Altmire struck a starkly antitrade tone in his bid for a House seat, beating Republican Rep. Melissa Hart, who had ran on an overt free-trade plank. "I'm not protectionist, but my view is that future trade deals can't just give the store away," Mr. Altmire says.

Indiana's Joe Donnelly pointed to job losses in his own district and promised to insist on strong labor and environmental protections in future deals. He said he would have voted against Cafta and recent trade deals with Chile and Singapore.

DOJ_NMG_0093589

In North Carolina, former National Football League quarterback Heath Shuler won on a campaign that was pro-guns and antiabortion but also strongly antitrade. He beat up on his opponent, Rep. Charles Taylor, for having cast no vote at all when Cafta squeaked through, which Mr. Taylor blamed on a technical glitch.

Economic Populism Pays For Democrats (FT)

By Edward Luce, Alim Remtulla

Financial Times, November 11, 2006

Defeated Republicans have found solace in the fact that many of their victorious Democratic opponents are "social conservatives". They point to James Webb, who surprised everyone by winning the bitter and close Senate race in Virginia on Thursday, giving his party a majority of one in the upper house to complement its decisive victory in the House of Representatives.

However, neither Mr Webb nor the majority of the Democratic freshmen who won elections this week can so easily be fitted into that category. Punching the air and holding up the dusty boots of his son who is serving in Iraq, Mr Webb told cheering supporters in Arlington that his election was as much a vote for economic fairness as it was for a change of course in Iraq.

Although Mr Webb supports the right to bear arms – a virtual necessity for anyone wanting to represent the Commonwealth of Virginia – the Vietnam veteran is pro-abortion and only lukewarm in his opposition to homosexual marriage.

One or two of his colleagues, including Bob Casey, the new senator for Pennsylvania, and Heath Shuler, a Democratic representative for North Carolina, are "pro-life" but the large majority of new Democrat lawmakers support the woman's right to choose.

More significantly a majority of the intake, including Mr Webb, are economic populists who are deeply suspicious of free trade and quick to blame China and other developing countries for the loss of US jobs. Some, such as Sherrod Brown, the new Democratic senator for the key Midwest state of Ohio, which has lost 200,000 manufacturing jobs since Mr Bush came to power, won the election virtually on that issue alone.

"We will focus on economic fairness in a country divided too much by class in an age of the internationalisation of American corporations," said Mr Webb in a victory rally speech that devoted more to the economy than all other themes combined. "At a time when profits are at a record high and wages are at a low, we will focus on bridging the class divide."

Labelled the "middle-class squeeze" by Democrats and "median wage stagnation" by economists, the incomes of median American households have barely shifted since George W. Bush was elected on a ticket of "compassionate conservatism" in 2000. However, in important parts of America, including large swathes of the Midwest and the north-east, which provided a majority of the Democratic gains, economic anxiety came a close second to the Iraq war in motivating voter turnout.

In a study of the election campaign, Robert Borosage, head of the liberal Campaign for a Fairer America, said there were more political advertisements "painting big oil [companies] and big pharma as threats than advertisements warning about bin Laden". According to Stan Greenberg, a Democratic pollster, 41 per cent of those who voted Democrat cited their disquiet over the Iraq war as their main reason for voting compared with 26 per cent on jobs and the economy. However, if the 23 per cent citing "corruption in Washington" is included, then domestic concerns trumped Iraq.

Democratic campaigns overwhelmingly linked middle-class economic anxieties to the Republican Congress's promiscuous use of tax breaks for large companies in exchange for campaign finance. "On the economy Democrats ran remarkably populist campaigns," said Mr Borosage. "Democrats linked corruption to economic woes, charging incumbents with being in the pockets of big oil and doing nothing about gas prices and being in the pockets of big pharma and doing nothing about drugs prices."

The most obvious economic consequence of the Democratic victory is that it will be virtually impossible for Mr Bush to renew his fast-track trade negotiating authority next year in order to revive the dormant Doha round of world trade talks. However, the administration's bilateral trade initiatives could run aground far more quickly.

Many leading Democrats, including Mr Brown and Mr Webb, campaigned for "fair trade" and "putting Americans first", which is code for including labour standards in bilateral trade agreements and being more critical of companies that "outsource" manufacturing jobs to China and service sector jobs to India. They are likely to be aggressive in pushing for tougher scrutiny of explicit and hidden tax breaks for large energy and pharmaceutical companies – known as "corporate welfare".

As the world focuses on the brewing debate over Iraq between the Bush administration and a Democratic Capitol Hill, the battle to define America's response to globalisation is also hotting up. "Both the Democrats and the Bush administration will want the other side to get the blame if their mutual promise of bipartisanship falls apart," said a senior Democratic strategist. "It could be over Iraq, it could be over the economy."

Congress Likely To Clash With Bush On Trade (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

DOJ_NMG_0093590

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — Congressional Democrats pledged this week to work with President Bush when they assume control of the House and Senate next year, but there is one issue where disagreement seems all but assured: U.S. trade policy.

For the last six years Bush has had little difficulty getting trade agreements through a business-friendly Republican Congress, but the new Democratic majority will include several members who campaigned against free trade.

One of the first battles could be over the president's authority to get trade deals approved quickly.

The U.S. Trade Promotion Authority Act, known as "fast track," streamlines the approval process by allowing the president to negotiate trade agreements without consulting Congress, and requires an up-or-down vote within 90 days. Passed in 2002, it expires in July, and the Bush administration is expected to seek reauthorization.

Senator-elect Rep. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio) — a foe of free trade while in the House — and a slate of new lawmakers plan to block fast track unless it's amended to include protections for domestic and foreign workers.

"It's not going to be the president's call on getting what he wants," Brown said Friday. "I don't think the Bush administration will go for [reauthorization] right away, but we need to start now."

Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.), who won reelection by promising legislation to create a trade prosecutor to investigate countries such as China that violate U.S. trade agreements, said Bush's trade policies have failed to protect American workers.

"Our trade policy needs to be one that expands jobs in America and maintains our standard of living. It should not be about creating a race to the bottom on wages," Stabenow said Friday, adding that she plans to resubmit the trade prosecutor bill in January.

Democratic party leaders also have indicated that trade is among their top priorities. Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), set to chair the powerful House Ways and Means Committee that oversees trade agreements, is expected to tackle trade policy immediately.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), likely the next Speaker of the House, intends to address Democrats' trade concerns as part of the majority's "Six for '06" agenda — "looking at trade policies and making them more fair" for U.S. workers, according to spokesman Brendan Daly.

Republicans will push for approval of several specific trade agreements during this month's lame duck session, according to staffers on Capitol Hill and at the Office of the U.S. trade representative. The list includes agreements with Colombia and Peru and normalizing trade relations with Vietnam in time for the president's visit to Hanoi next week for the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit.

As for fast track, R. Bruce Josten, executive vice president at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, says he expects a limited extension, one that would only allow specific trade deals to go forward. But he worries the Democratic Congress will turn protectionist, bogging down trade agreements with extra requirements and penalizing countries like China.

He pointed to a bill proposed by Sens. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) earlier this year that would have imposed a 27.5% tariff on Chinese imports until that country revalued its currency. "Are you just going to do that with China?" Josten asked. "What about Japan? What about India?"

U.S. trade officials are optimistic that they can preserve the president's trade authority with the help of moderate Democrats. They are counting on more senior, moderate lawmakers to shape trade policy, including Rangel and Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), incoming chair of the Finance Committee, which oversees trade policy in the Senate.

"The chairmen who actually will map out the agenda have sort of said this is what we want to do, that they want to work with us," on reauthorizing fast track, said Sean Spicer, a spokesman for the office of the U.S. trade representative.

Rangel supports fast track "in principle," according to a congressional staff member, but believes trade policy needs to include more enforcement of worker protections.

"His view is that the confidence in U.S. trade policy has dramatically declined. There's been a broad perception that globalization is not being structured in a way that its benefits are being spread broadly," said the staff member, who asked not to be identified.

Rep. Ellen A. Tauscher (D-Alamo), an investment banker who chairs the moderate New Democrat Coalition, told the pro-business group Thursday that she is circumspect about renewing fast track.

"We don't believe we've gotten the best agreements through the authority we gave this president," she said, "and frankly, unless there's some changes, I think we have to consider what we will do, whether it lapses and we wait until we have a Democratic president in 2008."

Tipping Point For Trade (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093591

The architect built his house of straw. The foundation -- the Republican base -- may have retained its brick-like solidity in support of its candidates Tuesday, just as Karl Rove predicted. But the house itself -- and the House itself -- was blown to smithereens, with massive shifts among moderate and independent voters to the Democratic column. And for all the talk of coming Democratic dissonance within their expanded congressional delegations, it's clear that on economic policy, a new progressive center has formed.

The Democrats' pickups came largely in the Northeast, Midwest and Mountain West. In the South, outside of Florida, they won just a couple of new seats. Moderate Northern Republicans in both houses -- including the most moderate, Rhode Island's Lincoln Chafee in the Senate and Iowa's Jim Leach in the House -- went down to defeat. The Republican Party that limps away from this election is rooted more firmly in the South -- which is precisely the party's problem. It was the Southernized GOP from which both moderates and mountain-state libertarians ran screaming in this election. The results from Arizona are particularly instructive. Not only did Democrats pick up two House seats there, but Arizona voters also became the first in the nation to reject a ban on gay marriage. The gap between Goldwater libertarianism and Southern religious traditionalism widened to a gulf this week.

But what of the Democrats? Is the incoming congressional majority a powder keg of veteran liberals and rookie moderates just primed for explosion? Can Nancy Pelosi navigate the treacherous shoals of gay marriage and school prayer?

Well, sure. It will be Pelosi who will control the agenda in the House, which means the issues that unite Democrats will be the ones that come to a vote. And the Democrats are far more united on a range of key issues than is commonly believed.

Ironically, one issue that unites the new majority is an issue that has historically divided Democrats perhaps more than any other: trade.

Since the passage of the North American Free Trade Act in 1993, House Democrats have been moving steadily away from a trade policy that benefits globe-trotting corporations and investment funds while depressing wages here in the States. Senate Democrats, on the other hand, have split fairly evenly on trade legislation over the past decade.

Tuesday's election changed all that. Looking at the Democrats who picked up formerly Republican House seats, Public Citizen's Global Trade Watch tallies 27 who defeated (or replaced resigning) free-trade Republicans and who campaigned against the kind of trade deals that Congress has ratified. The fair-trade 27 insist instead on deals that stress labor rights and environmental standards. In North Carolina, Democrat Heath Shuler -- ostensibly one of the new conservative Democrats -- attacked his opponent, Republican Charles Taylor, for backing off his commitment to vote against the Central American Free Trade Agreement. "It's not right when Congress passes trade bills that send our jobs overseas," said one Shuler ad.

In the incoming Senate delegation, the contrast is even sharper. The Democratic pickups -- Missouri's Claire McCaskill, Montana's Jon Tester, Ohio's Sherrod Brown, Pennsylvania's Bob Casey, Rhode Island's Sheldon Whitehouse and Virginia's James Webb -- all unseated free-trade incumbents with campaigns that stressed the need to pay far greater attention to the downward leveling that globalization entails. Tester ran ads attacking trade agreements for putting "our jobs and the viability of family farms and ranches across Montana in jeopardy." Webb's Web site states, "We must reexamine our tax and trade policies and reinstitute notions of fairness."

Exit polling made clear that the fair-trade Democrats have tapped into a profound national anxiety. When asked whether life for the next generation would be better, worse or about the same as life today, 40 percent responded "worse," while just 30 percent answered "better." That's a stunning figure to emerge from what has historically been perhaps the most optimistic of nations.

The Senate in particular will see real changes. The addition of Sherrod Brown and Vermont's Bernie Sanders will give fair-trade forces some passionate voices to go with their increased numbers; Brown is poised to emerge as a national leader in this fight.

When the president's fast-track authority expires next summer, it is plainly not going to be renewed. "Congress is done with ceding all trade authority to the president," Brown said Friday. A new majority on trade issues has formed. And having lost both houses in 1994 in part because of Democratic voters' discontent with NAFTA, the Democrats now seem to have won them back after a campaign in which they charged that our corporate-led globalization hardly seems to be building the best of all possible worlds.

Labor Movement Dusts Off Agenda As Power Shifts In Congress (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

After the Republicans took control of the House in 1994, perhaps no group was on the outs as much as organized labor. But now that the Democrats have swept both houses of Congress, the nation's labor unions feel as if they are back — and then some.

DOJ_NMG_0093592

Eager to be treated as an important force, union leaders have worked overtime since Election Day reminding Democrats about all that organized labor did to help put them over the top, including spending more than $100 million and dispatching more than 100,000 volunteers to help get out the vote.

After years of being sidelined by the Republican majority, the nation's unions are now pushing Congress to act on a long list of issues: improving mine safety, putting a brake on outsourcing, making it easier to unionize workers and extending health coverage to millions of uninsured Americans.

"There's a lot of pent-up demand on organized labor's part," said Randel Johnson, vice president for labor, immigration and employee benefits of the United States Chamber of Commerce. "Money talks, and they dumped a lot of money into the campaign."

For now at least, organized labor sounds fully in tune with the presumed House speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, because they both want to raise the minimum wage, rein in drug prices and help students with high college tuitions.

Representative George Miller, a California Democrat and ally of Ms. Pelosi who is expected to become chairman of the House Committee on Education and the Workforce, said, "There's a strong sense among the members that a lot of middle-class workers are getting left out of the economic growth in this country, and we are eager to do something about that."

Mr. Miller and Senator Edward M. Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democrat who is expected to head the Senate Labor Committee, say that raising the federal minimum wage will be the first issue they address.

"Clearly the minimum wage is front and center," Mr. Miller said.

Even with Democrats back in power, organized labor faces serious hurdles. Republicans and even some Democrats are uncomfortable with labor's demand to deny the Bush administration trade promotion authority, which makes it easier to negotiate trade pacts because Congress would be barred from amending them.

In the Senate, Republicans are likely to use the filibuster to block one of labor's most coveted pieces of legislation, a bill that would in many ways make it easier for unions to organize workers. The bill would, among other things, greatly increase penalties for companies that illegally fire workers to undermine unionization drives. Labor sees the bill, which is co-sponsored by more than 90 percent of House Democrats, as pivotal for reversing labor's decline.

"The filibuster, there's no question it's a hurdle," said William Samuel, the legislative director of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. "We will have to build a movement behind this legislation because it will give workers more bargaining power to respond to the loss of pensions, health coverage and jobs with good wages."

John J. Sweeney, the A.F.L.-C.I.O. president, said unions and the Democrats largely agree on most issues. Mr. Sweeney's wish list includes barring federal contracts for companies that send jobs overseas and making it harder for companies to shed their pension obligations when they file for bankruptcy protection.

Mr. Sweeney was eager to talk about how well labor did on Election Day. He pointed out that nonunion voters split more or less evenly between Democratic and Republican House candidates, while union members preferred Democratic candidates by a margin of 30 percentage points.

Union leaders said that among all voters nationwide, there was a 6.8 million-vote margin in favor of Democrats over Republicans in the House races. The A.F.L.-C.I.O. pointed to exit polls showing that members of union households accounted for 5.6 million of that margin.

"We were by far the most powerful turnout engine on the progressive side," Mr. Sweeney said.

Labor unions helped orchestrate successful minimum wage initiatives in Montana, Missouri, Ohio and three other states. Those efforts encouraged many low-income workers to vote, giving an additional lift to Democrats, especially in close contests like the Senate race in Montana.

"The Democrats wouldn't have won nearly as many seats without labor's money and manpower," said Larry J. Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia.

Professor Sabato said unions were not as demanding as they had sometimes been in past decades. "They're not pushing the Democrats far to the left on many subjects," he said. "They want to win, too. They were perfectly willing to back a lot of those moderate to conservative Democrats, who are Blue Dogs."

Representative Jim Matheson, a Utah Democrat who is co-chairman of the Blue Dog Coalition of moderate to conservative Democrats, said he strongly supported a higher minimum wage and the Employee Free Choice Act, the bill that would make it easier to unionize workers.

"A lot of Blue Dogs have a strong labor record," Mr. Matheson said. "But I'm a pro-trade Democrat, and that's where labor and I are on different sides of some issues. I'm a strong believer in the economic growth benefits of free trade."

Labor is urging Congress to block the ratification of free-trade accords negotiated with Peru and Colombia unless President Bush includes stronger protections on worker rights, human rights and the environment. Many unions have also pledged to oppose granting Mr. Bush new trade promotion authority to help him complete a worldwide trade agreement as well as free-trade accords with individual countries.

DOJ_NMG_0093593

"If you look at the new Democrats elected, if they mentioned trade it was almost always unfavorable," said Gary C. Hufbauer, a senior fellow at the Peterson Institute for International Economics. "Those Democrats are replacing a lot of pro-trade Republicans. There's been a substantial shift."

Mr. Hufbauer said Mr. Bush might have to do a lot of horse trading, like agreeing to a higher minimum wage and higher housing subsidies for the poor, to persuade Mr. Sweeney not to block some trade pacts and legislation.

When several unions quit the A.F.L.-C.I.O last year, many Democrats feared that the schism would hurt labor's effectiveness in election campaigns.

"People said the split would be terrible for labor in politics," said Anna Burger, chairwoman of the breakaway coalition, Change to Win. "Labor had its best year ever."

Ms. Burger said the two union federations were seeking to cooperate on a lobbying program. Her coalition is making a big push for universal health coverage.

"More and more workers are losing their health coverage," Ms. Burger said. "We need a way to stop that once and for all. One way to do that is extend the health insurance program that covers everyone in Congress. If it's good enough for them, why isn't it good enough for every American?"

Choice For Intelligence Panel Poses Early Test For Pelosi (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 9 — Her boss may want her gone, but Representative Jane Harman happens to think she is good at her job. And she has no intention of leaving it without a fight.

Ms. Harman argues that her role as the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee makes her the logical candidate to become chairman when the new Congress begins in January.

Representative Nancy Pelosi, the party's leader and presumptive House speaker in the next Congress, has indicated she has other plans.

The two women, both from California, have long had a frosty relationship, and Ms. Pelosi has been angry with Ms. Harman for not using her position on the Intelligence Committee to attack the Bush administration aggressively.

But Ms. Harman said that making her chairman would be good politics, citing Tuesday's victories as proof that Democrats will thrive by taking a centrist stance on issues of war and terrorism — as she has done for the past four years.

"The new crowd coming into the House are mostly moderates and conservatives who were in substantial part elected on a security message," Ms. Harman said in an interview on Thursday. "To keep our majority, we need to keep a tough and smart message on security."

Ms. Pelosi has told colleagues she plans to replace Ms. Harman on the Intelligence Committee, possibly with Representative Alcee Hastings of Florida, although she has given no public indication of her choice for the post since the election.

Many Democrats are closely watching the decision for signs of two things: how the speaker-in-waiting will chart her party's course on national security issues and how she will handle her first postelection test in dealing with the often fractious Democratic caucus.

"This is the battle that nobody wanted," one senior Democratic strategist said. "For Nancy to start off her speakership with a fight is a great shame."

In addition to pointing to her record over the past four years, Ms Harman said she was once made a promise by senior Democrats that she would assume control of the Intelligence Committee if her party regained power in the House.

"My view of this has to do with what is fair in terms of the commitments that were made to me," she said.

The promise came in the form of a letter in 1999, when Representative Richard A. Gephardt of Missouri, who was then the House Democratic leader, recruited her to try to regain her Congressional seat in 2000 after she relinquished it in 1998 to run for governor of California.

But allies of Ms. Pelosi said that when she appointed Ms. Harman as ranking member of the Intelligence Committee in 2003, her intention was always to have Ms. Harman serve only two terms.

The selection of Mr. Hastings, a black member of the committee, would win Ms. Pelosi support from the powerful Congressional Black Caucus. But his past could provide ammunition for Republicans: Mr. Hastings was impeached and removed by the Senate from a federal judgeship in 1989 on a bribery charge. (He was acquitted in the related criminal case.)

DOJ_NMG_0093594

Some leading Democrats said that choosing Mr. Hastings over Ms. Harman would send exactly the wrong message at a time when Democrats were struggling to prove their bona fides on national security.

“A lot of people would be astonished,” said Leslie H. Gelb, a former president of the Council on Foreign Relations and a State Department official in the Carter administration. “I think it would send a signal that Democrats are not going to be as serious about national security as they need to be.”

Representative Silvestre Reyes. Democrat of Texas and also a committee member, has emerged as a possible compromise candidate. But Ms. Pelosi has also told colleagues that she could select someone who is not currently on the committee.

Appearing Wednesday on CNN, Ms. Pelosi said that it was her prerogative to select an entirely new Intelligence Committee at the beginning of each Congress, and that it is the one committee on which seniority rules are not recognized.

Reid, Pelosi Expected To Keep Tight Rein In Both Chambers (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jonathan Weisman, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

After two days of watching Rep. Nancy Pelosi hailed as a political pioneer and the toast of her party, Sen. Harry M. Reid joined her yesterday atop the first Democratic-controlled Congress in a dozen years thanks to a razor-thin election in Virginia.

What seemed almost unthinkable a year ago -- Pelosi as House speaker and Reid as Senate majority leader in the 110th Congress -- suddenly is reality, sending the two into overdrive as they approve committee chairmen, set priorities, and referee disputes between colleagues who are planning to hire more staffers and move into larger offices.

The Democrats' success in the Bush presidency's final two years will depend largely on the compatibility and forcefulness of the two barely tested leaders, according to some lawmakers and political experts. Reid, a former boxer from Nevada, is a camera-averse Senate insider who has used rear-guard tactics to bedevil Senate Republicans on Social Security, nominations and other issues in recent years. Pelosi is a wealthy San Franciscan who grew up in a Baltimore political family and now has reached the highest elected post of any American woman.

They know that voters will expect results. But the Democrats' majorities in the House -- and especially the Senate -- are so slender that they will have to make at least modest accommodations to President Bush and Republican lawmakers on many matters. Reid and Pelosi are not particularly close, associates say, but they are disciplined realists who value party loyalty and are unafraid to tell colleagues or supporters not to overreach in a still-divided political climate.

"Both have shown how good they are at counting noses and enforcing party discipline," said Bruce Reed, a former Clinton White House aide who heads the centrist Democratic Leadership Council. Under their leadership, "the House and Senate Democratic caucuses have been more united than ever," he said. "They'll need that trait even more in the majority because they can leave no nose behind."

Yesterday, Reid echoed Pelosi's earlier assertion that Democrats will push an agenda to help middle-class families and reduce the deficit while also treating Republican lawmakers more generously than the GOP had treated Democrats during their years in the minority.

"The election is over, and it's time for a change," Reid told a cheering throng of Democratic aides outside the Capitol. They assembled shortly after Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) conceded defeat to James Webb, handing Democrats their 51st vote in the 100-member chamber.

Aides and friends say Reid and Pelosi are strongly partisan people who fumed under the heavy hand of GOP majorities, especially in the House, and who made no secret of their distaste for Bush's handling of the Iraq war and other policies. But the sources said the two also realize they must minimize differences within their caucuses. And they know they must balance the stridently anti-Bush sentiments of some liberal constituents against the more pragmatic pocketbook concerns of moderate and unaffiliated voters who were crucial to this week's election results.

"You have to govern from the center," Pelosi said yesterday. "We are in a completely different place now. We are setting our legislative agenda."

At the outdoor rally, where Reid was joined by Sens. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) and Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), the future majority leader stuck to generalities about his party's intentions.

"It's time for bipartisanship, it's time for open government, transparency, and it's a time for results," Reid said. "There must be a new direction in Iraq," he said, along with more affordable college tuition and health care, greater energy independence, and smaller deficits.

Reid did not say how Democrats would shrink the deficit while boosting college aid, and insiders said such challenges will be the test of the effectiveness and savvy of a Reid-and-Pelosi-led Congress. Both leaders agreed on the "Six for '06" priorities, which include relatively popular measures such as raising the minimum wage.

DOJ_NMG_0093595

"But it gets more complicated after that," said a former White House and congressional aide who knows Democratic lawmakers well. Especially in the Senate, he said, a party with a 51 to 49 majority will find it difficult to surgically raise, lower or leave alone certain taxes without opening the door for Republicans to push their own priorities.

Pelosi said that Democratic leaders want to demonstrate their effectiveness, and build up some trust with the White House, by tackling legislation that will have bipartisan support. Bush's "innovation agenda," laid out last year in his State of the Union address, has largely lain dormant. Democrats would like to take up Bush's proposals to expand funding for basic research and alternative energy sources such as ethanol, she said.

Democrats would also work with Bush to resurrect his proposed overhaul of the nation's immigration laws, which would pair tough border security measures with new paths to legal work and citizenship for the country's 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants, Pelosi said. And she is convinced Bush will back a higher minimum wage.

But even Pelosi questioned how quickly such legislative efforts can come together. "I guess the word 'rapid' is what gives me hesitation," she told a handful of reporters in her office.

Pelosi continues to put flesh on the bare-bones proposals that Democratic candidates campaigned on. As soon as she is elected speaker -- which does not appear in doubt -- Democrats will vote on a substantive slate of changes to the way the House operates, she said. They will include rules to diminish lobbyists' influence, ensure that lawmakers and the public have time to read legislation before lawmakers vote on it, open House-Senate legislative negotiating sessions to the media, and reinstitute lapsed budget rules that say any new spending or tax cuts must be offset by equal tax hikes or spending cuts.

Democrats also will extend new rules mandating that each home-district pet project, known as an earmark, be identified by the name of the lawmaker who sponsored it. Earmarks would have to be authorized by policymaking committees before they are approved by the Appropriations Committee.

Democrats avoided a potentially brutal intraparty fight yesterday when Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) decided not to run for the post of House majority whip next week. That would have pitted Emanuel, who has a huge well of support from this year's successful campaign, against James E. Clyburn (S.C.), the current chairman of the Democratic Caucus and the only African American in the Democratic leadership.

After delicate negotiations with Pelosi, Emanuel agreed to stand for caucus chairman, leaving the whip post to Clyburn. Under the agreement, John B. Larson (Conn.), the caucus vice chairman, will stay at that post rather than seek promotion, but both Emanuel and Larson would be offered additional power and responsibilities, according to Democratic leadership aides.

Emanuel's decision raised pressure on John P. Murtha (Pa.) to drop his challenge to House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer (Md.) for the post of House majority leader. But that battle continued to heat up ahead of the Thursday vote.

Congress will reassemble next week for a lame-duck session devoted mostly to completing work on the spending bills needed to keep the government operating. But with Democrats assuming the majority in January, not much will happen, Senate Republican aides conceded.

Pride Of Baltimore (WP)

By Lynne Duke, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

Nancy Pelosi Learned Her Politics At the Elbow of Her Father the Mayor

BALTIMORE -- When she wasn't racing to school at St. Leo's in her blue uniform or buying sweets in Mugavero's Confectionery or playing on front stoops up and down the block, Little Nancy sometimes worked the front desk at the family home at 245 Albemarle St., taking down the requests and sad stories of the folks who arrived to seek help from Big Tommy, her dad.

Or maybe she was riding around with her dad and his bullhorn, as he touted his candidacy from a convertible.

The late Thomas J. D'Alesandro Jr., also known as Old Tommy or Tommy the Elder, was the flamboyant and legendary machine politician, a Roosevelt Democrat, whose only daughter is the woman poised to be the speaker of the House, second in line of succession from the presidency.

She grew up stuffing envelopes for her dad. She grew up watching how the political game was played. She saw how favors were handed out, how chits were called in. She watched her mother balance full-time motherhood with grass-roots organizing, and later followed her example. Albemarle Street was Nancy Pelosi's training ground, the center of a political universe forged from a community as tight-knit as an Italian village.

Critics deride Pelosi, 66, for a presumed lightweight liberalism they attribute to her latter-day home in San Francisco. But her liberalism -- and the keen political instincts and skill at the inside parry of the game -- can be traced more deeply and more precisely back to Albemarle Street, to the political empire that grew there when her father held court through decades of an intensely political life.

DOJ_NMG_0093596

In that brick rowhouse on the corner of Albemarle and Fawn streets, politics was a family business that became a local dynasty. Big Tommy served 22 consecutive terms in public office, from state delegate to city councilman to U.S. congressman to Baltimore mayor, followed by a low-level appointment from President John F. Kennedy to something called the Federal Renegotiation Board.

One of Pelosi's five brothers, Thomas J. D'Alesandro III, Young Tommy, served on the Baltimore City Council and became the city's mayor as well.

Theirs was the politics of the New Deal, of the hand up for those who were down.

"It was always about the progressive economic agenda for a fair economy, where many Americans, all Americans, could participate in the economic success of our country," Pelosi said yesterday when asked about the influence of her family's politics on her own.

"What I got from them was about economic fairness," Pelosi said. "That was the difference between Republicans and Democrats all those years ago." She also learned about the power of loyalty, both extending it and enforcing it.

And even though the D'Alesandros could have moved away from the neighborhood's narrow streets and tight rowhouses, they stayed, no matter the patriarch's success.

That is one reason for the degree of pride that folks there express for Pelosi's success -- her family stayed rooted right with the rest of them.

"She wasn't born with a silver spoon, growing up around here," says Marion "Mugs" Mugavero, 84, who ran his confectionery for 59 years. "She grew up like the rest of us."

Except that her father became the go-to guy for Baltimore politics, a man with visitors from high places.

"He was good friends with Harry Truman," recalls Dominic "Fuzzy" Leonardi, 80. "When Truman was running for president, [Big Tommy] went and picked him up and brought him to his house" in a 1936 Plymouth.

"We had a lot of politicians coming down here," Leonardi said, seated on a bench along High Street yesterday as he is most days with his pal, Michael Trombetta, also 80. They listed Spiro Agnew, Jimmy Carter and Ronald Reagan as the pols they remember making a pilgrimage to see Big Tommy.

"They all came down to see him," Trombetta says.

Little Italy, where Pelosi grew up, occupies about a dozen square blocks near Baltimore's Inner Harbor, and was, in its day, the prototypical ethnic enclave in a city that was a patchwork -- and remains so, to an extent -- of Italian, German, Jewish, African American and Irish.

More than a civic duty, politics during her parents' day was about survival for the sons and daughters of Italian immigrants forging their way in a big city. It was about jobs. It was about favors of the political ward bosses. It was about patronage in a society in which the sons and daughters of immigrants often could depend only on themselves.

"There weren't a lot of vertical lines open to those kids, and the ward was where you got jobs. They would get you jobs," says Gilbert Sanders, a Baltimore historian and author of "The Neighborhood: The Story of Baltimore's Little Italy."

"And whole political machines were born out of these jobs. A job driving a car for city hall. A job picking up trash. Jobs were everything."

And Big Tommy "was the king of it," Sanders says. "It's just the way things were. It's not pejorative at all. These kids, you don't think they went off to Yale, do ya?"

John Pente, 96 and a lifelong Little Italy resident, remembers being destitute and with no prospects in 1930.

"It was the time of the Depression," Pente says. "I came out of Calvert Hall [high school] with a diploma under my arm and no job."

So he went to Big Tommy.

"He helped me get a job as a timekeeper" for the workers at a construction site.

And of course, such favors, such help, cemented a bond between patron and politician.

Pente shrugs and describes the ethic this way: "You scratch my back, I'll scratch your back. We all looked out for him."

Big Tommy tried to help people with scholarships, with education, with assimilation.

"You had a lot of foreigners here that needed to get around and get their citizenships and they didn't speak English," Mugavero recalls.

Big-city machine politics, no matter where it was practiced, often was a magnet for criminality. If a person betrayed the boss's loyalty, the consequences sometimes weren't pretty. Corruption often went with the territory.

In 1953, one of D'Alesandro's longtime associates, also a relative by marriage, was caught up in a bribery probe related to off-street parking. But Big Tommy was not known as a politico with dirty hands. Not even when the Teamsters tried to strong-arm the mayor during a city garbage strike in 1956 did he buckle to mob pressure.

DOJ_NMG_0093597

Tom J. O'Donnell, 95, was D'Alesandro's press secretary in those days and remembers well how the mayor ran afoul of the Teamsters when he declared one Friday that striking garbage collectors would be fired if they did not return to work on Monday.

That Saturday, he got a visit from a Teamsters official sent by Jimmy Hoffa himself.

"He told the mayor, 'Mr. Jimmy directed me to tell you that he is very unhappy with what you are doing,' " says O'Donnell, reading from a self-published book about his years with D'Alesandro. "And the mayor spoke up and said, 'You go back and tell Mr. Jimmy I'm very unhappy with the garbage piling up on the streets of Baltimore, and I'm not going to stand for it.' " And when Monday came, says O'Donnell, most of the striking workers were back on the job.

This political toughness runs through his daughter, who, as minority leader, has not been reluctant to bare her teeth or throw her elbows to enforce party discipline.

O'Donnell tells the story of D'Alesandro's entry into politics, when he entered the Maryland House of Delegates in 1926, an Italian boy making good for his people.

He wore patent-leather shoes and spats, an Oxford gray suit, a polka-dot bow tie and a derby, for he wanted to dress in the manner he thought would befit the men of high standing he would be joining.

"He said he thought he would encounter men of the stature of Thomas Jefferson, Patrick Henry and the like, and he was greatly disappointed when they were just ordinary people," O'Donnell said.

Through his political career, the polka-dot bow tie would remain his lucky charm. He told Sandler once that he'd lost an election the one time he did not wear that polka-dot tie.

Out of the political game, he remained a force. The house on Albemarle still received visitors seeking Big Tommy's blessing for political careers.

J. Joseph Curran Jr., the Maryland attorney general and the father-in-law of Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley, was among them.

"Tommy the Elder: I remember when I would want to run for office and they would say, 'Well, why don't you go see Tommy,' and you'd go down to the D'Alesandro house down on Albemarle Street and I said, 'Mr. Mayor, I want you to know I'm thinking about running and I'd appreciate your advice and help.' "

D'Alesandro appointed Curran's father to the City Council. He also attended grade school early in the last century with Curran's mother.

"It was smart politics, because then you have someone you like and who likes your mother and father," he said.

That was in 1968. By then, Pelosi was long gone -- to college, to marriage and family and then a political career of her own -- which started in 1987, the same year her father died.

But these many years since she pitched in as a girl on the fringes of her father's political machine, Little Nancy still bears the family imprint. Big Tommy's political world was her own.

Staff writers Jonathan Weisman and Juliet Eilperin contributed to this story.

The Determined Democrat (FT)

By Holly Yeager

Financial Times, November 11, 2006

Just days after the 2004 elections, when Democrats lost seats in Congress and John Kerry failed to oust George W. Bush from the White House, Nancy Pelosi, the party's leader in the House of Representatives, started planning for the midterm contests.

While pundits were talking about the arrival of a permanent Republican majority, she began recruiting candidates, targeting key races, tightening party discipline and, with other leaders, developing a message – critical of the war in Iraq, united in opposition to Mr Bush's proposed Social Security reforms – that would change the playing field.

"Many of the Republicans who are out there . . . were masquerading at home as moderates and voting here with a rightwing radical agenda," she said angrily at a press conference in her Capitol Hill office, foreshadowing a theme that would be heard around the country two years later. "They got away with it once. But we'll shine the spotlight on their voting patterns, and people will see that they're not the moderates they advertised themselves to be at home."

The strategy was effective, helping to oust Republicans across the country and positioning Mrs Pelosi, 66, to become the first female speaker of the House in US history.

A workaholic and self-confessed chocoholic, Mrs Pelosi has long been a vocal cheerleader and effective fundraiser for her party (she raised more than $100m for Democrats in the past four years – a feat matched only by the Clintons). But that this mother of five who first ran for public office 20 years ago is also a keen political strategist should not come as a surprise. Her late father, Thomas D'Alesandro Jr, spent 10 years in Congress, then a dozen as mayor of Baltimore. Known as "Old Tommy", he kept a "favour file" in the living room of their Little Italy home, tracking good deeds that he and the Baltimore Democratic machine had done for people – in case they needed to ask for something in return.

DOJ_NMG_0093598

Mrs Pelosi – "little Nancy" back then, the youngest of six children and the only girl – says she also learnt from him to count votes. "Going into an election, they'd sit around the table and they had these yellow legal pads and they'd say, 'How many votes does it take to win?' and it's still the same thing."

To get the votes Democrats needed on Tuesday, she travelled the country for months, appearing at fundraisers and campaign rallies, encouraging candidates and offering whatever help her Washington team could provide.

"She stood on a front lawn in Pennsylvania to help me champion the need for embryonic stem cell research," said Patrick Murphy, one of five Iraq war veterans elected this week. "For the minority leader to come to a race where most political analysts didn't give me a shot at winning – I will never forget that."

Republicans had hoped she would play a different role in the election. Mrs Pelosi, who married her college sweetheart, a wealthy investment banker, represents San Francisco in the House. In the closing weeks of the campaign, Republicans frequently invoked the famously liberal city, warning of the kinds of left-of-centre policies they said she would champion if Democrats took control.

But Rahm Emanuel, the Chicago congressman who ran the Democrats' campaign team, said the focus on Mrs Pelosi – who, until this week, was not a well known public figure – did not work. "In every district that the Republicans ran an ad against Nancy Pelosi . . . the Democrats will have that seat," he said.

However, questions about her politics persist. Mrs Pelosi's voting record is solidly liberal, and she has been a harsh critic of Mr Bush and the outgoing Republican congressional leadership, making many wary of her pledges to forge a bipartisan environment, on the Hill and with the White House.

"As speaker, I understand my responsibility: speaker of the House, of all of the House, not just the Democrats, and the responsibility to work with the administration to make progress for the American people," she said after a pasta lunch with the president on Thursday.

But close advisers say she is a pragmatic leader who has several reasons to run the House from the centre, rather than the far-left. Many candidates she recruited are moderates, including some whose views on social issues put them closer to Republicans. "It's not, 'do you agree with me?'" said George Crawford, her former chief of staff, of her approach. "It's, 'can you get elected in your district?'"

The election of several such candidates will increase the influence of centrists within the Democratic caucus, while the desire to protect the new majority – and elect a Democratic president – in 2008 will further encourage co-operation, he said. "She is not just interested in being speaker for two years."

That does not mean Mrs Pelosi will not be tough. Democrats have attacked what they called the Republican "culture of corruption" and she has shown little tolerance for misdeeds within her own ranks. Despite the objections of the black caucus, she quickly removed William Jefferson, a New Orleans congressman, from the powerful ways and means committee when he came under federal investigation in a bribery scandal.

Mrs Pelosi has vowed to make a new rules and ethics package the first order of House business in January. While Howard Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, differed sharply with Mrs Pelosi and Mr Emanuel on campaign strategy, he thinks her stance on ethics will be one of her strengths.

"I think Pelosi is going to be really great on corruption issues. I don't think she'll tolerate it for a second," Mr Dean said.

A devout Catholic, Mrs Pelosi makes frequent mention of her family. She warned aides this week she might have to alter her schedule at short notice to fly to New York, where one of her four daughters, Alexandra, was due to deliver a baby – her sixth grandchild.

The younger Pelosi, a documentary filmmaker, may also prove to be an invaluable resource for her mother. Her award-winning film, Journeys with George, chronicles Mr Bush's 2000 presidential campaign. The film shows candidate Bush, then Texas governor, as "a uniter not a divider", before the bitter partisanship that has characterised recent relations between the White House and Capitol Hill.

"Maybe we can find some common ground," Mr Bush says to the filmmaker, as he lightheartedly tries to quell a disagreement between two factions of the press corps that travelled with him. Whether Mrs Pelosi can find that common ground with him now is the main question.

2 Democrats Vie For House No. 2 (WT)

By Charles Hurt, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 10, 2006

House Democrats face their first major internal battle since Tuesday's stunning victory, a fight that pits some of the chamber's anti-war Democrats against the ideological center of their party.

DOJ_NMG_0093599

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, now the No. 2 Democrat in the caucus and thus in line to hold the majority leader's post, faces a challenge from Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, who has come to represent the party's anti-war movement because of his strong critique of the Bush administration's handling of the war.

Though Mr. Murtha is otherwise a fairly conservative Democrat, his position on the war appeals to many liberals in his ranks and, say Democratic staffers, he has the private blessing of Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, the caucus's head and the presumed next House speaker.

Within minutes of Democrats' capturing the 15th seat needed to take control of the House, Mr. Hoyer tried tightening his grip on the majority leader position by reminding fellow Democrats that he had been a central figure in their caucus during their darkest times.

"We have put forward responsible budgets, proposed smarter defense policies, advanced innovative ideas on energy independence and stood strong against the privatization of Social Security," he said. "I have been proud to be a part of all of those efforts every step of the way."

He also has said he has the votes to sew up the No. 2 position.

Mr. Murtha reminded colleagues that his strongest voice in recent years came in opposition to the Iraq war, which strategists on both sides credit in part for Democrats' enormous victories this week.

"Talk is cheap, which is why, up until Iraq forced me to, I didn't do a lot of it," the former Marine told colleagues. "But empty rhetoric is expensive. It has cost America three years in a failed war at nearly three thousand lives lost and will cost us a trillion dollars by the time we can extricate ourselves from it."

While the liberal Mrs. Pelosi must figure out how to unify an increasingly conservative caucus, she addresses the leadership fight for the No. 2 spot gingerly. She's officially staying out of the contest -- which will be decided next week -- but few wonder where she stands.

She has a long friendship with Mr. Murtha and, Democrats say, supports his candidacy. Mr. Hoyer, in contrast, has been Mrs. Pelosi's rival for leadership positions in previous years.

But the last thing she wants is a nasty internal fight that exacerbates differences in her caucus between the fierce anti-war Democrats and those from the more conservative wing, many of whom were elected to Republican-held seats this week.

Some Democrats also worry about moving Mr. Murtha into a high-profile leadership position after running so many campaigns about cleaning up the corruption in Congress. Mr. Murtha was among eight members of Congress caught up in the so-called Abscam bribery scandal of the 1970s and 1980s. While Mr. Murtha told the FBI agents posing as representatives of a fictitious Arab sheik that he was "not interested," he pointedly left open the possibility of future dealings.

While much of Mr. Murtha's support stems from his anti-war credentials, Hoyer supporters are quick to highlight Mr. Murtha's conservative position on abortion and other issues.

"Steny has an unwavering commitment to core Democratic principles," a group of top Democrats wrote in a letter to colleagues on Mr. Hoyer's behalf. "There simply is no question that Steny is deeply committed to our Party's efforts on civil and human rights, our support for working men and women, our commitment to education and health care, and our fight to protect the environment -- to name a few."

The letter was signed by Democratic Reps. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, John D. Dingell of Michigan, John Lewis of Georgia, Henry A. Waxman of California and Ike Skelton of Missouri, among others.

Other leadership races got settled smoothly for Democrats yesterday.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois Democrat who is credited with picking up nearly 30 seats Tuesday, decided to avoid a fight for the No. 3 position of majority whip, which will go to Rep. James E. Clyburn of South Carolina. Mr. Emanuel -- in his second term in Congress -- will become conference chairman and the youngest member of leadership.

"I seek this post, and not any other, because I believe what we need now is a unified Democratic caucus, focused squarely on the business of moving this country forward," he said yesterday.

Meanwhile on the Republican side, Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana, who is challenging Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio for minority leader, will pick up the endorsement today of the conservative group Club for Growth.

Democrats Ready To Flex Congressional Muscle (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning, Washington Bureau

Chicago Tribune, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Democrats solidified control over both chambers of Congress on Thursday as Republican Sen. George Allen conceded defeat to Democrat James Webb in Virginia's tight Senate contest, giving Democrats a slender 51-49 majority in the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0093600

The resolution of that race ushers in an era of divided government amid voter discontent with Republican President Bush and the war in Iraq. It will be the first time Democrats have held both houses of Congress since 1994.

Democratic control of the legislative branch will raise pressure for a change of direction in Iraq and impede the Bush administration's efforts to move the federal judiciary rightward. Democrats also have promised to rapidly pass legislation to raise the minimum wage, expand stem cell research, reduce the price of prescription drugs offered through Medicare, make some college tuition expenses tax-deductible and more strictly regulate lobbying and congressional ethics.

With Democrats controlling Capitol Hill, the president stands a better chance of gaining passage of his proposals for comprehensive immigration reform that includes a path to legalization for undocumented immigrants and an expanded guest worker program.

Incoming Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) signaled that the chances of a re-appointment of controversial UN Ambassador John Bolton are effectively dead. Bush was unable to win Senate confirmation for Bolton to the UN post so he used a constitutional prerogative to grant Bolton a "recess appointment" that expires when this congressional session ends.

Outgoing moderate Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island also said Thursday he would block any attempt to use the post-election lame-duck session of the current Republican-controlled Senate to confirm Bolton.

"The election's over. It's time for a change," declared incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), speaking shortly after Allen's concession at a celebratory Democratic rally on the lawn of the Capitol.

"Millions of people spoke on Tuesday night, and we heard the message," added Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), the party's second-ranking leader in the Senate. "America can do better. We can come together on a bipartisan basis to solve the real problems facing our country."

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), speaking Thursday in Chicago, said, ""I think there's no doubt that if the Democrats squander the opportunity we've been given over the next two years, we'll have problems in '08. We've now got joint responsibility."

Noting that Bush still has more than two years left in his term, Obama said, "The question is going to be how does the president react? If he's somebody who is willing to engage in a bipartisan discussion on issues like Iraq, on issues like budget reform… are those all issues that he wants to work on?"

Earlier in the day, Bush met with incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) for a private lunch at the White House.

"We won't agree on every issue," Bush said after the lunch. But "we will do our very best to address big problems."

Reid and Durbin are scheduled to meet with Bush Friday.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the Chicago Democrat who led his party's successful campaign to take over the House, announced late Thursday that he would forgo a bid he had been considering for the influential third-ranking leadership post, majority whip. Instead, he will run for a post one rung down the leadership ladder, Democratic Caucus chairman.

A Democratic source said Pelosi had urged Emanuel not to make a bid for the whip post in order to avoid a divisive internal fight with the Congressional Black Caucus, which is strongly backing the only declared candidate for the post, Rep. James Clyburn (D-S.C.). Clyburn is currently Democratic Caucus chairman and the only African-American in the party leadership.

"I seek this post, and not any other," Emanuel said in a statement announcing his candidacy for caucus chairman, "because I believe what we need now is a unified Democratic caucus, focused squarely on the business of moving this country forward."

The caucus chairman typically is a mostly ceremonial position but Democratic aides said Emanuel would be given additional duties, including responsibility for rapid response to Republican attacks, input into party policy positions and a role in strategy for re-electing vulnerable incumbents.

According to the Associated Press, Democrats have won at least 230 House seats, giving them 12 more votes than the 218 needed to control the 435-member chamber. Two more uncalled races appeared to be leaning Democratic Thursday evening. Republicans had won 196 seats, with 7 uncalled races leaning in their direction.

Two days after the polls closed in Virginia, Allen conceded defeat in a Senate re-election campaign that two months ago he had been comfortably leading in the polls as he considered a bid for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

But in August he was videotaped calling a Democratic campaign worker of Indian descent a "macaca," a term considered a racial slur by some. Afterward, several former teammates from his days of playing football for the University of Virginia said he had frequently used a racial slur for blacks—an accusation that Allen denied.

Democrat Webb held a lead of 8,942 votes among 2.37 million cast as of Thursday evening, according to the web site of the Virginia State Board of Elections.

Speaking to supporters in Alexandria, Va., Allen said a preliminary re-canvass of votes suggested an official recount would not change the result.

DOJ_NMG_0093601

"The Bible teaches us that there's a time and place for everything," Allen said. "Today I've called and congratulated Jim Webb and his team for their victory. They had the prevailing winds."

Webb, a former Republican and the Reagan administration's secretary of the Navy, stressed his opposition to the war in Iraq during the campaign. One trademark of his campaign was to carry around the state a pair of combat boots that he was given by his son, who is serving in Iraq. At the rally, he waved the pair of boots to cheers from his supporters.

"We're going to work hard to bring a sense of responsibility in our foreign policy that will, in my view, result soon in a diplomatic solution in Iraq," he said.

Tribune staff reporter Gerry Doyle contributed to this report from Chicago.

mdorning@tribune.com

Scandals Have Touched Some Key Democrats (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

Incoming Leaders in House And Senate Vow to Approve An Ethics-Reform Package

WASHINGTON -- After winning an election shaped by corruption as much as Iraq, Democrats are about to elevate a set of leaders in the House and Senate that will include lawmakers who have had their own brushes with scandal.

Sen. Harry Reid (D., Nev.), who is expected to be elected to majority leader in the Senate, has come under attack for his relationship with Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, a profitable land deal, and whether he inappropriately used campaign funds to give Christmas bonuses to employees at his condo complex.

In the House, West Virginia Democratic Rep. Allan Mollohan, whose conduct is being investigated by the Justice Department, is in line for a senior position on the Appropriations Committee. Meanwhile, Rep. Alcee Hastings, a Florida Democrat, is vying to become chairman of the Intelligence Committee. Once a federal judge, Mr. Hastings was impeached by Congress more than a decade ago after he was charged with -- and acquitted of -- taking a $150,000 bribe. Mr. Hastings declined to comment.

A fourth Democrat, Rep. William Jefferson of Louisiana, under Justice Department investigation for accepting bribes, came out ahead of 12 other candidates vying for his seat on Election Day, but faces a December runoff under Louisiana's unique election system. A spokeswoman for Mr. Jefferson said he has "consistently said that he is innocent of all the allegations."

Democratic leaders in both chambers say they will make it a top priority to approve an ethics-reform package that tightens rules for lawmakers, congressional aides and lobbyists. Republicans made the same promise a year ago after a Justice Department corruption probe garnered guilty pleas from a pair of one-time aides to former Republican Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas as well as from Mr. Abramoff, who was close to Mr. DeLay and other Republican lawmakers.

Democrats were successful in exploiting the corruption scandal on the campaign trail. Nearly three of four voters said that "corruption and scandals" in government were extremely important or very important in their votes, according to exit polls.

Indeed, four Republican lawmakers with ties to Mr. Abramoff lost their re-election bids, including Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana and Reps. Richard Pombo of California, J.D. Hayworth of Arizona and John Sweeney of New York.

Three other Republicans in the House gave up their seats due to federal investigations into their ties with lobbyists. Reps. Duke Cunningham of California and Bob Ney of Ohio gave up their seats after pleading guilty to accepting bribes from lobbyists. Mr. DeLay decided not to seek re-election after he was tied to the scandal involving Mr. Abramoff. Democrats won two of the three elections to fill those seats.

Now that Democrats are in control of Congress, however, some of those same corruption issues may come back to hound the party. Mr. Reid, for example, is one of a handful of Democrats in Congress who had ties to Mr. Abramoff.

Mr. Abramoff employed as a lobbyist one of Mr. Reid's former aides and the Democratic leader received more than $40,000 in campaign donations from the lobbyist's fund-raising network.

In 2002, Mr. Reid sent a letter asking the Interior Department to block an Indian tribe in Louisiana from opening a casino that would have competed with an existing casino operated by one of Mr. Abramoff's clients. The day after Mr. Reid sent his letter, Mr. Abramoff's client, a tribe called the Coushattas, sent a $5,000 contribution to one of Mr. Reid's fund-raising groups.

Jim Manley, a spokesman for Mr. Reid, said that the senator "has long opposed the expansion of off-reservation Indian gaming," and any official action he took was consistent with that view. Another top Democrat, Sen. Byron Dorgan of North Dakota, has returned $67,000 in donations received from Mr. Abramoff's lobbying firm and clients.

Mr. Reid admitted last month that he used campaign funds to pay $3,000 in Christmas bonuses to the employees of the Ritz-Carlton in Washington, where Mr. Reid lives. Mr. Reid said he often holds fund-raisers and campaign events at his condo and that it was appropriate to use his campaign account to reimburse the staff for extra work. Nevertheless, Mr. Reid agreed to write a personal check to cover the costs. Mr. Reid also amended his personal financial records to more clearly indicate his profits from a business deal in Nevada.

DOJ_NMG_0093602

Mr. Manley said that "whenever a question has been raised, he has taken swift action to address it, which is far different from how Republicans handle things."

Mr. Reid was born in the Nevada desert and was once an amateur boxer and Capitol police officer. A lawyer, Mr. Reid became head of the Nevada Gaming Commission in the late 1970s. He was elected to the U.S. House in 1982 and the U.S. Senate in 1986. When Democratic Sen. Tom Daschle of South Dakota was defeated for re-election in 2004, Mr. Reid took over as majority leader. He is considered a tough and smart legislator. His even-keeled manner has won praise from other Democrats. He holds a seat on the Appropriations Committee and takes credit for many of the federal dollars that Congress sends to his home state.

On the other side of the Capitol, Mr. Mollohan is being investigated by federal prosecutors who are examining his practice of directing federal funds to nonprofit groups he set up in his home state that are run by real-estate partners or political allies.

Some of the groups got grand-jury subpoenas, indicating an active investigation. No charges have been brought and Mr. Mollohan has denied the allegations. He stepped down as ranking Democrat on the House ethics committee earlier this year after his pattern of earmarking became public. The allegations became an issue in his campaign against challenger Christopher Wakim, a Republican state legislator. But Rep. Mollohan won easily, with 64% of the vote to 36% for Mr. Wakim. A spokesman for Mr. Mollohan didn't return a call or email yesterday.

Mr. Jefferson, the Louisiana Democrat, was kicked off the House tax-writing committee after the Federal Bureau of Investigation said he was hiding $90,000 in cash in a freezer in his home. No charges have been filed, but investigators said in court papers that he took the cash for his role in securing communications contracts. Mr. Jefferson has denied any misconduct and was the front-runner in a field of 13 candidates in Tuesday's results, winning 30% of the vote.

--John R. Wilke and Robert Block contributed to this article.

Write to Brody Mullins at brody.mullins@wsj.com1

Connecticut's Dodd May Lead Banking Committee (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff, Usa Today

USA Today, November 10, 2006

Among goals: More transparent markets

WASHINGTON — Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, a second-generation senator exploring a 2008 presidential bid, is in line to be chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, now that Democrats have a majority in that chamber.

In his 26 years in Congress, Dodd, 62, has been a strong advocate for the insurance and financial services industries in his state. Such firms as Bear Stearns, Lehman Bros. and Goldman Sachs are atop Dodd's list of political action committee donors, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

Insurance lobbyists are hoping Dodd will play a key role in a possible extension of federally backed terrorism insurance. Dodd was one of the authors of a current law, crafted after the 2001 terrorist attacks, that expires next year.

“We certainly hope there will be a long-term mechanism put in place. … It's fundamentally important,” says the American Insurance Association's Julie Rochman.

Kurt Pfotenhauer of the Mortgage Bankers Association calls Dodd the type of Democrat who is “not allergic to business.”

At the same time, consumer advocates note Dodd's progressive streak. He backs a minimum wage increase and pushed for greater disclosure of credit card interest rates and tougher standards for offering cards to people under 21.

“He's been very strong on credit cards. I would anticipate that consumers will have access,” says Allen Fishbein of the Consumer Federation of America.

In a statement this week, Dodd outlined general goals, including preventing outsourcing of militarily sensitive jobs, improving the transparency of markets, expanding affordable housing and beefing up market terrorism protections.

Dodd is the son of a former senator, Thomas Dodd, who was also a prosecutor in the Nuremberg trials of top Nazis after World War II.

Dodd was an author of the 1993 Family and Medical Leave Act and helped craft a law improving the voting process after the 2000 elections. In recent months, he's been traveling the country to test support for a possible presidential bid.

Though he voted for the Iraq war, he is now a sharp critic of President Bush's handling of the conflict. Dodd has said he regrets letting fellow Democrats talk him out of mounting a filibuster against recent legislation governing military tribunals, which he says violates international law banning torture.

In a swing through Iowa, Dodd said the law was in stark contrast with the Nuremberg trials. He referred to letters his father wrote his mother during the Nuremberg proceedings, telling her he would never do anything as vital.

Dodd supported the Sarbanes-Oxley law after the Enron scandal, requiring more business transparency. The business community is now pushing to relax the law, but the outcome is unclear.

"I suspect, just because of the business community's focus, at some point (Congress) will be discussing Sarbanes-Oxley," says Mark Peterson of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants. "Legislation, probably not. Oversight hearings, sure, at some point."

Some Defense Firms More At Ease As McCain Denied Oversight Chair (WSJ)

By Jonathan Karp And Andy Pasztor

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

Democratic control of Congress has sparked uncertainty among defense contractors after six years of tremendous growth, but many industry executives are relieved that Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain, a strident critic of Pentagon weapons-buying practices, won't become chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

The anticipated Democratic chairman, Michigan Sen. Carl Levin, brings his own longstanding skepticism of the industry and some of its prized weapons programs, particularly missile defense. Yet the soft-spoken Mr. Levin is likely to change the tone and focus of the committee's oversight efforts.

Unlike Mr. McCain, whose investigations into Boeing Co.'s ethical lapses laid the path for the panel to examine weapons-contract details and contractor profit margins, Mr. Levin has signaled that his priority will be the war in Iraq.

He fired a salvo in a post-election conference call with reporters Wednesday by criticizing the Bush administration for failing to include war costs in the regular Pentagon budget, which must be approved by the Armed Services Committee. Instead, the White House has resorted to increasingly large emergency-spending requests, which don't have the same accountability. Mr. Levin said the U.S. needs "honest" and "rational budgeting."

Michele Flournoy, a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic & International Studies think tank in Washington and a former Clinton administration Pentagon official, predicts Mr. Levin will concentrate on bringing oversight to the conduct of the Iraq war and ensuring funding to equip overstretched U.S. forces.

"Unlike some other senators, Sen. Levin isn't known to harbor any deep grudges against defense companies," she said. "He'll be a friend to the military and a friend to industry."

Even though the defense industry has benefited greatly from recent Republican control, some defense executives grew so peeved at Mr. McCain that they privately rooted for a Democratic takeover of the Senate. Had Republicans retained control of the chamber, he was likely to succeed Virginia Sen. John Warner, whose tenure would have been terminated by party-imposed term limits. As a minority member, the Arizona Republican will have less clout in setting the committee's agenda, and because of his expected presidential run in 2008, Mr. McCain can't count on the same level of bipartisan support that has long been a committee trademark.

The setback to Mr. McCain may provide some relief to companies he has targeted, such as Lockheed Martin Corp. and Boeing. But it is less positive for Northrop Grumman Corp., which has benefited from his demands for a fair competition against Boeing to supply aerial-refueling planes. With the change in leadership, senior Republican senators from the South will be less able to help Northrop's Gulf Coast shipyards.

Mr. McCain's office didn't respond to requests for comment.

Industry officials expect heightened scrutiny by a Democratic-led committee, but say Mr. Levin's is likely to focus less on the industry and more on the vast sums being outsourced to support the troops. "He will look at whether we have appropriate safeguards for services contracts, and that leads to things in Iraq," said one defense-industry executive who had extensive experience in government.

The 72-year-old Michigan Democrat, known for his collegial manner but also his persistence after more than two decades on the panel, sometimes can be a partisan and stubborn industry critic. When the military buildup of the 1980s was tainted by bribery and influence-peddling scandals, he blasted top Republican Pentagon appointees as "pitifully poor managers" who saddled the military with "more anticompetitive practices" than any previous administration.

These days, Mr. McCain is the defense industry's biggest irritant. He began by spearheading the drive that thwarted an Air Force plan to lease aerial-refueling planes from Boeing. Pentagon and Justice Department investigations backed up many of his allegations. Later, he used his position as a subcommittee chairman to browbeat senior executives and force the Pentagon to rewrite contracts, including the Boeing-led Army modernization program and Lockheed Martin's C-130J cargo plane.

His tenacious campaigns were cast as efforts to bring transparency and cost-savings to multibillion-dollar weapons programs. Pentagon officials, industry officials and Wall Street analysts complained about what they considered Mr. McCain's micromanaging. In June, however, Mr. McCain was dealt a rebuke when the full Senate easily approved a contract for Lockheed's F-22 stealth fighter jet he had argued against.

DOJ_NMG_0093604

Write to Jonathan Karp at jonathan.karp@wsj.com1 and Andy Pasztor at andy.pasztor@wsj.com2

Treasury Chief Set To Seek Deals (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 10 — For his first months in office, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. kept to the shadows while cabinet colleagues were campaigning for a Republican Congress. He made it plain that he disliked politicking, and he irritated some Republicans the Friday before Election Day by not joining the administration chorus talking up a drop in the jobless rate.

But now the new Treasury chief is set to plunge in. Untainted by the harshly partisan rhetoric of the past, he hopes to use his prowess as the former head of Goldman Sachs not just to pursue critical economic deals with China and other American trading partners but — equally important for the weakened administration — to explore deal-making with Democrats in Congress, as well.

An objective is to restore the long-term financial stability of Social Security and Medicare as baby boomers head toward retirement.

While that may prove politically impossible, in the short term Mr. Paulson is also expected to be at the center of efforts to find economic issues on which Congressional Democrats and the Bush administration can agree next year.

Lawmakers in both parties say talks may include middle-class tax breaks and simplification of the tax code. Democrats, for their part, hope to use Mr. Paulson's comments this summer, in which he deplored income inequality, to press for a minimum wage increase.

The White House says it is counting on the best from Mr. Paulson. But the chances for real cooperation are limited.

Mr. Paulson could easily run up against hard-liners in the administration who are likely to doubt that negotiation with the Democrats is the best course for Republicans already looking ahead to the 2008 elections. And while there is much talk in Washington of finding common ground after the vitriolic campaign, the mood could sour as early as next week when Congress returns for a lame-duck session where Republicans will still be in control.

"I have every reason to believe that Paulson will have some influence with the president," said Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York, the expected Democratic chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. "The question is how much."

The day after the Democratic victory in the midterm elections, President Bush announced that he asked Mr. Paulson "to reach out to folks on the Hill" on Social Security and Medicare, subjects that inevitably will lead to discussions about taxes and spending.

"With the election over, there may be an opportunity for some renaissance of bipartisanship," said Joshua B. Bolten, the White House chief of staff. "Hank Paulson is an important ingredient in that chemistry."

In an interview after the voting this week, Mr. Paulson said he was determined to work with Democrats to get something done next year.

"It has always been my view, even before the election, that on the major issues this country is facing, any solution was going to have to take a bipartisan approach," he said. "We were going to have to build a consensus, no matter who won the election."

Mr. Paulson is a professed neophyte in political and legislative warfare, but is recognized as a master at striking bargains in the business world. As chief executive of Goldman Sachs he made billions of dollars in investment banking deals in the United States, as well as in China, Germany and other countries.

"I don't think you'll find anybody as tenacious as he is," said John F. W. Rogers, a managing director at Goldman Sachs who served for a time as Mr. Paulson's chief of staff there. He added that it was instructive to go hiking with Mr. Paulson, an avid outdoorsman whose environmental views are not always in sync with the administration's.

"It's like a forced march," Mr. Rogers said. "If he sees a downed tree, he says, 'You can go over it, you can go under it, but you can't go around it.' There's an active sense of attacking problems head-on."

He has already delved into the issues presented by China. Mr. Paulson plans to lead an unusual delegation to China in December that will include at least a half-dozen cabinet colleagues dealing with issues like commerce, trade, energy and transportation. The trip underscores his first-among-equals status in the cabinet when it comes to economic matters.

For all his business experience, though, others who know Mr. Paulson say that he may have trouble navigating the egos and competing interests on Capitol Hill as well as those inside the administration.

DOJ_NMG_0093605

Beginning to address government benefit programs could be an early test of Mr. Paulson's leadership and negotiating skills. The Treasury chief has repeatedly asserted that he wants to fix Social Security and Medicare, which are set to rise sharply in cost in the coming years, and to work with Democrats on solutions.

But Democrats say that if the Treasury chief revives Mr. Bush's emphasis on private investment accounts, as a partial replacement for Social Security for future retirees, it will be rejected — and seen as an act of bad faith.

"I once told President Bush that if he took private accounts off the table, I would go around the country with him in support of Social Security reforms," Mr. Rangel recalled. "He said, 'As long as I'm president, private accounts will be on the table.' Well, if he says that now, he's basically saying he doesn't want a deal on Social Security."

Mr. Bush said a couple of weeks ago that he would continue to push for private investment accounts. But the president also said that he would retain Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, only to reverse himself this week.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who will lose his position as chairman of the Finance Committee next year, said it appeared that Mr. Paulson was already advocating more efforts to listen to Congress. But it was not clear whether he could persuade Vice President Dick Cheney or Karl Rove, the political strategist, to go along.

"I don't know whether he's going to win or lose," Mr. Grassley said, "but I sure applaud what he's doing."

In recent weeks, the Treasury secretary has spent a lot of time courting lawmakers like Mr. Rangel, who will be at the center of any discussion of taxes and benefit programs, and Senator Max Baucus of Montana, his counterpart as the expected chairman of the Finance Committee.

"I'm very impressed," Mr. Baucus said. "Hank Paulson seems to have very few ideological bones in his body."

But there is also precedent to consider or — possibly for this president — to avoid. Mr. Bush's father, President George H. W. Bush, negotiated a grand budget and tax deal with Congress in 1990, only to have it shot down by Republicans in the House because it contemplated some tax increases. (Later that year, after a temporary government shutdown, lawmakers finally approved a budget that included limited tax increases.)

That budget deal remains a source of bitterness among conservatives. Some argued that it was an excellent model for cooperation — in that Democrats accepted some spending cuts — and helped usher in economic growth in the 1990s. But it also involved Mr. Bush's going back on his "read my lips: no new taxes" pledge in the 1988 presidential campaign.

If there are marathon negotiations to resolve tax and budget issues, an administration official said, they would not take place at Andrews Air Force Base, the scene of the 1990 talks.

Taking over as Treasury chief this summer, Mr. Paulson has surrounded himself with an eclectic team. The only top official he has brought from his time at Goldman Sachs is Robert K. Steel, now the under secretary of the Treasury for domestic finance.

His chief of staff and top political aide is James Wilkinson, a veteran of Texas politics who has served as a top aide to Mr. Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

The environment in Congress on budget and tax issues will be tricky, because Democrats are loath to begin the discussion of increasing any taxes, having been accused by Republicans of being a bunch of tax raisers in the last election.

But Democrats all say they embrace enactment of a "pay as you go" regime in which any future tax cuts or spending increases will have to be paid for by spending cuts or tax increases elsewhere. While few insiders expect major changes to Mr. Bush's big tax cuts until after the 2008 election, the subject of increasing some taxes, or scaling back past tax cuts, may end up on the table next year.

Democrats, however, are determined to increase the minimum wage, now $5.15 an hour, to $7 or more. Mr. Paulson has not taken any stand on whether he would favor such an increase.

Mr. Paulson has declared that his other economic priorities are to combat protectionist sentiment in the United States and to engage in a widespread dialogue with China that could eventually prod the Chinese leadership to overhaul their nation's economic practices.

Mr. Paulson succeeded in persuading Mr. Bush to let him head an inter-agency committee of cabinet members on dealing with China. He did so by lining up support among the cabinet members and the White House staff first.

The mid-December trip is aimed at persuading the Chinese to liberalize their economy, crack down on piracy, discuss future cooperation on energy and encourage greater flexibility in currency practices.

Mr. Paulson is to be accompanied by Susan C. Schwab, the United States trade representative; Carlos M. Gutierrez, the commerce secretary; and Samuel W. Bodman, the energy secretary. Treasury officials say they would like quick progress on China's practice of keeping its currency artificially low in relation to the dollar, which aggravates the trade imbalance by making exports to America cheaper and imports to China more expensive. But many experts say the Chinese are resisting out of concern that such a step could damage their banking system, throwing people out of work.

Mr. Paulson will be raising the pressure on China, but political experts say his skills have mostly revealed themselves so far in getting United States lawmakers to withdraw a bill punishing China if it does not change its currency policy.

DOJ_NMG_0093606

The Treasury secretary also hopes to help Ms. Schwab get a global trade deal that could be approved by Congress next year. But the consensus among Congressional leaders is that it is probably too late for that.

Beyond a possible breakthrough with China, they say that Mr. Paulson's greatest hope for success lies in striking smaller bargains on the budget and taxes. Mr. Rangel and Mr. Baucus said it would be better to reach agreements on incremental tax issues first to build up trust.

Mr. Paulson, in the interview, also said he thought that the approach of reaching for "low-hanging fruit" on economic issues might make sense.

"I'm hoping there will be some things that we can get some quick victories on," Mr. Paulson said. "Then if we can get some things done, it will be a good basis for going on to more difficult issues."

U.N. Post Will Test Bush On Pledge For Consensus (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 10 — President Bush has pledged to be a bipartisan consensus builder now that Democrats are to control Congress, and since Wednesday he has made conciliatory gestures. The question now is whether Mr. Bush is ready to junk all of his make-nice pledges in order to keep John R. Bolton at the United Nations.

Officially, administration officials say they plan to make all the necessary calls to Republicans and Democrats on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to try to persuade them to confirm Mr. Bolton for a new term.

"He has been extraordinarily effective up there at the U.N., and now is not the time to have a gap," said Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman.

But with the announcement on Thursday by Senator Lincoln Chafee, Republican of Rhode Island, that he would deny Republicans on the committee the last vote needed to send Mr. Bolton's nomination to the full Senate, some administration officials privately acknowledge that Mr. Bolton's chances of confirmation are "nil," one State Department official said.

Mr. Chafee, who was defeated for re-election on Tuesday, said: "The American people have spoken out against the president's agenda on a number of fronts, and presumably one of those is on foreign policy. And at this late stage in my term, I'm not going to endorse something the American people have spoken out against."

In this situation, the usual next step would be for Mr. Bolton to withdraw from consideration and for Mr. Bush to nominate a less polarizing candidate. Names that have been floated both inside and outside the administration include Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador to Iraq; Philip D. Zelikow, the State Department counselor; Paula Dobriansky, under secretary of state for democracy and global affairs; and even Mr. Chafee.

But Mr. Bolton is keen to stay at the helm of the American team at the United Nations, administration officials say, and White House officials, including Mr. Bush's counsel, Harriet E. Miers, have been looking into whether the president can somehow bypass the Senate and keep him there. Administration officials said Vice President Dick Cheney was backing exploration of such a move.

Mr. Bolton "could be named acting permanent representative or deputy U.N. ambassador or something else that doesn't require confirmation," a senior administration official said.

Obviously, doing that will anger Democrats, the official said. "But we'll see."

When senators blocked Mr. Bolton's confirmation last year, Mr. Bush gave him a recess appointment, which expires when this Congress adjourns. Mr. Bush could give Mr. Bolton a second recess appointment as the United Nations ambassador, but under the law he could not be paid for his work.

White House officials are looking into whether he can be paid by some other entity and still serve as ambassador, or whether a de facto position could be created in which Mr. Bolton served as ambassador for all intents and purposes, but not in name.

Such a move would almost certainly enflame relations between the White House and the ascendant Democrats and would probably kill any further talk about bipartisan cooperation.

"It looks like an act out of Cirque du Soleil," said Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut and a member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. Dodd likened the proposed maneuver to "a vision of a contortionist" and said, "This John Bolton does not deserve to be promoted."

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, declined on Friday to speculate about Mr. Bolton's future if his nomination did not get through the Senate.

"I think what we ought to do right now is simply allow senators in the lame-duck session to see if they will give John Bolton a fair shake," Mr. Snow said. "After that, we'll talk about possibilities."

DOJ_NMG_0093607

Mr. Bolton's allies argue that during his tenure as ambassador, the United States has been successful in getting several Security Council resolutions through the United Nations, including actions that seek to slow or halt the nuclear ambitions of Iran and North Korea. Mr. Bolton also helped to shepherd through a Security Council resolution to end the Israel-Hezbollah war in Lebanon and to establish a United Nations peacekeeping force there.

"The president believes," Mr. Snow said, "that John Bolton has done an exemplary job, and if people fairly will examine his record, his real accomplishments, his record at the United Nations, that he not only will have earned confirmation but will receive it."

Mr. Bolton's critics say he is abrasive and represents a hard-line, conservative ideology at odds with the multilateral approach at the United Nations.

Administration officials say Mr. Bush resubmitted Mr. Bolton's nomination as part of a public relations strategy to put the onus on the Democrats for not allowing a vote on his appointment to go to the floor.

Democrats say that if the administration circumvents the Senate by trying a special appointment, they will portray Mr. Bush as insincere in his pledge to seek a middle ground.

"What all of this indicates is that the bipartisanship discussion we're seeing is very thin," said Steve Clemons, director of the American Strategy program at the New America Foundation.

Mississippians Rise Up Over Rangel's Comment (NYT)

By Anthony Ramirez

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

It was a remark, says Representative Charles B. Rangel, uttered with regional pride rather than rancor. But he apologized nonetheless.

On Wednesday, the day after the Democrats won a House majority, Mr. Rangel, the Harlem Democrat poised to become chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, which writes tax legislation, talked about winning back more of the tax revenue that New York State sends to the Treasury. He said, "Mississippi gets more than their fair share back in federal money, but who the hell wants to live in Mississippi?"

Apparently, a lot of people do, and they are not shy about saying so.

Charles W. Pickering Jr., a Mississippi Republican and a colleague of Mr. Rangel's, was the first to publicly take umbrage. He reacted as if he and his state had been slapped with a glove.

"Mr. Rangel owes the people of Mississippi an apology," he said in a statement. "I hope his remarks are not the kind of insults, slander and defamation that Mississippians will come to expect from the Democrat leadership in Washington, D.C."

Mr. Pickering, who is from Laurel, Miss., marched to his peroration.

"From the coast to the Delta to the Pine Belt to the hills and across Mississippi," he said, "there is beauty in every city, charity in every heart, love in every church, and majesty in every countryside."

In Jackson, the state capital, Mr. Rangel's remarks were discussed on local television and talk radio, said David Hampton, who edits the editorial page at The Clarion-Ledger. "A lot of it was post-election Republicans saying the evil Democrats this and that and a-ha, we told you so," he said. "Mississippi sort of has an inferiority complex."

Mr. Hampton said he had received about a dozen letters to the editor and five comments on his editorial page blog, and some of it was genuine outrage.

In a letter to the editor, Wendy Barthe Peavy of Biloxi wrote: "Congressman Rangel: As a proud Mississippian and resident of the Katrina-ravaged Gulf Coast, I would be happy to tell you 'who the hell wants to live in Mississippi.'

"I will not waste your time with the litany of world-class writers, artists, athletes, entertainers, scientists, surgeons, astronauts, musicians, soldiers and statesmen who have called Mississippi home," she wrote. "I will tell you of the 93,000 people still housed in FEMA trailers due to the loss of over 10,000 apartment units and over 150,000 homes to Hurricane Katrina."

She concluded, "Congressman Rangel, these people went through hell to live in Mississippi!"

Told of Representative Pickering's comments, Mr. Rangel said he was sorry. "I certainly don't mean to offend anyone," he said in a statement issued Thursday. "I just love New York so much that I can't understand why everyone wouldn't want to live here." Attempts to reach him by telephone and e-mail for further comment were unsuccessful.

Some Mississippians were skeptical about the regional chauvinism explanation.

"I don't know if he was joking," said Debbie Crapps, 46, who lives in Florence and works as a manager at Homer's Barbeque Store in Jackson.

"I think it was a bad thing to say," Ms. Crapps said in a telephone interview. "He doesn't live in Mississippi, he doesn't know anything about us. A lot of people here have a lot to say about it because we're not a big city like New York City. We are humans. We don't think that's right."

DOJ_NMG_0093608

But Mr. Pickering, at least, was prepared to let bygones be bygones. In a statement yesterday, he said Mississippians were "quick to forgive a sincere person."

Beyond the bruised feelings, there were some fears that Mississippi's needs would be ignored by a Northerner in a powerful position. In his editorial page blog, Mr. Hampton wrote that Mississippi would have to adjust to Mr. Rangel.

"Regional insults aside," Mr. Hampton wrote, "the more serious issue is Rangel will head the powerful Ways and Means Committee at a time when there already is reluctance to continue to address Katrina-recovery needs and a perception that Mississippi got more than it should have in recovery funds."

He said Mississippi's Democrats in the House, Bennie Thompson and Gene Taylor, "have their job cut out for them," and added, "They might start with a visit to Mr. Rangel."

Pelosi Affirms Support Of Full D.C. Voting Rights (WP)

By Yolanda Woodlee

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

U.S. Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the incoming speaker of the House of Representatives, supports District voting rights and is a co-sponsor of legislation that would give Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) a full vote in the House, a spokeswoman said yesterday.

The statement from Pelosi's office clarified her position after heated discussion on Washington Post Radio about her position on the issue. On Thursday, Pelosi said she would change House rules on the first day of the new Democratic-controlled session in January so that Norton could vote on proposed changes but not final approval of legislation on the House floor. That would be a temporary measure, Norton said.

"She wants D.C. to have full voting rights in the House," said Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Pelosi (D-Calif.). "She doesn't co-sponsor many pieces of legislation."

On Thursday, Crider had referred to Pelosi's opposition to portions of an earlier version of a voting rights bill. After changes were made, Pelosi signed on to the current bill, introduced in May by Norton and U.S. Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.).

City officials, including Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty and Vincent C. Gray, chairman-elect of the D.C. Council, said they are concerned that the temporary measure does not go far enough.

"This is going back to a proposal where we get a vote only if it doesn't count," Fenty said. "It doesn't make any sense. . . . We need to go to something more substantive."

The Norton-Davis bill links the D.C. vote to an additional congressional seat in Utah, raising the total number of House members from 435 to 437. Pelosi did not favor legislation that included redistricting in Utah, a move that some lawmakers feared would jeopardize that state's only Democrat representative. Pelosi later signed on to the bill after Utah made the congressional seat a statewide position.

The question for voting rights advocates is whether there will be time to consider and pass the bill before the current session ends.

Norton, who has championed voting rights for the District since she took office in 1991, said she prefers passage of the bipartisan bill this month rather than waiting until the Democrats take the majority.

Ilir Zherka, executive director of the nonprofit group D.C. Vote, is calling for an immediate vote.

"The next Congress is going to be very busy dealing with a lot of issues, and so our view is let's get this done now, because we have already dealt with the full range of questions posed about this bill," he said.

"Having got this far, to the 10-yard line, let's finish it."

Before the bill can move through Congress, however, Utah state lawmakers must vote on their portion of the measure. Aides to Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr. and Utah House Speaker Greg J. Curtis said this week that legislation creating the congressional seat could be approved in one day.

If this happens next week, Norton is optimistic that Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), chairman of the Judiciary Committee, will move the legislation to a floor vote in House. The Senate would also need to vote on it.

"The question is, is there time on their watch?" Norton said.

Full Vote Eyed For House Delegate Before Session Ends (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, November 11, 2006

D.C. voting rights advocates are encouraged by the recent Democratic takeover of Congress, but would prefer a bill giving their representative a full vote in the House be considered before the end of this legislative session.

DOJ_NMG_0093609

"For us, it's not necessarily a matter of Democratic control versus Republican control," said Ilir Zherka, executive director of the nonprofit advocacy group D.C. Vote. "Going into a new Congress presents new challenges and additional challenges, and we would rather complete this process now."

The D.C. Voting Rights Act was introduced in May by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, and D.C. Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, a Democrat. It would give the historically Democratic city a House vote and add a seat in the House for Utah, a Republican stronghold.

The bill is now in the House Judiciary Committee, where proponents are pushing for committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican, to allow it to be voted on by all 435 House members.

But the bill's move out of the committee depends on Utah lawmakers approving a redistricting map. And with the current session of a Republican Congress set to end soon, time for further action is expiring.

"In sort of such a lame-duck session where you have so many members of Congress who lost their seats, I'd be surprised if the legislation came up," said Brian Schaffner, a professor of political science at American University.

Yesterday, Doxie McCoy, a spokeswoman for Mrs. Norton, said the delegate "had the confirmed, continuing support of the new" Democratic House leadership for the bill. However, the measure must be introduced before the new Congress if no vote is taken before the current session ends.

Mr. Zherka said having to re-introduce the bill to a new Congress could create new problems. For example, new Democratic lawmakers could have concerns about adding a seat for Utah.

Other objections could be raised -- again -- over the redistricting of Utah, and restarting the process could be a step backward.

"Starting the process over again raises new questions that we would prefer not to have to answer and consider," Mr. Zherka said.

Still, the prospects for D.C. voting rights may not suffer much if put off until next year.

The measure has received bipartisan support and has already gone from the House Government Reform Committee, of which Mr. Davis is chairman, to the House Judiciary Committee.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman, California Democrat who co-sponsored the measure, is in line to replace Mr. Davis as committee chairman.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat who likely will be the House's next speaker, also co-sponsored the bill and is advocating rules allowing Mrs. Norton to vote on proposed changes to legislation.

Democrats in general are historically more supportive of giving the District voting rights, said Garry Young, director of the Center for Washington Area Studies at George Washington University.

"I don't think the [bill's] prospects are markedly changed, but at the same time it's obviously an issue that's a pet issue of a lot of Democrats," Mr. Young said.

D.C. Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty, who has pledged to actively lobby Congress for voting rights during his transition and after he takes office Jan. 2, called the Democratic takeover a "win-win" for voting advocates.

"We can try to win in the lame duck and then when the Democrats take over, I think most people know that they're even more likely to want to have two Democratic senators" as well, he said.

OTHER NEWS:

Election Past, How High Can Stocks Go? (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

Now that the stock and bond markets have shrugged off the major shift of political power in Washington, investors are beginning to wonder how much higher the stock market can go.

The markets seem to have welcomed the end of the divisive political campaign. Now, people's attention is turning back to more fundamental issues -- notably strong recent corporate profits and low interest rates.

For election week, the Dow Jones Industrial Average put in a gain of 122.39 points, or 1%, to finish at 12108.43. The price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note rose every day of the week, sending the yield down to 4.590% at week's end.

The Dow finished just short of the record close of 12176.54 that it achieved Wednesday. It rose on every day except Thursday, including a gain of 5.13 points, or 0.04%, Friday. It is up 13% in 2006.

Some sectors -- big drug companies, big telecommunications companies, big oil -- have suffered. Investors worry that Democratic legislators will try to regulate those industries more heavily, limiting profits.

DOJ_NMG_0093610

But technology stocks have done well, boosted by hopes for the economy and by a reassuring sales forecast from Cisco Systems. The prevalent view among investors was that the political campaign meant little to stocks, and that low interest rates and a resilient economy meant a lot more.

"The Republicans couldn't pass much of their program when Democrats had 45 senators. Now the Republicans have 49, so the Democrats probably can't pass anything either," said Alfred Kugel, chief investment strategist at Chicago investment-management firm Atlantic Trust/Stein Roe. "In the meantime, the economy is doing fine if you aren't in the housing business. Earnings are doing well. Employment is good."

Hopes are spreading that inflation will remain tame and that this will permit the Federal Reserve to avoid any interest-rate increases, which would be good news for consumers and businesses alike. Some pundits, in fact, forecast that the Fed could cut rates next year, to give the economy a little boost.

The dollar has been suffering compared with the euro, hitting two-month lows, as Chinese authorities hint that they will diversify into things like the euro and gold.

Investors are nervous about crude-oil futures, which bounced above $60 during the week. But the slowing economy has helped keep oil futures well off this year's highs. On Friday, they fell $1.57 to $59.59 a barrel, down 2.4% for 2006 but up 0.8% on the week.

Another worry is that the Dow industrials haven't pulled back as much as 10% since 2003, which is a long time. The industrials are up 12.7% since July 14, a big gain with very little pause to digest. But the end of the year historically has been good for stocks, and many experts think any pullback will occur next year.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index and Nasdaq Composite index also rose for the week. The S&P 500 Friday was up 0.19%, or 2.57 points, to 1380.90, ahead 10.6% this year.

The Nasdaq Friday rose 0.58%, or 13.71 points, to 2389.72, up 8.4% in 2006. Neither is near a record, but the Nasdaq recorded its highest finish since February 2001.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms, including new highs for markets in tocks in India, Indonesia and New Zealand. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.26%, or 0.61 point, to 231.24.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.33 billion shares, as 2,182 stocks rose and 1,100 fell.

Bond prices gained. The 10-year Treasury note rose 10/32, or $3.13 for each $1,000 invested. The 30-year bond was up 18/32 to yield 4.697%.

The dollar weakened. Late in New York, the currency traded at 117.59 yen, down from 117.94, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2847 from $1.2823.

Shares Up, Led By Home Builders (NYT)

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

Stocks rose yesterday, wrapping up their sixth weekly gain in the last seven weeks, as falling oil prices lifted companies that thrive in an expanding economy. Treasuries had their biggest weekly gain since September on speculation that the government would curb spending.

KB Home, D. R. Horton and Centex led a rally among home builders, the best performers in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index. Solectron, a maker of electronic components, had the index's biggest gain after saying that it would meet or exceed profit forecasts.

"I'm very positive on this market as the basic fundamentals are back in place," said John Merrill, who helps manage about $475 million as president and founder of Tanglewood Capital Management in Houston. "It's hard to have better earnings. The market does have further room to rise."

The S.& P. 500 rose 2.57 points, or 0.2 percent, to 1,380.90. The Nasdaq composite index increased 13.71 points, or 0.6 percent, to 2,389.72, its highest close since February 2001.

Walt Disney weighed on the Dow Jones industrial average, which added 5.13 points, to 12,108.43. Disney said that a higher tax rate might reduce earnings next year.

In the last five days, the S.& P. 500 rose 1.2 percent, the Dow gained 1 percent and the Nasdaq climbed 2.5 percent. Technology companies led the weekly advance on better-than-expected earnings and expectation that gridlock in Congress might forestall new regulations.

Treasuries also rose on expectations that demand for new securities would climb. Democratic control of Congress may lead to lower spending.

DOJ_NMG_0093611

Yesterday's gain helped bonds erase losses from Nov. 3, when a government report showed that the national unemployment rate fell to a five-year low, raising concern that growth might be strong enough to allow the Federal Reserve to keep interest rates steady.

The 10-year Treasury note rose 6/32, to 1009/32. The note's yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, fell to 4.59 percent, from 4.63 percent.

Yesterday, crude oil fell the most this month after the International Energy Agency cut its demand forecast for the third consecutive month.

World oil demand this year will average 84.49 million barrels a day, 80,000 barrels a day less than estimated last month, the agency said. Slower growth in Chinese use of transport fuels, especially gasoline, was behind the revision, it said. China, the world's second-biggest oil consumer, behind the United States, is still expected to drive growth this year and next.

"The I.E.A. has cut its demand forecast for three months in a row, which could be the start of a trend," said Kyle Cooper, director of research at IAF Advisors in Houston. "This is very different from 2004 and 2005 when we saw demand revised higher repeatedly. This may be evidence that these high prices are putting a lid on demand growth."

Crude oil for December delivery fell $1.57, or 2.6 percent, to $59.59 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Prices were up 0.8 percent this week and are 3.1 percent higher than a year ago.

The dollar declined versus the euro and yen after the head of China's central bank, Zhou Xiaochuan, said the nation would keep diversifying its foreign exchange reserves.

The dollar fell after Mr. Zhou said China would "stick to the existing policy" of reducing the share of United States assets it holds. The European Central Bank president, Jean-Claude Trichet, and the Bank of Japan governor, Toshihiko Fukui, suggested this week that they would raise interest rates, adding to the allure of their currencies.

"It was just a timely reminder there is a potential the Chinese central bank will diversify out of dollars into euros and even sterling," said Mike Moran, senior currency strategist at Standard Chartered Bank in New York. "People have forgotten about this in a market where the dollar bears are winning out."

The dollar traded at $1.2847 per euro from $1.2824 on Thursday and $1.2718 a week ago. The dollar has declined about 1 percent this week versus the euro.

Virginia Sen. Allen Concedes Defeat (AP-Y)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

As Sen. George Allen entered the campaign season, he anticipated smooth sailing toward an all-but-certain re-election that would bolster his presidential aspirations.

But on Thursday, suggesting that "the prevailing winds were against us," he conceded defeat to Democrat Jim Webb, ending not only his once-promising 2008 prospects but also GOP control of the U.S. Senate.

His rapid fall from political grace, aided by verbal gaffes and a nationwide Republican backlash, was complete.

Polite after a campaign that had been anything but, Allen said he would not demand a recount in a race Webb won by fewer than 9,000 votes out of 2.37 million ballots cast.

Allen said "the owners of government have spoken and I respect their decision," though a day earlier his campaign said it likely would wait for the State Board of Elections to complete its canvass before conceding.

"The Bible teaches us there is a time and place for everything, and today I called and congratulated Jim Webb and his team for their victory," Allen said.

The conservative Republican senator lost to a fellow Reagan acolyte who served as the former president's Navy secretary before becoming disenchanted with the GOP.

At a news conference and rally, Webb's supporters roared when he took his Marine son's battered combat boots from a bag and held them high above his head. Webb, whose son is fighting in Iraq, had worn the boots throughout what he called "an unnecessarily brutal campaign."

Allen chose not to demand a recount when initial canvassing of the results failed to significantly alter Webb's lead.

"I see no good purpose being served by continuously and needlessly expending money and causing any more personal animosity," he said. "Rather than bitterness, I want to focus on how best Virginians can be effectively served by their new junior senator."

Webb said Allen "was very gracious" in their conversation. He alluded to the nasty tone of the campaign, saying he told Allen that "it's vital to stop the politics of divisiveness, character assassination, distraction."

The Virginia contest was the last undecided Senate race in the country, and Webb's victory tipped the scales, giving the Democrats control of 51 Senate seats and majorities in both the House and Senate for the first time since 1994.

DOJ_NMG_0093612

Earlier in the day, Sen. Conrad Burns conceded the Montana Senate race to Democrat Jon Tester, catching Tester on the phone as he headed for a barber shop to get his famous flattop hair trimmed.

The call was "very cordial, very professional. It was positive," Tester, a farmer and state legislator, told The Associated Press.

Burns, a three-term GOP senator whose campaign was also troubled by gaffes and voter discontent, made no public appearances. But he released a statement saying he was ready to "help as Montana transitions to a new United States senator."

"We fought the good fight and we came up just a bit short. We've had a good 18 years and I am proud of my record," he said.

In Virginia, Allen had been expected to cruise to a second term this year and make a run for the White House in 2008. The son of a Hall of Fame football coach, Allen served as governor in the 1990s and was popular for abolishing parole and instituting other conservative reforms.

But in Webb he faced an unconventional challenger. Supporters drafted Webb, a political neophyte, to run because of his early opposition to the Iraq war.

Allen, 54, was comfortably ahead in polls until August, when he mockingly referred to a Webb campaign volunteer of Indian descent as "Macaca," regarded by some as a racial slur. The incident, caught on videotape, became international news. Some former football teammates from the University of Virginia also charged that Allen had commonly used a slur for blacks — something he denied.

Webb, a 60-year-old Naval Academy graduate and decorated Vietnam veteran, tried to link Allen to President Bush and the war during the campaign. He also used a video in ads that showed Reagan praising him.

___

Associated Press writers Bob Lewis in Richmond and Matt Gouras in Helena, Mont., contributed to this report.

Democrats Take Control Of Senate As Allen Concedes To Webb In Va. (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Alec MacGillis, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

Victor Vows New Approach To Iraq War

Democrat James Webb, who campaigned for Virginia's U.S. Senate seat by opposing the war in Iraq and calling for economic fairness, yesterday succeeded in his improbable bid to unseat Republican George Allen, giving the Democrats a 51-seat majority and control of both houses of Congress.

Webb's lead over Allen widened yesterday in the post-election vote canvass, and Allen graciously conceded to Webb to make the victory official. A short time later, Virginia's newest senator, who lives in Fairfax County, addressed a giddy crowd of hundreds of supporters in front of the Arlington County Courthouse.

His victory ended two days of suspense over which party would control the Senate. Going into Tuesday's election, the Democrats needed six seats for control, and it was Webb, a former Republican and Reagan administration official, who gave them the sixth seat.

"It is Virginia that turned the Senate blue," Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) told the cheering crowd.

Webb will take his place in a Congress in which Democrats will control both houses for the first time in 12 years.

"Mark Warner began a journey. Tim Kaine added on to it," a triumphant Webb said, referring to the state's back-to-back Democratic governors. "We are going to add on to it even more."

Webb said that Allen called him to concede and that the two former adversaries would have lunch next week. He called the campaign "unnecessarily brutal" and said he would talk to Allen about how they can help stop "the politics of divisiveness, character assassination, distraction."

A decorated former Marine with a son serving in Iraq, Webb wore combat boots throughout the campaign as a symbol of his early criticism of the conflict. Before speaking in Arlington, Webb took off the boots and held them in the air, delighting the crowd. He promised a new approach to the war that he said will lead to a diplomatic solution.

He also said, "We are going to work very hard on issues of economic fairness in a country that has become too divided by class."

Webb will join Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) in the Senate, where he will likely become a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a spokesman against the war with substantial credentials. Warner and Webb are part of a small fraternity, having both served as secretary of the Navy.

Webb, 60, was a Republican for most of his life and for a time served under the godfather of the modern GOP, President Ronald Reagan. But his election to the Senate delivered a final blow to the Republican Party.

"We will begin the process of putting this country back on the track where it needs to be," Webb said at yesterday's rally.

DOJ_NMG_0093613

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), who as chairman of the Senate Democrats' campaign arm helped Webb win the Democratic primary in June and later helped finance the campaign's expensive media barrage, stood by Webb yesterday, beaming as he thanked the newest member for delivering the Senate to the Democrats.

"What color is my tie? What color is my suit? What color is my Senate?" Schumer asked the Arlington crowd, which yelled, "blue!" in response to each question. "We couldn't have taken the Senate without Jim Webb."

Shortly before Webb's speech, Allen humbly conceded defeat, bowing to the electoral reality that he trailed Webb by an insurmountable lead and sparing the country a recount that could have left control of the Senate in limbo for weeks.

"It is with deep respect for the people of Virginia, and to bind factions together for a positive purpose, that I do not wish to cause more rancor by protracted litigation which would, in my judgment, not alter the results," Allen said in a 12-minute speech to supporters at the historic Carlyle House in Old Town Alexandria.

Allen campaign officials had initially put plans into motion to challenge Virginia's election after coming within 0.3 of a percentage point of Webb's lead. But after local election officials spent Wednesday and part of yesterday reviewing the totals as part of a routine post-election canvass, Webb's margin actually grew. Webb had a lead of 8,942 votes last night.

Allen concluded that further reexamination of the 2.3 million ballots in Virginia would not change the outcome. Speaking of the nearly even percentage split of votes in the contest, Allen said, "We have two '49-ers. But one of them has 49.55, and the other has 49.25."

In a speech filled with humility and respect rarely seen on the campaign trail, Allen praised Webb and said he was not bitter about losing. The former governor, 54, hinted that his life in politics is not over despite his stunning defeat to a political newcomer who trailed him by 16 points just 12 weeks ago.

"Sometimes winds -- political or otherwise -- can blow the leaves off branches and even break limbs," said Allen, flanked by his wife, Susan, and Sen. Warner. "But a deep-rooted tree will stand, stay standing, will regrow in the next season. In this season, the people of Virginia, who I always call the owners of the government, they have spoken. And I respect their decision."

Under Virginia law, Allen could have asked for a recount because his Democratic opponent was ahead by less than 1 percentage point. But several Republican sources said Allen received pressure from advisers and GOP colleagues in Washington who believed that little would be gained.

Sources close to Allen said Republicans in Washington were in no mood for a quixotic fight over Allen.

President Bush yesterday extended an olive branch to Democrats, inviting likely House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and Steny H. Hoyer (Md.), the No. 2 Democrat in the House, to a private luncheon.

The supporters who gathered yesterday afternoon for Allen and Webb reflected the results.

Before Webb spoke, a dozen supporters milled about on Clarendon Boulevard, near the courthouse, holding signs. Laura Sonnenmark, of the Alexandria section of Fairfax, held a sign that read, "Thanks Jim. We knew you could do it."

She said, "We feel awesome, optimistic -- like we helped the country. To America, Virginia says, 'You're welcome.' "

The several hundred Allen staffers and supporters gathered outside the Carlyle House took the senator's concession hard, with several crying as he spoke in front of the 18th-century building. But most of those interviewed said they agreed with the decision not to pursue a recount.

"For what was best for Virginia and moving forward, he needed to do what he did today," said Anthony Bedell, 38, of Falls Church, who has worked or volunteered for several Allen campaigns. "It's a tough one to swallow, but the senator did the right thing today."

Several supporters commented on the conciliatory tone of Allen's remarks, which included a pledge to assist Webb in his transition. This tone reflected the gracious, congenial manner they have admired in Allen, supporters said. "He had class," said James Glenn, 64, of the Mount Vernon section of Fairfax. "He's a good man."

Staff writer Tim Craig contributed to this report.

Allen Concedes, Gives Senate To Democrats (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And Seth Mclaughlin, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 10, 2006

Virginia Sen. George Allen yesterday conceded defeat to Democrat James H. Webb Jr. in his re-election bid, allowing Democrats to take the reins of the U.S. Senate for the first time in many years.

"In this season, the people of Virginia, who I always call the owners of the government, they have spoken, and I respect their decision," the Republican told supporters gathered in Old Town Alexandria just after calling Mr. Webb to congratulate him.

Mr. Webb unseated Mr. Allen Tuesday by just under 9,000 votes, according to an unofficial count. Mr. Allen, a former governor, noted he is within his legal rights to request a taxpayer-funded recount because the margin is three-tenths of one percent, but declined to do so.

"It is with deep respect for the people of Virginia and to bind factions together for a positive purpose that I do not wish to cause more rancor by protracted litigation, which would, in my judgment, not alter the results," Mr. Allen said, standing next to Virginia's senior Sen. John W. Warner, a Republican.

A few hours later in Arlington, Mr. Webb, a former Republican who served as President Reagan's Navy secretary, pumped his fists in the air in front of thousands of supporters gathered to cheer on the senator-elect at his victory rally.

"I am indebted to you, and I won't forget my loyalties," he said as the crowd pushed to shake his hand and thank him for delivering the Senate to the Democrats.

Mr. Allen's loss -- the third consecutive top office lost by state Republicans -- leaves the Virginia Republican party in disarray.

"George Allen is the patriarch of the modern Republican party in Virginia," said Lt. Gov. William T. Bolling, one of several Republicans jockeying to be the new leader. His win last fall buoyed depressed party loyalists after their candidate Jerry W. Kilgore lost the gubernatorial race to Democrat Timothy M. Kaine.

Now, conservatives can choose to unite behind former leaders with an anti-tax message -- such as James S. Gilmore III, the last Republican chief executive -- or centrists such as Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, who work with the opposing party. Mr. Davis won re-election Tuesday in a changing and growing Northern Virginia district that favored Mr. Webb.

The party has two years to figure out its message before two major elections -- the expected retirement of Mr. Warner from the Senate and the 2009 governor's race.

The soul-searching elevates Mr. Bolling and Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell, each of whom wants to be governor, and Mr. Davis, who is interested in being senator.

Mr. McDonnell, a longtime friend of Mr. Allen, praised him for his work eliminating parole in the 1990s as governor and for bringing jobs to Virginia. He said the concession is "an act of honor, character and putting the needs of his beloved Virginia first, attributes that have defined George Allen throughout his public career."

The anti-tax socially conservative wing of the party has struggled to woo voters in the growing Northern Virginia suburbs, which have voted Democratic in the past three statewide elections.

Mr. Gilmore, who is interested in seeking political office, said Republicans must "control spending" if they want to return to power. "This has been a chronic problem for quite a while," he said.

Mr. Gilmore would not name a new head of the party, saying it is the ideas that matter, not the personality. "The key is what is important to the people of Virginia and the United States. It is not about us, it is about them," he said.

But, the Democrats say Republicans need to realize the state has been changing, starting with Gov. Mark Warner's election in 2001.

"We have a much, much stronger Democratic Party," Mr. Webb said, standing with Mr. Kaine at his victory rally yesterday. "We have a situation in Virginia where Mark Warner began a journey, Tim Kaine has added onto it, we are going to add onto it even more."

Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles E. Schumer, sporting a blue tie and blue suit, asked the crowd what color his clothes were. "Blue!" the crowd shouted.

"We could not have taken the Senate without Jim Webb and his steadfastness," the New York Democrat said.

Mr. Kaine agreed: "It is Virginia that turned the Senate blue."

Specifically, Northern Virginia delivered Mr. Webb his slim victory, a trend Republicans are noting.

"We need to do something different," said Delegate David B. Albo, Fairfax County Republican. "From my standpoint it's not just Allen's loss. If you look at the trend, George got the same numbers Jerry Kilgore got in Northern Virginia. A lot of people think it's Iraq, I think it's that Northern Virginia is not voting for Republicans."

If Mr. Allen finds a way to motivate the region's voters, he might have a political future.

Standing at the finish of a bitter, mudslinging campaign, Mr. Allen took a conciliatory tone and said Virginians haven't seen the last of him.

Mr. Warner introduced Mr. Allen as one of Virginia's "favorite sons" and promised their friendship and working relationship would continue, a hint that the senior senator could coronate Mr. Allen to run for his seat in two years, should he retire.

"We live to fight another day for our vision of America's future," Mr. Allen said to the crowd, which was larger yesterday than some of his last few rallies combined.

Sobbing staffers and sad-faced supporters gathered around as he made his remarks, and cheered when Mr. Allen said, "come January, not as a senator but as an American citizen, you can count on me" to work on the issues he pushed during the campaign, including energy independence and competitiveness.

Many politicians say negative ads were the death knell to Mr. Allen's campaign, and Mr. Webb yesterday called on President Bush to tell members of his party to "stop the politics of divisiveness and character assassinations."

DOJ_NMG_0093615

He also noted Mr. Allen was "gracious" in his phone call and that the two men plan to have lunch next week.

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman attributed Mr. Allen's loss to "missteps in the campaign" and "a tough environment" for Republicans this year.

He also said Mr. Allen's past success played into his downfall. As governor, he brought many technology companies to Virginia, driving population growth among residents who have been voting Democratic in Northern Virginia.

· Amy Fagan contributed to this report.

After 2 Decades In Ascent, A Stunning Breakdown (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

The George Allen who conceded defeat yesterday in Virginia's nasty U.S. Senate campaign was the one who revitalized Virginia's Republican Party and the one who was considered a front-runner for the White House, with his folksy, football-and-cowboy charm.

Relaxed and smiling, ever gracious, he thanked his campaign staff, talked about his two-decade record of being tough on criminals and reforming schools and finished like the veteran campaigner who won two statewide elections: "Teammates, fellow patriots, stay strong and stand strong for freedom!"

But it was an Allen who was rarely seen on the campaign trail this year.

Instead, the relentlessly cheery politician who was an up-and-comer in the national GOP spent most of the fall during his campaign against challenger James Webb in a defensive crouch, trying to deflect accusations that, down deep, he is a bully or a racist.

Allen began the campaign with a 16-point lead in the polls. As a wildly popular governor and then senator, he was considered a shoo-in for reelection. As Allen visited Iowa and New Hampshire and prepared for a 2008 presidential bid, the conventional wisdom in August was that a stunning victory in the Senate race would position him as the darling of the party.

Then came the now-legendary "macaca moment." He called a Webb volunteer of Indian descent "macaca" and welcomed him to "America and the real world of Virginia." That was followed by his awkward handling of revelations about his Jewish heritage and accusations that he used racial epithets during and after college. He also got caught up in a tide of anti-GOP sentiment that cost Republicans control of the House and the Senate.

"The kind of meltdown that occurred here is a quintessential example about how 24 hours can be a lifetime in politics," said Robert D. Holsworth, director of the Center for Public Policy at Virginia Commonwealth University.

Allen's colleague Sen. John W. Warner (R) is the state party's senior statesman. But it is Allen who has been the face of a new generation of Virginia Republican activists. In his 1993 inaugural address, after overcoming a 34-point deficit to become the state's 67th governor, Allen called the activists his "insurgents."

"George Allen, I think, singularly, turned around the fortunes of the Republican Party in Virginia," said George Mason University political science professor Mark J. Rozell. "He unabashedly reached out to the religious conservatives. Yet, he still had that nice smile, that charisma, that sunny disposition that made him appeal to moderate and independent voters."

Allen rode that appeal first into the Virginia governor's mansion and then into the nation's most exclusive club, the Senate. From there, he hoped it might be a short hop to the White House.

By last December, others thought so, too. In an article in the conservative National Review, editor Richard Lowry wrote that Allen "combines the people skills of Bill Clinton, with the convictions of a Ronald Reagan, with the non-threatening persona of George W. Bush circa 2000, before he became a hate-figure for the left."

Lowry concluded that Allen was a leading contender for the 2008 GOP nomination because he blends "amiability with competitive ruthlessness in a way that makes him, at age 53, one of the nation's top politicians."

Now, Rozell said, "no one talks seriously about George Allen being presidential timber."

Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell (R) issued a statement yesterday calling Allen "the most effective Governor of the modern Virginia era." Lt. Gov. Bill Bolling (R) praised him for efforts "to abolish parole, reform welfare, promote higher academic standards in our public schools; and bring new business, industry and jobs to Virginia."

But Richmond lobbyist Charlie Davis said Allen "lost his way" when he went to the Senate and failed to grasp the state's changing demographics and moderating politics, especially in population-rich Northern Virginia.

"Once he got inside the Beltway, he got absorbed and detached from the state," Davis said. "When he was governor and he was around the state capital, he was with real people every day who were not reluctant to share their feelings. You get to D.C., for some reason he did not realize the landscape here was changing dramatically."

Longtime Virginia Republicans say Allen also turned away from the insiders who had helped him succeed, bringing in a new team, led by campaign manager Dick Wadhams, who had little experience in Virginia.

DOJ_NMG_0093616

It wasn't until September, after the scandals erupted, that Allen brought back his trusted Virginia hands.

G. Paul Nardo, Allen's chief speechwriter when he was governor, said he was sad to see his former boss lose: "I don't think you've heard the last of him."

But Democrats -- and even some of Allen's closest allies -- said yesterday that his defeat should serve as a political red flag that Virginia is no longer the conservative, Republican red state.

"The wrath of Northern Virginia can make Virginia purple," said Gerald E. Connolly (D), chairman of the Fairfax County Board of Supervisors.

At Allen's conciliatory concession speech, several supporters said it was unfortunate that voters had been unable to see more of the same humility from him during the hard-fought campaign.

"I know that on a personal level that was his tone, but how to translate that in the midst of a campaign, we have to learn that," said Brett Berlin, 56, of Alexandria.

Others said they expected, and hoped, that Allen would run again, for Senate in 2008 or governor in 2009. "By being as gracious as he was, he preserves those options," said Howard Lee, 57, of Fairfax County.

Allen also was joined during his concession speech by his daughter, Brooke, who clutched at her side the football Allen often has with him. The senator took the football from his daughter and tossed it to a supporter, who threw it back.

"Final toss. Done," said Allen after making the catch. "See y'all."

Democrats Gain Senate And New Influence (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 9 — Democrats gained control of the Senate on Thursday, giving them a majority in both houses of Congress for the first time since 1994 and increased influence over President Bush's policies at home and abroad, starting with the war in Iraq.

The Democrats picked up the seat they needed to capture the Senate when the Republican incumbent in Virginia, George Allen, conceded to Jim Webb, his Democratic challenger, completing a broad realignment of power in Washington. Including two independents who align themselves with the Democrats, Democrats will have a 51-to-49 advantage in the new Senate.

Within moments of Mr. Allen's announcement, Democrats rallied outside the Capitol to celebrate their victory, cheering and chanting, while their leaders began planning how to proceed after a dozen years in which their only taste of power in Congress was when they controlled the Senate for a period in 2001 and 2002.

"The election's over," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, who will be the new majority leader. "It's time for a change."

Mr. Bush continued adapting to the new political climate by having lunch with Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California, who stands on the cusp of becoming the first woman to serve as speaker of the House. He invited Mr. Reid to join him at breakfast at the White House on Friday.

But even as he was extending courtesies to his new partners, Mr. Bush was demanding action on several contentious measures before the Republican-led Congress disbands next month. The president renominated John R. Bolton to the post as United Nations ambassador and asked Congress to complete work on a bill authorizing domestic surveillance by the National Security Agency, both lightning-rod matters for Democrats.

As Washington was digesting the changed balance of power, there was a sign that the 2008 contest for the presidency had already begun. Tom Vilsack, the Democratic governor of Iowa, announced he was running for president, the first high-profile entrant in an expected parade of presidential hopefuls who will enter the race in coming months.

On the other side of the partisan ledger, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, Ken Mehlman, a close associate of Mr. Bush's political strategist, Karl Rove, said he would step aside.

In Virginia, the margin separating the two Senate candidates was roughly 9,000 votes, or less than one-half of 1 percent of more than 2.3 million votes cast. Under Virginia law, Mr. Allen was entitled to request a recount at state expense, but it was clear from a preliminary review of the ballots that Mr. Allen had little hope of reversing the verdict through recounts or lawsuits.

Senior Republican officials, including a lawyer deeply involved in the 2000 Florida recount battle, counseled Mr. Allen on Wednesday to withdraw rather than fight what would ultimately be a futile battle. After deliberating a day, Mr. Allen decided not to fight.

Mr. Allen said Thursday that he did not want to subject the people of Virginia or the nation to a recount fight that could have lasted until Christmas.

"I do not wish to cause more rancor by protracted litigation that would not, in my opinion, alter the results," Mr. Allen said, speaking on an unseasonably warm mid-autumn day in Alexandria, Va., to a crowd of staffers and supporters, some in tears. "I see no good purpose being served by continuously and needlessly expending money and causing any more personal animosity."

DOJ_NMG_0093617

He congratulated Mr. Webb on his narrow victory and made note of the favorable environment for Democrats this year. "They had the prevailing winds," Mr. Allen said.

Mr. Webb, a novelist, Marine combat veteran and former secretary of the Navy, claimed victory 90 minutes later at a rally in Arlington.

He brandished the sand-colored combat boots he wore throughout the campaign in tribute to his son, a Marine lance corporal serving in Iraq.

"Hoo-ah," shouted several marines in the audience as Mr. Webb started speaking, using the military cheer to show their support.

Mr. Webb, occasionally glancing at a three-by-five card of notes, said Mr. Allen and Senator John W. Warner, a Republican and Virginia's senior senator, had called to congratulate him, but he then spoke bitterly of the campaign, calling on Mr. Bush to denounce slice-and-dice political tactics.

"This was a brutal campaign and in many ways an unnecessarily brutal campaign," Mr. Webb said, "and I think it's hurting the country."

Mr. Webb also said that when he took his seat in the Senate he would continue to agitate for a rapid end to American military involvement in Iraq, even if it put him at odds with fellow Democrats seeking a more gradual withdrawal.

"I am walking into the Senate with the independence to represent the people who have no voice in the corridors of power and I intend to do that," he said.

Senate Democrats celebrated their triumph at a rally on Capitol Hill on Thursday afternoon.

Senator Reid and his two top lieutenants, Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the Democratic whip, and Charles E. Schumer of New York, who ran the Senate campaign committee, appeared with flag-waving staff members.

While Mr. Reid called for bipartisanship and more openness in government, the war in Iraq was the central issue on his mind.

"We believe this country has spoken loudly and clearly," Mr. Reid said.

When Mr. Schumer spoke, his words were punctuated by shouts of "Chuck, Chuck, Chuck."

Also on Thursday, Senator Conrad Burns, Republican of Montana, conceded to Jon Tester, the Democratic State Senate president and an organic farmer, formally bringing to a close a race that members of both parties had declared over a day earlier.

Mr. Burns's phone call caught Mr. Tester on his way to the barbershop to have his distinctive flattop haircut trimmed, according to The Associated Press.

The call was "very cordial, very professional," Mr. Tester said.

Mr. Burns, a three-term senator, said in a news release, "We fought the good fight and we came up just a bit short. We've had a good 18 years, and I am proud of my record."

The new Senate will have 49 Democrats, 49 Republicans and two independents, Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut and Bernard Sanders of Vermont.

Mr. Lieberman and Mr. Sanders will caucus with the Democrats, giving the party effective control, with the right to name committee chairmen and dictate parliamentary rules.

Mr. Bush, who has practiced a muscular brand of partisan combat in the past six years, adopted a more conciliatory tone after his meeting with Ms. Pelosi and the Democratic House whip, Steny Hoyer of Maryland.

"The elections are now behind us, and the congresswoman's party won," Mr. Bush said as he and Vice President Dick Cheney met with the two Democrats. "But the challenges still remain and therefore, we're going to work together to address those challenges in a constructive way."

Ms. Pelosi said, "We've made history. Now we have to make progress."

The president met with his cabinet in the morning and said he had instructed them to provide briefings for Democratic leaders in Congress and new members.

Mr. Bush, knowing that he has only a few weeks left with Republicans in control on Capitol Hill, urged quick action on budget bills, energy legislation and a bill to admit Vietnam to the World Trade Organization. He is to visit Vietnam this month.

But he will face considerable difficulty with other priorities he expressed on Thursday. Mr. Bush said he wanted the Senate to act before the end of the year on his nomination of Robert M. Gates to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld as secretary of defense and of Mr. Bolton, who is serving under a recess appointment, as the permanent representative to the United Nations.

Democrats have balked at the Bolton nomination and are not expected to change their views, although it was not clear that they would have the votes to derail his confirmation while Republicans hold the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0093618

One Republican who was defeated this week, Senator Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, said Thursday he would vote against confirming Mr. Bolton.

Republican recrimination over the Tuesday election wipeout continued another day, with conservatives criticizing Mr. Bush for dumping Mr. Rumsfeld the day after the election and not before, when it might have won some independent votes.

"I was very disappointed," said Newt Gingrich, the former Republican speaker of the House.

"If the president had replaced Rumsfeld two weeks ago, the Republicans would still control the Senate and they would probably have 10 more House members. For the president to have suggested for the last two weeks that there would be no change and then change the day after the election is very disheartening."

Wayne Semprini, chairman of the New Hampshire Republican Party, where two Republican members of Congress lost seats to antiwar Democrats, also said he was unhappy.

"I would have rather seen it announced a month or two months ago," Mr. Semprini said. "It might have made a difference."

Allen Concedes Defeat, Sealing Transfer Of Senate (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — Virginia Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) conceded today, putting the Senate in Democratic hands for the first time since 2003 and giving the Democrats a sweep of both houses — a seismic shift in the Washington political climate .

Montana Republican Sen. Conrad Burns conceded earlier today in his reelection bid after his Democratic challenger, Jon Tester, claimed victory Wednesday.

Coupled with Allen's defeat, those Senate victories give the party a 51-49 Senate majority, counting two independents who are expected to caucus with the Democrats.

In conceding to Democrat Jim Webb, Allen said a recount would only increase the acrimony that has recently characterized the political landscape.

"I do not wish to cause more rancor by protracted litigation which would, in my judgment, not … alter the results," he said. "I see no good purpose being served by continuously and needlessly expending money and causing any more personal animosity."

Noting that the results were close, Allen urged supporters to stay strong. "Sometimes winds, political or otherwise, can blow the leaves off branches and even break limbs," he said. "But a deep-rooted tree will stand, stay standing. It'll regrow in the next season."

Within hours, Webb responded, saying that he and Allen plan to have lunch next week to ensure a smooth transition. Allen called on President Bush to "publicly denounce campaign tactics that have divided us," noting the midterms have seen "an unnecessarily brutal campaign."

Meanwhile, Bush met today at the White House with House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and Rep. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), appealing for bipartisanship in the next two years.

"All three of us recognize that when you win, you have a responsibility to do the best you can for the country," Bush said, calling the conversation "constructive and very friendly."

For her part, Pelosi said the meeting was "very productive" and said both sides had extended "the hand of friendship, of partnership." But in a subtle moment, she said she looked forward to working "in a confidence-building way" to bridge differences.

"We've made history," she said. "Now we have to make progress."

Senate Democrats held a rally this afternoon to claim the mantle of leadership in the upper chamber, shortly after Allen conceded his race to Webb.

Earlier, Bush met with his Cabinet and instructed them to brief key members of Congress on issues within their agencies. Conceding that many voters embraced Democrats out of frustration over the war in Iraq, Bush said he was "open to any idea or suggestion that will help us achieve our goals of defeating the terrorists and ensuring that Iraq's democratic government succeeds."

Control of both congressional chambers would give Democrats a powerful platform to advance their agenda. And for the first time during Bush's presidency, Democrats could make the legislative branch a meaningful counterweight to the White House.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada is poised to join Pelosi at the forefront of a newly energized national Democratic Party when the new Congress convenes in January. Both the Democrats and Republicans plan to select their new leaders in caucus meetings next week.

DOJ_NMG_0093619

The GOP had grabbed control of the Senate and the House with its landslide win in the 1994 midterm election. Republicans have held the House since then; Democrats regained a Senate majority for about 18 months during Bush's first term, but lost it in the 2002 election.

Webb and Tester declared victory Wednesday. Their wins completed a strong showing by Democrats that seemed unlikely even to many of the party's leaders. Although most were confident they would take the House, fewer believed the Senate was within reach.

Reid was quick to characterize the results as a mandate for sweeping change.

"The days of the do-nothing Congress are over," he said. "From changing course in Iraq to raising the minimum wage to fixing the healthcare crisis to making this country energy-independent, we're ready to get to work."

Meanwhile, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow took a lot of questions about why the president answered elusively when asked a few days before the election whether Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would continue to serve.

Snow explained that Bush did not want to create a "political football." The idea, said Snow, was to send "an important signal to Capitol Hill, to the government of Iraq, to our military forces, and also to the terrorists that you can't jerk the president around on the basis of politics, period."

johanna.neuman@latimes.com

Times staff writer Janet Hook contributed to this report.

Webb Gives Thanks Early; Allen Aides Still Stunned (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

Virginia's U.S. senator-elect spent the day after clinching his victory by thanking his staff and beginning the process of making the transition from first-time candidate to freshman lawmaker.

The Democrat announced the addition of former state senator Leslie L. Byrne to his transition team, along with a lawyer from Abingdon. Byrne, also a former congresswoman from Fairfax, will help him set up his office, his spokeswoman said.

"He's tying up some loose ends from the campaign, thanking people, talking to people around the state who supported him," said Webb's campaign spokeswoman, Kristian Denny Todd. "He's working with staff to wrap up the campaign side of things."

Webb will take office when the 110th Congress begins its two-year session in January.

Since claiming victory Tuesday night, Webb has received several calls from his future colleagues, Todd said, including Arizona Sen. John McCain and Virginia Sen. John W. Warner, both Republicans.

As a first-time elected official, Webb also started receiving unsolicited advice from seasoned politicians.

State Del. L. Scott Lingamfelter (R-Prince William) said Webb's biggest challenge is likely to be his inexperience. Lingamfelter likened it to his own first year in the state legislature, when, he now admits, he was too eager to push controversial bills.

"Newly-electeds do come in sometimes with an inflated sense of their mandate," he said. "I didn't know much when I showed up, either. He certainly has the intellect to pick up on it."

Todd said Webb is planning a statewide "thank you" tour before the end of the year, but the trip's timing and details have not been determined. Next week, she said, Webb will attend a two-day Senate orientation.

She said Webb and his wife, Hong, who is pregnant, are also planning to take some time to prepare for the arrival of their child in early December.

In his speech to supporters Thursday, Webb said he had agreed to have lunch next week with Republican Sen. George Allen. Todd said that a time and place have not been determined and that Webb is waiting to hear from Allen.

"Jim is perfectly ready to schedule that when it fits into Senator Allen's schedule," she said.

But she said staff members for Allen and Webb will talk soon about how to transfer information about constituent concerns and other information to the Democrat.

Aides to Allen said they were stunned by the loss, despite knowing for weeks that the race against Webb was very close. Members of Allen's Senate staff, many of whom are young, cried Thursday when they found out he had decided not to seek a recount of the ballots.

Across the state, political observers began getting used to the idea that Allen would no longer be a Virginia senator come January.

"I'm not sure you write an obituary yet," Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) said Thursday. "This is a loss, but he could still come back and be governor again. He got caught up in a bad year, and it was a tough campaign."

DOJ_NMG_0093620

Del. Brian J. Moran (D-Alexandria), who is contemplating his own bid for governor in 2009, said he was surprised that Allen's usually successful kind of politics did not carry the day.

"What always made George Allen attractive was his independence," Moran said. "Over the last six years, he was merely a rubber stamp for the administration. He lost his appeal."

Another Layer Of Winners And Losers (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

Some of the losers to emerge from the midterm elections on Tuesday were easy to spot, particularly the Republicans who were defeated.

But there were other, low-profile winners and losers along the way: the professionals who rode to victory or defeat on strategies they had created and put into place. And as the results settle in, the game of scoring their performance is under way.

The most spectacular defeat was that of Senator George Allen of Virginia, who won the prize for most breathtaking downfall, not only losing his Senate seat to help hand power of the entire body to the Democrats, but also tarnishing a once-golden reputation in under three months flat.

Less obvious but no less real was the damage to Mr. Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, a strategist once celebrated as the "next Karl Rove."

Considered a sharp and sometimes hard-nosed operative — he engineered the defeat of Tom Daschle of South Dakota, then the Senate Democratic leader, in 2004 — Mr. Wadhams had been snapped up by the fledgling Allen presidential campaign to begin running it next year. After failing to contain the damage of a single "macaca" incident, Mr. Wadhams has suffered a tarnishing of his image in Republican circles.

Another adviser to emerge somewhat tainted is Scott Howell, Mr. Allen's media strategist. In addition to consulting for several losing candidates, Mr. Howell made the advertisement in the Tennessee Senate race featuring a blond woman suggestively asking the Democratic candidate, Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., to call her.

While some strategists believe that the spot worked — the Republican, Bob Corker, won — several Republicans distanced themselves from the tactic, which Democrats denounced as race-baiting.

At a slightly more visible level, strategists agreed that the chief Democratic winners were Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York and Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the top two engineers of the Democratic takeover of Congress.

"Rahm and Chuck are given great credit," said Representative Rosa DeLauro, Democrat of Connecticut and an Emanuel ally.

The jury is still out on Howard Dean, the Democratic National Committee chairman. Mr. Dean quarreled with Mr. Schumer and Mr. Emanuel, the heads of the Senate and House campaign committees respectively, over where to spend money, although they settled some of their differences in the end.

Mr. Emanuel, in particular, pushed hard to save money for "sneak attacks" in about a half-dozen districts in the last four days.

Mr. Dean, on the other hand, argued that rebuilding the Democratic Party by spreading money through all 50 states, including those that had not voted for Democratic candidates for many years, would have the greatest effect. While he cannot claim credit for any specific victories, his efforts may have broadly helped Democrats pick up seats in some Republican strongholds.

With rumblings of a movement to draft Mr. Ford to replace Mr. Dean at the national committee, several Democrats privately said Mr. Emanuel was winning the power struggle.

"It's pretty clear that the committees work and the D.N.C. works, but they don't work together," said James Carville, the Democratic strategist. "And now we're getting ready to gear up in a presidential year, and I think Harold Ford would be a great chairman."

Karen Finney, a spokeswoman for the D.N.C., responded by saying, "After President Bush and the Republicans have admitted to a thumping, why is it that the only one complaining on the Democratic side is James Carville, who today, in addition to trashing Howard Dean, praised the R.N.C., the outfit that brought us the racist ad that defeated Harold Ford, James's supposed candidate for chair?"

Ms. Finney was referring to a comment volunteered by Mr. Carville on Thursday that the Republican National Committee "did a better job than the D.N.C. this year."

Mr. Ford is not without his own problems, however, having lost his Senate race.

On the Republican side, Ken Mehlman emerged as less of a loser than many had predicted the day after the elections, despite the drubbing his party took. Although as chairman of the Republican National Committee Mr. Mehlman led — and lost — the charge to retain control of Congress, he is credited with pushing candidates hard and performing as well as possible in a hostile climate.

DOJ_NMG_0093621

Republicans generally said they did not blame him for the disastrous midterms; Mr. Carville said the losses should be pinned “95 percent on President Bush and 5 percent on Liddy Dole.”

He was referring to Senator Elizabeth Dole, Republican of North Carolina, who as chairwoman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee drew widespread criticism as having failed to recruit magnetic candidates and raise enough money. Mrs. Dole’s appearances on weekend news shows were occasionally painful, and, in the end, Republicans lost under her watch.

And then there was Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts.

Mr. Kerry, already tarnished by his failed presidential campaign in 2004, came out of the current season looking the worse for wear, after botching a joke that Republicans portrayed as having insulted American troops in Iraq.

“He’s a guy who was running second for the nomination,” said Stuart Stevens, a Republican consultant. “Now I don’t think a Democrat would invite him to a letter opening.”

Burns Concedes Montana Race To Democrat (AP-Y)

By Matt Gouras, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

U.S. Sen. Conrad Burns conceded defeat to Jon Tester on Thursday, acknowledging that a tight election had gone to the Democrats' favor, Burns' campaign told The Associated Press.

Burns, a three-term senator whose campaign was troubled by verbal gaffes and voter discontent, congratulated Tester, a farmer and state legislator.

"I stand ready to help as Montana transitions to a new United States Senator," Burns said in a statement provided to the AP. "We fought the good fight and we came up just a bit short. We've had a good 18 years and I am proud of my record."

Burns, 71, did not plan any public appearances Thursday, his campaign said.

He also didn't say what he plans to do now, though he indicated he was looking forward to taking some time off. "I hope there is still a good-sized buck out there, because I am going hunting," he said.

Burns called Tester and conceded in a friendly and cordial conversation at about 11 a.m, said Tester spokesman Matt McKenna.

"This was a hard fought campaign and I think that Montana is glad it is in their rear view mirror and Jon tester is ready to move forward," McKenna said.

Tester, who was busy with chores Thursday, picking up a barrel of oil in Great Falls on the way to his grain farm in Big Sandy, ran as an outsider to the Washington culture — the same theme Burns had used nearly two decades earlier.

"It is absolutely, critically important that we change the direction of the country," Tester, 50, said Wednesday after declaring victory by a thin margin of about 3,400 votes.

Tester said he wanted to empower the middle class, working families, small businesses and family farms and ranches — "the people who have made this country so great."

"It really is time to put politics aside," he said. "We've got many, many issues that are facing this great state and this country, both in foreign policy and domestic policy. We've talked about them for the last 18 months. Now is the time to roll up our sleeves and get some things done."

Tester's win — and fellow Democrat Jim Webb's close victory in Virginia — gave the Democrats the 51 Senate seats they need to control the chamber.

With 100 percent of precincts reporting, Tester had 198,302 votes, or 49.1 percent, to Burns' 194,904 votes, or 48.3 percent.

Together, the two campaigns spent more than $12 million.

Burns had not helped his own cause, with gaffes that included cursing at a firefighting crew in a state that sees thousands of acres burned in wildfires every summer. He was first elected in 1988 as a folksy, backslapping outsider, but this year, he was joined on the campaign trail by President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney.

Tester resisted help from the national party during his campaign.

When Burns tried to paint Tester as a liberal who wants to raise taxes and "cut and run" from Iraq, the liberal tag didn't seem to stick to the man who sports scuffed cowboy boots and a flattop haircut.

Tester portrayed himself as a Western moderate who owns guns, opposes gay marriage and has a libertarian's suspicion of the anti-terrorism Patriot Act.

DOJ_NMG_0093622

He hammered Burns over his ties to Abramoff. Burns was a top recipient of campaign contributions from Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in January to corruption. Burns has since returned or donated to charity about $150,000 he receive that was connected to Abramoff. He maintains he did nothing wrong and was not influenced by the lobbyist.

Ballot-counting problems delayed results of the race by about seven hours, keeping the nation in suspense. Duane Winslow, election administrator for Montana's most populous area, Yellowstone County, said he made a computer error while tabulating absentee ballots that required officials to start the process over.

___

Associated Press reporter Mary Clare Jalonick contributed to this

Rural Montana Farmer Is Going To Washington (LAT)

By Sam Howe Verhovek, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

Locals are excited that one of their own is joining the Senate. They just aren't sure Jon Tester can help save towns like theirs.

BIG SANDY, MONT. — Big Sandy has had its moments in the sun.

Local boy Jeff Ament made good a few years ago as the bassist for Pearl Jam. The town's "chief claim to worldwide fame," as resident historian Keith Edwards puts it, is the Big Bud 16V-747, a custom-made behemoth that the Guinness Book of World Records lists as the largest tractor on Earth.

But in recent years, the story in Big Sandy, as in countless other farm towns across the Great Plains, has been one of loss.

So this week's win by Jon Tester — a wheat and lentil farmer who also has done stints here as a custom butcher, soil conservation board member, high school basketball referee and music teacher at Big Sandy Elementary School — was huge.

The 50-year-old Democrat eked out a win over Republican Sen. Conrad Burns in Tuesday's midterm election and is headed to Washington come January.

Tester's Western roots are genuine and about as deep as can be: He has never lived anyplace other than the family farm, which his grandparents homesteaded here in 1916.

"No question about it: This is a big deal," said Conrad Heimbigner, manager of Big Sky Auto & Ag. "I don't care if you're Democrat or Republican … this is pretty cool that we have a United States senator from Big Sandy."

In an interview, Tester agreed that his hometown could use some good news.

"It's very typical of rural Montana," the senator-to-be said. "It's struggling to survive."

Residents describe local history by ticking off what's gone: two of the three banks, the "picture show," also known as a movie theater; several restaurants and two-thirds of the student population, which peaked back in 1920. Big Sandy High School is so small that the football team plays the eight-man version, as many Plains towns do.

"Fewer farmers, fewer kids," said Edwards, 88, a retired wheat farmer, founder of the Big Sandy Historical Museum and a onetime cattle-drive partner of Tester's late father, Dave.

Some here are hoping Tester — who sports a trademark flat-top — can draw attention to the plight of dying farm towns, and perhaps even generate some solutions.

Others are not so sure.

"It's a hoot, but I'm not sure it's going to make any darn difference in the long run," said Charlie Briggs, a retired miner who was nursing a beer at lunchtime the other day at the Redneck Club & Casino, a Main Street hangout. "I'm not sure that anything can really help turn this town around."

Big Sandy, a town of about 700 in the north-central part of the state, is ringed by grain silos. It takes its name from a nearby creek, which the Blackfeet called Un-es-putcha-eka; white settlers opted for the "Big Sandy" translation offered by an Indian guide.

It is classic amber-waves-of-grain, Big Sky country — spectacularly beautiful on a blue-sky day and tremendously foreboding when the sky is shades of gray and a chill, dusty wind blows.

In the early part of the last century, people like Tester's grandparents couldn't get to places like Big Sandy fast enough. For a time, until the late 1920s, the free land, plentiful rain and abundant harvests made for a sort of paradise.

But then came the dust bowl, and many settlers left in droves.

"Forty miles from water and 40 miles from wood, now I'm leaving Montana for good," read a sign, now famous, that was left behind by a member of the Big Sandy exodus.

Still, many folks held on and made a go of it.

Tester, who is 6 feet tall and pushing 300 pounds, farms organically on his 1,800-acre spread here — and he clearly loves it.

DOJ_NMG_0093623

"I do a lot of my best thinking right here," he told a visitor over the summer, on the last day of the harvest.

More than one person here compares him to Jimmy Stewart in the famous 1939 film "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington."

But, said Edwards, "I wouldn't carry that analogy too far. I don't think it's realistic to idealize the farmer these days. He's not a straw-chewer; he's a businessman. He's out to get the last buck, even out of the federal government," which gives farmers subsidies.

"Besides, you don't get to be the president of the Montana state Senate by sitting around on your butt," Edwards added. Tester ran for state senator eight years ago and quickly rose up the ranks in Helena, the state capital.

Several people laughed when asked whether they would have thought 20 years ago that the burly butcher cutting up their cow would wind up in the U.S. Senate. But, they said, they detected clues to Tester's ever-rising ambitions over the years.

"I could tell Jon was getting real smart about politics when he decided to stop refereeing basketball games with me several years ago," said Verlin Reichelt, 56, a neighbor and fellow farmer.

"I asked him why, and he laughed and he said: 'Verlin, I'm a politician now. And no matter what you do, if you're a referee at a high school basketball game, that's going to lose you some votes. So I'm out.' "

sam.verhovek@latimes.com

Lawmakers Who Won't Be Missed (WP)

By Colbert I. King

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

"Conrad, how can you live back there [in Washington] with all those niggers?" When asked how he had responded, Sen. Burns is reported to have . . . said with a chuckle that he told the rancher that it was 'a hell of a challenge.' "

-- The Washington Post, Oct. 22, 1994

Election night in the nation's capital was a pretty tame affair, given that most of the important local races were decided in the September primary. But for some of us who live in the District, the real action on election night took place far beyond city limits.

My attention, for example, was focused on Big Sky Country, where three-term Republican Sen. Conrad Burns was locking horns with the president of the Montana Senate, Jon Tester. It wasn't until late Wednesday morning that we received the good news that Burns had been defeated. It was worth the wait.

Burns lost his seat, in part, because of his ties to corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff. But Burns hit rock bottom with some of us 12 years ago when we learned about his slur against the District's African American population.

At the time, Burns was the senior Republican on the D.C. appropriations subcommittee. A former livestock auctioneer and radio announcer, Burns liked to affect a folksy, aw-shucks manner. A Montana newspaper, the Bozeman Daily Chronicle, reported that during a campaign visit with the paper's editors, Burns told an anecdote about an elderly Montana rancher who wanted to know how he could stand living in the nation's capital "with all those niggers." Asked how he responded, Burns reportedly said he told the man it was "a hell of a challenge."

After Montanans raised a stink about the slur, making it clear they didn't think it was as funny as the senator did, Burns apologized.

Thanks to the wisdom of the people of Montana, Conrad Burns no longer is forced to bear the burden of living among those of us of color. The "hell of a challenge" that Burns faced for lo these many years has ended, and with it his career as a United States senator. To which I shout: "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow."

Grace was also flowing back east in North Carolina on election night. Republican Rep. Charles Taylor lost his job to Democratic challenger Heath Shuler, who once labored for our hometown National Football League team -- a fact better left undiscussed.

Taylor was defeated for reasons having little to do with his former service as chairman of the House D.C. appropriations subcommittee. But, again, we in the District had reason to follow the North Carolina vote count as closely as we watched the D.C. returns.

I'd like to believe that Taylor's loss was retributive justice for the dastardly way he treated the District when he was the chief House overseer of the city's budget.

Who can forget his Jan. 9, 1998, "Dear Colleague" letter to members of the House of Representatives? Emblazoned in large, bold type near the top of the page was this announcement: "The average D.C. student can't read this letter."

It was a Taylor taunt hurled at our public school system and at students' math and reading test scores.

This was the same barbed-tongued Charles Taylor who:

--Directed the city to immediately close the University of the District of Columbia's law school and send the students to other schools. (He didn't succeed.)

DOJ_NMG_0093624

--Used to tell us how many cops should patrol the streets and how pay raises should be awarded.

--Had his meat-ax approach to the District's budget, which then-financial control board chairman Andrew Brimmer said tore at the "very fundamental operations of government," overruled by his own House Republican leadership.

A few years ago, Rep. John Hostettler (R-Ind.) introduced legislation to overturn a D.C. Human Rights Office ruling that ordered the Boy Scouts of America to pay two gay Eagle Scout troop leaders $50,000 in damages for discrimination. Mr. Hostettler won't do that sort of thing anymore. His constituents told him to take a hike on Tuesday.

The Democratic takeover of Congress offers the prospect of relief from amendments, or riders, that House Republicans loved to attach to the D.C. budget.

Under Republican rule, Congress banned the District from spending locally raised tax dollars on free needle-exchange programs to curb the spread of HIV -- even though local jurisdictions in half the states provide such services. A Republican Congress also extended a federal restriction on abortion funding to all federal and local money spent in the District. And it adopted a rider that prevented the city from using its own money to lobby for voting representation in Congress. One Republican-led appropriations subcommittee even added a provision to the city budget imposing federal penalties on D.C. children caught smoking.

Under House GOP rule, efforts were made to repeal the District's law prohibiting residents from possessing firearms. Another Republican measure would have allowed residents, except for convicted felons, to own handguns and keep them in their homes. The city was spared that fate only because the House ended up scrapping the national gun bill to which those amendments would have been attached.

Tuesday night's election hardly catapulted the District to the Promised Land. But the regaining of Congress by Democrats may have brought the city some relief from odious Republican budget riders and a welcome respite from the District-bashing in vogue in certain quarters on Capitol Hill for the past 12 years.

Just Call Him Joe Democrat (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

Sen. Joe Lieberman, who won reelection as an independent, has a message for his Senate colleagues in the next Congress: Call me a Democrat.

The three-term Connecticut lawmaker defied party leaders when he launched his independent bid after losing to Ned Lamont in the Democratic primary. During the campaign, he vowed to be an "independent-minded Democrat" if he were reelected.

At a postelection news conference, Lieberman said he was reassured by Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid that he would retain his seniority in the new Senate.

Democrats Win Bigger Share Of Religious Vote (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

As the results of the midterm elections sank in this week, religious leaders across the ideological spectrum found something they could agree on: The "God gap" in American politics has narrowed substantially.

Religious liberals contended that a concerted effort by Democrats since 2004 to appeal to people of faith had worked minor wonders, if not electoral miracles, in races across the country.

Religious conservatives disagreed, arguing that the Republican Party lost religious voters rather than the Democrats winning them.

Either way, the national exit polls told a dramatic story of changing views in the pews: Democrats recaptured the Catholic vote they had lost two years ago. They sliced the GOP's advantage among weekly churchgoers to 12 percentage points, down from 18 points in 2004 congressional races and 22 points in the 2004 presidential contest. Democrats even siphoned off a portion of the Republican Party's most loyal base, white evangelical Protestants.

"The God gap definitely didn't disappear, but it did narrow. And it narrowed in part because evangelical voters had major questions about the direction of the country," argued Democratic pollster Celinda Lake.

In House races in 2004, 74 percent of white evangelicals voted for Republicans and 25 percent for Democrats, a 49-point spread, according to exit polls. This year, Republicans received 70 percent of the white evangelical vote and Democrats got 28 percent, a 42-point spread.

Democratic activists joyfully compared the overall seven-point shift in the evangelical vote to the inroads that President Bush made in a core Democratic constituency -- African Americans -- in battleground states in 2004. "Boy, have we come a long way since 2004," said Mara Vanderslice, who was director of religious outreach for Sen. John F. Kerry's presidential campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0093625

"We still have a long way to go, but what this election showed is that Democrats can begin to compete for the evangelical vote. Moving seven points within a community that large can absolutely swing tight races," she said.

Evangelical leaders blamed corruption and big spending by Congress -- rather than the party's positions on social issues such as same-sex marriage -- for the GOP's defeat.

Evangelical Christians are "fed up with the Republican leadership, particularly in the House," said the Rev. Richard Land, head of the public policy arm of the 16 million-member Southern Baptist Convention. "They're disgusted that Republicans came to Washington and failed to behave any better than Democrats once they got their snouts in the trough."

Roberta Combs, chairman of the Christian Coalition, said responsibility for the GOP's loss of the House and Senate "goes right back to the leadership, the corruption among Republicans."

And James Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family, issued a statement saying that "many of the Values Voters of '04 simply stayed at home this year" because the Republican Party has "consistently ignored the constituency that put them in power."

In fact, white evangelical Protestants turned out this week as heavily as they did in 2004, making up roughly 24 percent of the electorate both times. "This is a solidly Republican voting bloc that there was reason to believe might stay home. Given the polling before the election, the amazing thing was that the Democratic swing wasn't bigger," said John C. Green, a senior fellow at the nonpartisan Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life.

The finger-pointing came as conservative Christians absorbed the gravity of their losses, including the defeat of congressional standard-bearers such as Rep. John N. Hostettler (R-Ind.), Rep. Jim Ryun (R-Kan.) and Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.).

In addition, voters in South Dakota overturned the nation's tightest abortion ban. In Missouri, they passed a measure supporting stem cell research. In Kansas, they defeated Phill Kline, an attorney general who had aggressively investigated abortion clinics.

Seven states passed constitutional amendments barring same-sex marriage, but by much tighter margins than in the 11 states that adopted similar measures two years ago. In Arizona this week, voters rejected a marriage amendment, the first time gay rights advocates have beaten such an initiative anywhere in the country.

In the view of religious liberals, the results showed that wedge issues have lost some power.

"People really care about right and wrong more than right and left, and their antennae were up about corruption and the war in Iraq and kitchen-table moral issues -- health care and poverty," said Alexia Kelley, executive director of Catholics in Alliance for the Common Good, a group that set out this year to challenge the religious right's hold on moral issues.

Kelley noted that Democrats received the support of 55 percent of Catholic voters and Republicans got 44 percent, a sharp reversal from 2004, when the GOP won a narrow majority of the Catholic vote in congressional races.

In the states where Democrats fielded candidates who were able to speak credibly about their faith, they made larger gains, according to Vanderslice, who served as a consultant to half a dozen Democratic candidates. Among her clients was Ted Strickland, a minister who won 58 percent of the Catholic vote and 51 percent of the white evangelical vote in the Ohio governor's race against Ken Blackwell, a Republican who has championed conservative Christian causes.

As they contemplated the results, religious conservatives anticipated attacks by business interests and fiscal conservatives within the GOP who think the party should focus on budget deficits and Iraq -- and put less emphasis on culture-war issues such as opposing embryonic stem cell research and keeping Terri Schiavo on life support.

David Barton, head of WallBuilders, a Texas-based evangelical group, predicted that fiscal conservatives would cite California's Republican governor, Arnold Schwarzenegger, as a model.

"They will say, 'Schwarzenegger won and won big; the guys that lost are the social conservatives -- Hostettler, Ryun.' And so there's going to be a push within the Republican caucus to move further away from social conservatives," Barton said.

Even before the election, former House majority leader Richard K. Armey (R-Tex.) called Dobson a "bully" who diverted the GOP from its core mission as the party of small government. On Wednesday, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said the GOP needs to become "a lot more progressive and a lot less ideological."

Despite the GOP's losses, conservative religious leaders gave no indication they plan to engage in the kind of introspection and repositioning that religious liberals did two years ago. And despite their anger at congressional Republicans, they did not suggest that they were about to abandon the GOP.

"Even though a lot of Democratic candidates talked about faith, and even though a lot of them are devout people who hold similar values, they are part of a party that is liberal," said Janice Shaw Crouse, director of Concerned Women for America's Beverly LaHaye Institute, a conservative Christian think tank. "So the only hope social conservatives really have is the Republican Party."

DOJ_NMG_0093626

The Architect Speaks (TIME)

By Mike Allen

Time.com, November 10, 2006

At the White House senior staff meeting in the Roosevelt Room at 7:30 a.m. on Wednesday, Chief of Staff Josh Bolten thanked Karl Rove for his hard work in the elections, and the group around the big table burst into spontaneous applause. It was a much-needed moment of cheer for Rove, the President's chief strategist, after Republicans lost the House and were headed toward the same fate in the Senate in midterm congressional elections that turned into a blue rip tide of voter ire.

"The profile of corruption in the exit polls was bigger than I'd expected," Rove tells TIME. "Abramoff, lobbying, Foley and Haggard [the disgraced evangelical leader] added to the general distaste that people have for all things Washington, and it just reached critical mass."

Exit polls showed heavy discontent with the course of the war, and Bush announced the departure of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld the next day. But Rove took comfort in results of the Connecticut Senate race between the anti-war Democratic nominee, Ned Lamont, and Sen. Joseph Lieberman, who ran as an independent after losing the Democratic primary over his support for the war. "Iraq mattered," Rove says. "But it was more frustration than it was an explicit call for withdrawal. If this was a get-out-now call for withdrawal, then Lamont would not have been beaten by Lieberman. Iraq does play a role, but not the critical, central role."

And he does not believe his data let him down. "My job is not to be a prognosticator," he said. "My job is not to go out there and wring my hands and say, 'We're going to lose.' I'm looking at the data and seeing if I can figure out, Where can we be? I told the President, 'I don't know where this is going to end up. But I see our way clear to Republican control.' "

Rove, who is Deputy Chief of Staff and Senior Adviser to the President, had long been warning in speeches that Democrats suffered defeat in 1994 after ossified thinking and an entitlement mentality took over the party: "What I was trying to say was: What happened to them could happen to us," he told TIME.

White House Counselor Dan Bartlett said Bush is "deeply appreciative for the time and effort put in by Karl, and for all the political team's effort." Bartlett pointed to the President's statement at his day-after news conference that as the head of the Republican Party, he shares a large part of the responsibility. "He's not the one that's going to sit there and point fingers at others," Bartlett said.

Despite this week's repudiation of the GOP, Rove said he believes the party can still achieve a long-term majority. "I see this as much more of a transient, passing thing," he said. "The Republican Party remains at its core a small-government, low-tax, limit-spending, traditional-values, strong-defense party. I see the power of the ideas, even in a tough year." He added that he has "fundamental confidence in the power of the underlying agenda of this President," and cited fighting the war on terror, entitlement reform, energy, tax cuts, immigration reform, No Child Left Behind reauthorization, democracy agenda in the Middle East, reducing trade barriers, spending restraint and legal reform.

Rove is famous for his political statistics, and his team has come up with an array of figures to contend that the Republicans' loss of 29 seats in the House and six in the Senate is not so out of whack with the historic norms. In all sixth year midterms, the President's party has lost an average of 29 House seats and 3 Senate seats, according to these figures. In all sixth-year midterms since World War II, the loss was an average of 31 House and 6 Senate seats. And in all wartime midterms since 1860, the average loss was 32 House and 5 Senate seat.

The Republican get-out-the-vote program Rove helped invent precluded even deeper losses, he says. "People were talking 35, 40 or more and it didn't happen," he said. "There were a number of elections which were supposed to be close and ended up not being close."

The Republican National Committee has been pointing out that a small shift in votes would have made a big difference. A shift of 77,611 votes would have given Republicans control of the House, according to Bush's political team. And a shift of 2,847 votes in Montana, or 7,217 votes in Virginia, or 41,537 votes in Missouri would have given a Republicans control of the Senate. In addition, the party has calculated that the winner received 51 percent or less in 35 contests, and that 23 races were decided by two percentage points or fewer, 18 races were decided by fewer than 5,000 votes, 15 races were decided by fewer than 4,000 votes, 10 races were decided by fewer than 3,000 votes, eight were decided by fewer than 2,000 votes and five races were decided by fewer than 1,000 votes.

Rove is an enthusiastic historian, but even he has trouble coming up with a parallel for this wild week. "We may look back and see this as a unique expression," he said. Republicans can only hope.

R.I. Senator May Leave Republican Party (AP-Y)

By Michelle R. Smith, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0093627

AP, November 10, 2006

Two days after losing a bid for a second term, Sen. Lincoln Chafee said he was unsure whether he would remain a Republican.

Chafee lost to Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse in a race seen as a referendum on President Bush and the GOP. On Thursday, he was asked whether he would stick with the Republican Party or become an independent or Democrat.

"I haven't made any decisions. I just haven't even thought about where my place is," Chafee said at a news conference. When pressed on whether his comments indicated he might leave the GOP, he replied: "That's fair."

Chafee, 53, is a lifelong Republican who has represented Rhode Island for seven years. His father held the same seat for 23 years before that.

He is the most liberal Republican in the Senate and was the sole Senate Republican to vote against the war in Iraq. But that was not enough to prevail against Whitehouse, who shared many of Chafee's views but was a Democrat in a heavily Democratic state.

Chafee said he has not decided what to do after leaving office, but he hoped to stay involved in public life. He said his loss may have helped the country by switching control of Congress.

"The people have spoken all across America. They want the Democrats and Republicans to work together," he said. "I think the president now is going to have to talk to the Democrats. I think that's going to be good for America."

Chafee said he waged a lonely campaign to bring the party to the middle. He described attending weekly lunches with fellow GOP senators and standing up to argue his point of view, often alone.

"There were times walking into my caucus room where it wasn't fun," he said, adding that he stayed with the GOP largely because it helped him bring federal dollars home to Rhode Island.

Republicans Are Ahead In Remaining House Races (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

See updates to Washington Wire each weekday at www.washwire.com1.

REPUBLICANS LEAD in most House races that remain undecided.

Narrow margins for some candidates, such as Buchanan in Florida and incumbent Rep. Hayes in North Carolina, make recounts likely. But "it's very unusual for recounts to alter races," says Carl Forti of House Republican campaign committee, which hopes to keep Democratic gains below 30 seats.

Women gain in Congress. Female senators number 16 with wins by Klobuchar in Minnesota and McCaskill in Missouri. House increase hinges partly on undecided races in Washington, where Darcy Burner hopes to unseat Rep. Reichert.

Three undecided races feature female opponents, including Republican Rep. Wilson vs. Patricia Madrid in New Mexico.

GINGRICH EMERGES as top conservative prospect for Republican 2008 field.

Ebbing fortunes of Santorum, Allen and Frist leave opening for architect of Republicans' 1994 sweep. Gingrich faults Bush for "very disturbing" post-election news conference, saying earlier replacement of Rumsfeld might have saved control of the Senate and 10 House seats.

"He can win some primaries," says Bush ad-maker Mark McKinnon, now with 2008 front-runner McCain. Anti-Washington mood helps departing Arkansas Gov. Huckabee compete with Kansas Sen. Brownback in wooing religious right.

ECONOMIC CONSERVATIVES court incoming Democratic tax chief Rangel.

The American Council on Capital Formation invites Rangel to breakfast next week. Despite campaign attacks labeling the New York Democrat a tax-raising liberal, the council's Mark Bloomfield predicts he'll be "a centrist legislator" who "understands the importance of economic growth."

Democratic and Republican strategists predict Congress will reauthorize the Clinton-era State Children's Health Insurance Program in 2007. Some states have tightened enrollment standards, and in 2005, the number of uninsured children rose for the first time since 1998.

Joseph Antos of American Enterprise Institute says Republicans won't want to look "hard-hearted" on the issue.

TURNOUT RISES to highest midterm election level since 1982. Curtis Gans of American University's Center for the Study of the American Electorate estimates that 40.4% of those eligible to vote did so, up from 39.7% four years ago.

STARTING GUN: Departing Iowa Gov. Vilsack's entry into Democratic presidential race creates early obstacle for 2008 rivals. "What we have to do is win Iowa," says an adviser to former vice presidential nominee Edwards. In 1992, Democrats generally sidestepped Iowa because of favorite son candidacy of Sen. Harkin.

DOJ_NMG_0093628

HOOSIER POWER: Democratic strategist Steve Elmendorf calls Indiana Sen. Bayh "the front-runner" for conservative slot vacated by ex-Virginia Gov. Warner's departure from 2008 field. Bayh touts Democratic pickup of three Indiana House seats; he had also dispatched staffers to help campaigns in Iowa and New Hampshire.

OBAMA COULD cite opposition to Iraq war in a 2008 race, but one potential competitor for that constituency looms. Liberal strategist Bob Borosage says Gore would capture antiwar left "immediately" by entering.

ACTIVISTS SEEKING end to Cuban trade embargo say Democratic control of Congress improves chances. Twelve groups seeking new policy write Rangel and Sen. Baucus, incoming chairman of Senate Finance Committee.

ENVIRONMENTALISTS CLAIM big win with defeat of Rep. Pombo.

As House Resources Committee chairman, Pombo sought to overhaul Endangered Species Act. Green groups poured more than $1 million into the Republican's California district.

Wind-energy consultant Jerry McNerney, once written off, won with 53%. "We have the political strength to...defeat extreme anti-environmental politicians," says Rodger Schlickeisen of the Defenders of Wildlife Action Fund.

Pombo cited the role of "outside groups" in his defeat.

MINOR MEMOS: Blaming "arrogant Republicanism" for losses, one former Bush administration official says "I'm ticked off, too." ... Republican Rep. Tom Cole, seeking support to run House campaign committee for 2008, reminds colleagues, "The most important election is not the last one -- it's the next one."

RNC Asks Steele To Replace Mehlman (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 10, 2006

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, whose party just lost both chambers of Congress, will leave his position in January, and the post as party chief has been offered to Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele.

"It is true," Mr. Mehlman told The Washington Times when asked about reports last night that he would resign. "It's something I decided over the summer. No one told me I needed to. In fact, folks wanted me to stay."

Mr. Mehlman said he "told the White House over the summer it was my decision" to leave the RNC post, "win, lose or draw."

Also last night, Republican officials told The Times that Mr. Steele, who lost his bid for the U.S. Senate on Tuesday, has been sought out to succeed Mr. Mehlman as national party chairman. Those Republican officials said Mr. Steele had not made a decision whether to take the post, as of last night.

Other Republican Party officials said some Republican National Committee (RNC) members, including state party chairmen, have mounted a move to have Mr. Steele succeed Mr. Mehlman.

But they said that President Bush's political adviser Karl Rove, who is Mr. Mehlman's mentor, would rather see Mr. Steele serve in the president's Cabinet, perhaps as secretary of Housing and Urban Development. These officials said no one has actually offered Mr. Steele either the RNC post or a Cabinet post.

Steele spokesman Doug Heye said last night that "I don't know of any conversations that Lt. Gov. Steele has had on this topic, but I can tell you that there are many people who have said he would be an ideal candidate, based on the race he ran this year."

"I talked to him very briefly about it today. He has not made any decisions yet about what he will do next. He is still focused on his role as lieutenant governor," Mr. Heye said.

Mr. Steele is one of the most successful and respected black Republicans in the country. He served as the elected Maryland Republican Party chairman before running for lieutenant governor.

The White House, RNC and National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) were pleased with what they called his tough but dignified performance as senatorial candidate in a liberal state that last elected a Republican senator in 1980. The NRSC had enough confidence in him as a candidate that it directed large amounts of money into independent expenditures on behalf of his campaign in the closing days.

Mr. Mehlman also told The Times he will not step down as Republican national chairman until the RNC's annual winter meeting in Washington. He said he also "will do an intensive after-action review" of the campaign.

The outgoing RNC chief was a regional political director for the 2000 Bush presidential nomination and general election campaigns and then was named White House political director after Mr. Bush's election.

Mr. Mehlman managed the successful 2004 Bush re-election campaign and implemented the vaunted "72-hour task force" -- the final days program to get out the vote for Republican candidates using the latest and most sophisticated technology and massive grass-roots, door-to-door volunteer program. That Republican "ace in the hole" failed to materialize in 2006, however.

DOJ_NMG_0093629

After the 2004 election success, he was the choice of Mr. Rove for national party chairman and Mr. Bush let it be known that he agreed. As is traditional when a Republican occupies the White House, the 165-member RNC then elected Mr. Mehlman as chairman at its winter meeting following the 2004 elections.

Earlier yesterday, Mr. Mehlman was asked at a luncheon with reporters whether he would announce his future plans at the RNC. He said he had made a decision, which he would announce at a future time.

He stressed, however, that he had made that decision before the election losses, and the two weren't related.

Asked about talk that he would join a possible presidential bid by former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, Mr. Mehlman said, "I have no plans to do the 2008 primary. I will focus on private sector, the party generally and ultimately on [whoever is] the nominee."

"After seven years of this kind of this [brutal] schedule, I am ready -- and really looking forward to -- the private sector.

"Don't worry," Mr. Mehlman added. "I will remain committed to the cause" of conservatism.

·Jon Ward and Amy Fagan contributed to this report.

Mehlman To Step Down From RNC Post (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, whose party lost both chambers of Congress in the midterm elections, will step down from his post when his two-year term ends in January, GOP officials said Thursday.

The officials spoke on the condition of anonymity because Mehlman had not yet made his intentions public.

Brian Jones, an RNC spokesman, declined to comment beyond saying that an announcement about Mehlman's future with the party would be made in the days ahead.

Democrats won control of the House and Senate on Tuesday by capitalizing on voter frustration with President Bush, the war in Iraq and the scandal-scarred Congress. Democrats also took a majority of governors' posts and gained a decisive edge in state legislatures.

The officials said Mehlman made the decision not to run for a second term more than a month or two ago — well before the election.

During his tenure, Mehlman, 40, traveled extensively to promote the Republican agenda. When he became chairman in January 2005, he said he hoped to tighten the GOP's grip on power in Washington.

"Nothing is permanent in politics," he said then. "The goal is how do you — both in the short term and the long term — do things to make it sustainable?"

Mehlman also said then that he hoped to expand the GOP base and help Bush enact his agenda.

Last year, Mehlman told NAACP members that the Republican Party was wrong for ignoring the black vote for decades and said he hoped the groups could restore their historic bond.

"Some Republicans gave up on winning the African-American vote, looking the other way or trying to benefit politically from racial polarization," Mehlman said at the NAACP convention. "I come here as Republican chairman to tell you we were wrong."

A protege of Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove, Mehlman became RNC chairman after managing Bush's re-election campaign in 2004, when the president won re-election and Republicans expanded their majorities in the House and the Senate.

Before that campaign, he served as White House political director under Rove. In 2000, he served as national field director for Bush's first presidential campaign, charged with coordinating the efforts of GOP leaders in every state.

Previous to that, he worked on Capitol Hill and practiced environmental law in Washington. Mehlman, a Baltimore native, is a graduate of Harvard Law School and Franklin & Marshall College in Lancaster, Pa.

Republican Party Chairman Will Not Seek Another Term (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 9 — The chairman of the Republican National Committee, Ken Mehlman, said Thursday that he would not seek to retain the post when his term expires in January and would return to a job in the private sector.

“This has been a great ride, but at the same time I have a lot of interests in addition to politics,” said Mr. Mehlman, who managed President Bush’s re-election campaign in 2004 and was the White House political director before that.

The decision was not a surprise. Associates of Mr. Mehlman said in July that he would not seek a second term as chairman regardless of the outcome of the midterm elections.

He announced his decision two days after an election in which his party suffered sharp setbacks, losing control of both the House and the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0093630

Mr. Mehlman ruled out going to work for any of the 2008 presidential candidates.

"My intention is to focus on identifying a platform that will be professionally rewarding for me for the next decade, that will include politics but not be related to politics," he said.

Mr. Mehlman's time in office has been marked by strong fund-raising — the committee spent $77 million on candidates this year — as well as the pioneering of sophisticated voter identification and turnout technologies that Republicans and Democrats said helped account for his party's successes in 2002 and 2004.

"I'd love to have him come work for me," said Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, who is preparing for a presidential run in 2008. "He has revolutionized American politics."

Mr. Romney said Republican setbacks this year came about despite the advances Mr. Mehlman made in fund-raising and voter turnout operations.

"I don't think anyone has suggested that the Republican Party's challenges two days ago were due to party machinery," he said.

The praise from Mr. Romney was echoed in an unsolicited call from James Carville, a veteran Democratic operative who is married to Mary Matalin, a veteran Republican strategist.

"The R.N.C. did a better job than the D.N.C. this year," Mr. Carville said, referring to the Democratic National Committee.

He said Democrats succeeded because the party's House and Senate campaign committees compensated for what Mr. Carville described as the shortcomings of the Democratic National Committee, allowing the party to take advantage of a wave of voter resentment directed at Republicans.

"When one of these things hit, it doesn't matter who the party chairman is," he said.

Mr. Mehlman declined to comment on who might succeed him.

Some Republicans said that Maria Cino, the deputy secretary of transportation, had emerged as an early contender.

As the national chairman, Mr. Mehlman is paid $200,000 a year. Unlike recent party leaders, he did not do outside legal or lobbying work.

He said one of his motivations in leaving politics was to make more money.

Mehlman Won't Seek Another Term As Republican Party Chief (WP)

By Dan Balz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, who guided President Bush's reelection campaign to victory in 2004 and saw his party suffer the loss of the House and Senate on Tuesday, will not seek a second term as party leader, informed sources said last night.

Mehlman is leaving his position voluntarily and has not come under any pressure from the White House or state party leaders to vacate his position as a result of Tuesday's elections. According to a Republican strategist familiar with developments at the RNC, Mehlman told the White House in August that he would leave after the elections.

Mehlman met with reporters yesterday to review the midterm elections at a lunch sponsored by the Christian Science Monitor and was asked whether he planned to stay on as party chairman. He declined to answer directly but said, "I will announce soon what my plan is in the future."

White House officials are trying to recruit a successor, but it was not known last night whether there was a leading candidate. One name that has emerged is that of Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, who just lost a bid for the Senate. But a GOP source said Steele is not likely to become chairman.

Others mentioned publicly as possible successors include Maria Cino, a former RNC official and now deputy secretary of transportation, and Mary Matalin, former communications director for Vice President Cheney and one of the party's most visible advocates. But a GOP strategist said, "From what I understand, all these names are not on the table."

Mehlman has spent the past seven years helping to advance the electoral fortunes of Bush and the Republican Party.

Assigned to help organize the Iowa caucuses in the 2000 campaign, he quickly rose through the ranks. He has been a protege and confidant of White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove and a key member of the Republican team that, until this week, had proved to be one of the most successful political units in modern American history.

Mehlman was named White House political director when the president arrived in Washington in 2001 and was elevated to campaign manager for the Bush-Cheney reelection campaign in 2004.

Mehlman used his chairmanship to strengthen the party's sophisticated machinery for identifying and turning out voters, an operation that has won plaudits even from his Democratic adversaries.

DOJ_NMG_0093631

He also spent much of his time trying to enlarge the party's coalition, particularly among Hispanics and African Americans. He helped recruit three African Americans -- Steele among them -- as statewide candidates this year. All three lost, but Mehlman said yesterday that he remained committed to making the party more diverse.

The RNC came under criticism in this campaign, however, for sponsoring an advertisement in Tennessee's Senate race that critics claimed was a thinly veiled racial appeal against Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., who is black.

Mehlman's future plans were not disclosed last night. There has been speculation that he might join one of the 2008 presidential campaigns, but one knowledgeable strategist said he knew of no such agreement. One Republican said Mehlman, a lawyer, might join a politically connected law firm and might play a role in that capacity.

Redistricting: Home To Roost (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

How Republicans' Gerrymandering Efforts May Have Backfired

(See Corrections & Amplifications item below.)

WASHINGTON -- Gerrymandering was supposed to cement Republican control of the House of Representatives, offering incumbents a wall of re-election protection even as public opinion turned sharply against them. Instead, the party's strategy of recrafting district boundaries may have backfired, contributing to the defeats of several lawmakers and the party's fall from power.

The reason: Republican leaders may have overreached and created so many Republican-leaning districts that they spread their core supporters too thinly. That left their incumbents vulnerable to the type of backlash from traditionally Republican-leaning independent voters that unfolded this week.

That helps to explain why three of four Republican incumbents in the Philadelphia area were beaten this week, while the remaining incumbent hung on by just a few thousand votes. In Florida, meanwhile, state lawmakers had shifted some Republican voters from the secure district of former Rep. Mark Foley in an attempt to shore up the re-election chances of Rep. Clay Shaw without risking the Foley seat. Instead, Democrats took both. In Texas, former Majority Leader Tom DeLay's decision to transfer thousands of stalwart Republican voters from his district in 2004 to boost a neighboring seat heightened the burden on the write-in candidate trying to hold Mr. DeLay's seat. She lost it.

"The trade-off in redistricting is between safety and maximizing the numbers," says Alan I. Abramowitz, a political scientist at Emory University in Atlanta. "You can't do both,"

Redistricting, the traditionally once-a-decade process of redrawing of House districts to adjust to population trends, has always been a contentious procedure. But Republicans, under the leadership of Mr. DeLay, took the opportunity to use it as a reward or punishment to new heights in 2002.

In so doing, Republicans created two new vulnerabilities: the dangerous dilution of core voters and the nurturing of a sense of invulnerability that contributes to corruption and scandal.

"You can do a little thing wrong and, if you were in a district where you might be punished, you probably wouldn't do the little thing," says Michael P. McDonald, a redistricting expert at George Mason University. Today, he said, most House districts aren't in jeopardy unless "you take a bribe for a vote and you are thrown into jail for it."

The drive to maximize seats was seen by Republicans as a matter of survival. Democrats regained ground every cycle after the 1994 Republican takeover. By 2000, the Republican majority had shrunk to 221 seats from 231 in 1994. Democrats, aligned with the chamber's one independent, needed just six seats to retake control in 2002.

So Mr. DeLay and House Speaker Dennis Hastert turned to their allies in the statehouses to redraw congressional district boundaries to erase Democratic seats and give Republicans new ones. "We wish to encourage you in these efforts, as they play a crucial role in maintaining a Republican majority," the two leaders wrote in a letter to Pennsylvania lawmakers.

There are three weapons to employ in redistricting. "Packing" involves concentrating a group of voters, such as African-Americans, in one district. "Cracking" means splitting up a group of voters to diminish their influence. "Pairing" forces two incumbents into the same district. Pennsylvania lawmakers used them all.

Philadelphia's urban voters were packed into Democratic seats, making them bluer than before. Since the state was losing two seats because of a population decline in the 2000 census, six incumbents were paired. That meant four Democrats were left to fight over two seats. And one Democrat was forced to run against an incumbent Republican in a district that favored the Republican.

Then, the legislators employed the supercomputers at Pittsburgh's Carnegie Mellon University to carve up the Philadelphia suburbs. The goal: make four Republican seats by cracking apart any Democratic strongholds left outside the city.

DOJ_NMG_0093632

One of those districts, the sixth, starts at the city line and moves west to pick up several suburbs. Then it turns back east to capture conservative Chester County. And then it shoots north into the rolling farms of conservative Berks County where it splits four townships and ends in Reading. Reading itself was broken apart, precinct by precinct, to be shared by the sixth district's then-new congressman, Republican Rep. Jim Gerlach, and incumbent Republican Rep. Joe Pitts, of the 16th District.

"If you look at the Pennsylvania map, it's ugly," says Sam Hirsch, an attorney who argued against the constitutionality of the map before the U.S. Supreme Court. Democrats lost that case 5-4.

After the Pennsylvania redistricting, the partisan make-up of the state's House delegation shifted to 12 Republicans and seven Democrats from a pre-redistricting breakdown of 10 Democrats and 11 Republicans. That meant the balance of the state's delegation shifted from one that was split roughly evenly to one in which Republicans had a five-seat edge.

In 2002 the fruits of the work in Pennsylvania -- as well as similar efforts in Ohio, Michigan and Florida -- were clear when the Republicans' U.S. House majority widened to 229-204. Mr. DeLay wasn't done, though. The next year, he pushed through a new congressional map in Texas that produced another net gain of five Republican seats in the Lone Star state. By 2004, his House majority had grown to 232-202.

While Republicans lauded their Texas coup, pro-Democratic union leaders at the AFL-CIO headquarters in Washington, across the street from the White House, pored over the 2004 presidential and congressional results. They began to put together a pattern: Republican-held House seats where Democrat John Kerry narrowly won or lost also included high concentrations of union members.

In the summer of 2005, they created a target list for the 2006 campaign. The Philadelphia suburban seats of Mr. Gerlach, Rep. Curt Weldon and Rep. Melissa Hart were on it.

Combined, the lawmakers' districts are home to 182,000 union members. With direct-mail literature and telephone calls, the labor leaders attacked the incumbents for their stands on Social Security and a host of other issues working their way through Congress.

Meanwhile, MoveOn.org, the liberal online group, was working through similar calculations. They put Rep. Michael Fitzpatrick on their target sheet. He won two years ago by 1,500 votes. MoveOn members made 102,000 telephone calls to inconsistent Democratic voters urging them to get out on Election Day. Its members donated $90,000 to his opponent's campaign.

On Tuesday, Mr. Fiztpatrick lost 50.3% to 49.7%. Ms. Hart lost 52% to 48%. Mr. Weldon, who also was stung by late disclosure of a federal investigation of his actions, lost 57% to 43%. Mr. Gerlach, the last Republican standing whose district was custom-made for him, is ahead amid final vote counting, 50.5% to 49.5%

"If Republicans had been a little less aggressive, they could have won several of those seats. If they gave the Democrats one more seat, they could have shored up by several percentage points the other seats," says Nathaniel Persily, a political scientist at the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia.

That isn't to say all the Republicans' 2002 redistricting plans went awry. Ohio lawmakers were more conservative than the Pennsylvanians. Before redistricting, their House delegation had 11 Republicans and eight Democrats. Like Pennsylvania, they lost two seats because of population losses. Statehouse Republicans took those two seats from the Democrats. But they only added one Republican seat, creating a partisan delegation split of 12-6.

That is one reason why today several of their incumbents are still hanging on. The state was besieged with scandals and Democrats easily won the governorship and the senate race. Seven of the state's 12 Republican incumbents were on watch lists. But Democrats only have pocketed three of them. Two incumbents were re-elected and two more are clinging to their seats, albeit with tiny margins.

Write to Jeanne Cummings at jeanne.cummings@wsj.com1

Corrections & Amplifications:

Pennsylvania Rep. Melissa Hart's district is located in a suburb of Pittsburgh. This article says it was outside of Philadelphia.

Evangelical Leader: GOP Abandoned Voters (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Talhelm, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

Conservative Christian leader James Dobson accused the Republican Party of abandoning values voters in the midterm elections — and paying the price by losing control of Congress. "What did they do with their power?" Dobson said in a statement. "Very little that values voters care about."

Finger-pointing abounded in the days after Democrats seized control of Congress after 12 years in the minority. Dobson, chairman of Focus on the Family, issued a statement railing against the Republicans for letting their majorities slip away.

DOJ_NMG_0093633

"They consistently ignored the constituency that put them in power until it was late in the game, and then frantically tried to catch up at the last minute," said Dobson, who argued that religious conservatives ensured GOP wins in 2004.

Dobson also criticized other conservatives, including former Majority Leader Dick Armey, R-Texas — an architect of the 1994 GOP House takeover — for complaining recently that the religious right was "too involved" with the party.

"Without the support of that specific constituency, John Kerry would be president and the Republicans would have fallen into a black hole in '04," Dobson said. "In fact, that is where they are headed if they continue to abandon their pro-moral, pro-family and pro-life base. The big tent will turn into a three-ring circus."

Dobson said he had predicted in 2004 that Republicans might squander their opportunity and pay the price in future elections.

"Sadly for conservatives, that in large measure explains what happened on Tuesday night," he said. "Many of the values voters of '04 simply stayed at home this year."

The cybersex scandal involving former Republican Rep. Mark Foley of Florida and the fall of Ted Haggard, the evangelical pastor who was fired amid allegations of gay sex and drug use, left some values voters dispirited.

More than four in 10 evangelicals said corruption and scandals were extremely important, and those who felt that way were more likely to vote for Democratic candidates than other evangelicals. About a third who were most concerned about corruption cast their votes for Democrats, according to exit polls conducted for The Associated Press and the networks.

About seven in 10 white evangelicals voted for the Republican candidate, slightly less than the eight in 10 who voted for Bush in 2004.

The relationship between religious conservatives and the GOP has frayed a bit.

Author David Kuo, a former aide in the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, wrote in his book, "Tempting Faith, An Inside Story of Political Seduction," that Bush aides privately called conservative Christians "nuts," "ridiculous" and "goofy."

Focus on the Family is based in Colorado Springs, Colo.

Schwarzenegger Welcomes 'New Blood' In D.C. (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 10, 2006

MEXICO CITY — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said here today that he was heartened by Tuesday's election resulting in a Democratic takeover of Congress, welcoming what he described as "new blood coming to Washington."

Speaking publicly for the first time about his party's apparent loss of both the U.S. House and Senate, Schwarzenegger said he was hopeful that the changes will jump-start a political system that was paralyzed.

"I think it's good that there are new ideas and new blood, because Washington was stuck," the governor said, after a meeting with Mexican President Vicente Fox at Los Pinos, Mexico's equivalent of the White House. "They could not move forward. Not much was accomplished. I think it was terrible."

Schwarzenegger said he was hopeful that the results would usher in a new era of bipartisan cooperation — similar to what he said he is bringing about in Sacramento.

"So I think the people have spoken in America, all over the United States," the governor told a roomful of California and Mexican journalists. "And they've sent a very clear message to Washington: We are not happy about the way things were going. And I think we want to see a new way of going, and we want to see bipartisanship."

Soon after the governor finished speaking, one of his aides, communications director Adam Mendelsohn, told reporters that Schwarzenegger was not saying he was necessarily pleased to see Congress under Democratic control.

Rather, Schwarzenegger was making the point that "it's good there is an infusion of new ideas and desire for bipartisanship," Mendelsohn said.

Still, Schwarzenegger's tone was a marked difference from that of President Bush.

Schwarzenegger arrived in Mexico City late Wednesday for a two-day trade mission where he is meeting with various political leaders and business executives.

In the meeting with Fox, the Mexican president raised the issue of illegal immigration, a raw subject on both sides of the border. Schwarzenegger said he told Fox that plans to make the border more secure through hundreds of miles of fencing amount to "an incomplete way of solving the problem."

While the U.S. builds its fence, officials in Washington must also enact a guest worker program so that employers have a steady supply of labor and find ways to create new jobs in Mexico so that there is less incentive to cross the border illegally, Schwarzenegger said.

DOJ_NMG_0093634

Referring to the 63-person California business delegation that has joined him in Mexico, the governor said: "Right now I have with me a bunch of farmers from California and they're complaining because their crops are spoiling right now and we are losing millions and millions of dollars because we can't get the workers into California."

Schwarzenegger was accompanied at the breakfast meeting by a dozen people, including his wife, Maria Shriver; his agriculture, business and environmental Cabinet secretaries; Claire Bilby, vice president for Walt Disney Parks & Resorts; and Allan Zaremberg, president of the California Chamber of Commerce, a major business lobbying group.

Schwarzenegger gave Fox and his wife a gift of silver spurs engraved with the California seal.

The governor went from Los Pinos to a supermarket, where he examined the California produce and drank from a glass of California red wine. Large pictures of Schwarzenegger touting California products were displayed near the vegetables and wine.

"This governor really enjoys selling California — all aspects of California, whether it's tourism or the 400 different commodities we produce," said A.G. Kawamura, the governor's secretary of food and agriculture.

peter.nicholas@latimes.com

Schwarzenegger Implores GOP To Follow Script Of His Sequel (WP)

By John Pomfret

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Nov. 10 -- In his victory speech Tuesday night to a confetti-swamped crowd at the Beverly Hilton, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger had a message for the rest of the Republican Party after its worst defeat in decades.

Follow "the California way," he said. "We are proving to the nation that there is another way to go, a better path to solve problems."

Schwarzenegger's landslide victory in a largely Democratic state illustrates the growing power of moderate candidates and the electoral appeal of bipartisanship, and it could contain important lessons for Republicans and Democrats as they seek to position themselves in the future, analysts and politicians said.

"If I was a Republican National Committee chair, I would hire Arnold out and teach Republicans what is necessary to put together a winning campaign," said Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a political analyst at the University of Southern California. "He really is the poster boy of what Republicans have denied for so long. Elections are won from the center."

In the 56-percent-to-39-percent triumph over Democratic nominee Phil Angelides, described even by his own partisans as a somewhat lackluster performer, Schwarzenegger owned the center. According to an exit poll of more than 2,000 voters done by CNN, almost 60 percent of California's independent voters chose Schwarzenegger, while 58 percent of the people who identified themselves as moderate cast ballots for him. Even 22 percent of Democratic voters voted for the governor.

The reason for this landslide, analysts said, involved the 180-degree reversal Schwarzenegger has undergone over the past year. Schwarzenegger rolled into office on the back of an unprecedented recall election in 2003, promising to govern from the center. For the first year of his administration he did just that. But in late 2004, he embraced partisan tactics. He addressed the Republican Convention, stumped for President Bush in Ohio during a critical period in Bush's reelection campaign, and then, in early 2005, decided to take on all the entrenched-Democratic Party interests in Sacramento at once, including teachers, nurses and prison guards.

"Arnold did this Karl Rove-inspired move to the right," said Bruce Cain, a professor of political science at the University of California at Berkeley. "He got carried away with the 'base' strategy because it worked in 2004. He tried a little bit of Bush politics in California."

The result? Miserable failure. Schwarzenegger pushed a series of ballot initiatives, and in June 2005 Californians defeated all of them.

"Schwarzenegger in 2005 was like an action hero playing Shakespeare," said Don Perata, the leading Democrat in the state Senate. "He wasn't comfortable."

The plot twists that followed rivaled any of the former action hero's movies. He apologized to the voters and changed character. He hired a Democrat as his chief of staff and cut bipartisan deals to limit global warming, boost the minimum wage and reduce the cost of prescription drugs. He clashed with Bush over sending the National Guard to the Mexican border and environmental issues. And he embraced a Democratic Party-inspired, multibillion-dollar bond package to rebuild California's crumbling roads, levees, ports and schools. Democratic lawmakers, including Perata, campaigned side by side with Schwarzenegger to get the bonds passed, which they did.

As Schwarzenegger said Tuesday night: "I just love doing sequels."

Schwarzenegger's bipartisanship immunized him against attacks by Angelides that a vote for Schwarzenegger was a vote for Bush. Indeed, according to the CNN exit poll, 55 percent of the voters who said they "somewhat disapproved" of the president, voted for Schwarzenegger.

DOJ_NMG_0093635

On Thursday, during a two-day trip to Mexico, Schwarzenegger actually sounded satisfied with a nationwide Democratic victory, theorizing that it might be what the country needs to force cooperation.

"I think this is good that we have new blood coming to Washington, that we have new people with new ideas coming to Washington," the governor told reporters, "because Washington was stuck."

A Democratic shift in the country might actually help Schwarzenegger's political future. He is rumored to be considering a run for the U.S. Senate in 2010 to replace Democrat Barbara Boxer.

Another factor that might hold lessons for the country involves California itself. For years, the state has been a laboratory for mean-spirited partisan political campaigns. It has been one of the leaders in spending on negative campaign ads and one of the first states where political consultants experimented with targeted mailings and robo-calls. The 2002 gubernatorial campaign is considered one of the nastiest in the nation's history.

"So," Cain said, "we've gotten sick of partisanship first." Schwarzenegger ran a reasonably clean campaign against Angelides. Perhaps the most negative ad was a lighthearted spot that showed Angelides moonwalking backward as it said he planned to take California back in time.

Patrick Dorinson, communications director for the California Republican Party, said he thinks the message in Schwarzenegger's victory is that results, not ideology, guaranteed victory.

The alternative, he suggested is "to be ideologically pure and lose."

Schwarzenegger, he said, subscribes to the "big tent" idea of the Republican Party as enunciated by Ronald Reagan in the 1960s. Despite his reputation as a hard-line conservative, as a California governor Reagan worked well with Democrats, raised state taxes and signed into law what was, for the time, one of the most liberal abortion laws in the nation.

"You mention 'big tent' to some Republicans now and they say, 'No way, we can't have that,' " Dorinson said. "We've gotten away from this idea, but that was a mistake. The center is where the future is."

Indeed, Schwarzenegger's victory reminded Republicans, said political consultant Allen Hoffenblum, that you cannot get elected by the base alone. Schwarzenegger kept his base; more than 90 percent of Republicans voted for him. But he won because of his broad appeal.

"The Bush obsession with the base, the base, the base doesn't work here," Hoffenblum said. "I think this election showed that it doesn't work anywhere else either."

Gingrich Sees Hope For Conservatives (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 10, 2006

Republicans, suddenly a minority in both houses of Congress and led by an unpopular president, need to restore their image as the party of small government but at the same time avoid the image of blind obstructionism, party leaders and analysts said yesterday.

"We have to recognize that this was a defeat for Republicans, not for conservatives," former House Speaker Newt Gingrich told The Washington Times yesterday.

There is hope to advance a conservative agenda, Mr. Gingrich said, if House Republicans can find allies among conservative Democrats.

"The balance of power in the House is now 50-plus blue-dog [conservative] Democrats," he said.

It won't be easy for Republicans to recover from Tuesday's defeat, because the party has "completely lost its brand as the party of limited government and low spending," said former Rep. Pat Toomey, president of the conservative Club for Growth.

A poll of 15 key congressional districts by the Club for Growth showed voters now think "Democrats, not Republicans, are the party of smaller government," Mr. Toomey said.

By a 66 percent to 43 percent margin, voters think the "GOP used to be the party of economic growth, fiscal discipline and limited government, but in recent years, too many Republicans in Washington have become just like the big spenders that they used to oppose," the poll found.

"The American people sent a very important message to both parties and particularly to my party," Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman told reporters yesterday at a luncheon hosted by the Christian Science Monitor. "I think we've got to listen to that message. I think we've got to recommit ourselves to being the party of conservative reform."

One alumnus of the Gingrich-led 1994 "Republican Revolution" blamed Tuesday's loss on the Bush administration.

"The Republican Party ... needs to recognize that the Bush administration was largely the architect of its defeat, and that the party can no longer afford to play by yesterday's playbook," said former Rep. Bob Barr, Georgia Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0093636

According to the "old, time-worn playbook, a sitting Republican president is the head of the party and his team can pick party leaders and dictate the agenda," said Mr. Barr, who warned that "if the party follows that paradigm, it will slip further into minority status."

Republicans "must break with the White House," chart their own course "with new, younger, bolder leadership" and provide "a true alternative" to Democrats, Mr. Barr said.

However, one House Republican said, the need to show legislative accomplishments means that Republicans will have to cooperate with the new Democratic leadership -- even at the risk of alienating conservatives such as Colorado Rep. Tom Tancredo and other opponents of an immigrant guest-worker program.

"There will have to be a guest-worker program of some kind and something that is not a full amnesty," said Rep. Ralph M. Hall, Texas Republican. "That will probably lose the Tancredo faction."

Mr. Hall predicted that Mr. Tancredo "is a smart man and will find a way" to make such a compromise work.

But some warn that bipartisan cooperation can be a trap.

"It is really important that the GOP not allow itself to be drawn into the 'can't-we-all-get-along' role that the liberal pundits and media will now hammer the GOP minority to play," said elections lawyer Cleta Mitchell, a conservative Republican.

She noted that Democrats won on Tuesday after successfully blocking much of the Republican agenda. "The lesson from the Democrats may well be that getting nothing done is better than doing the things that your base opposes," Mrs. Mitchell said.

Unifying Republicans could prove a difficult challenge, given a recent outburst of finger-pointing within the party. Former Rep. Dick Armey, Texas Republican, who has publicly blamed Christian conservatives for the party's declining fortunes, yesterday wrote a column in the Wall Street Journal excoriating congressional leaders who he said had attempted "to rally their political base on wedge issues like illegal immigration and gay marriage," and had thereby "alienated independents."

Mr. Armey's criticism -- and similar comments by Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican -- angered Focus on the Family Chairman James C. Dobson.

Republicans this year failed to motivate the "values voters" who helped Mr. Bush claim victory in 2004, said Mr. Dobson, who warned that some politicians are attempting to make social conservatives the scapegoats for Republican failures.

"The unfortunate thing is that Republican leaders still don't appear to get it," said Mr. Dobson, quoting Mr. Specter's Wednesday comments that the election results represented a "seismic earthquake" and advising Republicans to become "a lot more progressive and a lot less ideological."

Mr. Dobson said Mr. Armey "can't be serious" in urging Republicans to repudiate Christian conservatives.

"Someone should tell him that without the support of that specific constituency, John Kerry would be president and the Republicans would have fallen into a black hole in '04," said Mr. Dobson, who warned that the Republican Party's "big tent" could "turn into a three-ring circus."

Compounding the Republican Party's problem is the looming 2008 presidential campaign, said Rep. Ernest Istook, Oklahoma Republican.

Republicans "have a great challenge in trying to present a unified message, trying to bring House, Senate and presidential candidates all onto the same page," said Mr. Istook, who was defeated Tuesday in his campaign for governor of Oklahoma. "Unless the GOP nominee becomes apparent early, there will be a struggle to gain this unity."

Noting the defeat of Virginia Sen. George Allen, once viewed by conservatives as a favorite for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, Mr. Istook asked, "Do we have a contender with credentials that can bring this conservative unity? Certainly not [former New York Mayor Rudolph W.] Giuliani or [Arizona Sen. John] McCain. This is why I say that it's overly optimistic to think that this is just a two-year setback that will spark an immediate rebound by the conservative movement."

· Amy Fagan contributed to this report.

Minority Report (WSJ)

By Jeff Flake

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

I was rummaging through my closet the other day when I came across an old T-shirt. Stamped across the front were the words "SCRAP THE CODE: The Armey-Tauzin Tax Reform Debates." On the back was a list of 25 cities on the "National Tax Reform Tour."

What a difference a few years makes. During this election season, Republican congressional leaders awarded members with a bronze bust of Ronald Reagan if they could prove they'd hosted town halls to explain to seniors how to sign up for the newly created Medicare Part D, which created a huge new prescription-drug entitlement in an already huge entitlement program.

And we wonder why we were beaten like a rented mule on Tuesday? * * *

DOJ_NMG_0093637

The contest between the parties has come, for now, to a decisive close. But as Republicans, we have a choice to make, and we need to make it soon. The factions of the party must decide: Are we going to re-emerge as the party of ideas -- or be content as assistant hirelings of big government?

We might begin by asking why we lost. Taxes, first, is the easy one, and there is no need for a Republican mea culpa here. We've cut taxes, and Americans and the economy are better off for it. But recently we've been satisfied with putting Democrats "on record" supporting higher taxes. We need to do more. We will soon be bumping up against the deadlines to either repeal or extend the Bush tax cuts on income, estates, capital gains and dividends. This presents an excellent opportunity to rebuild momentum. Our congressional leadership should travel around the country -- concert tour style -- explaining why individuals spend their money better than the government.

Second, spending. This one is more difficult because it requires not just a mea culpa but abject apology. Not the politician-style -- "I'm sorry if you were offended by spending that our opponents have misinterpreted as offensive" -- but rather: "We've overspent, badly, and it was offensive to you as well as our conservative principles. We're sorry, and we're going to do better."

It is not only the level of spending, of course, that has been offensive. It is the manner of spending. Pork-barrel earmarks, or "member projects" (as we preferred to call them so as not to offend our own sensibilities), greatly multiplied under Republican rule. The Democrats were happy as long as enough crumbs fell from the Republican appropriators' table. Now that we are in the minority, will we be similarly satisfied or will we seek to change the practice?

On this issue, our constituents need no convincing. They know it is wrong. We need the courage to enact meaningful reforms, doubly difficult because of the present situation. But if we are chastened -- we ought to be -- perhaps we will emerge stronger for it. If Republicans are serious about changing direction, there will be ample opportunities in the next two years to translate our dormant beliefs into action.

The Farm Bill probably provides the best example of where we've gone wrong, and what we need to do to hew back to our first principles.

During the 1990s, then-Sen. Phil Gramm accurately described U.S. farm policy as "enough to make a Russian Commissar puke." The Republicans assembled the "Freedom to Farm Act," which, starting in 1996, put U.S. farmers on a glide path toward an end to subsidies. Somewhere between the field and the silo, however, we became mired in the political mud. In 2002, we repealed the Freedom to Farm Act and in its place installed the "Farm Security Act" -- those who value the adage about trading freedom for security can pause and shudder here -- with even more lavish subsidies.

Now, with reauthorization of the Farm Bill on the horizon next year, we have to decide whether we will up the ante with Democrats in terms of red state/blue state politics in the heartland, or whether we believe our own rhetoric about free markets. This debate will have implications larger than the fiscal one. Most notably, it will determine if we are serious about the future of free trade.

Of immediate concern to Republicans in the House of Representatives is deciding who will be our standard bearer. Can those who have been a part of the current leadership team convince the other members that they've had an epiphany? It's possible, I suppose. But I think we'd be best served with some fresh faces, congressmen like Mike Pence and John Shadegg, who haven't had to travel that road to Damascus.

Mr. Flake is a Republican representative from Arizona.

Bridge To Somewhere (WSJ)

A16

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

As they lick their wounds, Republicans are no doubt wondering what went wrong and what to do now. The answers aren't all that complicated: Revive the reform convictions that earned them power in the 1990s, and start that process in the House of Representatives by electing a new slate of leaders.

Twelve years ago, the Newt Gingrich-led Republicans swept into power as reformers who ran against corruption and pledged to make government "smaller and smarter." Somehow, across the years, that conviction was replaced by Tom DeLay and the quest for permanent incumbency, Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis and the "earmark" brigade, and a retinue of Beltway retainers symbolized by Jack Abramoff. The current leadership let it all happen, and if Republicans want a shot at regaining control in 2008 they'll turn to a new generation to lead them. * * *

If we had to pick the precise moment when House Republicans lost their way, it would be three years ago during the floor vote over the Medicare prescription drug bill. So unpopular was the bill among conservatives, and rightly so, that House leaders kept the vote open for an unheard of three hours as they dragooned reluctant Members to vote aye.

The other great symbol of GOP failure is the proliferation of earmarked spending. In 1994 there were 1,500 such projects stuffed into Democratic spending bills, and Republicans called this a fiscal disgrace. This year Republicans approved closer to 15,000 earmarks at a cost of more than $10 billion. The current leadership defended this earmarking even after such embarrassments as the Alaska Bridge to Nowhere were exposed. When they finally agreed to minimal transparency, it was too late.

DOJ_NMG_0093638

Here's one telling exit poll result: In battleground districts, only one in five voters said Republicans would do a better job to "keep government spending under control"; almost twice as many voters said Democrats would do a better job. Yet this week a separate poll found that 59% of Americans still favor fewer government services and lower taxes compared with 28% who favor more government services and higher taxes. "Big government conservatism" was a nice think-tank proposition; it merely lacks support from actual voters.

As a minority party in Congress, Republicans must operate as the party of change, not of Washington insiders willing to sign away their principles for a courthouse or swimming pool in the home district. This doesn't mean they shouldn't work with Democrats when it makes policy sense. But they need to reclaim their fiscal conservative birthright.

Republicans also need to rediscover an agenda for reforming government programs that don't work or threaten to bankrupt future generations. The Gingrich Republicans did that with welfare reform in the 1990s, and they tried with Medicaid. Then President Bush gave Republicans a once-in-a-generation chance to reform Social Security and health care along free market lines, but GOP House leaders fought him behind the scenes. For this alone, they should be returned to the backbenches.

The Senate GOP also committed some of these sins, but likely Minority Leader Mitch McConnell isn't among the big offenders. He's made his mark on policy by fighting for free speech, among other things; he knows the intricacies of the Senate and is likely to prove formidable as an opposition leader.

The problem is the House, where Speaker Dennis Hastert has already announced he won't stand for minority leader. Others in the leadership are claiming to have learned their lesson and promise a new beginning. That's for Members to judge. But we'd be wary of leaders who stake their claim to power on their ability to soak the lobbying mecca of K Street, or who refused to challenge the Appropriators who did so much to besmirch the image of the current, and soon-to-vanish, GOP majority.

Republicans might also recall what happened to Democrats when they tried to regain the House in 1996 by running with the same leadership and agenda that had been ousted in 1994. Those Democrats failed, despite Bill Clinton's victory at the top of the ticket, because too many voters saw the same old story. If Republicans lose again in 2008, they could be in the minority for a long time. * * *

The good news is that a younger generation does seem to be stepping forward. Mike Pence, of Indiana, has already declared for minority leader, and John Shadegg of Arizona is seeking the number two job as whip. Paul Ryan of Wisconsin, Jeb Hensarling of Texas and Jeff Flake of Arizona (see his essay nearby) are among the other Members who have tried to put ideas above mere incumbency. Republican Members will make up their own minds, but their willingness to consider new leadership will say a lot about the lessons they've learned from this week's drubbing.

Too many Republicans were corrupted and seduced by power and forgot why voters sent them to Washington. Winning back the majority requires new faces of leadership far removed from this year's debacle.

A Putsch At The DNC? (TNR)

By Ryan Lizza

The New Republic Online, November 10, 2006

Some big name Democrats want to oust DNC Chairman Howard Dean, arguing that his stubborn commitment to the 50-state strategy and his stinginess with funds for House races cost the Democrats several pickup opportunities.

The candidate being floated to replace Dean? Harold Ford.

Says James Carville, one of the anti-Deaniacs, "Suppose Harold Ford became chairman of the DNC? How much more money do you think we could raise? Just think of the difference it could make in one day. Now probably Harold Ford wants to stay in Tennessee. I just appointed myself his campaign manager."

Steele Still A Main Attraction (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow, Jon Ward

The Washington Times, November 11, 2006

Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele is being pulled in several directions -- to take over as the national leader of the Republican Party in two months, to take a Cabinet post in the Bush administration or to go into the private sector.

"No one from the White House or the Republican National Committee has formally offered me" the RNC chairmanship or a Cabinet post, Mr. Steele told The Washington Times yesterday.

